LAGIN, ATTEMPT ON. A ſtrong fort in the neighbourhood of Paris. In the beginning of the year 1432, the Duke of Bedford, Regent of France, during the minority of Henry VI. detached the Earl of Arundel and the Marechal de l'Iſle Adam, to beſiege Lagin, which had been lately ſurpriſed by Focaut; but the garriſon made ſuch a vigorous ſally, that he was obliged to abandon the enterprize. Towards Auguſt, the Regent again reſumed the ſiege in perſon, with an army of 6000 men, but in ſpite of his vigilance and precaution, the Baſtard of Orleans introduced a convoy into the place, and the Duke of Bedford apprehending that he carried on ſome intelligence with the Pariſians, ſudenly raiſed the ſiege of Lagin, and returned to the capital.

LAGONA TAKEN. A town in Santa Cruz, one of the Azore Iſles. The Earl of Cumberland in the year 1592 prepared for an expedition againſt Spain, the common enemy. His firſt intention was to command in perſon; but having loſt three months by contrary winds in the Channel, before he could gain the weſt of Plymouth, by which he loſt the opportunity of attacking the Spaniſh outward-bound carracks, he transferred the command in chief to one Captain Norton, with inſtructions to ſail to the Azores.

This little ſquadron conſiſted of one ſhip of 600 tons, called the Tiger; two ſhips called the Samſon and Golden Noble; and two other ſmaller ſhips. They ſtood firſt for the Rock of Liſbon, where, off Caſcais, they took a good Portugueſe prize, and diſpatched her under the convoy of the Golden Noble for England. The others ſteered for the Azores; where having watered and refreſhed themſelves, they cruized off Santa Cruz, and gave chaſe to a rich Portugueſe carrack, and forced her aſhore in the road of Lagona, without being able to come up with her by reaſon of a ſtorm that night. So that by the next day the Portugueſe had landed as much of the goods as was poſſible; and to prevent her falling into the enemy's hands ſet fire to her themſelves; but they were ſo cunning, notwithſtanding their haſte, that they loaded all her great ordnance; which when the fire came at them went off, without the help of a gunner. The Engliſh concluded, with good reaſon, that the prey which was not to be taken on the water, might be found on ſhore if they landed quickly. This they did, though with great difficulty, and made themſelves maſters, both of a good part of the booty, and the town likewiſe, which was by that time entirely forſaken of the inhabitants. And by waiting a month or two, another rich carrack, called the Madre de Dios, (on the 3d of Auguſt) fell into their hands. This veſſel being large, well furniſhed with men, and richly laden, coſt them ſome pains and trouble before they could entirely maſter her. Both Engliſh and Portugueſe fought like dragons, the one to defend, the other to obtain ſo great riches, for the ſpace of an hour and a half before ſhe ſurrendered. The Engliſh had like to have been blown up too, after the diſpute was over; being upon the hunt after plunder, every man with his lighted candle in his hand; for a cabin, in which a vaſt quantity of powder was laid up, was ſet on fire; and if it had not been preſently extinguiſhed by the great induſtry and courage of Captain Norton, it had reached the dreadful heap of gunpowder, and carried away both the plunder and the plunderers together into the air. But after all was ſecured, and in their own hands, there was no ſmall contention about dividing the ſpoil. For there being ſeveral other ſhips in company with them, in this action, all pretended to a ſhare. And as theſe ſhips were moſt of them her Majeſty's, their pretenſions were the ſtronger, and the claim the more undeniable.

The Earl of Cumberland's part (in proportion to his charges) muſt needs have been very conſiderable, perhaps a million or two. But then becauſe he did not act in perſon, and his commiſſion had not provided for the caſe of his return, the matter was determined ſo, that he ſhould ſtand to the Queen's mercy and bounty. So his Lordſhip came off with about 36,000l. and this not as a juſt ſhare, but as a free gift and favour.

LAGOS, NAVAL ENGAGEMENT OFF. Lagos is a cape or promontory in the province of Algarve, in the kingdom of Portugal, not far from Cape St. Vincent.

June 9, 1693. Advice came from the conſul of Oporto, that on the firſt of that month an expreſs arrived at Liſbon from Algarve, with an account that Monſieur Tourville with the French fleet, conſiſting of ſeventy-five ſhips of war, and ſeveral other ſhips and veſſels, in all to the number of 114, were come into the Bay of Lagos, between Cape St. Vincent and Faro.

At firſt they ſhewed Engliſh colours, and ſome of them Dutch, and by Engliſhmen ſent on ſhore they pretended to be of thoſe nations; but the next day the Governor ſending on board the Admiral, he inſinuated as if he had been forced in there by bad weather, and that he intended to ſail the following morning; though doubtleſs his real deſign was to intercept the Engliſh ſhips of war and their convoys.

Beſides this intelligence, an expreſs was ſent by the Biſhop of Algarve, with advice that the Count d'Eſtrees was joined by Monſieur de Tourville, and that the whole body of the French fleet ſeemed to ſtand off to ſea, in order firſt to double Cape St. Vincent, and then to proceed northward: beſides which there was advice at Cadiz, that they had been diſcovered in Lagos Bay the 6th of June, in all about 120 ſail, of which ſeventy were great ſhips, together with ſixteen fireſhips, and ſix bomb-veſſels, and that twenty of them were cruizing weſtward.

Theſe advices reaching the Engliſh court, the lords of the admiralty ſent orders to the Admiral on the 23d of June, to diſtribute the expected proviſions equally as ſoon as they arrived, and to cauſe each captain to take on board what water he could, inaſmuch as it was probable the ſervice might require the fleet's continuing at ſea a conſiderable time; and directions were given to the commiſſioners for victualling, to provide as faſt as poſſible they could, and haſten to the fleet what proviſions were then ſhipped off; for, at that time, what they had on board would not ſuffice longer than is hereafter mentioned, according to the computation which was made thereof by the agent to the ſaid commiſſioners.

On the 23d of June, a council of war was held at Torbay, in which it was reſolved to bear away for Liſbon directly, in caſe they could be properly victualled; but to prevent all danger, orders were immediately diſpatched to Sir George Rooke, of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter. If this reſolution had been purſued, and the fleet had actually ſailed for Liſbon, ſomething might have been done worthy of the Engliſh nation. But upon the 1ſt of July another council of war was held, in which though the Queen's orders were produced for their executing what themſelves had before propoſed, yet the flags came to a new reſolution, which was to ſubmit it to her Majeſty, whether, if the French ſquadrons were joined, and ſhould ſail north about, the coaſts of England might not be expoſed to ſome inſult during their abſence. This was doing what they had always charged the council with doing, viz. altering their ſcheme when it ought to be put in execution. They knew well enough that a hint of the coaſt being in danger, would be ſufficient to prevent their quitting it; and this was certainly what they now intended, and might eaſily have been diſcerned to be what its conſequences ſhewed it, a weak and ruinous meaſure, which expoſed Sir George Rooke, and the rich fleet under his care, to be attacked by the whole force of France, while we had a ſuperior fleet riding to no purpoſe in the Channel. But it is now time to leave it, and ſpeak of the conduct and fortune of that Vice-Admiral on this critical occaſion, whom they had left with the Straits fleet off Uſhant, on the 6th of June 1693, without having at that time any certain intelligence either of the force of the French ſquadrons, or where they were ſailed; which put that Admiral under very great difficulties, and therefore we cannot wonder that he expreſſed ſome concern at the great riſk the numerous fleet of merchantmen under his convoy was like to run.

It is true his ſquadron was very ſtrong, conſiſting of no leſs than twenty-three men of war, and he had under him two flag officers of great courage and experience, viz. the Dutch Vice-Admiral Vandergoes, and Rear-Admiral Hopſon. But then the merchantmen under his care were nearly 400, and not only Engliſh and Dutch, but Danes, Swedes, Hamburghers, Flemings, &c. ſo that our reputation as a maritime power, was in a manner ſtaked for their ſafety. When he left the fleet he had a very fair and ſtrong gale of wind, which carried him at ſuch a rate, as prevented any advice-boats ſent with freſh inſtructions from coming up with him; and he was ſo unlucky too as not to meet with any ſhips at ſea that could give him notice of Monſieur Tourville's fleet being in that part of the world. In this ſituation of things he purſued, as was his duty, his inſtructions, and having left by the way the veſſels bound for Bilboa, Liſbon, St. Ubes, and other places, he continued his courſe for the Straits.

Being the 17th of that month about ſixty leagues ſhort of Cape St. Vincent, he ordered the Lark, a nimble ſixth rate, to ſtretch ahead of his ſcouts in Lagos Bay, and get what intelligence could be had there of the enemy; which ſhip hauling the ſhore on board in the night more than the reſt of the fleet did, lay becalmed.

The next day the ſcouts diſcovered two of the enemy's ſhips, and giving them chaſe until a little after noon, the Chatham of fifty guns came up with one of them, them, mounted with ſeventy guns, and engaged her a ſhort time; but ſeeing eight or ten ſail under the Cape, ſhe left her and repaired to the Admiral with an account of what had been diſcovered. Upon which he called a council of war; and purſuant to a reſolution taken in this council of war, the fleet making ſail, ran along ſhore all night with a preſſed ſail, and forced ſeveral of the enemy's ſhips to cut from their anchors in Lagos Bay.

By break of day the next morning, being off Villa Nova, it fell a calm, when about ten ſail of the enemy's men of war, with ſome other ſmall ſhips, were ſeen in the offing. Theſe ſhips ſtood away with their boats ahead, ſetting fire to ſeveral, and abandoning others of the ſmaller veſſels, ſome of which fell into our hands, and in one of them there was a train laid which blew up twenty men. A fireſhip of theirs was likewiſe taken in the night. The men belonging to this fireſhip informed the Admiral, (as had alſo ſeveral fiſhermen before) that the ſquadron conſiſted of no more than fifteen ſhips of the line of battle; but that there were three flags, Monſieur Tourville, Monſieur Villet, and Monſieur Lernon; and that they had with them above forty ſail of ſtoreſhips and merchant ſhips bound to Toulon, or to meet Monſieur d'Eſtrees. They ſaid, likewiſe, that the ſquadron had been becalmed off the Cape, and having watered in the Bay, were now bound directly into the Straits, without any intention of ſeeing our fleet. This, with the haſty retreat of their men of war in the morning, and the deſerting and burning their ſmall veſſels, amuſed the Admiral and the reſt of the flag officers and captains for the preſent; but afterwards it was judged (and with reaſon too), that the precipitate retreat of this little part of the fleet (unleſs they were at firſt ſurpriſed, and judged our whole ſtrength might be together, from the number of merchant ſhips) was on purpoſe to amuſe us, and thereby draw our ſquadron on inſenſibly into the body of them. It is, however, not improbable that they apprehended, by their numbers, the whole Engliſh fleet was coming upon them; and, indeed, had they come ſo far with them, here was an occaſion offered, which perhaps may not be found again in an age, of deſtroying their whole ſtrength at ſea.

About noon the ſea breeze ſprung up at weſt-north-weſt and north-weſt, when the Admiral bore away along the ſhore upon the enemy, diſcovering their ſtrength the more the nearer he came to them. At laſt he reckoned about eighty ſail, commanded by Monſieur de Tourville: but the number that plied up to him was not above ſixteen, with three flags, viz. the Admiral, Vice-Admiral of the Blue, and Rear-Admiral of the White; for the Vice-Admiral of the White ſtood off to ſea, that he might weather our ſquadron and fall in with the merchant ſhips, whilſt the body of their fleet lay to the leeward of one another as far as they could be ſeen.

At three in the afternoon, our ſquadron being within four miles of the enemy, Vice-Admiral Vandergoes brought to, and ſent to Sir George Rooke, to let him know that he was then ſenſible of the deceit, their whole fleet being now viſible; for which reaſon he was for avoiding fighting if poſſible, being fearful that not only many of the merchant ſhips would be loſt, but an engagement be too hazardous.

The Admiral thought he was then advanced too far to think of retreating, and therefore until he received this meſſage, was fully reſolved to puſh for it; but conſidering afterwards the blame would lie upon him, ſhould he expoſe himſelf to the hazard of ſo unequal a fight, contrary to the opinion and advice of the Dutch flag-officer, and miſcarry, he brought to, and ſtood off with an eaſy ſail, that the Dutch and the heavy ſhips might work up to the windward. He ſent at the ſame time the Sheerneſs with orders to the ſmall ſhips that were near the land, and probably could not keep up with the fleet, to endeavour to get along ſhore in the night, and ſave themſelves in Faro, St. Lucar, or Cadiz.

The Admiral and Vice-Admiral of the Blue, with about ten ſail of the enemy's fleet, fetched up the Engliſh ſquadron very faſt, ſo that about ſix in the evening they came up with two Dutch men of war, and ſome merchant ſhips of that nation. The men of war were commanded by the Captains Schryver and Vander-Poel, who finding themſelves under the wind, and therefore in no probability of eſcaping, tacked in for the ſhore, and thereby drew the enemy after them, which ſaved the reſt of the fleet. The Dutch captains made a moſt deſperate defence, but were at laſt overpowered by numbers and taken. The Admiral ſtood off all night, having a freſh gale at N. N. W. and the next morning found fifty-four ſhips about him, among which were only two Dutch and one Hamburgher. Five ſail of the enemy's ſhips appeared to the leeward, and two to the windward, which laſt dogged him all the day.

In a letter written by Captain Littleton, Commander of the Smyrna Factor man of war, from Cadiz, we have the following particulars; ſome of which are not in any other accounts.

The 17th of June, at nine in the morning, we arrived in the height of Cape St. Vincent, and about two in the afternoon the headmoſt ſailers diſcovered the French, and about four in the afternoon both ſides engaged for ſome time. After which the headmoſt retired, and gave notice to the officer in chief.

The 27th, in the morning, we arrived near Lagos, and our ſhips took a fireſhip of the enemy's, which reported, that there were at Lagos eighteen French men of war, with ſome fireſhips and merchantmen. About four in the morning two ſhips blew up, or elſe the enemy ſet them on fire themſelves, within cannon-ſhot of the convoy. The Commander alſo gave the ſignal of drawing into a line of battle; for until then we deſcried no more than twenty-nine ſail of the enemy. There was no wind ſtirring until ten o'clock, at which time a freſh gale aroſe, and then we diſcovered a greater number of ſhips. The convoy alſo ſteering ſouthward, perceived on the one ſide forty ſail under three flags, beſides another ſquadron which endeavoured to get between us and the coaſts; which the Admiral obſerving, gave notice to the merchantmen make all the ſail they could for the port of Cadiz, while the men of war kept the enemy in play. This deſign was obſerved by the French, who made all the ſail they could to intercept us; but the convoy having the wind, kept the enemy in play until the evening, and gave time to the nimbleſt ſailers to get hither. Towards five in the afternoon the eighteen French men of war above-mentioned engaged the convoy, and the fight laſted ſome part of the beginning of the night, the reſt of the fleet not being able to come up with them. The 28th, in the morning, the fight began with greater fury, ſo that about ſeven o'clock our veſſels ſaw four ſhips on fire, not knowing whether French or Engliſh, and the guns were heard until nine, though the event be not yet known. It is to be feared we may have loſt ſome men of war and ſeveral merchants.

This engagement happened about ſix miles from Cape St. Mary.

The account which the French give of this action.—The Engliſh and Dutch, ſays Father Daniel, ſuſtaining every day great loſſes from the French privateers, and more particularly by thoſe of St. Maloes, had reſolved to ſecure their Smyrna fleet from any ſuch inſults, by putting it under the convoy of twenty-two men of war. Advice of this precaution being carried to the French king, his Majeſty ordered Monſieur de Tourville, with ſixty ſhips, which had been got together in the ports of the ocean, to ſail towards the coaſts of Portugal, and there way-lay the Smyrna fleet. Their ſcouts diſcovered it a few days afterwards; but as they had information that the Engliſh were at ſea, with a fleet of ninety men of war, which had been ſeen on the coaſt of France, the Admiral, who was not yet joined with the Toulon ſquadron, conſiſting of thirty ſhips, under the Count d'Eſtrees, thought fit to detach twenty of his beſt ſailers to take a view of the Engliſh fleet, and to begin the attack, if they did not find them much more numerous than themſelves, whilſt he would back them with the body of his fleet. They executed the orders given them, and took, at the beginning of their attack, two men of war; after which they burnt, ſunk, or run aground upon the coaſt, ſixty merchant ſhips; twenty-ſeven were taken; and the remainder, which could not make their way for England, took refuge at St. Lucar, Cadiz, and Gibraltar. The Marquis of Coetlogon, commander of a ſquadron, burnt four ſhips very richly laden at Gibraltar, and carried off thirteen, though they were defended by the batteries of the place and an eſtacade. If a greater number of men of war had taken the ſame courſe by night as the Sieurs de Belleiſle-Errard, de Chaland, and d'Henri, the Engliſh and Dutch would have ſuſtained a far greater loſs, though as it happened it was very conſiderable, and amounted, according to the relation of the captains of ſhips who were taken, to above twenty (de Larrey ſays twenty-five) millions of livres; (that is ſomething above 1,000,000l. ſterling).

Monſieur de Fourbin, who was in the action, gives the following account of it in his memoirs.—The King's (i. e. the French King's) fleet, which conſiſted of ſeventy-five men of war, commanded by the Mareſchal de Tourville, ſet ſail for the Straits of Gibraltar, where the Count d'Eſtrees, who was coming with twenty other ſhips from Provence, was to join him. They came to anchor in the road of Lagos, on the coaſt of Portugal. I (ſays our author) was ſent out for intelligence, with orders ſtrictly to examine whatever came to my view; and particularly, if I ſaw a great number of ſhips, I was to make it my buſineſs to diſcover whether they were merchantmen, or the enemy's ſhips of force. I was accompanied with three other captains, who were ſent on the ſame errand. We ſet ſail together, and in a few days, we diſcovered a fleet of the enemy's merchantmen. We found they conſiſted of upwards of 150 ſail, and being well aſſured of our fact, we returned with all poſſible haſte to the fleet, to give the Admiral an account of it, with an aſſurance, that it was a fleet of merchantmen, and not men of war. Upon this advice the Admiral made ready for ſailing, and ſtretched out, for what reaſon I am at a loſs to ſay, before the wind, to ten leagues diſtance. The next day our whole fleet diſcovered the enemy. The Admiral gave orders for the chaſe: but the enemy took the advantage of the wind, which our working the night before had made us loſe, and fled, inſomuch that we did them very little damage. We took, nevertheleſs, two of their men of war of ſixty guns, and about thirty of their merchant ſhips, which ran aground on the coaſt of Portugal, and were burnt. I, for my part, burnt three of them, and took a fourth. It was happy for them that they came off ſo well; for had it not been for the falſe ſtep I juſt now hinted at, their whole fleet would have been loſt.—Monſieur de Fourbin was not, it ſeems, let into the ſecret; nor did he obſerve the real neglect, which our fleet took the advantage of, and thereby eſcaped.

Thus the enemy drew our ſquadron and trade into the ſnare; but had they purſued their advantage, and executed their deſign with as much conduct and reſolution as it was projected, hardly a ſhip would have eſcaped; for their Admiral and Vice-Admiral of the Blue, were within ſhot of Sir George Rooke, when they tacked and ſtood into the ſhore after the Dutch, and thereby ſaved the reſt of the fleet.

This misfortune lay heavy upon the hearts of the merchants, and indeed upon the minds of all the people of England. The Turkey company in particular complained that the departure of the fleet was deſignedly put off till the French fleet was in a readineſs to wait for them; that the Admirals had advice of part of their fleet being at ſea when they left the Turkey convoy; and that the whole tranſaction as it happened, was publicly talked of ſix weeks before at Marſeilles. And therefore, at the meeting of the parliament, the firſt thing they did, was to inquire into the miſcarriages of the fleet the laſt ſummer, and to conſider how beſt to preſerve the trade of the nation. Some time was ſpent in examining the inſtructions and orders given to the fleet, (which were thought weakly drawn, ambiguous and defective, but worſe executed), the number of ſhips for the line of battle, and of the convoys and cruizers, the admirals who commanded both, both, and the refults of the feveral councils of war held by them. Great exceptions were taken to the many delays, by which it feemed a train was laid that they fhould not get out of our ports before the French were ready to lay wait for them. They were accufed of not having ufed any zeal or diligence in getting information concerning the French fleet; but had, in that important article, trufted too eafily to general and uncertain reports. Againft all which they chiefly fcreened themfelves by alleging, they had punctually obeyed their orders. After all which, on the 17th of November, the commons refolved, "It was the opinion of that houfe, that there had been a notorious and treacherous mifmanagement in the miſcarriage of the Smyrna fleet." Their next inquiry was, "Why the Straits fleet was ſtopped till the main fleet went out?" And then, "Why the main fleet did not convoy Sir George Rooke's fquadron and the merchant fhips out of danger of the French fleet?" And it being alledged, that the main fleet was not fufficiently victualled, the Commons examined the ſtate of their ſtores at failing from Spithead, and thereupon refolved, on the 27th of November, "That there were fufficient beer and other ſtores on board the main fleet, when Sir George Rooke ſeparated, to have ſerved them till they had convoyed this ſquadron and the merchant ſhips out of danger of the Breſt fleet." But though the miſcarriage was notorious, they knew not where to fix the particular blame; for on the 29th, the queſtion being put, "That it did appear to that houſe, that the Admirals who commanded the fleet the laſt ſummer, had, on the 11th of May laſt, information that part of the Breſt fleet was going out to ſea," it paſſed in the negative. And on the 6th of December, another queſtion being put, "That the Admirals, by not ſending into Breſt for intelligence, before they left the Straits ſquadron, were guilty of a high breach of the truſt that was repoſed in them, to the great loſs and diſhonour of the nation," it was likewiſe carried in the negative. Before this inquiry in parliament, the Admirals had been examined before the council-board; but nothing could be made appear to the prejudice of their honour, only ſome flying reports which gave occaſion to this order of council, on the 25th of October. "Whereas a report has been raiſed and ſpread, by Henry Killegrew, Eſq. Sir Ralph Delaval and Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, Knights, Admirals of their Majeſties fleet, that the Honourable the Lord Viſcount Falkland, one of the Lords of their Majeſties moſt Honourable Privy Council, did, upon reading a paper at the board, ſtifle ſomething that was material to their juſtification: the Lords of the Council having conſidered of, and examined into the matter, are ſatisfied, and do declare, that the ſaid report is falſe and ſcandalous; although, upon the ſaid examination, it did alſo appear, that ſomething happened which might lead the Admirals into that error, and it is ordered in Council, that this be printed and publiſhed in the Gazette."

The French Admiral, in the mean time, proceeded up the Straits, and coming to Malaga, the 20th of July, aſſured the Governor his deſign was only upon the Engliſh and Dutch ſhips, unleſs the city attempted to defend them, in which caſe he ſhould bombard it. The Governor anſwered, that he ſhould protect theſe ſhips to the utmoſt of his power, having his maſter's orders ſo to do; upon which, the next day, he laid his broadſides againſt four Dutch and one Engliſh ſhip in the Mole. He twice attempted to burn the Union frigate, but was bravely repulſed: however, he continued his fire with ſo much fury, that the maſters themſelves ſeeing there was no poſſibility of ſaving the ſhips, after having done their utmoſt to defend them, ſunk them; though Father Daniel pretends, the French took ſix ſhips here.

The French upon this returned to Cadiz, from whence they ſent their prizes (being about eighteen) to Toulon, with two men of war, and detached about fourteen ſhips, with two bomb veſſels to Gibraltar, where they approached ſo near the fortifications that they were fired upon, as well from them as the Mole and the ſhips, the whole day, but without any return on their ſide. They ſent in a frigate to attack four merchant ſhips which were bound for Turkey; but ſhe met with ſo warm a reception, that they were obliged to reſcue her with their boats; and the maſters of the merchantmen, in the end, followed the example of thoſe at Malaga, and boring holes in their ſhip's ſides, ſunk them. Upon which the French fleet retired to Lagos Bay.

Admiral Rooke having diſpatched the Lark to England, with an account of this diſaſter, ſailed to Madeira in hopes of finding ſome of the ſcattered ſhips; but only found Captain Fairborne with the Monk. He ſailed from thence the 27th of June, arrived the 3d of Auguſt at Cork in Ireland; where finding orders from the joint Admirals to ſend ſome of the ſhips of his ſquadron to the main fleet, he ſent them thither with Captain Fairborne, and he followed with the detachment ſoon after.

LAGOS. When the French had meditated their long-intended project to invade England with a mighty armament, to be conducted by the means of flat-bottomed boats, ſo as by favour of the night to evade the vigilance of our admirals, and land 20,000 men in ſome part of Kent or Suſſex, which lay neareſt to the place of their departure; at that time Admiral Boſcawen had blocked up Toulon; the Admirals, Saunders and Holmes, had entered the river St. Lawrence, and De la Clue was poſitively commanded to get out by all means, in order to relieve their affairs in North America; but on the French court's receiving certain advices of the above ſituation of Saunders and Holmes, De la Clue received countermanding orders, directing him into the Channel: this was a point of great hazard to De la Clue; but the court of Verſailles had ſent him his laſt ſailing orders, from which he could not recede. Meantime Admiral Boſcawen had left Toulon, and come to Gibraltar in order to refit, while the formidable ſquadron of De la Clue left its fortified road of Toulon, ſailed down the Mediterranean, endeavoured to force a paſſage down the Straits' Mouth, and ſo get away ſafe to the northern ſeas; or if impeded by Admiral Hawke, who lay off Breſt, to attack him in the rear, while Conflans ſhould come out of Breſt, and getting him between two fires, attack him in front. But all this mighty parade ended literally in ſmoke, and and was eluded by the vigilance of Admiral Boſcawen, who narrowly watched his motions, by detaching ſcouts to obſerve and give him notice of every approach. In conſequence of theſe neceſſary precautions, he ordered the Lyme, and Gibraltar, the only two frigates then ready, the former to cruize off Malaga, the other from Eſtepona to Ceuta Point, to look out and give timely notice.

On the 17th of Auguſt, 1759, about eight in the evening, the Gibraltar made the ſignal of the appearance of the enemy, viz. fourteen ſail on the Barbary ſhore, to the eaſtward of Ceuta; he then got under ſail immediately, and was out of the Bay before ten, with fourteen ſail of the line, and the Shannon and Etna fireſhips. At day-light he ſaw the Gibraltar, and ſoon after ſeven ſail of large ſhips lying to; but on our not anſwering their ſignal, they made ſail from us. About noon the Admiral came up with them, and at two o'clock on the 18th, ſome of the headmoſt ſhips began to engage; but he could not get up to the Ocean till near four. In about half an hour the Namur's mizen-maſt and both topſails were ſhot away; the enemy then made all the ſail they could; the Admiral then left the Namur, and ſhifted his flag to the Newark; and ſoon after the Centaur, a French man of war of 74 guns, ſtruck. He purſued all night, and in the morning of the 19th ſaw only four ſail, ſtanding in for the land (two of the beſt ſailers having altered their courſe in the night.) The Admiral's fleet was not above a league from them, and not above five leagues from the ſhore. About nine the Ocean, one of the enemy's largeſt ſhips ran among the breakers, and the other three anchored; the Admiral then ſent the Intrepid and America to deſtroy the Ocean; but Captain Pratten having anchored, could not get in, ſo Captain Kirke performed that ſervice alone. On his firſt firing at the Ocean ſhe ſtruck, and Captain Kirke ſent his officers on board. M. de la Clue, the French Admiral, having one leg broke, and the other wounded, had been landed from the Ocean, which was his own ſhip, about half an hour before; but they found the Captain of her, M. la Compte de Carne, and ſeveral officers and men on board; Captain Kirke having taking them out, finding it impoſſible to bring the ſhip off, ſet her on fire. Captain Bentley, of the Warſpite, was ordered againſt the Temeraire of 74 guns, and brought her off, with all her officers and men on board, with little damage. At the ſame time Vice-Admiral Broderick, with his diviſion, burnt the Redoutable, her officers and men having quitted her as ſhe was bulged; and brought the Modeſte of 64 guns off very little damaged, on board of which there was found a liſt of the French ſquadron.

It cannot be deemed any other but bare juſtice to the Admiral's prudence, courage, and vigilance in this action; for it was a piece of uncommon coolneſs, in the height of an engagement, to have the preſence of mind ſufficient to ſhift his flag from one ſhip to another, in order the ſooner to effect the deſtruction of the enemy; a proof that his diſabled ſhip, wherein there were more killed than on board any other in his ſquadron, ſhould not be a pretence for his not executing in another ſhip what he could not perform in his own. He received in the action a ſlight wound on the ſide of his face from a ſplinter which broke the binnacle, wherein the compaſs is contained.

Thus was this boaſted armament defeated and diſperſed, ſome flying one way, ſome another, for ſhelter; the greateſt part eſcaped to Cadiz, where they were blocked up by Admiral Broderick, while the Souverain and Guerrier, two more of their ſhips, took aſylum at Liſbon. One great conſequence happened from this victory off Lagos, that it prevented the ſcheme of France from taking place, of getting Admiral Hawke between two fires, deſtroying his fleet, and then proceeding to the invaſion of England.

LANDAU, SIEGE OF. A ſtrong city of Germany, in the circle of the Upper Rhine, and Landgravate of Alſace, ſituated on the river Queich, fifteen miles from Spire, and fourteen from Philipſburg, ſubject to France. In 1702, on the 16th of June, Prince Louis of Baden decamped from Langencandel, and poſted his his army before Landau, where he ſpent the reſt of the month in raiſing batteries, and making his approaches, to whom it ſurrendered on the 12th of September, in the preſence of the King of the Romans, after a ſiege, or rather a blockade of three months.

It was again inveſted by the ſame Prince in 1704, on the 12th of September; and the Duke of Marlborough, with Prince Eugene, came to the camp of Crone-Weiſſemburg, on the little river Lauter, to cover the ſiege. On the 18th of September the trenches were opened; and though the Marechal de Villeroy came to look on, yet he did not attempt to raiſe the ſiege. After ſeveral neceſſary ſteps made to reduce the place, the Duke, on the 6th of November, found the beſiegers maſters of the counterſcarp, on which they had raiſed ſome batteries, and having perfected more, they had ſixty pieces of cannon by the 8th firing to make the breach; and on the 23d, the garriſon beat a parley, and hoſtages being exchanged, the King of the Romans granted the enemy very honourable terms, in purſuance of which they delivered one of the gates on the 25th, and the next day marched out of the place, to the number of 3,400 men, which were left out of 7000, of which the garriſon conſiſted at the beginning of the ſiege. The loſs of the beſiegers was leſs in proportion, who had not above 2000 killed, and about 4000 wounded. This ſiege laſted two months.

This place was the third time inveſted by the Marechal de Villars, who came before it in the beginning of June, 1714, and on the 25th the trenches were opened. Though the Germans, who knew the importance of that place, had forgot nothing to put it into a ſtate of defence, and had augmented the fortifications by a conſiderable number of works, had uſed their mines and ſubterraneous preparations with execution, yet the place was obliged to ſurrender to Villars, after fifty-ſix days open trenches. Twelve battalions, of which the garriſon conſiſted, were made priſoners of war, and marched out on the 20th of Auguſt. This ſiege laſted near three months.

On the 22d July, 1793, an engagement happened near this place between the French and the allied forces; the French, to the number of 40,000 men, attacked the right wing of their enemy conſiſting of Pruſſians. The French at firſt had the advantage, and made the Pruſſians fall back, but three maſked batteries were ſoon made to play, and the Auſtrian cavalry at the ſame time fell upon them. The engagement began at ſeven in the morning, and continued till four in the afternoon. The carabineers of the Emperor, who never act but in caſes of the greateſt neceſſity, charged them with great vigour. The loſs of the French was 5000 men. The field of battle was ſtrewed with their dead and wounded. The carabineers and huſſars of Tuſcany loſt a great many men; but the battalion of Michaelowitz was that which ſuffered moſt. General Wurmſer was in great danger of being killed. The Colonel of cuiraſſiers was ſeverely wounded.

July the 27th, General Wurmſer attacked the French army encamped in the environs of Landau, and beat and diſperſed them in ſuch a manner, that they were unable to rally, but at a great diſtance behind that fortreſs. In conſequence of this happy event, General Wurmſer got a footing on the French territories near Landau, which place was beſieged by the allied armies on the 28th of October, but was turned to a blockade on the 2d of November, and beſieged again on the 10th of the ſame month.

On the 29th of November, the French troops, to the number of 30,000 men, attacked the Duke of Brunſwick in the intrenchments of this place; the action was dreadful for five ſucceſſive days.

On the firſt day the loſs of the French was eſtimated at 7000 men, and that of the Allies at 3000; and on the ſecond day the French had 3000 killed, and as many wounded and taken priſoners; and the Pruſſians 1,850 killed, and upwards of 2000 wounded and taken priſoners. On the whole five days the French were defeated, had 18,000 killed, and 5000 made priſoners; the Allies had 16,000 killed, wounded, and made priſoners.

December 10th.—The French made the greateſt efforts to break through the line of General Wurmſer, which extended from Haguenau to Fort Louis, in which were twenty-four redoubts, with 200 pieces of cannon. The enemy's deſign was to raiſe the ſiege of Landau, which fortreſs was of the greateſt importance to both armies.

On the 28th they ſtrained every nerve to gain that end. It was a moſt bloody and murderous day, and the chief attack was made at Fiſchbach.

The Duke of Brunſwick had before-hand reinforced General Wurmſer's army with ſix battalions of Pruſſians, and afterwards came and engaged himſelf in the combat. The French were entirely defeated, and ſeveral thouſands of them cut in pieces. The victors, who alſo ſuffered a conſiderable loſs, took twenty pieces of cannon.

Official Bulletin of the Imperial Army ſtationed on the Upper Rhine, under the command of General Count Von Wurmſer.

Head-Quarters at Haguenau,
December 13, 1793.

December 9.—The corps of the army under my command entered the entrenchments which had been got ready before the river Motter; but before that we were obliged to hold out a very vigorous attack near Davendorf and Urweiler, as far as Ohlungen.

The enemy attacked Lieutenant-Colonel Count Von Klenau, of the dragoons of the Emperor, with a force far ſuperior to his, and having charged him with the utmoſt rage, Count Klenau was obliged at the firſt onſet to yield for a moment to ſuperiority. The Count's preſence of mind and judicious meaſures, ſoon prevented the enemy penetrating farther, and this conflict became one of the hotteſt of the preſent campaign, and laſted from noon till late at night, without any interruption whatever. Lieutenant-Colonel Count Klenau who was cannonaded and attacked more and more violently from all ſides, oppoſed every where the moſt proper and beſt preparations to the enemy's fire, who, for every ſtep they penetrated, paid the ground with blood, and their loſs exceeds ours four times at leaſt.

I ſent all poſſible reinforcement to Count Klenau, who, who, in the evening, made a ſucceſsful attack upon the enemy, and took, not only one ſixteen-pounder and twenty-five horſes, but even repulſed them beyond Davendorf, and took poſition at Ohlungen and Urweiler, in the woods.

In this attack, Colonel Count Desfours became moſt conſpicuous by his gallantry, and the principal ſucceſs is due to him.

The valour and bravery which our troops manifeſted this day, being attacked almoſt every moment by more numerous and freſh columns, exceeds all deſcription, and does honour to all the officers and men.

When night came on, the Lieutenant-Colonel entered the poſition of the redoubts near Schweighauſen.

The corps of the Prince de Conde made a diverſion upon the heights beyond Ohlungen, and when this corps marched off, Colonel Count Benjovſky, of the Carabineers of the Emperor, ſignalized himſelf particularly by ſupporting the Huſſars of Mirabeau.

The enemy, who came this day in great force into the wood of Eben, were immediately repulſed and routed by the Infantry of Laſcy and Preis, and by the Free corps of Giulay, and the Huſſars of Leopold. All thoſe who could be overtaken were cut down, and Lieutenant-Colonel Count Giulay took poſſeſſion of the foreſt. A conſiderable hoſtile column, with artillery, remained ſtationed before the wood.

Near Reichſhofen ſtrong ſkirmiſhes took place all day long, and the poſition of Major-General Baron Hotze was ſtrongly cannonaded. Towards noon a ſtrong hoſtile detachment of upwards of 3000 men, favoured by a violent cannonade, approached cloſe to the town of Reichſhofen. General Hotze immediately reinforced the garriſon, and made the cavalry paſs round the place to the right, in order that the enemy might be attacked on their retreat. In this our troops ſucceeded ſo well, that they brought back a captain and two men priſoners, cut 200 men in pieces, and wounded a great number.

Near Sulzbach General Count Lichtenberg alſo fruſtrated the enemy's deſign of breaking through the Darmſtadters, who had on this occaſion twelve men killed, and fifty-two wounded; among the wounded is Lieutenant Conſens.

The enemy had near 200 men killed and wounded. The Palatine Bavarian Light Horſe took at Sulzbach two ammunition waggons, nineteen horſes, and two priſoners. They had one man and three horſes killed, and three men wounded. The enemy left a great number of killed on the field.

The enemy loſt on this day at leaſt 1000 men in killed and wounded.

December 11.—This day the enemy endeavoured to moleſt my redoubts before the wood. I gave orders to drive them away with howitzer ſhells whenever they ſhould return with greater reinforcements. Finding about noon that they became bolder and bolder, I gave orders to Major Walther, of the Cuiraſſiers of Mack, to paſs through the right and left of the foreſt with a ſtrong detachment, compoſed of Wallachians, and of Huſſars of Terzy and Archduke Leopold, to drive away the enemy.

The Major, with great dexterity, executed his orders, repulſed the enemy, and a ſharp conflict enſued on both ſides. The enemy's loſs, which cannot exactly be aſcertained, amounts at leaſt to 250 men killed and wounded. We had three men killed, and fifty wounded. Among the latter are two officers. Major Walther's horſe was ſhot under him, and eight other horſes were killed, and eighteen wounded.

At half paſt eleven o'clock in the forenoon, the enemy advanced from Ratzendorf beyond Ohlungen with 600 horſe; but Count Klenau kept them in check with his manœuvres, with one diviſion of the Emperor's dragoons, and one ſquadron of huſſars; the enemy were twice repulſed, with the loſs of 30 Chaſſeurs.

Colonel Baron Kempf reports from Schweighauſen, that a diviſion of Samuel Giulay had ſignalized itſelf in the affair of the wood. After a long and obſtinate engagement, the enemy were obliged to evacuate the wood, and left upwards of forty men killed on the ſpot. They carried off ſeveral waggons with wounded. On our ſide we had twenty men killed and wounded.

Major-General Baron Funk, whom I entruſted with the poſition of Baron Hotze, now ill, reports from Reichſhofen, that the enemy, at half paſt eight o'clock in the morning, with eight battalions and two ſquadrons, and eight pieces of cannon, advanced upon a height near Nahweiler towards the wood, where five companies of the Servian Free Corps were ſtationed.

Baron Funk immediately ordered a detachment upon the height to the left of Nahweiler, and another to the point of the wood, to turn the enemy's left wing.

The battalion of the Emperor immediately made itſelf maſter of the village of Nahweiler, and of two pieces of cannon, on which occaſion the Carabineers cut in pieces almoſt a whole battalion of the enemy. Our two ſix-pounders not being able to come up in time, on account of the badneſs of the roads, and two horſes having already been ſhot, Lieutenant Laſgaller ſaved the cannon and the reſt of the horſes.

This prevented the enemy from executing his plan, and penetrating to the right and left of the foreſt.

Major-General Funk, who was wounded with a cartridge ball in the hip, ſignalized himſelf by the moſt indefatigable activity and gallantry.

The enemy left upwards of 300 men killed on the field, and the number of their wounded cannot be aſcertained.

Our loſs conſiſts of eleven men and five horſes killed, eleven miſſing, and fifty-three men and twelve horſes wounded. Among the wounded is Lieutenant Fitzke, of the infantry.

Near Reichſhofen and Merzweiller, the enemy cannonaded ſtrongly, and ſkirmiſhed with our poſition till the approach of night, but without effect. The enemy could alſo make no progreſs on the wood ſide of Merzweiller, owing to the excellent diſpoſitions of Colonel Loudon. Three men of Oliver Wallis were killed there, and nine wounded.

The enemy had upwards of 30 men killed.

About noon the enemy began to ſkirmiſh violently with the advanced poſts of Count Lichtenber, near Sulzbach.

Sulzbach. Soon after they cannonaded that poſition, but were at laſt obliged to retreat.

(Signed) WURMSER.

Thus the ſiege of Landau was raiſed December 22.

December 29.—The Imperialiſts poſted near Haguenau, though attacked inceſſantly, were enabled to maintain their ground till the 22d of December. On that day the Republican troops advanced againſt them with ſuch ſuperiority of force, and with ſuch a tremendous train of artillery, that, after a vigorous reſiſtance, they were forced to evacuate Haguenau, and retreat with great precipitation to Seltz, near Weiſſembourg.

It was deemed neceſſary, however, on the next day, to take a poſition nearer Weiſſembourg, in order that the Imperialiſts might not be ſo much expoſed to the inceſſant attacks of the enemy, who in every battle had freſh troops.

The French having obliged the Allies to retreat from Haguenau, reſolved to perſevere in that vigorous ſyſtem which had produced ſuch important advantages to them.

On the 26th, a column of 22,000 Republicans pierced the right wing of General Wurmſer's army; and 4000 of their cavalry had turned the redoubts eſtabliſhed near Werth and Reichſhofen, and that meeting with no more obſtacles the enemy attacked General Wurmſer's army, in the rear of their poſition. Some battalions of the troops of Heſſe Darmſtadt, newly raiſed, with the Palatine troops, who were poſted in the intrenchments, gave way, and by their flight occaſioned a general breaking up, the conſequences of which were beyond all computation.

The Pruſſians with the Imperialiſts being forced to change their poſition, took that on the heights of Weiſſembourg, and General Wurmſer moving from Seltz, approached nearer to Weiſſembourg. The Republicans, with the whole maſs of their forces, eſtimated at 120, and according to others at 150,000 men, not giving our brave troops a momemt's reſt, having continually annoyed them for more than a month paſt, made, poſterior to the 26th, a general and irreſiſtible attack on the centre of the combined army, which, unable to reſiſt ſuch a ſevere ſhock, being moreover exhauſted with fatigue, and in want of ammunition, were forced to retreat towards Spire and Manheim. The Duke of Brunſwick at the ſame time was under the neceſſity of retreating towards Mentz.

LANDEN, BATTLE AT. A ſmall town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in the province of Brabant, on the river Becke, twenty miles from Namur. This battle was fought on the 19th of June, 1693, for the glory of France or England, between the Confederates, under King William, and the French, under Luxemburg. This haſty general had, previouſly to this memorable battle, gained the aſcendant of King William in ſtratagem, by making the latter divide his army to cover Huy, whither he detached 15,000 men. This was in reality beſieged by Villeroy: but Luxemburg's going to view the intrenchments and works before Liege, was truly a feint to amuſe King William, and in which he ſucceeded: for the King ſent another detachment to reinforce that garriſon, which proved fatal to him, and loſt him the battle of Landen, by manifeſtly giving the ſuperiority in numbers to Luxemberg his rival: for Luxemburg, farther to deceive his enemy, ordered his troops to make faſcines, as if he had a real intention to attack Liege; but decamping all on a ſudden, he made a march of ſeven leagues, and arrived with the troops of the King's houſehold within ſight of the enemy's camp. The King of England and the Elector of Bavaria concluded immediately that Luxemburg had a deſign to attack them, and reſolved to wait for him, though the French were then retiring, perſuaded that the victory would reaſonably be diſputed by favour of their intrenchments, notwithſtanding their own ſuperiority in numbers. Luxemburg ſpent all the night in diſpoſing his army in order of battle; the King of England being at the ſame time employed in raiſing intrenchments, and planting his artillery (conſiſting of 100 pieces of cannon) on the borders of his camp. Both armies lay under arms all night. Moſt people thought, that conſidering the great ſuperiority of the French, King William would have paſſed over the next day: but he was confident in the advantage of his poſt, which, together with his perſonal bravery, and that of the troops, induced him to riſk the hazard of a battle. Having completed his intrenchments, furniſhed and fortified the two villages of Landen and Nerwinden, which cloſed his two wings, he waited for the event of the next day; and by ſun-riſing, the French were drawn up within cannon-ſhot of the Confederate army, who played upon the French with ſucceſs, and which the latter received with great patience and reſolution. About ſix o'clock the enemy made a movement to come nearer to the King's intrenchments, and about eight Luxemburg ordered a ſtrong body of troops to attack the villages. Luxemburg had given his laſt orders, which were not ſo punctually executed, and the Confederates remained maſters of them; for his right too ſoon attacked their left, and therefore was not able to penetrate into the village of Landen, which, as well as one part of the King's lines, was covered with a great ravine. This occaſioned Luxemburg, who found his left quiet, to march the greateſt part of his forces to the village of Nerwinden, which was on the right of the enemy. The French by this were every where repulſed, and about eleven o'clock began to deſpair: upon which the Marechal, perceiving them faint and remiſs, rode through the ranks with his hat in his hand, calling out aloud to animate them, "Remember gentleman, the glory of France." The left wing then began the attack again upon the village of Nerwinden, but with the loſs of a great number of men, and with no ſucceſs. This ſecond attack was followed by a pauſe, which ſeemed to indicate the Duke's retreat: nay, at that time, it was the opinion of Marechal Boufflers that it was more eligible to do ſo than to riſk the loſs of the battle. Even the Prince of Conti, who did wonders in the fight, and Marechal Villeroy thought of retreating. But the Duke of Luxemburg aſking the Duke of Bourbon what he thought of it, he anſwered, that he would engage to retake Nerwinden den (for they had been a little time in poſſeſſion of it) if he would give him ten freſh battalions. Accordingly he put himſelf, with the Prince of Conti, at the head of the brigade of the guards, the Duke of Luxemburg ſeconding them, and doubling all his efforts, drew up his cavalry, crying out again, "Gentlemen, the glory of France;" and attacked the right wing of the Confederates, where the fire began to ſlacken for want of ammunition, and that forced the village of Nerwinden. But neither had this availed, if the Duke of Chartres, with the French cavalry, had not paſſed the intrenchments to engage the Confederate cavalry: after having broke through the two firſt lines, he was repulſed by the third, and was near being taken, till aſſiſted by two of his domeſtics, and having killed with his own ſword one of his purſuers, he recovered the next line, which as ſoon as he had put in order, he charged the horſe again, and threw them into ſo much confuſion, that they never rallied, any more than the foot, ſo that in the end, the French puſhed the horſe into the river Layette, where a great number periſhed.

This was the laſt ſcene of a battle as bloody and terrible as ever was fought, wherein the very conquerors mourned a dear-bought victory; ſo many fell, that they might ſay with Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, that ſuch another victory would quite ruin them. The Duke of Berwick was taken priſoner in the defence of the village of Nerwinden.

The King, during the whole battle, behaved like a moſt magnanimous Prince, having eſcaped the execution of three muſket-ſhots, one through his wig, another through his ſleeve, while a third carried off the knot of his ſcarf, leaving a ſmall contuſion on his ſide: in ſhort, his Majeſty this day gained ſo much reſpect from his enemies, that it was ſaid by them, that they only wanted ſuch a king to make themſelves maſters of Chriſtendom: and in ſome of the intercepted letters, after the battle, to their friends, they ſaid, they ſaw the King of England every where preſent where there was the greateſt heat of action, expoſing his perſon to the greateſt dangers; and that ſurely ſo much valour very well deſerved the quiet poſſeſſion of the crown to which he was an ornament.

The French reported that the Confederates had loſt 20,000 men in this action; and indeed, till a review was made, the Confederates believed they had loſt more than afterwards appeared to be the event, which was only 6000 killed; for the French reckoned their own men as ours in the computation: as there appeared on the field of battle 20,000 men, 10,000 or 12,000 of which, though we aſſume to ourſelves the remainder, could not be other than French, who fought ſo ſtrenuouſly in every attack, and were conſiderably worſted in ſeveral. The Allies loſt a large train of artillery, abundance of ſmall arms, and about 2000 priſoners. A great number was certainly wounded on both ſides; for there was no purſuit; and as the battle was maintained with an obſtinate fury on both ſides, why ſhould there be ſuch a diſparity in the killed and wounded, ſince the French were confeſſedly near double the number of the Confederates, and had once given over all thoughts of conquering; nay, had entertained a notion of retiring?

The King of England attributed this loſs chiefly to M. Goulon, who commanded the artillery, becauſe he had diſcontinued firing. Goulon ſaid in his juſtification, that he had obeyed the orders of a general officer, which, however, that general officer denied. That engineer ſoon after left his Majeſty's ſervice; but was, notwithſtanding the charge imputed to him, warmly recommended to the Emperor, whom he afterwards ſerved.

The Confederates retired to Lewe, without being purſued by the enemy; a proof that they were ſick of the victory, dear bought as it was. Luxemburg, on his return to Paris, was no doubt troubled to ſee ſo many illuſtrious families in mourning; and though he had the thanks of the King, he had the curſe of the people; which latter he could not juſtly deſerve, ſince he did but his duty, though he ſacrificed his troops to the glory of his country. A number of ladies waited on him in mourning coaches, demanding his intereſt at court to procure them penſions, or on failure, they threatened to burn his palace. Yet though he might move ſuch a ſuit, it muſt greatly affect the King's finances to give penſions to the widows of ſo many as fell on that dear-bought iſſue.

LANDSDOWN-HILL, BATTLE AT. Near Marſfield in Somerſetſhire, not far from Bath. In the year 1643, in the diſpute between the Royaliſts and the Parliament's forces, after the ſucceſs of the former over the latter, under the Earl of Stamford at Stratton, the two houſes ſent Sir William Waller to raiſe an army in the county of Somerſet, in order to retrieve that misfortune. The Royaliſts having reſted a few days at Wales, advanced towards Sir William Waller, who had fixed his head quarters at Bath, and had received a reinforcement of 500 cavalry, ſo completely armed with cuiraſſes and defenſive armour, that the Royaliſts ludicrouſly termed them the Lobſters, and in the ſequel found them for the moſt part impenetrable.

After ſome ſkirmiſhes, fought with various ſucceſs on both ſides, the Marquis of Hertford and Prince Maurice marched to Marsfield, five miles beyond Bath, in the road for Oxford. Waller, whoſe aim was to prevent their joining the King's forces, immediately poſſeſſed himſelf of Landſdown-Hill, which he fortified with breaſt-works and cannon: then he detached a body of horſe towards Marsfield, from whence they were driven back by the Royaliſts, who drew up their forces on the plain, but perceiving how advantageouſly the enemy was ſituated, they began to retreat to their old quarters. Waller immediately ſent his whole cavalry to fall upon their flank and rear, in which the new regiment of cuiraſſiers did great execution, ſo that the King's horſe, hitherto deemed invincible, were broken and diſcomfited. Nevertheleſs, they were rallied, and the enemy fled in their turn. The Royaliſts then attacked the hill with ſurpriſing courage, and gained the ſummit after a very obſtinate engagement, the enemy retiring behind a ſtone wall, where they faced the King's troops, in good order, till night, and then retired to Bath by favour of the darkneſs. The Marquis was left in poſſeſſion of the field; but the victory was not gained without conſiderable damage. Sir Bevil Grenville was killed in the attack, with a good number of excellent officers: and next morning, Sir Ralph Hopton, and Serjeant-Major Sheldon, riding about the field, they were blown up with gun-powder, eight barrels of which happened to be in a waggon, and took fire either by accident or treachery. The Major died next day; and Sir Ralph was miſerably ſcorched.

LANDRECY, SIEGE OF. A town of the French Netherlands, in the province of Hainault, on the river Sambre, eighteen miles eaſt from Cambray. In 1543, the Emperor Charles V. being at war with Francis I. of France, after he had brought the Duke of Cleves to ſubmit, and much about the time of the revolt of the Rochellers, laid ſiege to Landrecy, but apprehending its ſtrength, reſolved to reduce it by famine. The beſieged ſuffered very much in a ſiege of two months, when Francis I. putting himſelf at the head of his army approached within two leagues of the beſiegers. The Emperor imagining he would give him battle, imprudently drew his forces from the further ſide of the Sambre to join the forces on this ſide, which weak ſtep gave Francis an opportunity of throwing relief into the town, ſo that the Emperor was thereupon forced immediately to raiſe the ſiege.

LANDRECY, SIEGE OF. This place was inveſted by Prince Eugene, after he had ſeparated from the Engliſh forces, in 1712. The Allies, after the deſertion of the Britiſh troops by an inglorious miniſtry, had entirely been diſconcerted in moſt of their plans of operation; however they reſolved to carry on the war. On the 16th of July, Landrecy was beſieged with thirty-four battalions, under the command of the Prince of Anhalt Deſſau, and under the direction of Prince Eugene's army joined the camp before Landrecy, and the right extended along the Scheldt towards Denain, where the Allies had an intrenched camp to cover the bringing up their artillery, ammunition, and proviſions, which they drew from the magazines in Walloon Flanders by water.

The Marechal de Villars, who had received orders from his court to relieve Landrecy, cauſed bridges to be laid over the Scheldt the 18th of July, which he paſſed the 19th, and the next day encamped on the Salle, towards Chatteau Cambreſis: the two next days he took up in directing 1500 men to widen and level the roads towards the Sambre, and to lay brides over that river.

Prince Eugene being informed of theſe motions, cauſed a large intrenchment to be made before his left, poſting General Fagel behind it, with forty battalions, and cauſed his right to move up, that he might be in a condition to maintain the ſiege with his whole army.

Monſieur de Villars had in the mean time, formed the important deſign of poſſeſſing himſelf of the camp of Denain, and by that coup-de-main at once diſconcert the meaſures of the Allies, and force Prince Eugene to raiſe the ſiege of Landrecy, and get poſſeſſion of all their magazines. To this end, he ordered Count de Broglio, on the 23d in the evening, to advance along the Salle with forty ſquadrons, cauſing all the paſſages of that river to be guarded, that none of the parties of the Allies might eroſs it to obſerve the operations of his army. He then marched in one night to Bouchain, having broke up his camp at Chatteau Cambreſis, and repaſſed the Scheldt, unobſerved by the Allies, broke through the lines of Denain, and forced them to retire over the bridge on the Scheldt. We ſhall not give a particular detail of the action of Denain, though neceſſarily connected with the ſiege of Landrecy, being the occaſion of raiſing that ſiege, but ſhall refer the reader to the whole affair, already cited under DENAIN.

The French having thus, like a torrent, burſt and broken down all mounds, they took ſeveral places, as Atarchiennes, Fort Scarpe, Douay, Queſnoy, and Bouchain, while Prince Eugene, on the other hand, was obliged to quit the ſiege of Landrecy, to ſtop the impetuoſity of Villars, and, if poſſible, to relieve Douay; which, notwithſtanding all his efforts, he was unable to effect. However, Prince Eugene's conduct did not eſcape cenſure on this occaſion; for in reſpect to Landrecy, it was objected againſt him, that it was imprudently undertaken before the reduction of Maubeuge, which ſhould, ſay the objectors, by all means have preceded it. What grounds there were for theſe allegations and reflections, we ſhall not undertake to determine; and ſhall only obſerve, that as the diſgraces and diſappointments which befel the Confederates from the period of Landrecy, caſt a ſhade on the conduct and reputation of that Prince, ſo did he moſt honourably acquit himſelf, in a letter which he ſent to one of the miniſtry of England, in vindication of the Earl of Albemarle, who commanded in the action of Denain, and was cruelly aſperſed at home for miſconduct in that unfortunate affair; which letter, as it is an original, we ſhall preſerve, and is thus:

SIR,

I am ſurpriſed and troubled to hear of the injuſtice people to do my Lord Albemarle, and all the impertinent diſcourſes that have been vented, concerning his conduct in the action of Denain. I have long been ſenſible, that the miſinformed vulgar judge by events, and that the unfortunate are always cenſured by them for thoſe miſcarriages which they could not foreſee; or foreſeeing, could not poſſibly avoid. But I wonder that ſuch ſlander ſhould have found reception among men of figure, as could only have been broached by his enemies, and what man is without them?

I ſhould think myſelf wanting in the duty of a man of honour, much more of a chief general, if I did not teſtify the truth of which I was an eye witneſs. He performed on that occaſion, all that a courageous, prudent, and vigilant general could do; and had all the troops done their duty, conformable to his commands or example, the affair would not have had ſo unfortunate a turn as it had; but when they run as ſoon as they have given one fire, and cannot be rallied, no general on earth can help it; and, therefore, I doubt not but you will contribute to the diſabuſing thoſe at the helm, who have been miſinformed, and that you will be perſuaded none can have more eſteem for you than,

Sir, your's, &c.
EUGENE DE SAVOY."

On the 17th of April, 1794, a ſevere battle was fought near Landrecy between the allied army and the French: the following diſtinguiſhed characters were perſonally engaged:

The Emperor of Germany.

The Archdukes Charles and Leopold, his Imperial Majeſty's brothers.

The Hereditary Prince of Orange.

The Prince of Saxe Cobourg.

Prince Chriſtian of Heſſe Darmſtadt.

The Duke of York.

Princes Erneſt Auguſtus and Adolphus Frederick, his Royal Highneſs's brothers.

Prince William of Glouceſter.

The French, it ſeems, attempted to throw a relief of 2000 men into Landrecy, and to effect this, attacked the Auſtrian advanced poſt commanded by General Bellegarde; they, however, experienced ſo warm a reception, that they were obliged to fall back, with the loſs of 600 men killed, and ſeveral pieces of cannon taken.

The ſiege of Landrecy was directed by the Auſtrian General La Tour, under the orders of the Prince of Orange. Fifteen thouſand pioneers were at work, and the neceſſary train of artillery, ammunition, faſcines, and all the implements of a ſiege on the ſpot. The trenches were opened in the night between the 10th and 21ſt inſtant, on the ſide of Pſeux-au-Bois, and the attack directed againſt the horn-work. The allied troops were completely maſters of the wood of Mormal. The right wing of the army, which covered the ſiege, was near Femy; the left near Marolle, and its centre had the Saar in its rear. That of the Duke of York extended from Mazinguet to Catteau.

The following is a Copy of a Letter from the Duke of York, dated April 22, 1794.

On Sunday morning the Hereditary Prince of Orange made a general attack upon the poſts which the enemy ſtill occupied in the front of Landrecy, and ſucceeded in getting poſſeſſion of them all, and in taking by ſtorm their intrenched camp, and a very ſtrong redoubt which they had thrown up at the villages of Eloques, within 600 yards of the place. He took advantage of this redoubt to cover the left flank of the trenches, which were opened the ſame evening. Much praiſe is given to the behaviour of the Auſtrian and Dutch troops upon that occaſion.

According to the original plan, adopted before the battle of the 17th, it was determined to withdraw the detached corps of each army as ſoon as the poſition for the inveſtiture of Landrecy was properly ſecured; and, in conſequence, the orders were given the night before laſt, that theſe corps ſhould retire as this morning.

But yeſterday the enemy attacked two detached corps of the Prince of Cobourg's army at Grand Blocus and Nouvion, under the command of Major-General Bellegarde and Lieutenant-General Alvinzy. The Prince of Cobourg ſent to deſire me to ſupport the former, and I marched immediately, with five battalions of Auſtrians and Major-General Sir Robert Laurie's brigade of Britiſh cavalry. I did not, however, arrive till the affair was over, General Bellegarde having repulſed the enemy with great ſlaughter, and having taken four pieces of cannon and one howitzer.

As the enemy appeared in great force on General Alvinzy's front, the Prince of Cobourg did not think it proper to ſupport a poſt which was of no importance to him, and which was at any rate to be abandoned that night: General Alvinzy was therefore ordered to retire to his poſition in the line, which he did in great order, and with very inconſiderable loſs, although expoſed to the enemy's cannonade.

I this morning received a report from Lieutenant-General Wurmb, who commands a detached corps of the army at Denain, that the enemy attacked him in great force on Saturday; that at firſt his advanced poſts were obliged to retire, and that the enemy had already got poſſeſſion of the village of Abſcon, and of one of the redoubts on his front; but, upon a reinforcement coming up, the enemy were completely driven back with great loſs. The Heſſians, however, ſuffered very conſiderably, having loſt five officers, and ſeventy men killed and wounded.

General Wurmb expreſſes himſelf highly ſatisfied with the behaviour of the Auſtrian huſſars of Leopold, and the Heſſian dragoons de corps.

FREDERICK.

April 30, 1794.

It is with peculiar ſatisfaction that I have the pleaſure to acquaint you with the ſurrender of Landrecy.

At ten o'clock this morning the town offered to capitulate, and requeſted a ſuſpenſion of arms for forty-eight hours, to arrange the articles; but this was abſolutely refuſed, and they were allowed only half an hour to come to a determination, which, upon a ſecond requeſt, was extended to an hour,—before, however, this time was elapſed, the deputies of the town came out, and, after a very ſhort conference, agreed to deliver up the place this evening at five o'clock, and that the garriſon ſhould be made priſoners of war.

This fortunate event, which was not expected to happen ſo ſoon, makes up for the diſagreeable intelligence which we received this day, of a check which General Clairfayt had at Moucron. This poſt had been retaken from the enemy by a corps of Hanoverians, under the command of Major-General Count Oenhauſen, the night before; but the enemy having in a manner ſurrounded it, General Clairfayt, who had joined the Hanoverians with ſix battalions of Auſtrians, was at laſt obliged to retreat, and had taken up a new poſition, in order to cover the high road from Tournay to Courtray.

In conſequence of this intelligence, the Emperor has deſired desired me to march this evening, as quick as possible, to St. Amand, and from thence, if necessary, to Tournay, to the assistance of General Clairfayt.

FREDERICK.

Capitulation proposed by General Rouland, commandant at Landrecy to the commander in chief of the combined armies, before Landrecy.

Article I. I propose that our garrison, three days after the capitulation, shall march out with their arms, baggage, and two pieces of cannon to each battalion, and that they shall retire into the interior of France.

Reply. The commandant shall surrender to the troops of his Imperial Majesty the town and fortress of Landrecy on the following conditions and stipulations. The garrison shall be prisoners of war—shall march out of the garrison this day, at five o'clock, by the gate of Quesnoy; the horn-work and the town gate shall be immediately delivered to the troops of the combined army. The garrison, on account of the courageous defence, shall march out with the honours of war, shall ground their arms on the glacis of the horn-work, where the colours and horses shall also be deposited. The officers may retain their horses and their swords.—All the artillery, ammunition, provisions, papers, archives, and plans of fortifications, shall be delivered to the commissaries.

Art. II. The citizens of the town shall be permitted to retire into the interior, as well as the garrison, if they think proper. That no injury be done to them on account of their opinions. That they may be permitted to carry away such of their effects as have not been burnt, and that for this purpose proper conveyances be furnished them.

Reply. The inhabitants will be permitted to retire during the space of a month with their effects, and passports will be given to them. No peaceable inhabitants shall be molested: but if any of the citizens, in violation of the laws of war, shall have done military duty during the siege, they shall be exempt from the benefit above mentioned.

Art. III. Our sick and wounded shall be treated with that care and tenderness which the brave victims of war merit.

Reply. Granted.—It must be understood, that the officers and soldiers, as soon as they have recovered from their illness, shall be subject to the same fate as the garrison.

Art. IV. The artillery horses shall be retained for the purpose of conveying the baggage and provisions into the interior.

Reply. Referred to the first article.

Art. V. A delay of a week shall be granted to those inhabitants who, on account of sickness or other forcible reasons, may not be enabled to retire with the garrison: during the delay, security and protection shall be granted to them.

Reply. Referred to the second article.

Art. VI. The inhabitants shall be guaranteed in their property.

Reply. All those who submitted to his Imperial Majesty, shall receive the protection of the laws.

Art. VII. Twelve covered waggons shall be allowed.

Reply. Refused.—Deserters shall be scrupulously given up before departure of the garrison, and the necessary search shall be made for those who may conceal themselves.—Austrians and those of the other allied powers shall be surrendered.

Additional articles by the Commander in Chief of the besieging army.

Art. I. Commissaries from the military and civil departments shall be appointed for the purpose of receiving papers, effects, artillery, ammunition, military and civil chests, in a word, all the articles belonging to the government under any denomination whatever. The commissaries shall be allowed immediate entrance after the exchange of hostages. The commanders shall be personally responsible for any errors committed in the surrender of the abovementioned articles. The commissioners shall remain in the garrison till the proper inventories are taken.

Reply. Granted.

Art. II. On both sides a lieutenant-colonel and captain shall be sent as hostages.

Reply. Granted.

Additional articles proposed by the commandant of Landrecy.

Art. I. Such of the inhabitants as have done military duty in obedience to the law shall not be exempted from the benefits of the 2d article.

Reply. Granted.

Art. II. The garrison consists of eight battalions, of nine companies each. It is proposed that one farrier in each company, one quarter-master in each battalion, one farrier in each detachment of hussars and artillery, shall not be made prisoners, but shall be sent into the interior of France: the amount of such persons will be ninety.

Reply. Granted.—The aforesaid ninety shall not be made prisoners of war.

(Signed) The Adjutant-General Fremont Lamarche, Captain of the 4th Regiment of Hussars; and the Commandant at Landrecy, Rouland.

Done in the Trenches before Landrecy, April, 30, 1799.

(Signed) G. F. Hereditary Prince of ORANGE. Commander in Chief of the Combined, Imperial, and Dutch Army.

This day we have finished the important business of reducing Landrecy. We have taken 172 pieces of cannon; and the whole garrison, consisting of about 6000 men, are prisoners of war. Thus, within ten days from the opening of the trenches, our brave troops have have humbled the gaſconading French, who, at the beginning of the ſiege, by hoiſting the red flag, declared they would never accept that mercy, which they have ſo ſoon been obliged to implore. It is ſaid, that before the ſiege, the garriſon amounted to 9000 men. The town was ſo injured by the fire of the beſiegers, that there are ſcarce twelve houſes which have not received ſome damage. Though Landrecy was ſurrendered to the Prince of Orange, the Auſtrians have ſince taken poſſeſſion of it, and two Auſtrian commiſſaries are at preſent employed in re-organizing the civil government of that fortreſs.

LANDSHUT, ACTION NEAR, IN 1760. This city is the capital of Lower Bavaria, in Germany.

General Laudohn having been repulſed with great loſs, in an aſſault which he ventured to make upon Glatz, the night between the 27th and 28th of June, left but a ſmall number of troops before that place, and marched in order to attack the corps under the command of General Fouquet. The latter, who was deſirous of maintaining the poſt at Landſhut, from whence he had juſt diſlodged the Generals Geiſrugg and Jahnus, took every meaſure immediately for making a good defence. He was obliged, however, to ſend off Major-General Ziethen with four battalions and two ſquadrons towards Frauenſtein, in order to preſerve a communication with Schweidnitz, as well as Major-General Grant, on the other ſide, with ſome cavalry; ſo that there were but few generals left with him, and part of his corps, of which the whole was already in itſelf but weak.

The 23d, at two o'clock in the morning, General Laudohn, with all his forces, attacked all the redoubts which General Fouquet occupied near Landſhut, and carried three of them, viz. thoſe on the heights of Mummel, Bouch, and Blaſſdorff, after a very vigorous defence on the part of the five battalions that guarded them. Amongſt others, one of Moſel's battalions diſtinguiſhed itſelf extremely on this occaſion.

General Fouquet having then thrown himſelf into the two redoubts, which he had ſtill in his poſſeſſion, upon the heights of Kirchenberg and Galgenberg, was twice ſummoned on the part of General Laudohn to ſurrender with his people, which he refuſed complying with. In conſequence whereof he was attacked with great fury by the enemy, who, by their ſuperior force, penetrated at laſt into the redoubts, which had been defended till ſix o'clock. General Fouquet fell there into the hands of the enemy, after having received two wounds; but part of his infantry and almoſt all the cavalry made their way and got to Breſlau.

Major-General Ziethen likewiſe, upon the approach of the enemy, threw himſelf into Schweidnitz, with his four battalions and two ſquadrons, without the loſs of a ſingle man. This affair, however unfortunate, cannot but do great honour to General Fouquet for having defended his poſt with the utmoſt bravery, though he had but a handful of men oppoſed to an army, which, as the enemy themſelves have declared, conſiſted of 50,000, and did not yield till after having occaſioned as great a loſs as they would have ſuffered by a defeat in a pitched battle. According to accounts received from the Auſtrians themſelves, they had near 6000 men killed in the affair, and almoſt double that number wounded; which is the more credible, as M. Daun was thereupon obliged to detach five regiments of infantry and two of cavalry from his own army towards the county of Glatz upon the news of this action.

LANGENSALTZE, BATTLE OF, IN 1761. This town is ſituated in Heſſe, in Germany.

M. de Sporcken having divided the corps under him into two columns, one of which was commanded by Count Kilmanſegge, and the other by Lieutenant-General Wangenheim, put Major-General de Luckner at the head of a ſtrong advanced guard, who marched the 9th to Heiligenſtadt.

The firſt column arrived at Buren, and the ſecond at Stadthworbes. The troops halted the 10th. M. de Luckner marched the next day to Kelſtedt. Count Kilmanſegge to Helmſtorff, and M. de Wangenheim to Baberſtedt.

M. de Sporcken went to reconnoitre the enemy, ſeveral of whoſe regiments of infantry had paſſed the Werra at Eſchwege. There were 5000 French in the city of Muhlhauſen; that of Langenſaltze, and the villages in its neighbourhood were occupied by Saxons. M. de Sporcken found on the heights of Dorne four battalions of grenadiers of France ranged in order of battle, and the infantry poſted in the wood towards Eſchwege, to protect the communication of the Werra with Mulhauſen and Langenſaltze. M. de Luckner had orders to attack them the next day in the morning with his corps, which was to be ſuſtained by two battalions and ſix ſquadrons. The ſame day M. de Belſunce appeared before Duderſtadt with 3000 men, and ſome cannon of the garriſon of Gottingen. He ſummoned Lieutenant-Colonel Rehbom, who commanded in that town three times; and upon the negative anſwers received from him, he cauſed the gates to be battered for three hours, but his attempts were fruitleſs, and he returned the ſame night.

M. de Luckner attacked, on the 12th, the French and Swiſs grenadiers, who had paſſed the night under arms in the wood of Dorne, over againſt his advanced poſts at Anerode and Buckewriede. He puſhed them as far as the heights of Egerieden, where they gained a thick wood, which Count de Solms had fortified by felled trees. They cannonaded each other. The enemy received reinforcements from the quarters on the Werra, and thoſe of the Saxons.

The night coming on, M. de Sporcken could not aſſemble his men ſo as to undertake any thing againſt the enemy; he contented himſelf with making ſome changes in the diſpoſition of his quarters, and to puſh the poſts further on. The ſkirmiſhes of this day coſt him forty men in killed and wounded. The loſs of the enemy was more conſiderable, and four officers and fifty of their men were taken.

M. de Sporcken put his troops in order of battle the 13th, at ſeven o'clock in the morning, upon the height called Eiſberg; but having found the enemy reinforced; that they had occupied all the woods where the the horſe could not act; and that the troops of his Pruſſian Majeſty were at the diſtance of three marches, he reſolved to paſs the Unſtrut Silberhauſen and Hortſmar, to draw near them by a forced march.

He informed M. de Sibourg of his intentions, and the motion was executed in preſence of the enemy without the leaſt loſs. The troops were cantoned between Keyſerſhager and Marolderude.

The corps of Pruſſians advanced the 14th to the height of Langenfaltze, which was occupied by 3000 Saxons. M. de Sporcken occupied the village on the left ſide of the river Unſtrut, with the troops of his firſt line, and drew thoſe of his ſecond line as near it as poſſible.

He agreed with M. de Sibourg, that the Pruſſian troops ſhould paſs the Unſtrut at Merchleben, whilſt he paſſed it at Thomaſbruck, and M. de Luckner at Boldſtedt. In the night the bridges which the enemy had broken were repaired.

On the 15th, at ſeven in the morning, all the troops came to the river ſide in order to paſs it, but the thaw had increaſed the waters to ſuch a degree in twice twenty-four hours, that there was an inundation from Muhlhauſen almoſt to Langenſaltze.

The Pruſſian cavalry got through the paſſage of Merchleben, while their cannon was battering the town of Langenſaltze. Eight ſquadrons of M. de Sporcken's firſt line paſſed Thomaſbruck with a brigade of chaſſeurs, and a ſquadron of Luckner's, whoſe whole corps could not paſs, the waters continuing out all the day. In the mean time the Pruſſian cavalry fell upon the enemy who were going out of Langenſaltze; and M. de Sporcken's corps did ſo likewiſe upon the troops which were coming down the hills to their aſſiſtance.

M. de Sporcken computes the enemy's loſs that day at 5000 men, at the ſame time that his own ſcarcely exceeds 100. Lieutenant-General Hodenberg was wounded and taken priſoner.

The Pruſſians took three battalions, and ſeven pieces of cannon; and M. de Sporcken's troops took two battalions and ſix pieces of cannon.

LANNOY, October 1793. His Royal Highneſs ſent, upon the evening of the 28th, two battalions of Auſtrian infantry, and ſome companies of light troops, with two twelve-pounders and two howitzers, under the command of Major-General Werneck, and two battalions of Britiſh infantry, (the flank battalion and that of the 3d regiment of guards) with one ſquadron of the 7th and one of the 15th light dragoons, with two twelve-pounders and two howitzers likewiſe, to attack Lannoy which the enemy had intrenched, and occupied with 1500 men.

Major-General Abercromby commanded this detachment; and he had orders to expoſe the troops as little as poſſible, but to confine the attack to a cannonade, until the enemy ſhould be driven from their poſt. This plan had the deſired ſucceſs. After reſiſting ſome time the heavy and well-directed fire of the Britiſh and Auſtrian artillery, which was gradually advanced to within a very ſmall diſtance of the town, the French gave way, retiring in great diſorder, part of them towards Liſle, and part towards Roubaix. They were purſued with great ſpirit by Lieutenant-Colonel Churchill, at the head of the two ſquadrons of light dragoons, who killed and wounded near 100 of them, and took fifty-nine priſoners. Several others were killed and taken by a party of Auſtrian infantry, who entered the town. There were taken in all about 150 priſoners, and five pieces of cannon, beſides ſeveral tumbrils, and baggage waggons. The killed are ſuppoſed to have amounted to between two and three hundred.

In point of numbers, the loſs upon our ſide has been very inconſiderable; but unfortunately, Captain Sutherland of the Royal Engineers, an officer of acknowledged merit, was killed upon this occaſion. Though not called upon to be preſent at the attack, he had been induced by his zeal to accompany the detachment. The Auſtrians had eight or ten men killed and wounded.

In 1794, having received a large reinforcement of 25,000 Auſtrians, the Duke of York, relieved from the neceſſity of confining himſelf to a defenſive operation, reſolved to act offenſively. It was accordingly determined, that an attack ſhould be made on the French on the 17th inſt.

The army was put in motion about midnight, and proceeding towards Lannoy, waited there till daybreak.

A vigorous and well ſupported attack was then commenced, and, it was ſuppoſed, that the attack was wholly unexpected, for the enemy after a ſhort reſiſtance gave way, and fell back from Lannoy to the village of Roubaix. The Duke of York purſued them inſtantly with the right wing of his army, and not ſtopping at Lannoy, puſhed forward to Roubaix, where the enemy made a ſtand, and where they had a very large number both of cavalry and infantry. In their approach to the village, they were ſeverely galled by a heavy diſcharge of grape ſhot from a battery. They nevertheleſs attacked and forced the village, and the French retired, as it was then thought, diſcomfited, and in great diſorder, towards Liſle.

While one wing of the Duke of York's army was thus fortunate, the other, which advanced againſt the enemy on the ſide of Courtray, was equally ſucceſsful.

After the forcing of Roubaix, his Royal Highneſs reſted for ſeveral hours, with a determination to attack the enemy again on the ſucceeding morning.

In purſuance of this determination, the army moved forward on Sunday morning, and the enemy at firſt made a ſhew of retiring, and ſeemed unwilling to hazard another battle; but this, as it afterwards appeared, was only a feint to draw on the Allies: the manœuvre unfortunately ſucceeded.

The gallant ſoldiers of the Britiſh regiments, fluſhed with victory, puſhed forward with alacrity and vigour.

After retiring ſome time, the French at length made a ſtand, and at ſeven o'clock in the morning, being reinforced by the whole garriſon of Liſle, attacked the Britiſh detachment on all ſides.

The

The greater part of the Auſtrians poſted on the left, could not afford any aſſiſtance.

The conflict now commenced, and with horrible carnage. Hemmed in by an army of 60,000 men, to retreat was impracticable.

In this ſad ſituation, it is ſaid that the Auſtrians retreated in great diſorder, and the Britiſh were left to ſuſtain the attack alone. They did ſuſtain it with a degree of courage which the greatneſs of the danger encreaſed rather than diminiſhed.

It will ſcarcely be believed that the Britiſh were enabled to make good their retreat. Their loſs, however, was very great.

Lieutenant-Colonel Ludlow, of the firſt regiment of foot guards, Lieutenant-Colonel Manners, of the third regiment of guards, Colonel Drummond, of the artillery, Major Wright, and Captain Browne, of the 14th regiment, were wounded.

Lieutenant-Colonel Ludlow's wound was in the arm, which has ſince been amputated, Lieutenant-Colonel Manners and Colonel Drummond's wounds are ſlight. Major Wright is ſince dead; Captain Browne is made priſoner.

All the artillery, as might be expected, fell into the hands of the enemy, together with one pair of colours of one of the regiments of guards.

LANWERENHAGEN, BATTLE AT. A little village in the Landgravate of Heſſe. Fought on the 30th of September, 1758. The operations of the armies in Weſtphalia ſeemed for a long time to be in a ſtate of torpitude; the grand army of the French, under the Marechal de Contades, was wholly unable to drive Prince Ferdinand from the poſts which he had ſo judiciouſly choſen along the Lippe; the other diviſion of the French forces, under the Prince de Soubiſe, had made no great progreſs on the ſide of Heſſe-Caſſel, againſt the Prince of Iſenburg, who ſtill kept his ground in that principality, in order to protect the courſe of the Weſer, and to cover the Electorate of Hanover. The French were ſenſible that an attack on the principal army of the Allies would prove a very dangerous attempt; in which, even if they ſhould meet with ſome ſucceſs, their progreſs into the King's electorate dominions muſt be ſlow and difficult. But as the body of the Allies employed in Heſſe-Caſſel was far the weakeſt, and as an advantage on that ſide promiſed the French the command of the Weſer, and a better paſſage into the heart of the enemy's country, they determined to make an attempt there: to further this deſign a conſiderable detachment was made from the army of M. de Contades, which increaſed the Prince of Soubiſe's corps to at leaſt 30,000.

Prince Ferdinand, ſufficiently aware of the enemy's plan, had previouſly ſent General Oberg with a ſtrong reinforcement to join the Prince of Iſenburg; but notwithſtanding the reinforcement, the whole force of the Allies did not exceed 15,000. This body was attacked by the French at Lanwerenhagen, and their great ſuperiority, eſpecially in point of cavalry, obliged the Allies to retire with the loſs of 1,500 men. The Allies, unable to keep the field, had, however, ſome woods in their rear which covered their retreat, in which they preſerved ſo good a countenance as to prevent their defeat from becoming total: great conſequences might have been expected from this affair, but Prince Ferdinand's vigilance, who had eſtabliſhed the moſt ready communications all along the Lippe, ſuffered the victorious army to reap but little advantage from that incident.

LAPLA, BATTLE AT. A town in Finland. About the middle of the year 1714, the arms of the Czar had gained ſeveral advantages over thoſe of Sweden. After the battle of Pultowa, Prince Gallitzen had been haraſſing the Swedes continually, endeavouring to force them to an engagement, but they kept a running fight, and gave the Ruſſian General an opportunity of laying all Finland under contribution; at length he came up with them at Lapla, under the command of Armfeldt, who had intrenched himſelf there with 9000 men, one part of which were ill-armed peaſants. Gallitzen attacked them; they ſtood firm at firſt and repulſed the Ruſſians; but they returning to the charge, the peaſants took to their heels, which throwing the ſoldiers into confuſion, drew them to do the ſame. This victory was of the more importance to the Ruſſians, as by it they were now become maſters of Finland.

LAUTERBOURG, in Alſace, a place of conſiderable ſtrength, ſituated about 10 miles S. E. of Weiſſembourg. It was taken by the Auſtrians in 1744; and when the Republicans of France ravaged this country, they took poſſeſſion of this town; but it was obliged to receive the troops of the Allies on Sept. 7, 1793, and the following is a copy of a letter from General Wurmſer.

At five o'clock this morning, the uſual patroles met in the environs of Lauterbourg, and ſkirmiſhed for ſome time. Soon after a ſtrong hoſtile detachment of 1,200 advanced towards the right wing of the brigade of Major-General Hotze, encamped in the Bienenwald, and attacked the Sclavonian riflemen, and the rangers of Rohan, with the utmoſt violence. General Hotze inſtantly marched ſome companies of infantry to ſupport the rangers, and a briſk diſcharge of muſquetry was kept up for ſeveral hours, during which the enemy maintained their ground. This induced General Hotze to ſend forth two three-pounders, and to direct ſeveral diſcharges of caſe-ſhot upon the enemy, which obliged them to fall back towards the left flank. General Hotze then ordered out Lieutenant Verga, with a ſtrong patrole, to reconnoitre the enemy's farther deſign. Lieutenant Verga returned with the advice, that the enemy were collected on that wing in a force of 800 men; but they were alſo driven thence by the bravery of our troops, and ſome well-ſerved charges of our artillery.

At eleven o'clock every thing was quiet. The enemy left twenty-two men, including one officer, dead on the field. On our ſide, Enſign Tzaltevich, of the third battalion of Sclavonians, and ſeven men were wounded.

About four o'clock in the afternoon the enemy cannonaded from the works of Lauterbourg, the caſtle of General Schwartz, and with their red-hot balls ſet fire to a barn filled with hay and ſtraw, erected cloſe to the caſtle, caſtle, which was wholly burnt down. They alſo threw ſome red-hot balls into the church of the village of Berg, but without effect. We obſerved ſeveral movements towards night in the enemy's camp.

(Signed) WURMSER.

On the 9th of September, 1793, the French kept up a briſk cannonade upon the advanced poſt of the allied armies, and upon the village of Berg; the Allies diſpatched a detachment of men againſt them, with two pieces of cannon. The French ſaw them advance by the riſing of the duſt, and after a diſcharge from their cannon, the French made a precipitate retreat, leaving eight men killed behind them.

On the 18th the French advanced in three columns from this place againſt the village of Berg. They attacked with the firſt column the poſt in that village, and ſoon repulſed the Allies there and in a little wood, planted their artillery, and cannonaded moſt violently the poſition of Major-General Yellachich. The ſecond column immediately moved to the left into the wood of Bienwald, where it attacked the diviſion of Servians, ſupported by a battalion of Preiſs. The fire was extremely ſmart on both ſides. General Yellachich obſerved, that the French endeavoured to break through the wood, and to charge his poſition in the rear, he therefore ſought to take the enemy in flank with the Suabian battalion of grenadiers, and one diviſion of Manfredini; he ſucceeded in it, turning the French completely; but they collecting again, endeavoured to break through by a repeated and moſt vigorous attack, but after a combat of four hours, the French were repulſed; while the huſſars of Wurmſer, poſted in the plain below the village of Berg, prevented their Horſe-Chaſſeurs from penetrating farther into that quarter.

The enemy left the great wood at the approach of night, under the protection of a fog, and remained with the troops in the village of Berg and the adjacent wood. The allied troops remained under arms all night, and the advanced poſts and patroles ceaſed to ſkirmiſh.

At four o'clock in the ſame afternoon, the French advanced alſo with four battalions againſt General Hotze, but after a very warm reſiſtance they were obliged to retreat.

On the 19th of this month, General Yellachich was briſkly attacked by the French for ſeveral hours, and in the end the French were obliged to retreat from Berg, General Yellachich re-occupied all his former poſts. The French had 1,200 killed, wounded, and taken priſoners; the Allies had twenty-nine men and three horſes killed; one officer, 128 men, and ſix horſes wounded.

On the ſame day General Hotze was alſo attacked very briſkly, and he was under the neceſſity to retreat a little, but he ſoon after advanced to attack the French, and by ſome different movements he forced them to retreat as far as Lauterbourg at two o'clock in the afternoon.

In the attacks of both days General Hotze loſt three officers, forty men, and ſix horſes killed; and eight officers, 223 men, and ſixteen horſes wounded. The French had 609 killed on the ſpot, and a great many wounded.

LEDES, SIEGE OF. Formerly a caſtle in Kent. In the troubles between Edward II. with his Barons, in 1321, his Queen proceeding on a journey of devotion to the metropolitan church of Canterbury, ſent an officer to demand a lodging at the caſtle of Ledes, belonging to Bartholomew Badleſmere, a gentleman who had been under manifold obligations to Edward, but had lately abandoned his intereſt, and joined the diſcontented Barons. He was not then in the caſtle; but his lady refuſed admittance to the Queen, or to any perſon whatever, without an order from her huſband; and told the officers and domeſtics, that they might provide lodgings for their miſtreſs in ſome other place, for that ſhe ſhould not enter her caſtle. The Queen went in perſon to the gate, and not only met with a repulſe, but ſaw ſix of her attendants killed by the garriſon. Incenſed at this outrage, ſhe complained to the King, demanding reparation for the inſult ſhe had met with. Edward readily entering into the quarrel of his Queen, and aſſembling a body of forces, he inveſted the caſtle, which was well provided with all neceſſaries to ſuſtain a ſiege.

The Barons of the Welch marches advanced as far as Kingſton, in their way to the relief of the place; but the Earl of Lancaſter, who hated Badleſmere, refuſing to ſend the ſuccours they ſolicited, the Welch Barons found themſelves too weak to give the King battle. They then propoſed that hoſtilities ſhould ceaſe, till a parliament could be aſſembled, but being rejected, they retired. The caſtle held out till their proviſions were conſumed, and then ſurrendered at diſcretion.

Walter de Colpepper, the Governor, and eleven of the officers, were executed as traitors; the reſt were impriſoned in different places; and the women, with Badleſmere's lady, committed to the Tower of London.

LEEDS, BATTLE AT IN 655. The Kings of Diera and Eaſt Anglia, having entered into a league with Penda of Mercia, to dethrone Oſwy of Bernicia, took the field; but the King of Diera dreading the conſequence of a defeat, determined not to ſupport his ally. When the armies came in ſight of each other, on the ſpot where Leeds in Yorkſhire now ſtands, the Dieras ſtood neuter, and ſuffered Penda to be totally defeated.

LEER, IN FLANDERS.—Extract of a Letter from an Officer in the Army under the Command of Lord Cathcart.

ACTION OF THE 26TH OF FEBRUARY, 1795.

On this day the enemy, conſiſting of about 3000 men, ſupported by a formidable train of artillery, advanced in two columns againſt one of our moſt important poſts on the Sea Dyke, defended by little more than 400 of our troops, commanded by Colonel Forbes, and diſpoſed of in the following order:—The right wing conſiſted of a body of emigrant huſſars and chaſſeurs, aided by ſeveral pieces of artillery; the left our riflemen;

riflemen; and the centre, the four Britiſh light companies of the 27th, 28th, 80th, and 84th regiments; beſides an advanced picquet ſtationed at a windmill, at the diſtance of about 200 yards. The attack commenced about half paſt nine in the morning, with a diſcharge of cannon from the enemy, which was immediately returned by us: ſhortly after this, our huſſars vigorouſly charged their line, and drove them back a conſiderable way; but a reinforcement of riflemen coming to their aſſiſtance, the huſſars were forced to retire with much precipitation. In a few minutes after the action became warm in every direction, and the conflict was deſperate on both ſides for ſome hours. At length the right wing, overpowered by numbers, was obliged to give way, the picquet having previouſly been beaten in. The troops in this diviſion, as I have already ſtated, were chiefly emigrants, who (determined to ſell their lives as dear as poſſible), gave no quarter to the enemy, and conſequently received none from their Republican countrymen. With an undaunted courage, never ſurpaſſed in the annals of military valour, they charged the enemy with ſword and bayonet, and, being aſſiſted by a continual diſcharge of canniſter-ſhot from our guns, the execution was great, and the fate of the day rendered doubtful for a conſiderable time, till their cavalry, having out-flanked ours, attacked us in the rear with ſuch irreſiſtible impetuoſity, that we were forced to retreat in every direction, and with ſo much confuſion, that every man endeavoured to ſave himſelf in the beſt manner he could deviſe; at this juncture, you will readily conceive, the carnage was ſhocking to an extreme. The left and centre ſtill gallantly maintained their ground until four o'clock in the afternoon, when the whole of their ammunition being exhauſted, and their whole force entirely encircled by the enemy, they charged bayonets, and forced their way with very little loſs. The Commander had a miraculous eſcape from falling into their hands; being ſurrounded by three huſſars, he determined to ride down a dyke, nearly perpendicular, and plunged himſelf and his horſe into a canal at the ſide of it, in which he continued near half an hour before effectual aſſiſtance could be afforded him. I effected my eſcape by taking a foot-path between two canals, into one or other of which I was in danger of falling every moment. The intrepidity and courage diſplayed by every corps on the occaſion, was truly exemplary. The loſs of the emigrants is very ſevere indeed; that of the Britiſh trifling. Lieutenant Reynolds, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a moſt eminent manner, in defence of the out-poſt, was wounded in the leg by a rifle ball, but no danger is apprehended in conſequence; it was not without much perſuaſion he was induced to leave the field, notwithſtanding his diſabled ſtate.

On the 27th and 28th, the whole of our army was engaged, on which occaſion we again loſt ground, with conſiderable loſs. The right diviſion and the 84th regiment were obliged to leave their baggage behind, all of which fell into the enemy's hands. The whole of our army has re-croſſed the Ems. The Auſtrians are reported to have gained ſome advantages on our left.

LEFFINGHEN, SIEGE OF. A village near Oudenburg, in the Auſtrian Netherlands in Flanders. In the year 1708, during the conteſt for glory between the Duke of Marlborough and the celebrated Duke de Vendome, after General Webb, with 8000 of the confederate forces, had beat M. de la Motte with 22,000 at Wynendale. Vendome, being enraged at ſo flagrant a diſgrace to the French arms, marched in perſon to Oudenarde with the French army, and ordered the dikes between Bruges and Nieuport to be cut in ſeveral places, in order to lay the country under water, and thus prevent the communication between Oſtend and the Duke of Marlborough's army. But notwithſtanding the great inundation, Major-General Cadogan, favoured by the Britiſh troops at Leſſinghen, found means to carry through the water-floods great quantities of ammunition and other neceſſaries.

Hereupon the Duke de Vendome bent all his reſentment and efforts againſt the village of Leſſinghen with 8000 men; after ſeveral warm repulſes, and eight days open trenches, he carried it, (through the ſupineneſs of ſome officers), and made the garriſon priſoners of war.

To give a particular account of this ſiege in miniature (for it could be termed no other), would be as ridiculous as it was inglorious to the French; to make an attack in form with a great army, on ſo weak and defenceleſs a poſt, while the ſiege of the moſt important of all their frontiers was carrying on; they not daring ſo much as to attempt the relief thereof. And yet the French writers, particularly the Marquis de Quincy, gives as formal an account of this mighty ſiege, and extols the valour of his countrymen in the ſeveral attacks of it, as if it had been a place of the greateſt importance, while the magnanimous Vendome, acted in this affair from immediate reſentment, and like another Quixote, ſpent his rage on a poor windmill.

We ſhall only, for the ſake of brevity obſerve, that though it was allowed on all hands not to be tenable againſt a vigorous attack, yet Lieutenant-Colonel Rapin, and Major Herbert, defended it bravely for eight days againſt all the ſkill and cannon of Vendome, killed and wounded a great number of his men, and took ſeveral officers priſoners: among the latter Major-General de Croiſſy Colbert, taken by an Engliſh grenadier, who generouſly refuſed 200 piſtoles, and a commiſſion in the French ſervice, to permit his eſcape.

Thus this place was bravely defended, during eight days open trenches, till the fatigued garriſon was relieved by Colonel Caulfield, with ſeveral other officers, and 1,250 men. This new officer, by ſome unaccountable miſconduct, left undetermined by our hiſtorians, ſuffered himſelf to be ſurpriſed the very next day, and ſurrendered with his garriſon priſoners at diſcretion. However, the M. de Quincy accounts for this ſurpriſe, by telling us, that the new Governor having been making merry on account of the ſurrender of Liſle, which happened two days before, the French found the ſoldiers all drunk, and the officers quiet in their beds, ſo that they got into the place before the former could get into a poſture of defence, or the latter put on their cloaths.

LEGHORN, ENGAGEMENT NEAR. A ſea port in the Mediterranean. The privateers of London, Briſtol, Liverpool, Liverpool, Guernſey, and Jerſey, having had great ſucceſs againſt the enemy (Auguſt 1756), and amongſt other captures, made prizes of ſeveral of their privateers, Captain Fortunatus Wright, of the St. George privateer, of Liverpool, of twelve guns and eighty men, performed a very gallant action off the port of Leghorn, where, to the honour of his country, he fought a French xebeque of ſixteen carriage guns, and 280 men, who, with two other privateers which were then in ſight, had long blocked up that port, and forced her to ſheer off, having her captain, lieutenant, and lieutenant of marines, and ſeventy or eighty men killed, and ſeventy wounded. He loſt himſelf only four, and had nine wounded. The whole of this deſperate engagement was ſeen from the port, and procured ſecurity for all the veſſels bound inward and outward, and greatly elated the Engliſh and their friends in that city. Captain Wright, at his return to Leghorn, was confined by order of the regency.

Two men of war were ſent by Sir Edward Hawke to Leghorn, on the 21ſt of September, as a convoy to the homeward bound ſhips from that port, and peremptorily demanded the releaſe of the gallant Captain Fortunatus Wright and his ſnow, the St. George, which they obtained and brought away with them.

On the 27th of June, 1796, a French corps, conſiſting of 5000 foot, and ſome ſquadrons of horſe, took poſſeſſion of Leghorn, in purſuance of the agreement entered into by the Grand Duke of Tuſcany and the Directory; but the Engliſh magazines and effects found in that place, were of no importance, as the Engliſh had ſufficient time to remove them on board the Engliſh ſhips which were in the harbour. In the road remained only two Britiſh frigates, beyond cannon-ſhot from the batteries of that place.

Orders given by General Buonaparte to the Conſul of the French Republic at Leghorn, June 28.

The Conſul of the French Republic ſhall put the ſeals upon all the magazines belonging to the Engliſh, to the Emperor, to the Empreſs of Ruſſia, and in general to all the princes or ſubjects of the States with which we are at war; he ſhall make an inventory of the goods.

He ſhall take all ſteps, adopt all meaſures, and employ all neceſſary means to diſcover the merchandize which may have been depoſited with the different merchants at Leghorn—of that property he ſhall take poſſeſſion.

(Signed) BONAPARTE.

In execution of the orders of the General, the Conſul of the French Republic invites all the inhabitants of the city of Leghorn and its environs, of whatever nation or quality they may be, who poſſeſs, under the name of depoſit, or any other name, effects, merchandize, ſilver, gold, money, jewels, horſes, furniture, &c. belonging to the ſubjects of Great Britain, the empire, Ruſſia, or other enemies of the Republic, to deliver, in the courſe of to-morrow, 12 Meſſidor, (June 30, old ſtile) to the Conſul himſelf, a detailed account and true declaration of the effects and ſums of money which belong to the abovementioned States, enemies of the Republic. Thoſe who have contracted with the enemies of the Republic in any manner and form ſoever, are equally to make their declaration to the Conſul of the Republic, which is to ſerve ſimply as a neceſſary meaſure to the examination of them. The Conſul particularly invites the French to point out to him the effects hidden, depoſited, or alienated by pretended ſales, or in any other manner—no motive for retaining them ſhall be admitted, becauſe it is proved, that the French citizens have been at different times deſpoiled or injured by the blind meaſures of the enemies of the Republic in the port of Leghorn, and that even force and violence have been employed. It is therefore the moſt legitimate right of repriſal which the French Republic exerts, and a reſtitution of its property, equally juſt, which it claims to-day conformably to the right of all nations. As ſoon as the declarations have been made, meaſures ſhall be taken to aſcertain their exactneſs, and to aſſure the ſequeſtration of the ſaid effects. Thoſe who ſhall neglect making declarations, or ſhall make them incomplete, will expoſe themſelves to ſevere reſearches, and to fatal conſequences, which, out of regard to their own intereſt, they ought not to ſubject themſelves to. The intention of the General in Chief is, that all the property of the enemies of the Republic be delivered into the hands of the Republic as prizes taken by ſea; in conſequence, and by this conſideration, all reſearches, all trials, all condemnations are attached to the conſular juriſdiction.

Bonaparte, Commander in Chief of the Army of Italy, to his Royal Highneſs the Grand Duke of Tuſcany.

Head-Quarters at Piſtoia, June 30.

The flag of the French Republic is conſtantly inſulted in the Port of Leghorn. The property of the French merchants is violated there; every day is marked by ſome attempt againſt France, as contrary to the intereſts of the Republic as to the law of nations. The Executive Directory have repeatedly preferred their complaints to the miniſter of your Royal Highneſs at Paris, who has been obliged to avow that it is impoſſible for your Royal Highneſs to repreſs the Engliſh, and to maintain a neutrality in the Port of Leghorn.

This confeſſion immediately convinced the Executive Directory, that it was their duty to repel force by force, to make their commerce reſpected, and they ordered me to ſend a diviſion of the army, under my command, to take poſſeſſion of Leghorn.

I have the honour to inform your Royal Highneſs, that on the 28th of June, a diviſion of the army entered Leghorn; their conduct there will be conformable to thoſe principles of neutrality which they have been ſent to maintain. The flag, the garriſon, the property, and your Royal Highneſs and his people ſhall be ſcrupulouſly reſpected.

I am, moreover, inſtructed to aſſure your Royal Highneſs of the deſire of the French government, to witneſs a continuation of the friendſhip which unites the two States, and of their conviction that your Royal Highneſs, conſcious of the exceſſes daily committed by the Engliſh ſhips, which you cannot prevent, will apriflemen; and the centre, the four Britiſh light companies of the 27th, 28th, 80th, and 84th regiments; beſides an advanced picquet ſtationed at a windmill, at the diſtance of about 200 yards. Bonaparte to the Grand Duke of Tuſcany.

Head-Quarters at Leghorn, June 29.

Royal Highneſs,

An hour before we entered Leghorn an Engliſh frigate carried off two French ſhips, worth 500,000 livres. The Governor ſuffered them to be taken under the fire of his batteries, which was contrary to the intention of your Royal Highneſs, and the neutrality of the Port of Leghorn. I prefer a complaint to your Royal Highneſs againſt this Governor, who, in his whole conduct, diſplays a decided hatred againſt the French. He yeſterday endeavoured, at the moment of our arrival, to make the people riſe up againſt us; there is no kind of ill treatment that he did not make our advanced guard experience. I ſhould, doubtleſs, have been juſtified in bringing him to trial before a military commiſſion; but, from reſpect for your Royal Highneſs, intimately convinced of the ſpirit of juſtice which directs all your actions, I preferred ſending him to Florence, where, I am perſuaded, you will give orders to have him puniſhed ſeverely.

I muſt, at the ſame time, return my thanks to his Royal Highneſs, for his goodneſs in appointing General Straſaldo to ſupply the army with every thing that was neceſſary. He has acquitted himſelf with equal zeal and ſucceſs.

BONAPARTE.

The Grand Duke of Tuſcany, it appears, lately ſent Count Manfredini to General Bonaparte.

The reſult of theſe conferences was the following convention: 1ſt, The Grand Duke engages to pay 800,000 livres to defray the expences of the French garriſon at Leghorn.

2d. General Bonaparte promiſes, in the name of the Republic, to withdraw the 16,000 French troops who are at Leghorn, and the Grand Duke engages to pay, on the day they ſhall begin their march, 1,200,000 livres more.

On the 26th of June all the Engliſh had embarked, and 400 French cavalry entered the city, made themſelves maſters of Fort Molo, and fired upon two Engliſh frigates, one of which put to ſea, but the other could not eſcape. No ſhip afterwards dared to leave the harbour, but all were viſited by the French. On the 27th, 5000 French entered the city, and took poſſeſſion of all the forts and batteries, and mounted guard at the gates, together with the Tuſcan ſoldiers. Bonaparte took up his reſidence in the Grand Duke's palace, and had a guard of 200 gens d'armes, one piece of artillery, and one howitzer.

When Bonaparte arrived at Leghorn, he was ſo mortified at the idea of Mr. Wyndham and Mr. Udney, with the Engliſh property of the factory, having got off, that he ſet off for Florence, took poſſeſſion of the different entrances, and actually ordered the Grand Duke and Ducheſs into confinement in their palace, with the royal family, and mounted a guard over them; notwithſtanding their neutrality and their having an ambaſſador at Paris.

After the convention at Caſtiglione in 1800, the French took poſſeſſion of Leghorn and all Tuſcany, as appears by the following account.

General Brune informed the government that conformable to the 2d article of the preliminaries, and the particular convention of Caſtiglione, he had ſummoned the General, commanding in Tuſcany, for the Grand Duke, to diſarm the levy in maſs; that, in conſequence of his refuſal, Lieutenant-General Dupont entered Florence on the 15th of October, 1800, and the General of Brigade, Clement, Leghorn on the 16th. More than 25,000 of the levy in maſs were diſperſed, diſarmed, and returned to their houſes. The French troops found that their reputation only was ſufficient to vanquiſh them. General Sommariva and the Auſtrian troops retired to Ancona.

All the Engliſh merchandize which was in Tuſcany, and particularly at Leghorn, was confiſcated to the profit of the Republic.

The diſarming of theſe brigands occaſioned no loſs. The French troops obſerved the ſtricteſt diſcipline.

Dupont, Lieutenant-General, to the General in Chief, Brune.

I haſten, Citizen General, to render you an account of my entry into Florence. The army of Tuſcan inſurgents, about 25,000 ſtrong, according to the confeſſion of the Auſtrians themſelves, is diſſolved. There remains for me nothing more to do but to purſue the ſcattered corps which have taken refuge from ſeveral quarters in the defiles of the Appenines, and to drive away the brigands of Arezzo. They are the moſt daring, and are the ſame who in the laſt campaign inſulted the army of Naples. In that town was performed the famous miracle of the Holy Virgin giving the ſignal of inſurrection by the report of a muſket, which Mr. Wickham, one of the principal contrivers of this ridiculous miracle, cauſed to be fired againſt the French. Theſe deluſions, however, were not ſufficient to arm this multitude of peaſants, and it was found neceſſary to reſort to force.

The head-quarters of the Inſurgents commanded by Spannochi, were at Barbarino, whence they were driven yeſterday. As they were menaced on every ſide, they were compelled to divide themſelves to avoid being ſurrounded. They abandoned their works, on which they had begun to plant ſome artillery, and the moſt advantageous poſitions.

General Sommariva has informed me of his departure from Florence, by a letter, a copy of which I ſubjoin. He retires to Ancona.

To-morrow General Monnier proceeds to Arezzo with the brigade of General St. Cyr. General Pino marches to Prato and Piſtoia, and General Malher to Leghorn. I know not whether General Clement has entered that place. I hope, however, that in conſequence of thoſe diſpoſitions the diſarmament will be ſpeedily effected throughout all Tuſcany.

The

The regency on its departure eſtabliſhed a proviſional government—General Sommariva had emptied the treaſury.

DUPONT.

LEGNAGO, IN ITALY.—Extract of a Letter from General Kray, dated March 26, 1800.

The enemy attacked me early this day with great impetuoſity, but I have repulſed them with conſiderable loſs. The French General Devins has been killed, and General Servan wounded. The priſoners who have already been brought in conſiſt of two chiefs of battalions, twenty officers, and more than 500 ſoldiers. Fifteen pieces of cannon, and as many ammunition waggons, have alſo fallen into our hands. Fifteen hundred Frenchmen lie dead upon the field of battle. We have alſo a conſiderable number killed and wounded. The enemy have been entirely diſperſed, and purſued in their flight from Legnago to Angeri and Cerera. General Baron Von Khaitzen writes me word from Verona, that he has been attacked by General Scherer, but made a ſucceſsful reſiſtance.

March 31.—Yeſterday the enemy, with the two diviſions of Le Serrurier and Victor, endeavoured to make a fourth attack upon our poſitions along the Adige. They preſſed forward with great impetuoſity over that river. Their plan in this hazardous attempt was, to force the army that lay behind Verona to retreat towards Vicenza, and thus to ſeize upon Verona and Legnago, as the barriers of the Venetian territory; but Generals Frolich, Lattermann, Ellnitz, and Gottenheim, advanced againſt them, in a determined manner, and drove them entirely acroſs the Adige. The enemy, from a fear of being purſued, broke down the bridges above Verona, immediately after paſſing them, by which means their rear, conſiſting of 1300 men, was cut off; 800 of theſe were made priſoners, and the reſt withdrew towards the Tyrolian Hill. Among the priſoners are ſeveral ſtaff and other officers. We have only had 100 men wounded, and very few have been killed. See VERONA.

LEIGE, the capital of the biſhoprick. The French began to cannonade Liege on the 27th of July, 1793. The attack of the advanced poſts near the ſuburbs of St. Marguerite was as obſtinately made as vigorouſly repulſed. Nevertheleſs, after an hour's hard fighting, the Auſtrians, yielding to the vaſt numbers of the enemy, fell back to La Chartreuſe, where General Latour's army was encamped. The Liegois of the ſuburb taking this retreat for a flight, pelted the Auſtrians with ſtones and tiles; on which General Latour ordered that red hot balls ſhould be fired on the ſuburbs.

The French continued the attack againſt the quarter of Amercour, and attempted four times to force the bridge on the Meuſe, but were finally repulſed. After this retreat, the Imperialiſts deſtroyed every thing about that part of the Meuſe, and made great havock, particularly among the Inſurgents, of whom ſeveral were killed, and twenty-two taken priſoners. At ſix in the evening the French entirely evacuated Liege, retiring into the citadel. They renewed their attack on the following day, and were received with the ſame vigour: ſince which there has been a continual cannonade on both ſides, and ſome ſlight ſkirmiſhing. The two armies remain ſeparated by the bridge of the ſuburb of Amercour, which has been almoſt entirely deſtroyed by the conſtant firing on each ſide.

General Count De Latour having learned that the enemy were proceeding in force towards Ourte, made ſeveral neceſſary diſpoſitions, and repaired to Sprimont, at which place General Liſſen commanded. On the 15th and 16th, nothing particular occurred, if we except a few unſucceſsful attempts made by the enemy to croſs the Ourte, and the Embleve at different places. The 17th was ſpent in attacks made on the different poſts by the French.

On the 18th, in the morning, they preſented themſelves in a maſs along the Ourte, from Eſneux to Freture, and along the Embleve from Rouvron to Sougne; they threw up a number of batteries oppoſite ours, and, under the protection of their fire, their infantry attempted to ford the river. They were at firſt driven back with a terrible ſlaughter: the attack commenced at day-break; and at ſeven o'clock the enemy, in ſpite of all their efforts, had experienced no manner of ſucceſs.

By dint, however, of making a prodigious ſacrifice of men, they forced the poſts of General Rieſe, between Eſneux and Monfort; and while they were making the attack in that quarter, they filed off detachments towards Naye, behind the above poſts. It became neceſſary to ſend off troops in that direction, to obviate any miſchief that might reſult from this movement; but by half paſt eight the enemy ſucceeded in forcing alſo the poſts of Lougne and Roncevaux, from which we were forced to ſend off detachments in conſequence of a vigorous attack made by the enemy on Aywaille and Rouvron. The loſs of the two latter poſts forced General De Latour to order a retreat; and the poſts of Eſneux under General Rieſe, and of Freture under General Otto, retreated to Bauffave. That of Haut-Regard retreated by Theux to Herve; and General Count de Baillet Latour, with the poſt of Sprimont, planned a retreat to Louvergne.

The enemy, however, having penetrated to the right and left, and taken poſt there, he left that village on the right, and drew up his troops on the heights of Foret, where he gave them five hours reſt. He afterwards encamped at Herve, where the different detached corps, particularly that of La Chartreuſe, aſſembled on the following day. The loſs did not amount to 1000 men. The enemy having obtained poſſeſſion of Louvergne, the baggage ſent off towards Spa and Verviers fell into their hands, as did alſo ſeveral guns and ammunition waggons, the wheels of which had been broken. Their loſs muſt have been very conſiderable, ſeeing that they were expoſed for nearly ſix hours to a croſs-fire of artillery and muſketry. We calculate that upwards of 4000 were killed.

On the 20th a very obſtinate conflict took place at Clermont. The French Generals Championet and Hatry formed a junction of their diviſions, and attacked tacked the advanced guard of Count Latour, poſted at Clermont, under the command of General Ott, who ſupported the moſt vigorous attack that had perhaps been made during the preſent war. The enemy made no fewer than twenty attacks on the village and height of Clermont, endeavouring, by every poſſible expedient to turn the poſt. The reſiſtance was the ſame throughout; and after a combat of ſeven hours, the French retreated, with the loſs of upwards of 2000 men. The Auſtrians had thirty killed, and nearly 300 wounded.

LEIPSIC. A city of Saxony, ſeized by the Pruſſians, September the 1ſt, 1756. The King of Pruſſia finding that he could not provoke the combined army to an engagement upon fair ground, notwithſtanding the ſuperiority of their numbers, he made a feint, ſoon after the beginning of September 1757, as if he intended to march to Berlin with the greateſt part of his army, leaving General Keith with only 7000 or 8000 men to defend Leipſic. Upon this the combined army took courage, paſſed the Sala, and having marched up to the city, ſummoned the General to ſurrender; to which he anſwered, that the King his maſter had ordered him to defend it to the laſt extremity, and he would obey his orders. But before the enemy could ſo much as begin to form the ſiege of that place, they were alarmed with the approach of the King of Pruſſia, who had, by previous and private orders, collected together all his diſtant detachments, and was advancing by long marches to Leipſic; whereupon they retreated again over the Sala, and being followed by his Pruſſian Majeſty, thus brought on the battle of Roſbach, the 5th inſtant. of which we have given the beſt accounts. To which we ſhall add, that even at Paris, they were ſo far from ſinging Te Deum, as uſual, that they frankly acknowledged upon this occaſion their having been defeated, and only endeavoured to leſſen their loſs: but by accounts from ſeveral parts of Germany we were told that the combined army was almoſt entirely diſperſed, and that whole bodies of the Imperial troops deſerted to the King of Pruſſia.

LEMBACH, September 23, 1793. The Hereditary Prince of Hohenlohe having received orders from the King of Pruſſia to attack the French who were intrenched with twenty-five pieces of cannon behind Lembach, divided his corps, and took his meaſures with ſuch ſucceſs, that the enemy were repulſed and driven beyond Biles, by Limbach; behind Limbach they rallied and took a new poſition, where they defended themſelves a conſiderable time, but at length were again forced, completely routed, and purſued as far as St. Imbert. Their loſs amounted to twelve officers and 330 men killed, and 136 taken priſoners, with two pieces of cannon. The battalions of grenadiers and volunteers ſuffered moſt: the free company of Metz was cut to pieces. The loſs of the Pruſſians conſiſts of forty men killed and wounded.

LEMNOS, SIEGE OF. An iſland of the Archipelago, in European Turkey, at the entrance of the Helleſpont, or Dardanels, belonging to the Turks. In the diſpute between the Venetians and the Turks for the maſtery at ſea, the latter fitted out a large fleet to proſecute the war in the year 1656; but as ſoon as it ſailed out of the Dardanels, the Venetians, who waited for it, began the attack, whence enſued a bloody engagement; and though the Captain-General Marcello was ſlain, yet the Proveditor ſo vigorouſly proſecuted the fight, that out of ſixty-eight galleys, twenty-eight ſhips, and nine galeaſſes, only eighteen galleys eſcaped, the reſt being either taken, ſunk, or burnt.

The Venetians, animated with this ſucceſs, proceeded in their intentions, which were to take Tenedos and Lemnos, the former of which they took in four days, and immediately afterwards Lemnos. The Turkiſh miniſtry, conſidering that the loſs of thoſe iſlands would be attended with conſiderable danger to the Ottoman ſtate, ſent a numerous fleet to recover them: but putting into Scio, to wait for ten galleys from Barbary, with a great number of ſaiks or merchantmen, under their convoy, the Venetians intercepted or burnt the ſhips, with many of the ſaiks, killing 1000 Turks in the ſeveral conflicts. Upon which another fleet was fitted out; but though the Venetians defeated that alſo, yet they repaired it again, and coming before Tenedos, in the end of July, it was deſerted by the beſieged, who did not think it tenable. But Lemnos held out two months longer, and then was ſurrendered on articles. Hereupon Sultan Mohammed propoſed to make peace with the Republic of Venice, if they would ſurrender Candia, and pay three millions for the expence of the war, which terms were rejected.

LEUZE, BATTLE AT. A town in the Auſtrian Netherlands, and province of Hainault, fourteen miles from Mons, near Liege. In the year 1691, the French drove all before them, to the great mortification of King William, who had juſt finiſhed the Iriſh war by defeating his father-in-law, James, at the battle of the Boyne: Nice, Mons, and other towns of ſtrength, fell into their hands. After the taking of Mons, the French having gained ſo important a point, thought only of acting upon the defenſive for the reſt of the campaign in Flanders.

The Confederates, under King William, were indeed ſomewhat ſuperior to them in point of infantry, but in cavalry the French were ſtronger. King William did all he could to bring Luxemburg to a battle, by ſeveral marches and countermarches, as well as the feints he made of retaking Mons; yet all was ineffectual; for Luxemburg as induſtriouſly avoided fighting, reſolving to give no opportunity, except he ſaw a great diſadvantage on the ſide of the Allies; ſo that the King, after he had firſt blown up the fortifications of Beaumont, marched his army towards Aeth, and leaving the command to Prince Waldeck, he retired to conſider of the farther operations of the war. Prince Waldeck continued ſome time about Aeth; but as he was decamping from Leuze, on the 19th of September, the Duke of Luxemburg thought it a fair opportunity to fall upon the Prince's rear, as he was approaching towards Benair and Cambrun, which he did by a forced march, with a great body of horſe, the beſt in France, and that before any of the Confederates knew of his intentions: nay, when Tilly, who commanded in the rear, ſent the Prince an expreſs of it, he could ſcarce credit credit it. But the firſt line of the Confederates was hardly drawn up, before it was charged by the French King's houſehold troops, while the ſecond line was forming of ſuch troops as were ordered to paſs the river with all convenient ſpeed. The French horſe being more numerous, they had ſome advantage for a ſhort time over the Allies, who being ſuſtained by the infantry, though their firſt and ſecond line were diſordered, rallied again, and after a long diſpute, the French quitted their enterprize, ſufficiently contented with having haraſſed the Prince's march. In this action near Leuze, the loſs is ſaid to be 1000 of the Confederates, and about 500 of the French.

LEWES. A town in the county of Suſſex, and near which the following very important battle was fought in 1264. Henry III. quarrelling with his Barons, and all hopes of agreement being loſt by the animoſity of both parties, nothing was thought of but a battle. The Earl of Leiceſter the chief of the Barons, advancing with his army, drew it up in order of battle near the King's, who was preparing to receive him. The Royal army was divided into three bodies, of which that on the right was commanded by Prince Edward, (afterwards Edward I.) William de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, his uncle, and John, Earl of Warren and Surry. The King of the Romans, and Earl of Cornwallis commanded the left wing, and the King the centre. The Barons' army was divided into four bodies; the firſt was led by Henry de Montfort, the General's ſon; the Earl of Glouceſter commanded the ſecond; the third, conſiſting wholly of Londoners, was on the left, commanded by Nicholas Segrave; and the fourth was headed by the Earl of Leiceſter. The two armies being thus drawn up, Prince Edward began the fight by attacking the Londoners, who not being able to withſtand ſo vigorous a charge immediately took to flight. As the Prince was animated with a deſire of revenging the affront done the Queen his mother by the London mob, he purſued them above four miles without giving any quarter. But this revenge coſt him dear. Whilſt he purſued his victory with more eagerneſs than diſcretion, the Earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter gained the ſame advantage over Henry, and the King of the Romans his brother. The Barons being ſenſible what their fate would be were they vanquiſhed, attacked with a fury mixed with deſpair the Royal troops, who had not the ſame reaſon to fight with that animoſity. Accordingly they took to flight after a faint reſiſtance, leaving the two Kings in the hands of their enemies. Henry ſurrendering to the Earl of Leiceſter, and the King of the Romans to the Earl of Glouceſter, were preſently conducted to the priory of Lewes, ſituated at the foot of the caſtle, which was kept by ſome of the King's troops. To this place the ſoldiers of the Royal army fled, in order to retire into the caſtle. But when they ſaw the town in the power of the Barons, the two Kings made priſoners, and in all appearance themſelves going to be ſurrounded on all ſides, they threw down their arms and ſurrendered at diſcretion.

Meantime Prince Edward, who was returning in triumph from the purſuit of the Londoners, was extremely ſurpriſed to ſee the Royal army diſperſed, and to hear the two Kings were priſoners. His firſt thoughts were to exert his utmoſt to ſet them at liberty. If this reſolution could have been immediately executed, it would infallibly have changed the face of affairs. The conquerors, employed in guarding their priſoners, or diſperſed about the field in purſuit of their flying enemies, would have found it difficult to withſtand a vigorous attack. But the Prince's ſoldiers, diſmayed at the defeat of the reſt of the army, and the captivity of the two Kings, ſhewed no inclination to renew a fight, which to them ſeemed unequal. This fear, which all Edward's ſolicitations could not overcome, made him loſe ſo fair an opportunity, wherein very probably he would have gained great reputation. Meantime the Earl of Leiceſter drew his army together again with all poſſible expedition. At firſt he only thought of defending himſelf, juſtly dreading to be attacked in his preſent diſorder. But when he ſaw he had time to rally his troops, his only concern was to hinder the Prince from eſcaping. To that end he ſent propoſals to amuſe him, whilſt by ſeveral detachments, he took care to prevent his retreat.

Edward's uncertainty at firſt what courſe he ſhould take, the oppoſition of his own troops, the time ſpent in trying to animate them, and the ſeveral meſſages from the Earl of Leiceſter to amuſe him, were the cauſe of his loſing ſo many hours, which ſhould have been employed either in fighting, or retreating in good order. But having done neither, he found himſelf on a ſudden ſurrounded on all ſides, and under a neceſſity of accepting conditions, which appeared tolerable in his ill ſituation. This negociation, which laſted but a few moments, was ended by theſe articles: That the Statutes of Oxford ſhould be inviolably obſerved; yet ſo, that they might be amended by four biſhops or barons choſen by the parliament; and if theſe four commiſſioners ſhould not agree, they were to ſtand to the arbitration of the Earl of Anjou, brother to the King of France, aſſiſted by four French noblemen. Thus far all went well for the Prince; but the laſt article was the worſt, namely, that himſelf and Henry, his couſin, ſon to the King of the Romans, ſhould remain as hoſtages in the cuſtody of the Barons till all things ſhould be ſettled by parliament. How hard ſoever this article was, Edward, who ſaw no remedy, was forced to conſent to it. Theſe articles, called the Miſe, that is to ſay, the Agreement of Lewes, were ſigned by Edward, and confirmed by the King, who was not in a condition to reject them.

LEXINGTON, ACTION OF. See CONCORD.

LEZNO, BATTLE AT. A village in Poland, not far from Mohilow. In 1708, the Czar of Muſcovy being informed that Charles XII. his competitor for glory, had left a body of his forces in Poland, and had ordered his General, Lewenhaup, to leave Livonia and Courland to join his own army, he thought it abſolutely neceſſary, if poſſible, to prevent this junction. After he had fought that General at Mohilow with loſs, he ſtill perſiſted to embarraſs his march towards the King, and ſoon got ſight of the enemy near the banks of the Pronia, who made as if they would would oppoſe the Czar's paſſage over that river; but no ſooner were ſeven field-pieces brought up to cannonade them, than General Lewenhaup ſtruck off towards the village of Lezno.

About four in the morning, ſome time in July, the Czar began his march towards the Swedes, and at nine came up with them near Lezno, Lewenhaup, informed by parties of the approach of the Ruſſians, drew up his army in the order of battle, cauſing two battalions to advance near a mile before his camp, in order to diſpute the enemy's paſſage over a ſmall moraſs: upon which the Czar gave orders to Prince Menzikoff to ſend Colonel Campbell with his dragoons diſmounted, to attack the two battalions, who made ſo quick a fire upon the Ruſſians, that they could ſcarce form themſelves in order of battle. Theſe diſmounted dragoons having ſtood the fire for ſome time, the Czar cauſed them to be ſupported by four battalions of his own guards, and two of Ingria, who pouring in their ſhot upon the two Swediſh battalions, killed about half of them, and gained the paſſage through the moraſs. General Lewenhaup perceiving his vanguard beaten, cauſed his army to move up, to prevent the Ruſſians from drawing up in battalia. His Czariſh Majeſty obſerving that the enemy's line extended wider than his own, immediately cauſed ſeveral regiments to ſtrengthen the wings. Theſe diſpoſitions being made, about eleven o'clock in the morning the ſignal for attacking was given by a general diſcharge of all the artillery. The enemy began to advance with great fierceneſs and reſolution, and the fight being hot and obſtinate for above an hour and a half, victory hung in ſuſpenſe; during the terrible fire which was every where made, the Czar appeared in all places of danger, to animate his ſoldiers by his preſence; and the Swedes too well obſerving how greatly the Muſcovites acquitted themſelves under the eye of their monarch, ſeemed to regret the abſence of their own, which is given as a great cauſe for their beginning to give ground, and growing diſpirited; in retiring, however, they drew off in order of battle. The Muſcovites then redoubled their efforts to break them, and to improve their own advantage.

The Swedes being driven back to their baggage, the action was for ſome time reſpited on both ſides. About three o'clock in the afternoon, the Ruſſians coming up, the action began again. General Baur being within a mile of the Czar with 4000 men, thought fit to wait for his coming up in order to join him, which was effected by four. He was obliged to endure the fire of the Swedes before he could join the right, where he was to poſt himſelf. When the junction between Baur and the Czar was formed completely, the latter ordered that neither the right nor the left ſhould renew the fight, one without the other; but the left wing having ſtood ſome time inactive, their impatience to fight ſuperſeded that order, while the right wing continued to engage with the utmoſt vigour.

The Swedes ſeeing themſelves repulſed, cauſed two battalions and ten ſquadrons of their reſerve to charge the right of the Ruſſians in flank, but they were ſo well received, and afterwards ſo cloſely purſued, that not above fifty men of the two battalions eſcaped. Upon this advantage, the Ruſſian left and their centre purſued the Swedes forwards amongſt their waggons, and broke all their left wing.

On the right of the Muſcovites, Lewenhaup rallying his troops faced the Muſcovites, who were among his waggons, and fired on them ſo hotly that the Ruſſians retired; but their centre and left wing advanced at the ſame time againſt the Swedes, who were then obliged to face to the right about to make head againſt them. The charge was renewed on both ſides with greater fury than before, both by the horſe and foot, and continued the action till it was dark night; the Czar then reflecting how dangerous it was, as well as difficult to diſlodge them from behind their waggons, forbid the officers on pain of being caſhiered, and the ſoldiers of being hanged, to quit their ranks to rifle the dead; ſo the Ruſſian army kept all night under arms watching the motions of the Swedes. In the mean time, the trophies of the day were preſented to the Czar, conſiſting of forty-ſeven colours, and ten ſtandards, beſides ſixteen cannon, which he added to his own train of artillery.

Thus they paſſed the night, which was very cold, till, at the approach of morning, they ſaw the Swedes kindle fires about their waggons; upon which the Czar ordered that fires ſhould be made in the front of his right line, and that his men ſhould hold themſelves in direct readineſs; they marched then towards the enemy's waggons, expecting to meet with no leſs reſiſtance than before; but to their ſurpriſe they found the enemy gone, and that Lewenhaup had made uſe of that ſtratagem to cover his flight, abandoning all his wounded to the mercy of the Czar, as well as 700 waggons loaded with proviſions. General Pflug was immediately ordered with 1000 grenadiers on horſeback, and 2000 dragoons to purſue and haraſs their flight. He had not marched above half a league, when he overtook the remains of them in a wood, and falling upon them, he made a ſlaughter of them for a league and a half, as far as Pourpouſk, where ſome of the ſcattered army, to the number of 3000, retired into the churchyard. General Pflug advancing to force them, they made a ſignal that they were deſirous to capitulate, and he ſent a lieutenant-colonel with ſix grenadiers to receive their offers; but moſt of the Swediſh ſoldiers being drunk with brandy, would not agree to their officers' propoſals, and ſome of them fired and killed two of the Ruſſian grenadiers. The lieutenant-colonel and officers retiring, according to deſire, Pflug reſolved not to ſpare the ſoldiers; and the Muſcovites falling upon them ſword in hand, killed all that made reſiſtance. A party flying towards the river Soza was purſued by General Mitkuſch with great ſlaughter, who drove moſt of them into the river, among whom General Lewenhaup was himſelf ſwimming with the common men; whereupon Mitkuſch alſo ſwam after them with his party, who forced the officers he took to beg for quarter, but the ſoldiers he put to the ſword, and then rejoined General Pflug. Lewenhaup ſafely paſſed the Soza, and fled precipitately tately with 4000 men, being all that were ſaved from the wreck of the day. General Renchild had juſt joined them with 8000 dragoons, when General Towerden fell upon his rear-guard, and obliged him to retire with the reſt.

The King of Sweden was then at Starodub on the Degne, little ſuſpecting this dreadful ſlaughter of his troops; and when the Czar had returned thanks to Heaven in a public manner, for this complete victory, he gave orders to re-eſtabliſh thoſe regiments which had ſuffered moſt, and repoſed himſelf at Zizirt.

LIEGE, SIEGE OF. A ſtrong town and biſhopric in the circle of Weſtphalia in Germany, on the river Maes, twelve miles from Maeſtricht. This important and ſtrong town was taken in 1675 by the French, during the illneſs of the Prince of Orange, who lay in the ſmall-pox, though at that time we had no leſs than five large armies in the field againſt the limited forces of France and Sweden.

In the year 1702, the Allies having met with uncommon ſucceſs during a year's campaign, under the conduct of the glorious Duke of Marlborough, determined to purſue the advantages they had gained. The ſtrong towns of Keyſerſwaert, Venlo, Landau, Ruremonde, and Stephenſwaert, all falling ſucceſſively into the hands of the Confederates within the ſpace of four months; in conſequence of this reſolution and ſucceſs of the Allies, they next caſt their eyes on the wealthy and ſtrong town of Liege.

Marechal Boufflers at this juncture was mortified at his camp of Berringhen, where he lay under the greateſt anxiety to ſee the rapidity of their conqueſts, without being able to check them. He was at once deſirous of ſecuring Liege, and of poſting his army in ſuch a ſituation as might render it free from the inſults of victorious enemies; he therefore, with thoſe views in contemplation, decamped from Berringhen the 11th of September, paſſed the Damer, made a detachment of 6000 men for Liege, under the command of the Prince of Tſerclas, and advancing as far as Tongres, he there intrenched himſelf. The Duke of Marlborough left his camp alſo of Genk and Aſch to march directly to the Marechal, deſirous to add the gain of a battle to the progreſs his arms had already made; but he found Boufflers poſted in ſo advantageous a manner, as rendered it impoſſible to force him from his intrenchments to the hazard of a battle, and therefore he, with the other generals, came to a reſolution to beſiege the city of Liege. All the Confederate army had orders to march in two columns between the Maes and the Jecker, and on the 13th of October they arrived within cannon-ſhot of the citadel. Marechal Boufflers then made a motion with the French army, and abandoning his ſtrong intrenchments at Tongres, poſted himſelf behind the Maine, in order to protect that ſide of Brabant. The town of Liege, without any reſiſtance, capitulated the next day after the appearance of the Confederate army; but the garriſon retired into the citadel and charter-houſe. General Cohorn having erected the batteries, made ſuch a terrible fire on the 20th and 21ſt, and puſhed the attack with ſo much vigour, that on the 23d the Duke of Marlborough reſolved to make an aſſault upon the place, which he executed about four in the afternoon by a detachment of grenadiers, ſupported by ſeveral other battalions, commanded by Generals Fagel and Somerfeldt. Theſe troops, which were ordered to lodge themſelves upon the counterſcarp, puſhed on with ſo much vigour that they ruſhed ſword in hand into the place, and made ſuch dreadful carnage for three quarters of an hour, that the beſieged, unable to bear the heat and fury of the aſſault, inſtantly threw down their arms, begged for quarter, and ſurrendered at diſcretion.

In the citadel they found thirty-ſix pieces of cannon, a large quantity of arms, with all ſorts of ammunition, beſides 20,000 crowns in money, a ſervice of plate, which belonged to the Governor; which laſt particulars were given as plunder amongſt the ſoldiers, to reward their bravery and fatigue. The diſmal fate of thoſe in the citadel, made the garriſon of the charter-houſe ſeriouſly reflect on the fatal conſequences of an obſtinate delay, ſo that ſcarcely had the Confederates begun to fire, but they alſo beat a parley and capitulated, and Liege with its garriſon was taken in ten days time.

LIER, ATTEMPT ON. A town in the Auſtrian Netherlands, on the little river Netham, the midway between Antwerp and Molines. In the memorable year 1588, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when the Spaniſh armada was deſtroyed, and ſoon after Cambray was taken by the Spaniards, the Dutch then engaging in a joint war with the Engliſh againſt them, made a powerful irruption into the county of Horn, carried all before them, and took the Count of Herenberg himſelf priſoner. Prince Maurice was then at the head of the Dutch forces; and Herranger, one of the Dutch Generals, having miſcarried at Huy ſome time before, and willing to make amends for not keeping a place which his miſconduct or negligence had loſt, formed a deſign of ſurpriſing Lier. Accordingly, he marched with 1000 choſen troops drawn out of the garriſon of Breda in the night-time, and by day-break ordered ſome volunteers ſilently to eſcalade the walls, who having killed the centinels and guards of the adjacent gate, admitted the reſt of the Dutch troops, who ſoon made themſelves maſters of the place; but this place likewiſe Herranger again loſt for want of the neceſſary precautions and circumſpection uſed on ſuch like occaſions.

Alphonſus Luna, Governor of Lier, on the firſt alarm collected all the force of the garriſon, and intrenching himſelf in the market-place before the ſtadt-houſe, ſent a large detachment to maintain the other gate that leads towards the ſide of Louvain, while the Dutch, diſperſed in ſmall troops through the town, were attentive only to plunder the houſes, in which they ſpent moſt part of the day. Indeed Herranger did all he could by threats, commands and intreaties, in perſuading them to force the enemy from the Louvain gate, repreſenting to them the danger they were expoſed to by ſuffering the Spaniards to receive freſh ſupplies from that ſide; but being deaf to all his remonſtrances, Herranger, as the laſt expedient, ordered the other gate, through which he entered the town, to be be barricaded up, in hopes by this ſtep to oblige the plunderers when they ſhould be attacked, to fight their way through, and by that means got poſſeſſion of the Louvain gate. The Spaniards by this time were reinforced with ſome troops from Antwerp, and then attacked the Dutch ſtragglers ſeparately, and on all ſides; but they were ſo far from making reſiſtance, or forming themſelves into a body, according to Herranger's commands, that they fought only for ſafety by flight; and finding the gate through which they had entered now impaſſable, they threw themſelves from the walls into the ditch, whereby many ſaved themſelves by ſwimming, and among the reſt Herranger himſelf.

LIMA, EXPEDITION AGAINST. The capital of the empire of Peru, and of the port of Callao. About the year 1625, during the war between the Spaniards and the States of Holland, the former contending to impoſe, the latter to throw off the Spaniſh yoke, Hermite, the Dutch Admiral, ſoon after a diſpute at ſea between ſome of their reſpective ſhips, proceeded to ſteer his courſe towards the coaſt of Chili. As the Dutch had ſecured a conſiderable footing in the Eaſt Indies, they now bent their deſigns on the weſtern world, and its immenſe wealth, which they envied their old maſters the Spaniards the poſſeſſion of. Influenced at once by the views of ambition, reſentment, and avarice, they were attentive to ſtrengthen themſelves by ſea, and to this end fitted out powerful ſquadrons, one of which Hermite had at this time the command of, with inſtructions to intercept the Spaniſh Plate fleet, which was to ſet ſail from the coaſt of Chili for Old Spain the enſuing December; but being diſappointed in theſe his intentions by the falſe intelligence which he received from a Spaniſh pilot which he took, he altered his courſe and returned to Lima, with a reſolution to revenge himſelf on Callao, the port of Lima, where moſt of its wealth lay, which was two leagues from the imperial city, defended by two ſtrong forts at the entrance, upon which were mounted 130 pieces of large cannon. The Dutch Admiral entered the harbour in the night-time with fourteen ſloops, and burnt nine large carracks, and a great number of other veſſels; he alſo ſet fire to a very large galleon, and endeavoured to ſeize a ſhip which had on board two millions of pieces of eight, but was not able to carry her off; he then retired into the port with 900 men on board, but the forts being reinforced from Lima, he went and burnt Guyaquil, one of the moſt commodious ports of Peru, ſeized upon the King's money, ſet fire to the town, and returned towards Callao, taking ſeventeen ſhips laden with wine, flour, and other commodities, in the paſſage; then made another attempt upon the galleon, which he burnt, with all the veſſels in the port; a leſſon of inſtruction to all admirals and ſea officers, how far perſeverance, ſeconded by duty, may prevail over the beſt prepared enemy in the world.

LIMBURG, SIEGE OF. The capital of the Duchy of Limburg, on the river Veſe, twenty miles from Liege, and eighteen from Aix-la-Chapelle, ſubject to the Empreſs. It having been long debated upon what ſtep ſhould be taken next after the reduction of Huy by the Confederate armies, it was at firſt propoſed to beſiege Limburg; but the Duke of Marlborough, Generaliſſimo, was againſt that proceeding, having urged in defence of his opinion, that it was time enough to attack that place when the ſeaſon ſhould be more advanced. The Duke was for forcing the lines of the French, and gave many ſolid reaſons, ſummed up in the ſuperiority of numbers, the opportunity of fighting with this advantage, the hopes of a complete victory; the preſent inability of the enemy's lines to defend ſo wide an extent of ground as thoſe lines pretended to cover, and their avoiding an engagement for that and other reaſons. Theſe reaſons were ſigned by three Engliſh generals, three Daniſh, five of Lunenburg, and three Heſſian: but the Dutch deputies were againſt the proceeding as hazardous; ſummed up, firſt in doubting whether the French lines were really ſo weak or ſo inferior in number as was reported: whether, though the lines were forced, any farther advantage might be reaped from the ſucceſs, in which ſome loſs muſt be certain; and, ſecondly, the enemy would, if forced, retire to ſtronger places than their lines, ſuch as Ramillies: beſides many other prudential reaſons for avoiding a proceeding of the utmoſt danger and hazard, even though ſucceſsful in its firſt intent. Theſe were ſigned by a minority, who, notwithſtanding, carried the point againſt the Duke of Marlborough, which determined the ſiege of Limburg, and the project of forcing the lines was thus laid aſide. However, the arguments offered by the Duke were cogent and ſolid, and might have produced glorious effects, as the French writers allow, who knew what he propoſed to be true, and afterwards confeſſed that it was owing to the non-compliance of the Dutch deputies with the Duke's meaſures, that his Grace had not a more brilliant campaign that ſeaſon; but beſides, the Duke had other private reaſons founded upon very good intelligence, which he had by his ſpies, three of whom in one night were admitted to his tent, the officers of the guard having orders to wake him when they came.

As there was a medal ſtruck on the taking of Limburg, and as the event was looked upon by all of ſuch moment, it ſeems neceſſary to prefix the above particulars, the more to elucidate a ſucceſs in itſelf bright and glorious.

The 5th of September, 1703, by break of day, the Duke and Monſieur d'Auverquerque marched with the grand army from the neighbourhood of Huy, within two leagues of the French grand army, which conſiſted of ſeventy-four battalions, 140 ſquadrons, upwards of 120 pieces of cannon, twenty-four mortars, mounted on their intrenchments and lines in the front. The confederate army formed eighty battalions, and 142 ſquadrons. The Duke, with ſeveral other generals, and a guard of forty ſquadrons, advanced from the front of the camp within almoſt cannon-ſhot of the enemy's lines to view their ſituation, which put them into ſuch conſternation, that they immediately manned their lines, expecting nothing leſs than it was the Duke's deſign to attack them; but how earneſtly ſoever he might have have deſired, his hands were tied down. The French however ſay, that they were ſo little apprehenſive of the Allies attacking them, that none but the common guards of the lines ſtood to their arms; and that none of the reſt of their troops made any motion of defence, till ſome of our troops advancing within muſquet-ſhot of their lines, and continuing to provoke them, M. de Villeroi ordered a detachment of carabineers of the King's guards out of the lines to correct their raſhneſs, which (ſay they) was done with ſucceſs, ſeveral of them being killed and wounded, nay, diſperſed ſome of the Duke's own retinue.

However on the 6th, the army encamped at St. Tron, from whence two days after the Duke detached Lieutenant-General Bulau with a body of troops towards Limburg. The day preceding his ſetting out, the enemy made a detachment in order to intercept a convoy of the Allies, but perceiving two coaches and ſix, and imagining the Duke of Marlborough to be in one of them, they quitted the convoy to purſue the coaches, but to their great diſappointment found it was the Duke of Hamilton going to Aix-la-Chapelle with a paſs In the interim the convoy eſcaped, and left them the ſhadow for the ſubſtance. Limburg was inveſted the 10th, by Lieutenant-General Bulau, with twenty-four ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons. The officer who commanded there, had orders to abandon the place on the approach of the Allies, but firſt to blow up the caſtle; however, being ſurpriſed, he was forced to make ſome defence for the ſake of his credit, which Father Daniel confirms; the garriſon in the town and caſtle conſiſted of four battalions, with twelve pieces of large cannon and four mortars mounted. The 12th, the Duke, with the Hereditary Prince of Heſſe-Caſſel, marched from the camp of St. Tron with fifteen ſquadrons and twenty four battalions, in order to command the ſiege in perſon, and he arrived there in two days after, the whole force of the beſiegers then conſiſting of twenty-four battalions of foot, and thirty-nine ſquarons of horſe and dragoons. On the 20th, the artillery, with all other neceſſaries for the expeditious carrying on of the ſiege, arrived from Liege, and the next day was chiefly employed in making and bringing together a great quantity of faſcines. The beſiegers having taken their reſpective poſts, a Lieutenant-Colonel with 300 men was ordered to attack the Lower Town, from whence the enemy retired upon their firſt approach, without making the leaſt reſiſtance. The trenches being opened, and the batteries finiſhed on the 25th, they played night and day with twenty-four pieces of cannon and eight mortars upon the Upper Town. By the 27th the breach was ſo wide that the Confederates were on the point of giving a general aſſault, which the French perceiving, beat a parley, demanding a capitulation, but the Duke refuſed to give them any other conditions than that the garriſon ſhould remain priſoners of war, the officers and ſoldiers to retain their properties; twelve waggons to be allowed to the officers for their baggage, provided one of their gates was delivered up in half an hour after the agreement.

This being conſented to, the garriſon, conſiſting of 1,400, (700 according to the French account) having laid down their arms, and marching out, the beſiegers entered Limburg and took poſſeſſion, and the Duke appointed the Baron Van Rechteren to be governor of it. The conſequence of taking this place was, that the Allies became entire maſters of the duchy of Limburg, and at the ſame time ſecured the country of Liege, with the Electorate of Cologne, from the incurſions of the French; on occaſion of this and preceding ſucceſſes, a medal was ſtruck. On the face, a buſt of her Majeſty, with her royal titles; on the reverſe, the Duke on horſeback, a nymph crowned with a mural crown, kneeling and preſenting him three keys in a baſon, with this inſcription in the exergue—

SINE CLADE VICTOR, CAPTIS BONNA, HUO, LIMBURGO, 1703.

With this ended the campaign in the Netherlands, which, though glorious to the Britiſh arms and the Allies, might have been much more ſo, had the Duke been allowed to have purſued his own reaſonable and well-concerted meaſures. He had the ſuperior army, being at all times a match for the French on a par; but what by reaſon of the cautious maxims of the State, and the factions then reigning among them, no great deſign could be undertaken by counſels ſo diſtracted; the late King William's party were for having a Captain-General, while thoſe of the Loveſtein party were for governing and directing all by a deputation of the States, which occaſioned the Duke to reply to a queſtion aſked him, Why his conqueſts were not as rapid as thoſe of Alexander and other ancient generals? "Becauſe they had no Dutch deputies to check their arms, or thwart their deſigns." The French, however, make it a merit in their generals, and heap applauſes upon them for having with ſo much conduct prevented the Allies from making any farther conqueſts than this of Limburg during the campaign; and pretend, notwithſtanding what they had attempted at the opening of it, that they never deſigned any more than to lie on the defenſive in Flanders, that they might be enabled to act with more vigour in Germany and Italy. And the French continuator of Rapin, ever ready to depreciate our military operations in thoſe days, particularly to undervalue the actions of the Duke of Marlborough, will hardly allow this campaign a claim to merit; "One might," ſays he, "have reaſonably expected ſomething more brilliant from ſuch a ſuperiority of force, backed by the intrigues of the Engliſh General, and the repeated aſſiſtances of the States, than has appeared this campaign, ſince without this augmentation he would have been enabled to have beſieged and taken thoſe three places, ſo much boaſted of in the vain medal."

LIMERICK, SIEGE OF. Formerly a ſtrong fortified town in the kingdom of Ireland, and province of Munſter, ſituated on the river Shannon, 100 miles from Dublin, and fifty-two from Cork. During the critical conteſt for the crown between King James and King William, his ſon-in-law, the affairs of Ireland were torn into ſeparate factions, one adhering to the old King, the other intereſting itſelf in the cauſe of King William for the protection of liberty and religion.

The battle of the Boyne had well nigh put a finiſhing ſtroke to the intereſts of James in the kingdom. He himſelf had retired to France, and left his ſuffering adherents in a ſtate of deſpair. The ſtrongeſt places had been reduced, but Limerick held out for James with unwearied fidelity, and ſome who were infatuated by their prieſts, were made to believe that France would make ſuch a deſcent upon England, as muſt oblige King William to abandon Ireland; upon which ſanguine, though ill-grounded conceits, Monſieur de Boiſſelau, Governor of Limerick, with the Duke of Berwick and General Sarsfield, were determined to hold the place for King James.

King William, apprehenſive of ſome ill conſequences from the malcontents in England, left his camp at Carrick on the 27th of July, 1690, with an intent to go to Dublin, and from thence to London to ſettle the affairs of that nation; but on his receiving letters of another ſtrain, importing that matters were in a good poſture, he publiſhed a pardon to all who ſhould ſubmit and acknowledge his ſovereignty in Ireland, and returned to the army at Golden Bridge on the 4th of Auguſt.

He was joined within five miles of Limerick by Douglas, and the next day the Earl of Portland, with Brigadier Stuart, were detached to the town with 900 horſe and 1200 foot, who advanced within cannon-ſhot of the place, without meeting with any conſiderable oppoſition. In the evening the King, with Prince George of Denmark, (the conſort of the then Princeſs Anne, afterwards Queen of England) Monſieur Auverquerk, Lieutenant-General Ginckle, and ſeveral other great officers, went to view the poſture of the enemy, and the avenues leading to the town. On the 9th the whole army decamped from Golden Bridge at five in the morning, and made their approaches. 200 horſe and dragoons, with a 1000 foot, leading the van. That part of the country by which they approached being woody and full of ditches, the pioneers were ordered to clear away the one, and fill up and level the other; the army then advancing, drove the enemy before them till they came to a narrow paſs (between two bogs within half a mile of the town) about 150 yards wide, filled with obſtacles and buſhes to impede their paſſage. In this paſs were lanes leading to the town, in the midſt of which, being the broadeſt, ſtood the Iriſh horſe, and to the right and left of it the hedges were lined with muſqueteers. The detached party of the Engliſh foot was upon the advance towards the centre; the horſe a little to the right of them, the Danes to the left, and the Blue Dutch, with ſeveral Engliſh regiments, upon the right. The King after this diſpoſition of the army, ordered two field-pieces towards the left, where they could bear upon the enemy's horſe, whence they fired with ſo much good ſucceſs, that the enemy ſoon quitted that poſt; at the ſame time Colonel Earle led on his foot, who marched againſt a hot fire made from the hedges, and they puſhed them from hedge to hedge, continuing all the while the hedge-fight for two hours, when at length they drove the Iriſh under the very walls of the town, and poſſeſſed themſelves of two advantageous poſts, the one called Cromwell's Fort, the other the Old Chapel. The Iriſh then plied the Engliſh with their great guns from the walls, which killed a few as they marched into the forts, which the whole army did, by five in the evening of the ſame day, while moſt of them encamped within cannon-ſhot.

The Danes, according to their poſt, encamped to the left, near an old fort built long ſince by the Danes their anceſtors, of which not being a little proud, they fired three field-pieces upon the Iriſh, who lay intrenched between them and the town. Meantime Cromwell's Fort was mounted with four field-pieces to play upon the town from the outworks. Thus poſted, the King ſent a trumpet to ſummon the town; moſt of the garriſon were for capitulating, but were over-ruled. Boiſſelau ſent back the trumpet, with a letter directed to Sir Robert Southwell, ſecretary of ſtate, (which he did to avoid addreſſing the Prince of Orange as king) importing, that he was ſurpriſed at the ſummons, and that he thought the beſt way to gain the Prince of Orange's eſteem, was by a vigorous defence of the town, which his Majeſty had intruſted him with. Before the town was fully inveſted, Colonel Sarsfield, with a body of horſe and dragoons, paſſed the Shannon in the night, intercepted the King's train of artillery on its way to the camp, routed the troops that guarded it, deſtroyed the carriages, waggons, and ammunition, and returned in ſafety to Limerick; which when King William was informed of, he commended Sarsfield, ſaying, "It was as fine a coup-de-main as ever he heard of." Notwithſtanding this diſaſter, the trenches were opened on the 17th day of the month, and a battery raiſed with ſome cannon brought from Waterford, while the enemy fired very thick; a twenty-four pounder ſtruck on the very ſpot where King William had juſt before ſtood, which accident he eſcaped by ſpeaking to a gentleman within 20 paces of him, and was returning to the ſpot, had not the diſcourſe continued a minute longer.

On the 27th of Auguſt, a breach was made nigh St. John's Gate, over the black battery, of about twelve yards in length, upon which the King, after many attacks and repulſes on both ſides, growing weary of the ſiege, ordered his troops to make a lodgment in the covered way, or counterſcarp, which here was almoſt the ſame with the ditch; and alſo two towers contiguous to the wall to be attacked, with this reſtriction, that they ſhould proceed no farther, but lodge themſelves there only; which limitation, though prudential enough, loſt King William the town, for if Counts Solms and Naſſau had ſeconded the aſſailants and grenadiers that made the attack when they got on the ramparts, the Iriſh would have ſurrendered that very hour.

Douglas, Naſſau, Sidney, and Stuart, attacked the fort with undaunted bravery, drove out the enemy and killed forty of them; but the Iriſh in a little time after made a reſolute ſally with 200 horſe and foot, but were repulſed; Douglas then detached Monſieur de la Barthe with nine companies of grenadiers to the attack, who ſoon diſlodged the Iriſh from the covered way, entered the breach, and were actually on the ramparts, nay, ſome got into the very place.

This

This action had been decisive if the engineers had made a lodgment in time, for the Irish were all running from the walls over the bridge; but seeing the grenadiers and La Barthe's detachment who begun the attack not seconded, and perceiving they were but few, the Irish rallied, faced the assailants and plied them so well, that several of them were killed and many mortally wounded. Elated with this success, the enemy ventured upon the breach again, and the women fought as resolutely as the men, appearing on the breach in the hottest fires: so that after three hours unequal fighting, the English were forced to retire to their trenches; and the King, after miscarriages and defeats, was obliged to raise the siege, having lost 1200 men before it. King William returned to England soon after, having left the army to Count Solms, and the regency to Lord Sidney and Sir Thomas Coningsby.

LIMERICK. Between the former siege of this town, and the siege before us, various were the intrigues between the English, Irish, and French. The Irish were instigated by the French to insist on very high demands, in case the town should be again attacked, in hopes they would be rejected. The Earl of Tyrconnel had, with a particular view, studied to divert the French court from sending over any more forces to Ireland, designing, in case of desperation, to treat with King William for the preservation of himself and friends; so that he began to dispose the Irish to think of treating for a surrender. But those who were inclined to the French interest, and were for prolonging the war, held him in contempt; and he died, as it is said, still persevering in his advice, that the Irish should make up matters with King William, and by that means serve themselves and families, rather than favour the French interests in that kingdom. After his death, his sentiments were deemed salutary, and the Irish looked upon him when gone as a friend, to whom he was odious when living.

King William knowing the intrigues of the French, sent secret instructions to General Ginckle, to offer the Irish, in case of a capitulation, the most favourable terms, in order to put an end to the war in those parts, as he was convinced the court of Versailles did all they possibly could to prolong it, in order to make a diversion on that side, by that means keep his hands full, and prevent him from making the stronger head against France. While these intrigues were carrying on between the different parties, Athlone was taken: and the battle of Aghrim being decisive in favour of King William, the few Irish that remained after the defeat retired in great confusion to Limerick, where they resolved to make a final stand, till the expected succours arrived from France. But it never was the intention of Louis to assist James effectually, and with all his force; he had only in contemplation to amuse King James, and keep King William at a bay, by engaging him in the Irish war, while he should carry his ambitious schemes of sovereign sway into execution.

After the battle of Aghrim, detachments were sent by General Ginckle to secure all the passes on the Shannon, such as Bannaher, Moor Castle, Portumny, and others, which were accordingly possessed by the English: then Ginckle advanced to Galway, which he reduced after a short siege, and permitted the garrison to retire to Limerick. Thus this strong town was considerably reinforced by the adventitious supplies which came continually from the reduced places. The General next marched to this town, and while Captain Cole sailed up the Shannon with a squadron and some frigates, he drove the enemy from their advanced posts. The batteries were opened, and a line of contravallation was formed on the 25th of August, 1691, while the Irish army lay encamped on the other side of the river Killala, and the fords were guarded with four regiments of their dragoons. After the town had been almost reduced to a heap of ruins, and large breaches made in the walls, the guns were dismounted, the outforts evacuated, and all such other motions were made as if the English were inclined to abandon the siege; for on the 17th of September, it was warmly debated in a council of war, whether they should prosecute the siege, or turn it into a blockade, and in the mean time pass over the Shannon and destroy the enemy's forage in the county of Clare. It was so far carried for the latter, that an engineer was ordered to go with a guard to Kilmallock, and fortify that place, but was countermanded, and a great number of pallisades brought to Mackay's Fort, (Ireton's being now so called) as Cromwell's was named Nassau's, in honour of the present commanders who had taken them), as if the army intended to winter there. On the 19th a party was ordered to pass the river, either to prosecute the siege with vigour, or if not found feasible, to burn their forage, and prevent all supplies.

A battery was raised between Mackay's Fort and the Old Church, to flank the Irish, in case of a sally from St. John's Gate; and four mortars were brought from the great battery to this fort, it being judged the best for bombarding, as the whole town lay in a line from it. When the ships that came up the river with Captain Cole had appeared, and fired into the Irish horse camp, the enemy could scarcely credit it, having been persuaded that either the English had no ships there, or else that the Dauphin, with a strong fleet from France, would soon destroy them; which was industriously propagated and hourly expected, so infatuated were the credulous Irish in their favourite opinion of succours from the French King.

On the 20th most of the heavy cannon were sent on ship-board, which caused it to be generally believed that Limerick would not be taken this year. But Ginckle, far from desponding, exerted all his military capacity on this arduous occasion; for in two days after, he pressed with most of the horse and dragoons, over a bridge of boats they had laid, into the county of Clare, on the other side the river, leaving Mackay and Talmash to the command on this side, while the enemy fired on them all the morning from several batteries without any effect. In the afternoon a party of English troops, under Colonel Matthews, was attacked by a superior force of the enemy, till being sustained by four regiments of foot, they drove and obliged them to retire under their cannon. Then the English were commanded commanded to advance and attack the works that covered St. Thomond's Gate, and other ſmaller fortifications, from which the Iriſh played their cannon, and made ſuch diſcharges with their ſmall ſhot, that the Engliſh were ordered not to approach ſo near: the grenadiers, notwithſtanding, preſſed ſo hotly on the reinforced detachments, that they drove them to the draw-bridge, which the officers, fearing the Engliſh would enter inſtantly, drew up, and thus ſacrificed the Iriſh who were on the outſide, to the fury of the Engliſh, who killed or drowned moſt of them.

The Engliſh then lodged themſelves within ten yards of the bridge; and the Iriſh, finding all communication cut off between them and their horſe, and deſpairing of the French ſuccours, began to open their eyes and think ſeriouſly of capitulation. In the mean time the ſiege was carried on with great fury, and the fire was exceſſive hot on both ſides the next day, though it rained and blew inceſſantly: but towards night, on the 23d, the rain began to ceaſe, and both ſtorms ended together, for about ſix o'clock the Iriſh beat a parley. The next day Sarsfield and Wachop deſired a ceſſation of arms for three days, till they could ſend to Lieutenant-Colonel Sheldon, who lay with 1,600 horſe at Six-mile Bridge, in order that he and his men ſhould be included in the articles of capitulation, which was granted, and the Engliſh priſoners in the town were releaſed. On the 26th Sarsfield and Wachop dined with General Ginckle, and it was agreed to exchange hoſtages. The next day the Iriſh ſent out their propoſals, which were ſo high, that Ginckle ſent word, that though he was a ſtranger to the laws of England, (being a Dutchman), yet from the face of the demands, he was ſure they could not be liſtened to; and ſo ordered a new battery to be raiſed: but upon the requeſt of the Iriſh, he ſent twelve articles, which in the end proved to be the ſum of the capitulation; which put an end to the French intrigues for holding out the ſiege, and thereby the war. This ſtep was alſo mortifying to ſome Engliſh, who hoped this war, if continued, would end in the total deſtruction of the Iriſh intereſts, whereby they might enjoy the forfeited the lands.

On the 1ſt of October the Lords Juſtices came into the camp, and after ſome conferences with the Commiſſioners, on the part of the garriſon, and their troops in the county of Clare, the articles for the ſurrender of the city of Limerick, with the caſtles of Roſs, Clare, and other places, were finally concluded on the 3d. By theſe the Iriſh, who choſe to ſtay in that kingdom, and take the oaths of allegiance to William, were reſtored to all their eſtates which they enjoyed under King Charles. They were freed from the oath of ſupremacy, as they always look upon the Pope as the head of the church. Not only the French, but as many of the Iriſh as pleaſed, had liberty to go over to France, with ſafe tranſportation and free paſſage. So that about 12,000 choice troops, of the Iriſh alone, were ſhipped off, being the original of thoſe Iriſh forces which have ſo much ſtrengthened the French army.

On their arrival in France, King James thanked them for their ſervice, in a letter to their Commander, General Sheldon, wherein he expreſſed great ſatisfaction in their conduct and bravery, but more that they were come to ſerve where he was; telling them, that his brother of France had given orders to cloath and furniſh them with all neceſſaries. Thus ended the ſecond ſiege of Limerick, having in the two ſieges, (which may be reckoned as one), held out fifty-ſix days againſt many furious attacks.

LIMOGES, SIEGE OF. A city in the kingdom of France, and Province of Guienne, 100 miles from Bourdeaux. Notwithſtanding the victory at Poictiers, in which Edward the Black Prince took John, the French King priſoner, and brought him to London, yet they continued to commit hoſtilities in Guienne, which Edward had ſome years been in poſſeſſion of; and the Dukes of Anjou and Berry entered Guienne, during the reign of Edward III. 1369, with two numerous armies, in order to regain the conquered territories from the Engliſh, and drive them out of the nation. The Duke of Anjou, having penetrated as far as the territory of Limoſin, and inveſted Limoges, the Biſhop perſuaded the inhabitants to ſurrender it. Prince Edward being informed of theſe affairs, declared the enemy ſhould never find him cooped up in town or fortreſs, and immediately aſſembled his forces at Cognac; but the French General thought proper to retire before him, as the Duke of Lancaſter arrived at the ſame with a conſiderable reinforcement from England.

The Black Prince, incenſed at the treaty and revolt of the Biſhop and people of Limoges, ſummoned them to expel the French garriſon, and return to their duty; otherwiſe he would lay their town in ruins, and deſtroy the inhabitants with fire and ſword, without regard to rank, ſex, or age. As they were deaf to the citation, and behaved contemptuouſly to his emiſſaries, he was carried in a litter at the head of his forces, and night and day employed the ſoldiery in undermining the fortifications. As ſoon as this was finiſhed, and the mines completed, he formed his men in readineſs to make the aſſault, and ordered fires to be kindled under the props, which were no ſooner burned, than above thirty yards of the wall fell down and filled the ditch which ſurrounded it. The troops ruſhing on the breach, opened the gates to the Prince, who entered the place with a ſtrong force, maſſacred all the inhabitants, and would have beheaded the Biſhop, had not the Duke of Lancaſter pleaded ſtrongly in his behalf, and the Pope afterwards procured his pardon.

LINCELLES, BATTLE AT, Auguſt 18, 1793.

A Diſpatch from Colonel Sir James Murray, Adjutant-General to the Forces under the Command of his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York.

Menin, Auguſt 29, 1793.

I have the honour to inform you, that the army marched from Torcoing, upon the morning of the 18th, to a camp near this town. The Hereditary Prince of Orange made an attack the ſame day upon the French poſts of Mauvaix, Blaton, and Lincelles. This was in ſome degree advantageous to the operations of his Royal Highneſs, as it ſerved to cover his march and to keep the enemy in a ſtate of uncertainty in regard to his deſigns.

The former of theſe attacks miſcarried; in the latter his Serene Highneſs ſucceeded without much loſs. About one o'clock in the afternoon, the enemy, in their turn, attacked the poſt of Lincelles, and, as it afterwards appeared, in great force. The Prince of Orange, who had made large detachments from his camp for theſe different enterprizes, requeſted of his Royal Highneſs to ſend three battalions to the ſupport of his troops. The three neareſt battalions, which happened to be thoſe of the firſt, Coldſtream, and the third regiments of Guards, were accordingly ordered to march, under the command of Major-General Lake for that purpoſe. Upon their arrival at Lincelles, they found the poſt in poſſeſſion of the enemy. The Dutch troops having been forced to abandon it, had retreated by a road different from that by which the Britiſh had advanced. To have fallen back in this ſituation muſt have preſented the enemy, evidently ſuperior in numbers, an opportunity of entirely defeating the detachment. General Lake embraced a reſolution worthier of the troops which he commanded, and which has been attended with glory and ſucceſs. He determined upon an immediate attack.

The enemy occupied a redoubt of uncommon ſize and ſtrength upon a height adjoining to the high road, in front of the village of Lincelles. The road itſelf was defended by their works ſtrongly palliſadoed; woods and ditches covered their flanks. The battalions were inſtantly formed, and advanced under a very heavy fire, with an order and intrepidity for which no praiſe can be too high. After firing three or four rounds, they ruſhed on with their bayonets, ſtormed the redoubt, and drove the enemy through the village. At the end of the village the latter rallied, under the protection of other troops, and kept up for ſome time a ſevere fire: but they were again defeated, and ſo entirely put to the route, that they have not ſince appeared in that quarter. They loſt eleven pieces of cannon, two of which had been before taken from the Dutch. There are about fifty priſoners: the number of killed and wounded cannot be aſcertained with any preciſion; it is calculated at between 2 and 300 men. By the concurring teſtimony of theſe priſoners, the enemy had twelve battalions upon the poſt, and muſt have been upwards of 5000 men.

I am ſorry to add, that ſuch difficulties could not be overcome without conſiderable loſs. The fall of two gallant officers, and the brave men who have ſuffered upon this occaſion, muſt be matter of regret. It can only be imputed to the ability of Major-General Lake, and the extraordinary valour of the officers and men, that the loſs has not been ſtill greater. The conduct of Colonel Grinfield, Colonel Hulſe, and Colonel Pennington, have reflected honour upon themſelves, and merited his Royal Highneſs's warmeſt approbation. Equal praiſe is due to Major Wright, and the officers and men of the Royal Artillery attached to the battalions.

As ſoon as the retreat of the Dutch troops was known, ſeveral battalions were ordered from camp to ſupport the Guards. They arrived after the action was at an end, but remained to ſtrengthen the poſt (which the Dutch had by this time re-occupied) during the night. They returned to camp this morning. The French made an attack this day upon the Dutch poſt at Roubaix, in which they have been repulſed with conſiderable loſs.

The works of Lincelles have been deſtroyed, and the poſt left unoccupied.

I have the honour to be, &c.

WM. CONGREVE, Major of Artillery.

Dutch Account of the Affair at Lincelles.—An official Letter from his Royal Highneſs the Hereditary Prince of Orange.

By the various letters which I have had the honour of tranſmitting to your High Mightineſſes, you muſt have been informed of the continual annoyance which our troops have experienced from the enemy's advanced poſts; but though advantage has conſtantly been on our ſide, the heavy fatigue attendant upon it would not prevent our loſs of a great many men at different times.

But to prevent theſe daily ſkirmiſhes as much as poſſible, with the advice of Lieutenant-Colonel Comez, and Colonel Sohler, in the Imperial and Pruſſian ſervice, I was determined to make uſe of the favourable opportunity that preſented itſelf, being in the preſence of the army under the Duke of York, the plan of which, as it had alſo met with the approbation of his Highneſs, was then concluded upon; and he aſſured me, that if it was neceſſary, he would ſupport me with the troops under his command.

In conſequence of this, I moved forward on the 18th, with two columns; one under the orders of the Lieutenant-General the Prince of Waldeck, who made himſelf maſter of the enemy's poſt at Blaton, while I marched with the other column againſt that of Lincelles, which I entered; and, notwithſtanding the heavy fire from the batteries of the enemy, it was ſuſtained with great intrepidity by all our troops. The Swiſs Guards and the Dutch battalions were the firſt that marched up againſt this poſt.

After this had been forced, finding that, conſidering the violence of the enemy's fire, our loſs was very ſmall, the Dutch Guards having only three killed, and not above thirty wounded in the whole among all the battalions, I put a part of my troops in poſſeſſion of it, while I returned to the camp near Menin, with the reſt of them. In the afternoon I received a report, that the poſt of Lincelles was again attacked by the enemy, with a very ſuperior force; upon which I immediately requeſted the Duke of York to ſend ſome of his troops to ſuſtain the poſt—this was immediately put in effect, while, for the ſame purpoſe, I alſo detached two battalions from my camp; but our forces at Lincelles were then found to have been ſurrounded and attacked with ſuch a ſuperior number of the enemy, that they were obliged to retire, and had even evacuated the poſt before the abovementioned reinforcement had arrived. Yet immediately after, as the place was again attacked by freſh troops, it was carried by ſtorm, and the enemy were driven from it with great loſs: thus having again become maſters of this ſtrong poſt, it was occupied by our troops, in conjunction with thoſe under the orders of the Duke of York. In the mean time, as I had no intention of retaining it, I ſent a ſufficient number of labourers to deſtroy the works, when our troops at Blaton were attacked by ſuch a ſuperior number of the enemy, that they were obliged to retire. The return not being yet come in, I am not in a ſituation to ſend your High Mightineſſes an exact liſt of the killed and wounded; but having learned, by report, that the French have made ſome priſoners, I ſhall ſend your High Mightineſſes further particulars hereafter. I mention it with much regret, that Major Muller, of the artillery, has been killed in the firſt attack, by which the country has ſuffered the loſs of an excellent officer, who has been of great utility to me during this campaign.

The number of priſoners which we have taken from the enemy on this occaſion, amounts to an officer and ſeventeen men.

LINCOLN, BATTLE AT. The capital of the country of Lincoln, 150 miles from London, and fifty from York. Stephen, King of England, had by ſeveral falſe meaſures forfeited the eſteem of the nobility and clergy, ſome of whom had raiſed him to the throne, in prejudice of Matilda, or Maud, Henry I.'s only daughter and heireſs, widow of the Emperor, to whom Stephen had ſworn allegiance. During the conteſt between Stephen and her in 1140, ſhe retired to Lincoln, whither the King, her rival, purſued her. He began a regular ſiege; but Matilda having but a few forces, eſcaped while the articles were drawing up for the ſurrender. The Earl of Glouceſter, Matilda's ſpurious brother, came to her relief. Having forded the river Trent, and paſſed a moraſs which the King thought impracticable, he came on a ſudden ſo cloſe to the Royal army, that the King could not avoid fighting. The battle for a long time was in ſuſpenſe. The infantry, commanded by the Earl of Glouceſter, formed the centre: the horſe formed two wings, one of which conſiſted of thoſe who had been deprived of their hereditary honours and eſtates by Stephen, the other of the Earl of Cheſter's (ſon-in-law to Glouceſter) own vaſſals, while the Welch, who were unprovided with defenſive armour, conſtituted a ſeparate body, and were poſted at the extremity of the line. Stephen drew up his army conformable to that of Glouceſter; one being of Flemiſh and Breton cavalry, under William D'Ypres and the Earl of Albemarle; the other wing of Bretons and Engliſh, under Count Alain of Dinan, Walleron De Mellent, Hugh Bigot, Earl of Norfolk, Simon De Seales, and William De Warren, Earls of Northampton and Surry. The King, on foot, placed himſelf in the centre. William D'Ypres began the battle, at the head of the Flemiſh and Bretons, by attacking the Welch, who were entirely routed: but the Earl of Cheſter, Ralph De Gernon, Glouceſter's ſon-in-law, perceiving them to be thrown into diſorder in the purſuit, charged them in flank, and broke them entirely. The Engliſh at the ſame time on the other wing of Glouceſter's army, fired by their reſentment and loſt eſtates, threw away their lances, and fell ſword in hand among Stephen's cavaliers, who not being able to ſtand the firſt onſet, fled in the utmoſt diſorder. Stephen being thus left deſtitute to the right and left, was ſurrounded by the enemy; and though he behaved with the utmoſt ſkill and bravery againſt odds, he was obliged to yield to the ſuperiority of effort and numbers. He fought with extraordinary addreſs till his battle-axe battle-axe was broke to pieces, then drawing his ſword, he defended himſelf ſingly againſt a large party that ſurrounded him, enraged to find himſelf abandoned by his ſoldiers. In this unequal conflict he ſhivered his ſword, and ſtill continued to fight with his truncheon, till he received a blow with a ſtone, which brought him to the ground; yet ſtarting up again, he would have continued the fight with incredible obſtinacy on his knees, had not a knight, called William de Kaines, ſeized his creſt, and preſenting the point of his ſword, threatened to kill him on the ſpot, if he did not inſtantly ſurrender. He refuſed, however, to ſurrender to any but the Duke of Glouceſter, who being near, came up and took him priſoner, together with four noblemen, who endeavoured to reſcue him. They conducted him to Briſtol, where he was loaded with chains, by command of the Empreſs Matilda, with the loſs of about 100 of his men.

LINCOLN, BATTLE AT. The Barons had, in the reign of King John, invited Louis, Dauphin of France, to the throne of England, and actually did homage to him in London, reſolving to proſecute his pretenſions by carrying on a war: but on the death of John, when Henry III. came to the throne, his intereſts began to fade before the luſtre of the Regent, the Marſhal Earl of Pembroke. Louis had already forfeited the eſteem not only of the people, but of the very barons who had invited him over, by his inſolent carriage to all ſorts and ranks of people. Louis, therefore, in order to gain the ground he had loſt, and willing to eſtabliſh his footing in England, entered into the meaſures offered him of a ſhort truce, during which time the Earl Regent ſtrengthened his army with new levies and proſelytes, whom he had gained over to the young King his pupil's intereſt. At the expiration of the truce, the French General recommenced hoſtilities, advanced to Lincoln in 1217, inveſted the caſtle, which was held for the King, though the town declared for the Barons. The Regent was determined to relieve this important fortreſs, though at the expence of an engagement. He had previouſly ſent the Earl of Cheſter to beſiege Mount Sorrel in Leiceſterſhire, in thoſe days a very ſtrong place, and in which there was a French garriſon. Louis ſent the Earl of Perche with 20,000 men to raiſe the ſiege, with orders to march to the enemy, who made the Earl of Cheſter retire. Elevated with this ſucceſs, he reſolved on the ſiege of Lincoln, and coming before it, began to batter the caſtle. Pembroke uſed ſuch expedition to relieve it, that he advanced as far as Newark before the beſiegers were determined whether to expect him on the ſpot, or march and give him battle. They had all along hoped to take the caſtle before the Regent could aſſemble his forces together; therefore, being ſurpriſed at the ſudden approach of the enemy, the French General, the Earl of Perche, called a council of war, to conſult what was to be done in ſo critical a ſituation: ſome were for hazarding a battle, becauſe if victory was the iſſue the caſtle would in conſequence ſurrender. This opinion was ſtrengthened, as they could uſe their horſe, in which conſiſted their chief ſtrength, whereas they could be of no ſervice within the walls. This advice was certainly the moſt ſalutary, though the reverſe was followed by thoſe who affirmed, that ſince the caſtle was reduced to extremities, it was more eligible to keep within the walls, and continue the ſiege; that it was eaſy to defend the walls till the caſtle ſurrendered, after which they thought the Earl of Pembroke would retreat, the reſource of fighting being at any time in their own power. In conſequence of this opinion, all things were prepared for the defence of the city, at the ſame time continuing the ſiege of the caſtle. The Earl Regent cauſed his troops to approach, and ordered Faulk De Brent to enter the caſtle at a poſtern gate which opened into the fields, of which the beſiegers had not the leaſt notion. Faulk was no ſooner entered, but, purſuant to the inſtructions he had received, he ſallied out upon the beſiegers, while the King's army ſtormed one of the gates of the city. The French General, Perche, perceiving himſelf to be thus between two attacks from two different quarters, was ſoon thrown into diſorder, neither having room to engage, nor enabled to make uſe of his cavalry. On the other ſide, the Royal army encouraged by the preſence of the Regent, and animated by the indulgencies liberally beſtowed by the Pope's legate upon all who ſhould be ſlain in battle, continued to ſtorm the gate in ſo vigorous a manner, that they entered the city on the one ſide, while Faulk De Brent preſſed the enemy from the other ſide. The Earl of Perche perceiving all was loſt, reſolved not to ſurvive the ſhame of his defeat: he was ſlain while he was upbraiding the Engliſh of his party for betraying him by their pernicious counſels, which diſſuaded him from marching to fight the Earl in the open field. After the death of the General, a dreadful ſlaughter was made of the French troops, who all well nigh periſhed on this occaſion. The city of Lincoln, which had all along ſided with the Barons, was abandoned to a general plunder, wherein the ſoldiers of the royal party found an ineſtimable booty, and therefore called it Lincoln fair.

LINGEN, SIEGE OF. A town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia. While the Dutch were contending for their liberties againſt the tyranny of the Spaniards, Prince Maurice beſieged this place in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, at the head of 7000 foot, and 1200 horſe, having previouſly conquered moſt of the garriſon towns in the poſſeſſion of the Spaniards. The poſſeſſion of this place would have rendered him maſter of the right ſide of the Rhine; ſo though it was near winter, he reſolved to attack it, though the caſtle was ſtrong, and ſome new works lately added, and being willing to ſpare the town, he directed his attack againſt the caſtle. Being advanced to the counterſcarp, he found the ditch lined with ſeveral out-works, which with ſome difficulty he forced, and took them ſword in hand. Having filled up the ditch, he then began to batter the caſtle, which ſurrendered to his victorious fortune after ſixteen days open trenches.

Prince Maurice, commander for the States, and Spinola, the Spaniſh General, had long been competitors in the field of glory, having been variouſly ſucceſsful, or otherwiſe, againſt each other. After the former had miſcarried miſcarried in his deſign upon Antwerp, Spinola, putting himſelf at the head of his forces, marched to Lingen in 1605, a place belonging to Prince Maurice, and which he had fortified at his own proper charge, with five new baſtions and a broad ditch. As the works were new, and the garriſon conſiſted only of 600 men, Spinola was the more encouraged to expect ſucceſs. He therefore advanced under the ſhelter of the adjacent gardens to the ditch, and filled it with ſo much expedition, that in nine days time, the Walloons having made themſelves maſters of the ravelin on their ſide, and the Spaniards, Italians, and Germans, being poſted within the ditch, the garriſon forced the Governor to ſurrender, when he would have held out and retained it, as he knew that in two days time, Prince Maurice would appear to relieve it, which he did, but too late to effect any ſervice to the States.

Spinola, the Spaniſh General, is greatly cenſured by his countrymen for not inſtantly improving this advantage, by attacking Coeverden and ſome other places, very indifferently garriſoned at that time, by which he might have penetrated into the heart of Frieſland or Overyſſel; the neglect of which gave Prince Maurice an opportunity and full time to intrench himſelf with 9000 men under Coeverden, to obſerve all the motions of his rival. Thus it appears from the various plans and operations of generals and chief commanders, they ſhould not only be endued with ſagacity and foreſight, but alſo diligently watch a criſis, look into the ſprings and motives, and ſo form probable conjectures of the conſequences, events, and iſſues of ſuch plans.

LISBON, ENGAGEMENT OFF IN 1650. The capital of the kingdom of Portugal. Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice having eſcaped Blake from Kinſale (ſee that article), with ſome of his fleet reached this city, where they were protected and careſſed by the King of Portugal. The Parliament declared war with that King for receiving their enemies, and Blake followed the two Princes to Portugal. Being before the river of Liſbon, he ſent to the King for leave to enter, and coming near with his ſhips, the caſtle ſhot at him. Blake dropped anchor, and ſent a boat to know the reaſon of this hoſtility. The Captain of the caſtle anſwered, he had no orders from the King to let his ſhips paſs. However, the King commanded one of the lords of the court to compliment Blake. The Portugueſe lord deſired him not to come in, except the weather proved bad; for he ſaid, his maſter feared leſt ſome quarrel might happen between him and Prince Rupert in his harbour. The King ſent him at the ſame time a large preſent of freſh proviſions. The weather proving bad, Blake went up the river into the bay of Wyers, but two miles from the place where Prince Rupert's ſhips lay, and thence he ſent Captain Moulton to inform the King of the falſities in the Prince's declaration. The King refuſing ſtill to admit the Admiral to fall on Prince Rupert's ſhips, Blake took five of the Brazil fleet richly laden, and gave the King to underſtand, that unleſs he would command the Prince's ſhips out from his river, he would endeavour to ſeize the reſt of the Portugueſe fleet from America. In September, 1650, the Prince endeavoured to get out of the harbour, but was ſoon driven in again by Blake, who ſent home nine ſhips outward bound to Brazil, which he had taken; and in October following, Blake and Popham met with a fleet of twenty-three ſail from Brazil, bound for Liſbon, of whom they ſunk the Admiral, took the Vice-Admiral, and eleven other ſhips, having 10,000 cheſts of ſugar on board, and burnt three more; the reſt were ſmall ſhips, which during the action got into the river.

In his return home he met with two ſhips laden with proviſions for his fleet, which determined him to ſail back in ſearch of the Prince, whom he followed up the Straits. In this cruize he in his own ſhip, the Phœnix, took a French man of war, the captain of which had committed hoſtilities, and this prize was reputed of immenſe value. He proceeded next to Carthagena, where the Prince lay; and as ſoon as he came to an anchor before the fort, he acquainted the Spaniſh Governor by a meſſage, that an enemy to the State of England was in his port, that the Parliament commanded him to purſue him, and the King of Spain being at amity with the Parliament, he deſired leave to take all advantages againſt their enemy. The Governor replied, he could not take any notice of the difference of any nations or perſons amongſt themſelves, only ſuch as were declared enemies to the King his maſter; that they came in thither for ſafety, and therefore he could not refuſe them protection, and that he would do the like for the Admiral. Blake ſtill preſſed the Governor to permit him to attack the Prince, and the Spaniard put him off till he could have orders from Madrid. While the Admiral was cruiſing in the Mediterranean, Prince Rupert got out of Carthagena, and ſailed to Malaga. Admiral Blake having notice of his deſtroying many Engliſh ſhips there, followed him with all the expedition poſſible, and finding him in the port, attacked him, without the ceremony of aſking leave of the Spaniſh Governor, and burnt and deſtroyed his whole fleet, two ſhips only excepted, the Reformation, in which Prince Rupert himſelf was, and Swallow, commanded by his brother Prince Maurice. This was in January, 1651. In February Admiral Blake took a French man of war of forty guns, and ſent it with four other prizes before him into England.

LISBON, ENGAGEMENT OFF, IN 1760. The action here alluded to was between two French frigates of thirty-ſix guns each, and the Flamborough and Biddiford, and is a ſhining example of what Britons will do when engaged with an obſtinate and ſuperior enemy. A more obſtinate conteſt had not been ſeen during the courſe of this war; nor a more convincing opportunity for a proof of Britiſh courage, which the officers zealouſly embraced and improved to the utmoſt.

The French frigates were ſtationed with a deſign to intercept a rich convoy expected at Liſbon. On the ſame coaſt were alſo ſtationed his Majeſty's ſhips the Flamborough, Captain Archibald Kennedy, and the Biddiford, Captain Skinner, two twenty gun ſhips, upon a cruize, and they gave ſuch a good look out, that on the 4th of April, Captain Kennedy diſcovered four ſail of ſhips, about fifty-ſix leagues diſtant S. S. E. ½ E. from the Rock of Liſbon, ſteering S. by W. right before the wind; of which he immediately made ſignal to Captain Skinner, at that time about three miles to leeward of the Flamborough. They both ſtood towards the enemy, but the Flamborough being the beſt going ſhip, and to leeward, and the enemy not making any alteration in their courſe, Captain Kennedy ſoon came nearly within gun-ſhot of the headmoſt, who brought to at five in the afternoon. The Flamborough in this proximity of ſituation, fired ſeveral ſhot, and diſplayed her colours to provoke her to action. But when Captain Kennedy found that the ſternmoſt ſhip, about half an hour after had alſo brought to, and could perceive very plainly that they were ſpeaking to each other, that they were large French frigates, that one of them made ſignals for the government of the other two ſhips in their company, which immediately made off with all the ſail they could make; and that they hoiſted French colours, and were bearing down upon the Flamborough, he judged it beſt for his Majeſty's ſervice and his own honour, to edge away towards the Biddiford, and had the good fortune to join her about ſix. Though every body was ſenſible of the great ſuperiority of the two ſhips that continued their courſe after the Flamborough, the two brave Britiſh captains waſted no time in conſultation, but the only queſtion between them, when near enough to hear each other, was, "Shall we engage?" the word was, "Now for honour!" Then the crews reſpectively ſaluted each other with three cheers, and their two ſhips ſtood in a line for the enemy. A determination that ſtaggered the French. For as ſoon as they ſaw the reſolution of the Flamborough and Biddiford, they hauled their wind and ſtood to the eaſtward; which obliged the Britiſh to make the attack.

The Flamborough ſoon came up with the ſternmoſt ſhip, and received her broadſide, which was well returned. But Captain Kennedy to prevent the eſcape of the other frigate, left this to the management of the Biddiford, kept after the headmoſt, came up with her at half paſt ſix, and engaged as near as poſſible without being on board each other, from about a quarter before ſeven till nine at night, with great fury and regularity on both ſides. By which the maſts, rigging, and ſails of the Flamborough ſuffered greatly, and moſt of the running rigging was cut to pieces; there was not remaining either a brace or bowline to govern the ſails; and the hull was very much damaged with ſhot, ſome of which were betwixt wind and water. At nine both parties, unable to manage their ſhips, ceaſed firing for about half an hour; which gave the Flamborough an opportunity to reeve new braces, and to repair the moſt material damages, and then the battle was renewed, which continued till the enemy was obliged to ſheer off, and uſe every effort to eſcape about eleven at night. Captain Kennedy chaſed and purſued her till noon next day, but being much diſabled, and having neither courſe nor top-ſail fit for uſe, the Frenchman gained ſo much in flight, that Captain Kennedy thought it in vain to purſue any longer. The Flamborough had only five men killed and wounded: and, having loſt the enemy, the Captain ſailed off for Liſbon.

The action was more fatal to the brave Captain Lancelot Skinner, to whoſe management Captain Kennedy had left the ſternmoſt, which was the Commodore's ſhip. Captain Skinner ran cloſe alongſide of this large frigate about ſeven o'clock, and attacked her with conduct and undaunted courage. But was unfortunately killed by a cannon-ball, whilſt ſtanding upon the arms cheſt to inſpect the ſeveral poſts, and to animate his men by his own example, and applauſe of their behaviour. Thus ended Captain Skinner his days with as much honour as an officer could do, cloſely engaged with a royal French frigate of thirty-ſix guns; and we relate it upon the beſt authority, that he behaved during the ſhare he had in the action with remarkable coolneſs as well as bravery. No man ever behaving with more calmneſs, or more courage than the Captain of the Biddiford. As he gained the love of his officers and crew, ſo their mournful behaviour at his funeral, in the Britiſh burying ground at Liſbon, teſtified his worth, and how extremely they lamented the loſs of a captain, who knew how to maintain his authority, without diveſting himſelf of that humanity and affability, which are the ornaments of a complete officer; and the moſt effectual preſervatives of true Britiſh ſpirits in an engagement, who fear no danger under the command of one who treats them at all times like Britons.

LISLE, SIEGE OF. The capital of French Flanders, twelve miles from Tournay. Louis XIV. had long meditated the conqueſt of the Spaniſh Netherlands, by which conqueſt he would have been an overmatch for any ſingle power in Europe; this gave great umbrage and uneaſineſs to all the other powers, who dreaded ſo great a ſuperiority in an ambitious monarch. His claim was founded in right of his wife's dower, Maria Thereſa, daughter of Anne of Auſtria, the Queen-mother of Spain, whoſe previous title was ſaid to be unqueſtionable on the duchy of Brabant, and its dependencies, together with part of Gueldres, as alſo upon Luxemburg, the Franche Compte, Mons, Antwerp, Cambray, Molines, Limburg, Namur, and ſome other places on the Maes. Louis, ever ambitious of extending his frontiers, had obtained the advice of the moſt eminent lawyers in the Low Countries upon the point in queſtion, who were eaſily influenced to confirm her title, which indeed was good according to the eſtabliſhed laws of Spain, which decrees the poſſeſſion of the parents to the children begot in the firſt marriage. She had renounced them when under age by force, not choice, from a motive of obedience rather than a voluntary reſignation; add to this, the authority of a parent and king, her want of knowledge and experience in her own affairs, the paſſion ſhe had for the King's (afterwards her conſort) perſon, and the proſpect of having for her ſpouſe one of the handſomeſt and greateſt princes in Europe; all theſe being taken together, what wonder if the young Infanta had not conſtancy ſufficient to refuſe the requeſt of the King her father,

We are the more explicit in this affair, in order to develop the cauſe and origin, the ſprings and motives of that war, of ſo much conſequence in the ſcale of nations; beſides, ſhe was allowed to have no other equivalent for having made this renunciation of her avowed right than 500,000 golden crowns, or 200,000l. ſterling, which, indeed, was a debt due to her on account of her mother's dowry, which was never paid her; whereas ſhe had renounced only in conſideration of this ſum to be paid her at the term mentioned in the contract. Louis therefore, having ſuch plauſible reaſons, and not wanting power to force the Spaniards to a full reſtitution, yet offered to enter into negotiation; but neither was this done, though repeatedly ſolicited for, both by himſelf and the Queen-mother before ſhe died: ſo after a fruitleſs treaty of eighteen months, he thought himſelf at liberty to have recourſe to arms. He marched therefore in perſon at the head of 35,000 men, commanded under him by the Viſcount Turenne, into Flanders. At the ſame time he ordered two flying camps, the one to enter the duchy of Luxemburg, under the command of the Marechal De Crequi, to obſerve the motions of the Germans on that ſide; the other to march along the ſea coaſt, commanded by Marechal Anthony D'Aumont.

At this time the Spaniſh garriſons in Flanders were in a very ill condition, the fortifications had been ſtrangely neglected, being neither provided with ammunition, or a ſufficient number of troops; ſo that Courtray was taken in two days, Dyxmude in twenty-four hours, Furnes in one day, and Armentieres furrendered on the firſt citation. Theſe were taken by the General D'Aumont. The army which the King commanded in perſon met with as little reſiſtance as the other. Charleroy was demoliſhed by the Spaniards; Binch and Aeth opened their gates on the firſt appearance of his forces; Tournay did not hold out forty-eight hours; Douay and its citadel the ſame; Oudenarde not above a day, and Aloſt but a few hours: in ſhort, within leſs than four months, they made themſelves maſters of fourteen places of importance: Liſle alone held out; it was then a large city, well fortified, and accounted the moſt populous of any in the Spaniſh Netherlands; for there were at the time of this firſt ſiege in 1667, within the walls, 30,000 inhabitants capable of bearing arms, beſides 4000 regulars, and a great number of volunteers, who had thrown themſelves into this place to ſignalize themſelves, and to learn the rudiments of war, under one of the beſt and moſt experienced commanders in the Spaniſh ſervice.

Louis having received advice that Count Marſin was on his march to relieve the city of Liege, detached the Marechal De Crequi, who had joined him before with his flying camp, to poſſeſs himſelf of all the avenues through which the Count De Marſin muſt needs approach the city, which in the mean time capitulated. His Majeſty reſolved to march directly to Marſin, but De Crequi and De Bellefons had already effected that point, and routed the Spaniards, of whom they killed 500 on the ſpot, took ſeveral ſtandards and kettle-drums, and 300 priſoners, among whom were many colonels, and ſome general officers. Count De Marſin, who was not inſenſible that the whole fortune of Flanders depended on his army, thought it adviſable to make a ſafe retreat, and to throw his troops into ſuch places as were moſt expoſed to the victorious enemy: and thus Liſle ſurrendered the 11th day after open trenches.

LISLE, SIEGE OF. The ſtrength and riches of this fair city drew the attention of the Confederates. The merchants of this place were of conſiderable ſervice to Louis XIV. and a great annoyance to his enemies, eſpecially the maritime powers, being the principal owners of the Dunkirk privateers; it was alſo one of the principal keys of France, a favourite port of its monarch, and therefore newly fortified by Vauban, the famous engineer, who had exerted his utmoſt ſkill in the works, and at an immenſe charge rendered it almoſt impregnable. The reduction of a place every way ſo important, could not but redound very much to the honour as well as the profit of the Allies; while, on the other hand, this great importance cauſed the French to uſe all human means for its preſervation; therefore, beſides the preſence of Marechal Boufflers, Governor of all French Flanders, with other great officers of ſkill and experience, they threw into the place twenty-one battalions of the beſt troops in France, beſides ſix ſquadrons of dragoons, 140 horſe, and 800 invalids capable of ſervice; all together a little army rather than a garriſon. Notwithſtanding the difficulties which muſt neceſſarily attend the ſiege, both on account of its natural ſtrength, its improvement by Vauban, and the numerous garriſon thrown into it, not to mention the ſtraights the Allies were reduced to by being cut off from their magazines in Antwerp and Sas-Van-Ghent, yet nothing could deter the Confederates from their reſolutions to attack it, which made the Duke De Vendome, when he was firſt informed of the deſign of the Allies, ſay, that he did not think ſo wiſe a commander as Prince Eugene was confeſſed to be, would venture upon ſo raſh an enterprize; and the French officers in general boaſted, that without ſtriking a blow, they would oblige the Allies to abandon the ſiege, which they ſo confidently attempted.

Voltaire tells us, by way of anecdote on this memorable ſiege, that a bomb fell on or near the opera houſe, but the French were ſo ſecure and confident in the ſtrength of the place, that it no way diſconcerted their entertainment.

The artillery being arrived at Pottes, and all other neceſſaries provided, on the 12th of Auguſt, 1708, the Prince of Orange Naſſau, John William Friſo, Stadtholder of Friſeland, was detached with thirty-one battalions to take poſt at Marquette, on the Lower Deule, the river on which Liſle lies, within half a league of Liſle; and Lieutenant-General Wood, with thirty-four ſquadrons, marched to Potteghem. The ſame day the army under the Duke of Marlborough, who covered the ſiege, marched from Werwich to Helchin, and Prince Eugene having paſſed the Marquette at Pont-a-Treſin, inveſted the town of Liſle between that place and the Upper Deule; the Prince of Orange Naſſau did the like with his detachment, between the Upper and Lower Deule, while the Duke of Marlborough lay at a convenient diſtance to cover them. The chief engineers were Des Roques and Du Mey, each of whom was to have direction of a ſeparate attack; the lines of circumvallation were marked out the ſame day, and the pioneers ſet to work.

On the 18th in the morning, the Prince of Orange's valet-de-chambre had his head ſhot off while he was dreſſing his Highneſs, which paſſed over the Prince's ſhoulders, within ſix inches of his face, and beſmeared it, as well as his cloaths, with the blood and brains of his ſervant; upon which his Highneſs removed his quarters.

Prince Eugene, who directed the operations of this ſiege, ſoon found he had more difficulties to ſtruggle with than a numerous garriſon, though conſiſting of the beſt troops of France, commanded by Marechal Boufflers; for, as we have obſerved, the enemy had cut off his communication with his magazines about Sas-Van-Ghent, and Antwerp, therefore he was obliged to bring his convoys along a narrow cauſeway from Oſtend, expoſed to the attack of the enemy, whoſe army was ſuperior to the Allies. This important ſiege was carried on with fifty battalions; ſix of whom were Imperialiſts, nine Palatines, five Heſſians, and thirty from the grand army; and all matters being put into a proper poſture for a vigorous ſiege, the trenches were opened on the 22d day of Auguſt, about eight in the evening. On the following night 320 grenadiers were commanded to attack the chapel of St. Magdalen, wherein the enemy had 120 grenadiers; the attack was ſharp, but the ſuperiority of numbers prevailed, for having killed about twenty the reſt ſurrendered. The beſiegers had in this action upwards of thirty men killed and wounded, ſome officers, and M. du Mey, director of the attacks, received a ſmall contuſion.

The 26th the beſieged retook the chapel, having made a ſally with moſt of the grenadiers, and two ſquadrons of dragoons; but the Prince of Orange Naſſau being in the trenches, cauſed two battalions to advance, who retook it, and cauſed the enemy to retire with precipitation into the counterſcarp. The 27th in the morning, the beſiegers fired fifty pieces of cannon and twenty mortars upon the town with ſo good ſucceſs, that they beat down one of the enemy's batteries. On the 29th, early in the morning, the Confederate troops ſtormed a fortified mill on the right, near the gate of St. Andrew, with 300 grenadiers, beat the enemy from that poſt, and took ſeveral priſoners; but at the ſame time the enemy made ſo terrible a fire from the ramparts, that they were obliged to quit it. The next day 300 grenadiers were commanded to retake that mill, but the enemy ſet it on fire, and abandoned that poſt. On the laſt of Auguſt the Prince of Holſtein Beck relieved the trenches; and each battalion was ordered to furniſh ſix waggons to carry ſtones near the batteries, to throw the ſame with mortars into the enemy's works. The 1ſt of September at night, the Imperialiſts relieved the trenches, and the beſiegers carried on the ſap towards the ſaliant angle of the counterſcarp of the horn-work, within fifty paces of the palliſades; and a vaſt quantity of faſcines and gabions were prepared for making their lodgement on the counterſcarp. At the ſame time the breach being very wide, and the ditch almoſt filled up with the ruins of the walls, Marechal Boufflers was apprehenſive that the town would fall into the hands of the Confederates, and therefore ordered ſeveral of the largeſt pieces of cannon to be removed into the citadel. On the 4th the Prince of Holſtein Beck relieved the trenches, as did alſo Lieutenant-General Sparr the next day; and the approaches were carried on ſo ſucceſsfully, that it was judged the counterſcarp would be ſtormed the ſame evening; but this was deferred till the 7th.

Whilſt the ſiege of Liſle was thus vigorouſly carried on, the Dukes of Burgundy, Vendome, and Berwick, made two or three feint advances as if they intended to attack the Duke of Marlborough; who, upon thoſe motions, gave orders for his army to be ready to march upon the firſt occaſion: and in the mean time detached the Earl of Athlone, with 1500 horſe, to obſerve the enemy. The Earl advancing towards Leuſes, his vanguard fell in with 100 horſe detached from the Duke of Berwick's army, whom they charged, defeated, and took thirty priſoners. The enemy made ſeveral marches and countermarches, whereby it was apparent that they deſigned to attempt the raiſing of the ſiege. The Duke of Burgundy likewiſe ſent a ſpy to endeavour to get into Liſle, and to acquaint the Marechal Boufflers that their army being on this ſide Tournay, he might depend upon being relieved; but that meſſenger happened to be diſcovered and ſeized by the Allies. Upon this the Duke of Marlborough, in expectation of an engagement, ordered the Confederate Army, on the 5th of September, to march to the ground marked out for them, in order to give the enemy battle; and being reinforced by Prince Eugene with ſeventy-two ſquadrons and twenty-ſix battalions from the ſiege, (with which troops came alſo King Auguſtus, and the Landgrave of Heſſe as volunteers); alſo Lieutenant-General Fagel having marched with incredible ſpeed out of Dutch Flanders and Brabant, and joined the Confederate army with ſeven battalions and as many ſquadrons, they continued till ten o'clock in order of battle. But the enemy declined coming to an engagement, ſo that the Confederate Generals ordered the tents to be pitched again, and the detachment of Prince Eugene returned to the camp before Liſle, except ſome Imperial and Heſſian ſquadrons. The Generals concluding that the enemy had no other deſign than to give them frequent alarms to retard the ſiege, and ſtraiten them in their forage, without venturing an engagement, 100 men out of each battalion were ordered to caſt up an intrenchment in the front of their army, which would both ſecure the troops from any ſudden ſurpriſe, and the beſiegers from interruption.

The Confederates thus finding it impracticable to bring the enemy to a battle, thought fit to ſtorm the counterſcarp of Liſle, which had been delayed by theſe movements, and on the 7th of September in the morning, they made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for that enterprize, prize, having received a reinforcement from the grand army of 700 grenadiers, and the like number of fuſileers, and 600 workmen. Eight hundred grenadiers, ſupported by the like number of fuſileers, thirty carpenters, and 200 workmen, were commanded for the attack of the right, between the Lower Deule and the Gate of St. Andrew, under the direction of the Sieur des Roques; and 1,600 grenadiers, ſupported by the like number of fuſileers, thirty carpenters, and 200 workmen, were commanded for the attack of the left, between the river and the Gate of St. Magdalen, under the direction of the Sieur du Mey. The batteries of the Confederates made a continual fire before the attack on all the baſtions to diſturb the enemy; and after the ſignal of three guns, and a general diſcharge of all the artillery, the attack was made with ſo much order and courage on the ſide of the officers and ſoldiers, that the counterſcarp was taken in a ſhort time, notwithſtanding it was defended by 200 men of each regiment in the garriſon; and the beſiegers lodged themſelves in the covered way; but the enemy made ſuch a terrible fire from their outworks with their cannon, mortars, and ſmall arms, and ſprung three mines in the covered way, that there were no leſs than 1000 men wounded and ſlain.

The Confederates having made themſelves maſters of the counterſcarp, endeavoured to perfect their works with all poſſible application. In the night between the 9th and 10th, the enemy made a ſally, but were repulſed with conſiderable loſs. On the 11th the Imperialiſts relieved the trenches, and an Adjutant came from the grand army to acquaint Prince Eugene, that the French were advanced within ſight of the intrenchment, and ſeemed to have a deſign to attack them; whereupon the Prince marched with fifteen battalions and the cavalry, to reinforce the Duke of Marlborough. The Duke being at dinner, received advice that the French foragers were advanced within a quarter of a league from the Confederate camp, and were ſuſtained by ſeveral regiments. Lieutenant-General Wood, who happened to be at table, deſired his permiſſion that he might charge them with two battalions only. The Duke granted his requeſt; and having detached the regiment of Sir Richard Temple, and another Engliſh battalion for that enterprize, they fell upon the enemy, whom they repulſed as far as Ennevelin, where they had poſted ſome forces in a caſtle which was ſurrounded with ditches. The Engliſh endeavoured to diſlodge them from thence, and charged the French with great bravery; but the Duke de Vendome cauſed all his grenadiers, and the picquets of ſix brigades, which were encamped in the front of his army, near Pont-a-Marque, to ſupport his troops in the caſtle; whereupon the two battalions were obliged to retire after a very ſtout reſiſtance, and retreated in good order, with the loſs of about ſix or ſeven officers, and near 200 killed or wounded. The next morning the French troops began to be in motion, and about two in the afternoon the Allies ſaw the head of their army, conſiſting of ſeveral battalions and ſquadrons, with their workmen, who levelled the ground between them and the Allies' intrenchments. The Confederate Generals now thought the enemy were reſolved upon an attack, ſo that the troops were immediately ordered to their arms, and the regiments commanded to their reſpective poſts behind the intrenchments. Prince Eugene likewiſe joined the army; and, at the ſame time, orders were ſent to the Earl of Albemarle (who was then between Oudenarde and Menin with thirty ſquadrons, to guard a convoy from Bruſſels) to return to the camp with the utmoſt expedition; and accordingly the Earl on the 12th, by break of day, arrived with his detachment.

About four in the afternoon, the enemy began to cannonade the Confederate camp, directing their fire againſt the village of Entiers, where the Brigadiers Evans and Wertmuller, were poſted with two brigades of foot, and were anſwered by the artillery planted on the intrenchments, which continued till it was dark. The Confederate troops, who lay upon their arms all night, were the next day formed in order of battle, and early in the morning the enemy renewed their cannonading with between thirty and forty pieces, moſtly twenty-four pounders, and the Allies did the like, with almoſt equal execution on both ſides. At length the enemy withdrew their cannon, and the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, perceiving that they had no other deſign than by frequent alarms to delay the ſtorming the out-works of Liſle, the troops were ordered to encamp in ſuch a manner, as to be immediately ready to receive the French, provided they ſhould make any farther attempts; and the works about the village of Entiers were repaired and enlarged for the greater ſecurity of that poſt. Prince Eugene being ſatisfied that the Confederate camp was ſufficiently ſecured, he returned on the 13th of September with his troops to the ſiege.

In the mean while the French Generals were contriving means to diſtreſs the Confederate Army in ſuch a manner, as to oblige Prince Eugene to raiſe the ſiege; and, in order to this, they at laſt found an opportunity of engaging ſome of the inhabitants at Aeth in a conſpiracy to deliver up that town; while, on the other hand, they were indefatigable in concerting meaſures for cutting off the convoys, of which the camp before Liſle ſtood in need. The former ſcheme failed; for before the conſpiracy at Aeth was ripe for execution, it was diſcovered; but in the latter part of their deſign they ſucceeded; for after various motions of both armies, they began to throw up lines for ſecuring the paſſes of the Scheldt, and worked at them ſo hard, that they appeared rather like the fortifications of a town, than intrenchments thrown up in haſte, notwithſtanding they were ſeven miles in length. On theſe they laid cannon, and poſted the greateſt part of their army upon them, ſo that they effectually ſtopped all communication by the Scheldt. Upon which the States ordered all that was neceſſary both for the army and for the ſiege, to be ſent to Oſtend; and if the French had begun their deſigns, with the intercepting this way of conveyance, the ſiege muſt have been raiſed for want of ammunition to carry it on.

The Duke of Burgundy was very uneaſy for want of intelligence from Liſle, which put Dubois, a Captain in in his army, on one of the boldeſt enterprizes which, pehaps, was ever undertaken by a ſingle man: he determined to attempt getting into the city, notwithſtanding the ſtrict guards kept by the beſiegers. He undreſſed himſelf, and having hid his cloaths, ſwam over ſeven canals and ditches, and ſo got into the town. Marechal Boufflers having provided him with cloaths, conducted him to both the attacks, ſhewed him the condition all things were in, and having written a letter to the Duke of Burgundy, he rolled it up in wax, which the Captain put in his mouth; he then returned the ſame way he came, with the intelligence the Duke of Burgundy wanted; by which it was ſaid, Marechal Boufflers acquainted him, that if one of the Allies' convoys could be intercepted, the ſiege would be raiſed; and that he would undertake the place ſhould hold out till the 9th or 10th of October.

On the 12th of September about nine in the morning, the beſieged came out of the town in great numbers, with four colours, and attacked the trenches on the left in ſix different places, having, at the ſame time, another body of troops in the covered-way ready to ſuſtain them; but before they could do any other damage than the overturning a few gabions, they were engaged by the next battalions in the trenches, and obliged to retreat in great diſorder, having had above ſixty men killed, and among them ſeveral officers; and of the Confederates fourteen men were killed, and near thirty wounded. Lieutenant-General Arnam continued that night in the trenches, which were relieved in the night between the 13th and 14th by the Prince of Holſtein Beck; but the works were not advanced very much, becauſe the troops which had joined the grand army with Prince Eugene, were not returned to their reſpective poſts. However they arrived on the 14th a little before break of day. The ſame night the trenches were relieved by Lieutenant-General Sparr, with ten battalions as uſual; and the beſiegers began to work upon ſome mines, in order to fill up the ditch of the tenaille, and they placed a great many gabions on the palliſades. On the 17th the trenches were relieved with twelve battalions; and on the 20th the enemy was drove with loſs from a traverſe in the covered-way; the aſſault was then to have been made; but the enemy having burned their galleries and bridges, it was deferred. The trenches being relieved, the grenadiers marched and mounted the breach of the tenaille, obliged the enemy to retire, and made a good lodgement. The left having poſſeſſed themſelves of a place of arms on the counterſcarp of the tenaille, drove the enemy out of the counterſcarp before the grand breach, making a ſecond lodgement; but the enemy drove them from the lodgements, and killed ſeveral.

Prince Eugene, to reanimate the grenadiers, came out of the trenches, rallied them thrice at their head, but receiving a wound over his eye, was forced to retire to be dreſſed, while the Duke of Marlborough carried on the ſiege, and at the ſame time covered it, being in both commands at the ſame time. On the 23d, he gave orders for ſtorming; the troops drove the enemy from the tenaille on the left, and made a great lodgement along the covered way. The vigour of the enemy abating, which was owing to want of ammunition, Marechal Boufflers found means to let the Duke de Vendome know it, who ſent a body of horſe and dragoons, each man having a bag of forty pounds weight of gunpowder; but what by the vigilance of the General, and by their powder taking fire by accident, they were moſtly killed by our men, or blown up by their own powder.

Vendome having laid a deſign of intercepting a convoy coming from Oſtend, the Duke ordered twelve battalions and 800 horſe, with ten ſquadrons, to guard the convoy; but ſuppoſing that the French might be too ſtrong, he reinforced it with twelve battalions more, to join the detachment between Menin and Oſtend, while Major-General Cadogan marched with ſome horſe and foot to meet the convoy. The Count de la Motte, by command of the Duke of Berwick, marched from Ghent with 22,000 men, and came up with 6000 of the Confederates, who guarded the convoy, which occaſioned one of the moſt glorious and remarkable actions recorded in hiſtory. See WYNENDALE, BATTLE AT.

In this battle near Wynendale, the Count de la Motte being obliged to retire, gave the convoy an opportunity to arrive the ſame night unmoleſted and ſafe at Menin. If this large convoy of 800 waggons had been intercepted, the ſiege of the city muſt inevitably have been raiſed; for the Duke of Marlborough had ſent ſeveral ſupplies from his army to carry on the ſiege, and could now ſpare no more. He began himſelf to deſpair of the ſucceſs of the undertaking, and prepared the army and beſiegers for raiſing the ſiege, being in great anxiety for the ſafety of ſo large a convoy, upon which the whole ſucceſs of the ſiege depended. On the 30th of September, Prince Eugene viſited the trenches, which were relieved with five battalions on the right, and ſeven on the left. The beginning of the next month, 300 grenadiers joined the troops, and attacked the ravelin, in which they ſucceeded ſo well, that they made a lodgement on the ravelin, and forced the enemy behind the traverſes to leap into the water, where moſt of them were killed or drowned; ſo that now the beſiegers were maſters of both the counterguards and the ravelins; they next finiſhed the batteries on the counterſcarp, to ruin thoſe of the enemy on the courtine, and to beat down the bridge of communication which they had from a place of arms to the ravelin. After ſpringing mines and other operations towards the latter end of October, all the neceſſary diſpoſitions for a general ſtorm were made, by draining the ditch, making apertures in the walls, working on the galleries, filling up the ditch, perfecting their lodgements and places of arms, and laſtly of finiſhing their batteries, which conſiſted of forty-five pieces of cannon, and fifty-five mortars; to ſupply which, a new convoy of 20,000 weight of powder, with a great number of bombs, cannon balls; and hand-grenades, arrived at the ſiege from Oſtend. Theſe began to fire with ſo much ſucceſs, that the beſieged beat a parley on the 22d, and offered to capitulate for the town; whereupon hoſtages were exchanged, and it was agreed that Marechal Boufflers ſhould capitulate capitulate for the garriſon with Prince Eugene of Savoy, and that the magiſtrates and council of the town, ſhould propoſe their own terms for themſelves, and the caſtellary of Liſle, to the field-deputies of the States-general.

The French delivered up Magdalen Gate that afternoon; the horſe under the Chevalier de Luxemburg, who had got into the town with the ſupplies, marched to Douay. The French garriſon to retire into the citadel. The Prince of Holſtein Beck, being appointed governor of Liſle, marched in with two Engliſh, and thirteen other battalions, and a detachment of horſe. In this ſiege the French loſt 7000 men, and the Allies near 9000. On the 29th, the beſieged commenced hoſtilities by the diſcharge of five pieces of cannon; the Allies contracted the lines of circumvallation, erected the batteries of cannon, and carried on their approaches by ſap; on the 13th, lodged themſelves by the paliſades of the firſt covered way, and made themſelves maſters of the counterſcarp, except two places of arms; prepared faſcines, continued to drain the ditch; made ſeveral openings into it; paſſed the ditch in the night, and lodged themſelves on the glacis of the ſecond covered way, without any loſs.

On the 1ſt of December, they raiſed batteries on the ſecond counterſcarp, which were finiſhed on the 5th, and then Prince Eugene ſent the Marechal Boufflers a ſummons to ſurrender, if he expected an honourable capitulation; if he would give up the citadel before the batteries began to play; otherwiſe, to expect no better terms than to be made priſoner of war with his garriſon.

The Governor, whoſe ſtock of ammunition was nigh exhauſted, being informed that the communication was open and free between Bruſſels and Liſle, thought fit to prevent the conſequences of a breach being made in the body of the citadel, by beating a parley on the 8th of December. Hoſtages being exchanged, the articles were ſigned the day following, and on the 10th the Marechal with the whole garriſon marched out, and were conducted to Douay.

Liſle was beſieged by the Auſtrians on September 15, 1792, and they relinquiſhed the ſiege of it, October 8, following.

On the 4th of September, ſeveral detachments of French infantry and cavalry ſent out from Liſle to reconnoitre, were ſo vigorouſly attacked by the Pruſſians, that they were ſoon put to flight: fifty priſoners were taken.

On Auguſt 7, 1793, the French broke up the camp of La Magdelaine which covered Liſle, 15,000 men having been ſent for its defence.

On September 9, 1793, the French were moſt completely drubbed on the ſide of Liſle by General Beaulieu, who drove them into the very gates of that city, his army having purſued them to Helemmes, which is not above half a league from Liſle. The Auſtrian chaſſeurs made conſiderable ſlaughter, in revenge for the barbarities exerciſed on their troops, having killed above four hundred of them.

The Bruſſels gazette extraordinary of the 14th of September ſtates, that on the 11th a detachment from the Auſtrian army, commanded by the Duke of Saxe Teſchen, gained ſome advantage over the French troops near Liſle. The troops attacked by the Auſtrians formed the rear-guard of the battalion of the north, which had left the camp of Mauld, and was now proceeding to Liſle. They were entirely routed, loſt thirty killed, and three officers and eighty-ſix privates taken priſoners. The Auſtrians, by this account, had not a ſingle man killed or wounded, though the action happened under the cannon of Liſle.

The French give the following account of the action of May 11, 1794. At break of day, the Allies preſented themſelves to attack us, and we, on our part, had prepared to attack them. Their forces amounted to thirty thouſand men, but we were nearly double that number, with an artillery ſufficient to put to flight ſo many devils.

The action ſoon began; the enemy were vigorouſly attacked, and defended themſelves as bravely. Never was a hotter fire ſeen, or a more obſtinate engagement. In the end the enemy was obliged to give way. Our infantry, though broken by the rout of our own cavalry, and charged many times by that of the enemy, nevertheleſs rallied and did wonders. The enemy at laſt yielded the field of battle. The Auſtrian infantry diſtinguiſhed themſelves greatly. We were never once able to break them.

General Starray, one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed commanders in the allied forces, was killed in the engagement.

LIZARD, ENGAGEMENT OFF, IN 1707. The ſouthernmoſt point of land in Great Britain. The Liſbon fleet, under the convoy of the Cumberland of eighty guns, the Devonſhire of eighty guns, the Royal Oak of ſeventy guns, and the Cheſter and Ruby of fifty guns, fell in with the French fleet, commanded by M. du Guay Trouin, off the Lizard. The French were at leaſt twelve ſail of line of battle ſhips. The convoy diſpoſed themſelves in a line, and thereby gave the merchant ſhips an opportunity of eſcaping. M. du Guay attacked the Cumberland about twelve at noon, and with the aſſiſtance of two other ſhips, after an obſtinate diſpute, carried her; the Devonſhire defended herſelf for a long time againſt ſeven, and until evening againſt five French ſhips; but then by ſome accident, which will remain for ever unknown, took fire and blew up, two only out of 900 men eſcaped; the Royal Oak made a vigorous reſiſtance, and having ſet the French ſhip which attacked her, and was commanded by M. de Bearnois, on fire, got ſafe into Kinſale harbour; the Count de Fourbin took the Cheſter, and Monſieurs de Courſerat and de Neſmond took the Ruby. As for the Liſbon fleet, they very prudently ſaved themſelves during the engagement.

LIZARD, ENGAGEMENT OFF, IN 1709. On the 25th of February, Captain Tollet in the Aſſurance of ſeventy guns, with the Sunderland of ſixty, Hampſhire and Angleſea of fifty guns each, ſailed from Cork, Cork, and being joined by the Aſſiſtance, a fifty gun ſhip likewiſe, with the trade from Kinſale, continued his voyage for England. On the 2d of March, about five in the morning, being then eight leagues S. S. W. off the Lizard, he ſaw four ſail ſtanding after him. About ſeven they came within random ſhot; whereupon he made the ſignal for drawing into a line of battle, and another for the merchantmen to bear away for their ſecurity; ſome of them, with the Angleſea and Sunderland, having before loſt company. About eight, the enemy bore down in a line, and when they were come within muſquet-ſhot, they hoiſted French colours. The French Commodore who was in a ſhip of ſeventy guns or upwards, came ranging along the larboard ſide of the Aſſurance, and fell aboard her, ſo that they engaged yard-arm and yard-arm for the ſpace of almoſt half an hour; during which the Frenchman plied Captain Tollet ſo warmly with ſmall ſhot, that he cut off moſt of his marines and ſeamen that were quartered on deck. He then put off, and fell on board again on the lee-ſide of the Aſſurance, firſt ranging on her bow, and then on her quarter, while ſhe fired her upper deck and part of her lower deck guns with ſuch vigour, that ſhe obliged the enemy to ſheer off, and ſtand away ahead towards the merchantmen. The three other ſhips, which were of forty or fifty guns, then came ranging up to the Aſſurance, firing ſeveral broadſides into her, and after that bore away after the former. The damage ſhe received was very great; her ſides were ſhot through and through in a great many places; her ſhrouds and back-ſtays cut to pieces, as likewiſe her main and falſe ſtay, which, if not timely ſeen, had occaſioned the loſs of her maſt. Her foreſail and fore-topſail were torn to pieces, her beſt bower cut away; one of the flukes of the ſpare anchor ſhot off, and her ſmall bower by the enemies' boarding drove through her bow. All poſſible diſpatch was made in fitting her rigging, which, with the bending of a new fore-ſail and fore-topſail, took up ſome time. After which the ſhips of war all bore down to ſecure what merchant ſhips they could, expecting to engage the enemy again, but they declined it. The Captain of the Aſſurance, who had been four months ſick, and had been carried upon deck in a chair, was wounded; the firſt lieutenant was ſhot in the leg, which he got dreſſed, and then returned to his charge upon the deck; the ſecond lieutenant was killed, as were ſeveral French officers whom they brought from Ireland, but more of the latter were wounded. In the whole, the Aſſurance had twenty-five killed, and fifty-three wounded, and ſome of theſe died of their wounds; for the enemy making their chief attempt on her, ſhe had been ſeverely treated; the Hampſhire had only two killed, and eleven wounded; the Aſſiſtance eight killed, and twenty-one wounded, among the latter was Captain Tudor, her commander, who died afterwards of his wounds. M. du Guay Trouin, who commanded the French ſquadron, had abundance of men killed and wounded, and took only five merchantmen, which it was believed he ſent into Breſt. In the memoirs which go under his name, it is acknowledged that our officers did their duty extremely well, that not only his own ſhip was very roughly handled by Captain Tollet; but alſo, that the Amazon and the Glory, that were with him, met the like reception from the Hampſhire and the Aſſiſtance. As to the five prizes, he ſays, that two of them were ſent to St. Malo's, one got into Calais, and the other two foundered on the Engliſh coaſt.

Lord Durſley on the 20th of March, ordered three ſhips to cruize off Breſt to gain intelligence, and in the mean time the Saliſbury took a French Weſt-India ſhip richly laden; but the moſt valuable part of her effects were taken out becauſe ſhe proved ſo leaky, that it was ſuſpected ſhe might founder at ſea. On the 29th his Lordſhip had orders to ſee the Liſbon fleet of merchantmen ſafe into the ſea; but his Lordſhip having received certain intelligence that M. du Guay Trouin was then cruizing at the diſtance of about thirty-five leagues from the Lizard, his Lordſhip propoſed to leave the trade and tranſports under the protection of ſome Dutch men of war that were expected from Portſmouth, and reſolved to go himſelf in ſearch of the enemy; but theſe Dutch ſhips of war not arriving in time, his Lordſhip thought it better to comply with his orders; and having ſeen the Liſbon fleet as far as he was directed, he had ſcarce parted from them on the 9th of April, before he diſcovered the Achilles, commanded by M. du Guay Trouin, and the Glory, who the day before had taken the Briſtol man of war, a fifty gun ſhip; his Lordſhip immediately gave them chaſe, recovered the Briſtol, which, by a ſhot in her bread room, ſunk ſoon afterwards; but all the men except twenty were ſaved. The Achilles much ſhattered, eſcaped by her ſwift ſailing, but the Le Gloire, a French man of war of forty-four guns and 312 men was taken; his Lordſhip having about ſeventy men killed and wounded in the action. On the 26th of April, two ſmall ſhips were taken, and on the 7th of May, a privateer carrying fourteen guns and 100 men; but the proviſions through all the ſhips then growing very ſhort, his Lordſhip found it neceſſary to return to Plymouth on the 13th with his ſquadron, which conſiſted at that time of one third, and ſeven fourth rates, and there received the unwelcome news, that her Majeſty's ſhip the Sweepſtakes of thirty-two guns, had been taken by two French privateers, each of which was of greater force than that frigate.

There arrived about the ſame time advice that four French men of war had attacked ſome New England ſhips laden with maſts, under the convoy of Captain Walter Ryddel, in the Falmouth, a ſhip of fifty guns, about twenty-four leagues from the Lizard. This happened on the 18th of May; and the French Commodore, a ſixty gun ſhip, attempting to board the Falmouth, Captain Ryddel ſaved him the trouble, by filling his headſails, and laying her on board under her bowſprit, directly athwart her hawſer, and at the ſame time raked her fore and aft with his cannon. The enemy continued in this poſture about an hour and a half, during which time he entered many men, but they were repulſed. However, the number of men on board her being much greater than thoſe in the Falmouth, it occaſioned various turns; but at length he thought fit to retire, having firſt cut all the laniards of the Falmouth's fore and mizen-ſhrouds, believing it might prevent her following to reſcue the convoys, which the enemy ſtood after. Notwithſtanding this, Captain Ryddel made ſail after him with ſuch diligence, as enabled him, notwithſtanding the bad condition he was in, to preſerve them all, and to bring them ſafe into Plymouth. In this action the Falmouth had thirteen men killed, and fifty-ſix wounded. The Captain himſelf was wounded in the right leg, and had ſeveral other hurts; and the ſecond lieutenant and Mr. Lawſon, a volunteer, were ſhot through the body; the Falmouth had 20,000 pounds New England money on board her at the time of the engagement.

LODI, ON THE RIVER ADDA, BATTLE AT, May 10, 1796, where Bonaparte defeated the Auſtrians under General Beaulieu. The battle began at day-break by the French paſſing the bridge before the Auſtrians had perceived their approach, when a general diſcharge deſtroyed 700 French, their generals who ſaw their danger ruſhed forward, ſeized the Auſtrian artillery, and threw their army into diſorder which ended the conteſt.

The following is an extract of a letter from General Bonaparte, dated Lodi, March 11, 1796.

The head quarters arrived yeſterday at Caſal, at three o'clock in the morning; at nine our vanguard found the enemy defending the approaches of Lodi. The diviſion of General Angereau, which had remained that night at Borghetto, and that of General Maſſena, which had paſſed it at Caſal, put themſelves inſtantly in motion. In the mean time the van-guard forced all the enemy's poſts, and took one piece of cannon. We entered Lodi in purſuit of the enemy, who had already paſſed the Adda by the bridge. Beaulieu's whole army was arranged in order of battle, and thirty pieces of heavy ordnance defended the paſſage of the bridge. I ordered my whole artillery to be brought up; a very briſk cannonade was kept up ſeveral hours. As ſoon as the army arrived, it was drawn up in one column, at the head of which marched the ſecond battalion of carabineers, followed by all the battalions of grenadiers, who reached the bridge. The enemy made a dreadful fire; the head of the column ſeemed to heſitate; Generals Berthier, Maſſena, Cervoni, Dallemagne, and Larne and Dupat, chiefs of brigade, felt it, and precipitated themſelves at the head of the column, and decided the day.

This column bore down all oppoſition; the enemy's whole artillery was inſtantly taken; Beaulieu's order of battle was broken, and the enemy's army was diſperſed. Our cavalry paſſed the Adda by a ford. Beaulieu's horſe attempted to charge our troops, in order to protect the retreat of his infantry, but they found it was no eaſy matter to frighten our ſoldiers. The coming on of night, and the extreme fatigues which our troops had ſuſtained, prevented us from purſuing the enemy, who loſt twenty pieces of cannon, and between two and three thouſand men in killed, wounded, and priſoners.

BONAPARTE.

LONDON PLUNDERED. The metropolis of Great Britain. When the Saxon heptarchy had ceaſed, and the Engliſh monarchy took origin in Egbert the Saxon, and firſt king of England, in 800, the firſt care that Prince engaged in, was to ſecure himſelf in the hearts of the Saxons, his countrymen, and to reduce the Britons. His conqueſts were rapid. He then obtained a ſignal victory over the Mercians at Wilton in Wiltſhire; ſubdued Kent; received the ſubmiſſion of the Eaſt Saxons (or Eſſex), routed the Eaſt Anglians (Norfolk and Suffolk), and the Mercians, (or the centre counties of England), ſubjected them to his ſway, and ſoon after the kingdom of Northumberland ſubmitted; but in the midſt of his conqueſts and ambitious ſchemes to reduce the whole iſland, he was interrupted by the deſcent of the Danes, who had before ravaged the coaſts of England here and there in ſmall parties, but now had landed at the iſland of Sheppey in Kent, in a formidable body to invade the kingdom; but returned to their ſhips ſatisfied with an immenſe plunder.

This firſt great landing was in 831, encouraged by the ſucceſs of which, they entered the mouth of the Tyne in the following year; where having received a ſmall check, they cruized along the coaſt, ſailing round, and made a ſecond deſcent at Charmouth, near Axminſter in Dorſetſhire, where they landed to the number of 1,500 men. Egbert was no ſooner apprized of their appearance, than he marched againſt them at the head of a ſmall body of troops, which he imprudently thought ſufficient to chaſtiſe a band of pilfering pirates; but, notwithſtanding the impetuoſity of his attack, by which they were at firſt thrown into diſorder, they rallied, and gave him ſo warm a reception, that night only ſaved him from an entire defeat; however, the Danes finding themſelves ſo roughly handled, retired to their ſhips, and about two years after, equipped a large naval armament and landed in Cornwall, where being joined by the diſaffected Britons, they advanced towards the borders of Devonſhire, with a view to penetrate into the territories of Egbert, who met them at Hongſdown-Hill, near Kellington, in Cornwall, where he entirely routed them, and almoſt cut their whole army to pieces; by which ſignal victory, he wiped off the ſlight diſgrace which had ſoiled his arms in the action of Charmouth, and died in the year 838, having reigned thirty-ſix years with ſuch ability and ſucceſs as juſtly intitled him to the name of a profound ſtateſman, as well as that of an able warrior.

The Danes returned again in the very firſt year of his ſon Ethelwolfe's reign, and arrived at Southampton, in thirty-three ſhips, where, having ravaged the country, and having met with various ſucceſſes and repulſes, they at length defeated and killed the Engliſh General, Edelhelm, at the head of his forces, which they routed near Portland.

In the courſe of the ſucceeding year 839, they landed at Romney, and defeated Herebert, who was ſent to oppoſe poſe their progreſs; then penetrating farther into the country, they waſted Lindſey, Eaſt Anglia, and Kent, with great outrage and barbarity. The ſucceeding year they ravaged London, Rocheſter, and Canterbury, and returned home with a vaſt booty. They in 852 returned in the ſpring, with a mighty fleet of 300 ſail, which entered the river Thames ſo ſuddenly, that the Engliſh were in no condition to oppoſe ſuch a formidable invaſion; and while they were engaged in gathering forces able to face ſuch a number, the Danes took London, which they plundered, and proceeding to Canterbury and other places, almoſt bid fair for making a conqueſt of the whole iſland.

LONDON BESIEGED. The Danes in 993, having received a large ſum of money from Ethelred, whoſe puſillanimity did not permit him to oppoſe their ravages, ceaſed for a ſhort time to pillage Britain. But the year following, Swayne of Denmark, and Olaus of Sweden, invaded England with a large fleet, entered the Thames, and landed their troops near London, which place they attacked ſeveral times; but meeting with a braver reſiſtance than they imagined, were obliged to retire.

In 1013, the Danes, under Swayne, having got poſſeſſion of almoſt all Britain, laid ſiege to London, where Ethelred was ſhut up. Though he was but ill provided with neceſſaries to beſiege in form a place of importance, he imagined the citizens would be terrified at his menaces; but finding they were not moved by them, for a ſhort time he deſiſted from his enterprize, and went and ravaged the weſtern parts of Weſſex, where he found no oppoſition to his deſigns; after which he returned againſt London, when, whilſt he was preparing for the ſiege with greater precaution than before, Ethelred made his eſcape out of the city, and abandoned the inhabitants to the mercy of Swayne's troops; whereupon the Londoners, judging it a raſh undertaking to maintain the rights of a Prince he himſelf had relinquiſhed, ſubmitted to Swayne, who was, without further oppoſition, proclaimed King.

In 1016, on the death of Ethelred, the citizens of London, and all the nobility there, proclaimed young Edmund his ſon (commonly called Ironſide) King; but a greater number of the biſhops, clergy, and ſome nobles, ſided with Canute the Dane, whom they crowned at Southampton. While Edmund marched into Weſſex, being ſecure of London, Canute, his rival, took the opportunity of his abſence, and ſailed up the river Thames, with an intent to reduce the city of London, which was Edmund's chief reſource: and now believing, if he could deprive Edmund of this treaſure, it would put an end to the conteſt, he approached London, and forming the ſiege, he carried it on vigorouſly; but the reſiſtance he met with from the citizens, giving time to Edmund to throw in troops from the other ſide of the Thames, Canute was obliged to raiſe the ſiege.

Failing in his project, he uſed many ſtratagems to ſurpriſe the city; and in a ſhort time after the battle of Scoerſtan, or Sherſton, in Wilts, he again laid ſiege to the city. Edmund being ſenſible that he was far from being in a condition to relieve it, retired into Weſſex to reinforce his army; and having received the expected ſuccours, began his march to London, and compelled the Danes once more to raiſe the ſiege: and had not Edmund truſted his army to Edric, the traitor, and by that means loſt the battle of Aſhdown (ſee ASHDOWN), he might in all probability, have drove the Danes out of England.

After the battle of Haſtings, the Normans, under William the Conqueror, came to govern this iſland. That ſucceſsful warrior, during the general conſternation at London, reſolving to improve his advantage, marched to Dover, reduced it, and proceeded to Kent, where he met the Kentiſh men, who hearing of his approach were prepared to oppoſe his progreſs; but they ſoon ſubmitted to him on certain favourable conditions which he granted them: and while Morcar and Edwin, Harold's brothers, were aſſembling the nobility at London, he continued advancing to London in three diviſions, through three different routes, commanding his men, in caſe of oppoſition, to waſte the country with fire and ſword, which they too cruelly obeyed on every ſlight offence; William thinking by ſuch rigours of war, to terrify the inhabitants of London, already ſufficiently intimidated by his approach, who earneſtly preſſed Morcar and Edwin to a ſubmiſſion; but they, with a view to animate their party, took the opportunity to ſally out from London upon William, who arrived in the neighbourhood of that capital with his firſt diviſion. They determined to give him battle before the reſt of his forces ſhould come up to ſupport him, but were forced to retire with precipitation to the northern provinces. By this time the Normans had burned and deſtroyed the ſuburbs on the Surry ſide of the Thames (now the Borough), by the command of their leader; while another diviſion, paſſing the Thames at Wallingford in Berkſhire, came as far as Berkhamſtead in their march to the capital: ſo that the nobility and clergy, attended by the magiſtrates, choſe to ſubmit, rather than make a deſperate and fruitleſs oppoſition, met the Conqueror at the head of his forces, and made a formal tender of the crown, which, after ſome deliberation, he accepted, and was crowned with great pomp and ſplendour at the metropolis in 1066.

Louis the Dauphin, in 1215, during the diſpute between him and King John, in the war of the Barons, took this city.

Louis the Dauphin, 1217, two years afterwards, during the beforementioned conteſt, failing in his attempts upon Dover, turned his projects upon the metropolis. Having newly heard of his general, the Earl of Perche's defeat (ſee LINCOLN), he thought this city the beſt place of ſecurity, and a refuge wherein he might conſult further meaſures for proſecuting the war of the Barons; but being unable to make head againſt the victorious Regent, the Earl of Pembroke, after ſo notable a defeat, he acquainted his father Philip, King of France, with his condition and circumſtances; who being unwilling to diſoblige the Pope, and thereby embarraſs his own kingdom, pretended to take no part with his ſon, who was under excommunication, but nevertheleſs privately furniſhed Blanche, his daughter-in-law, and wife to Louis, with a naval armament, who was inſtructed to go to the aſſiſtance of her huſband, the Dauphin, in her own name, who, with a ſtrong body of forces, and eighty ſhips, embarked from Calais. Had theſe ſuccours arrived, they might have retrieved the circumſtances of Louis. The Governors of the Cinque Ports hearing they were to embark at Calais, waited for them, and engaging them, took or ſunk moſt of the French fleet, (ſee OCEAN.) He found himſelf reduced to ſuch ſtraits by theſe two ſucceſſive defeats by land and ſea, that he began to wiſh himſelf diſengaged from the alliance with the Barons.

Henry III. ſon of the former King, was now a minor, under the care of the Earl of Pembroke, Regent of the kingdom, who, to crown the ill fortune of Louis, blocked him up in the City of London. At the ſame time moſt of his friends, the Barons, were either killed or taken priſoners at the battle of Lincoln. He alſo lay under the Pope's interdiction. The Engliſh expreſſed their diſcontent every where, and without reſerve; while he himſelf was beſieged in a foreign country and cut off from all reſources. In this abandoned ſituation he thought it the beſt expedient to accommodate matters as well as he could with the Regent; and accordingly he demanded an honourable treaty with him, which was immediately entered into and agreed upon.

In this treaty of peace, he very honourably included his Engliſh adherents; and the Earl of Pembroke, unwilling to bring on himſelf the united force of France, which he knew would be exerted to relieve the heir of that kingdom, he granted his demands, and the ſooner, leſt by perſevering in the war, the Barons might be drove to deſpair, and the nation continued in its troubles. Moderation, he foreſaw, would in all probability reſtore the ſtate to its former tranquillity, and therefore wiſely adopted a coalition of all parties, by which he might put the young King in quiet poſſeſſion of the crown, the ſole aim of his deſires. Theſe ſalutary reflections induced him to agree to a treaty of peace, upon the following conditions, ſigned at London, and confirmed by the Pope's Legate. That the City of London ſhould poſſeſs her ancient privileges; all priſoners taken by Louis, ſince his engaging in the cauſe of the Barons, releaſed: that the Engliſh, priſoners or not, ſhall ſwear allegiance to Henry: that Louis ſhould renounce all pretenſions, on account of former homage, with many other articles. After the ſigning of theſe, Louis received the Pope's abſolution; and having borrowed 5000 marks, (Matthew Paris, the French hiſtorian, ſays pounds), he returned to France; and the repoſe of the kingdom was eſtabliſhed for ſome time.

After the battle of Kenilworth, (which ſee), and before the reduction of Ely, in the diſpute between King Henry III. and the diſcontented Barons, in 1267, the Earl of Glouceſter having ſigned a paper with his own hand, that he would never take arms againſt King Henry, nevertheleſs privately raiſed forces, and while the King was engaged in reducing the rebels at Ely, he marched ſo ſuddenly to London, that he arrived in that neighbourhood before the magiſtrates could be informed whether he acted for the King or the malcontents. In this criſis they conſulted the Pope's Legate, whom Henry had left Governor of the Tower, and who adviſed them to admit Glouceſter with a ſmall retinue. He was for ſome time in London before he declared his intentions; but on ſome of the Barons appearing in Southwark, the magiſtrates knowing his deſign ordered the drawbridge to be drawn up, and the gates to be ſhut for their own ſecurity.

He lay before the tower a fortnight, and by fair promiſes gained over the citizens to his party. He then ſeized the gates, and permitted the malcontents to enter the capital. The people elected new magiſtrates, and erected barbicans and bulwarks between the Tower and the City, while Glouceſter ſummoned the Legate to ſurrender the former. For ſome time he ſtood out, excommunicating all, and laying the churches under interdiction: but as theſe cenſures were totally deſpiſed, every thing prepared to beſiege in form, and he cut off from all communication and ſupplies, it was ſurrendered at diſcretion. Glouceſter having made himſelf maſter of the Tower and the City, threw off the maſk, and publicly avowed that his deſign in taking arms, was to eſtabliſh the peace of the kingdom on a ſolid baſis, by procuring equitable conditions for the revolters; and in his manifeſto declared that he would not relinquiſh his deſign, till the King and Prince Edward ſhould make good their promiſes recited in the two charters, one article of which was, to baniſh all foreigners from their councils, which they had ſcandalouſly neglected to perform. Henry, alarmed at theſe proceedings, and under the apprehenſions of being attacked, diſpatched away orders to his ſon to join him on the inſtant. The junction was ſoon formed, and the armies marched together towards London, and ſtopping at Stratford-le-Bow, were joined by increaſing numbers. Glouceſter ſeeing Henry's army thus reinforced, and diſappointed in his dependance on an inconſtant people, would not hazard a battle; ſo choſe to remain within the walls of London, till he could retrieve his ſituation by a treaty; in conſequence of which he obtained a pardon both for himſelf and the citizens of London.

During the troubleſome reign of Henry VI. an inſurrection of an extraordinary nature appeared in London. The whole kingdom was in a ferment at that time againſt the Queen and Suffolk. Glouceſter was privately ſmothered; the Biſhop of Sarum was murdered in Wiltſhire; and the Duke of Suffolk beheaded. During this ferment one John Cade, an Iriſhman, in 1450, was employed by the Duke of York, Regent of France, and then in Ireland, to revive the pretenſions of the Houſe of March, whoſe title to the throne had for many years lain dormant. Cade had been a ſoldier, ſerved under the Regent in France, and was a man of uncommon reſolution, great cunning, of an enterprizing ſpirit, and ſome underſtanding.

Having received proper inſtructions from the Duke of York's agent, he aſſumed the name of John Mortimer, and perſonated the ſon of Sir John Mortimer, who had been executed for treaſon in the reign of Henry V. He choſe Kent for the ſcene of his firſt appearance, where the Duke of York had a great number of friends, and ſoon aſſembling a large body of malcontents, he marched towards London, under the pretence of redreſſing dreſſing grivances, and reſtoring the public tranquillity.

The rebels increaſed ſo faſt, that Cade in a few days, found himſelf in a condition to oppoſe the King's forces, and encamped on Blackheath. The King having notice of this rebellion, ſent to Cade to know the reaſon of the inſurrection, and was anſwered, that they had no deſign againſt his perſon, as their buſineſs was with the parliament, to remove evil miniſters, by whom the nation was ſold. They preferred two petitions, the one general, for the reformation of abuſes and corruptions; the other particular, demanding that the Duke of Suffolk ſhould be puniſhed for the loſs of Normandy, and that the King's council ſhould be filled by men of virtue and ability, nobles, and princes of the blood, and not by wretches, hirelings, corrupt and profligate villains, who lived by plundering the nation. Theſe petitions were immediately deemed ſeditious, and the King reſolved to ſuppreſs the rebellion by force of arms. To this end he marched againſt Cade towards Blackheath, and Cade retired, but hid himſelf in a wood, deſigning to fall upon the King's army, which conſiſted of 15,000 men, take the King priſoner, and oblige him to redreſs thoſe grievances ſpecified in the petitions. But Henry, believing the rebels dared not ſtand to face him, and imagining they were diſperſed, he returned to London, ſending only a detachment of his army in purſuit of them. This detachment falling into ambuſh, were cut in pieces, and Sir Henry Stafford, the commander loſt his life in the affair.

Cade, ſpirited by this ſucceſs, marched to London, while the King and the whole court haſtily retired to Kenilworth Caſtle, leaving a garriſon in the Tower. Cade's ſucceſs increaſed his numbers. The City of London opened her gates to him, and he entered in triumph at the head of his army. He forbade plunder under ſevere penalties, or offering the leaſt inſult to any of the inhabitants. Lord Say, who was accuſed with Suffolk of bribery, in the affair of Maine, was, on the clamours of the rebels, diveſted of the lord treaſureſhip, and committed to the tower. He was brought by them from thence to Guildhall, to be tried before the Mayor. On his requeſting to be tried by his peers, Cade, who would admit of no dilatory pleas, took him to the ſtandard in Cheapſide, (now Cornhill), ordered his head to be cut off, and carried on a pole through the ſtreets, then dragged his naked body at a horſe's tail into Southwark, where it was quartered.

Cade's ſoldiers and the citizens lived together very friendly for ſome time, till not able to refrain from plunder, they were entering from Southwark into London; the gate was ſhut againſt them, on which a battle enſued, and laſted all that day the 5th of July, 1450. Meanwhile the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Lord Chancellor, Archbiſhop of York, having retired into the tower, publiſhed a general pardon to all who ſhould quit Cade, which had ſo ſurpriſing an effect, that he found himſelf abandoned, and was obliged to fly into Suſſex, where, after having been proclaimed at 1000 marks for his perſon, dead or alive, he was killed at Hothfield, by one Alexander Iden, a gentleman of Kent, who brought his body to London; where, with ſeveral of his accomplices, who did not come in, it was hanged and quartered. Thus ended this dangerous inſurrection, which might have been attended with worſe conſequences, had it been conducted by a more experienced leader.

LONDON, (NEW), EXPEDITION AGAINST, IN 1781. This town is the capital of a county of the ſame name in the province of Connecticut, ſituated on the weſt ſide of Thames river, North America. Many privateers being fitted out at this port for annoying the Britiſh trade, Sir Henry Clinton the commander in chief at New York thought it adviſeable to attempt deſtroying them, and for this means ſent a detachment under General Arnold who wrote the following account to Sir Henry Clinton.

Sound off Plumb Iſland,
SIR, September 8, 1781.

I have the honour to inform your Excellency, that the tranſports, with the detachment of troops under my orders, anchored on the Long Iſland ſhore, on the 5th inſt. at two o'clock P. M. about ten leagues from New London; and having made ſome neceſſary arrangements, weighed anchor at ſeven o'clock P. M. and ſtood for New London, with a fair wind. At one o'clock the next morning, we arrived off the harbour, when the wind ſuddenly ſhifted to the northward, and it was nine o'clock before the tranſports could beat in. At ten o'clock the troops, in two diviſions, and in four debarkations, were landed; one on each ſide the harbour; about three miles from New London; that on the Groton ſide conſiſting of the 40th and 54th regiments, and the 3d battalion of New Jerſey Volunteers, with a detachment of Yagers and artillery, were under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre. The diviſion on the New London ſide conſiſted of the 38th regiment, the Loyal Americans, the American Legion, Refugees, and a detachment of ſixty Yagers, who were immediately on their landing put in motion, and at eleven o'clock, being within half a mile of Fort Trumbull, which commands New London harbour, I detached Captain Millet, with four companies of the 38th regiment; to attack the fort, who was joined on his march by Captain Think, with one company of the American Legion. At the ſame time I advanced with the remainder of the diviſion, weſt of Fort Trumbull, on the road to the town, to attack a redoubt, which had kept up a briſk fire upon us for ſome time, but which the enemy evacuated on our approach. In this work we found ſix pieces of cannon mounted, and two diſmounted; ſoon after I had the pleaſure to ſee Captain Millet marching to Fort Trumbull, under a ſhower of grape ſhot from a number of cannon which the enemy had turned upon him; and I have the pleaſure to inform your Excellency, that by the ſudden attack and determined bravery of the troops the fort was carried with the loſs of only four or ſeven men killed and wounded. Captain Millet had orders to leave one company in Fort Trumbull, to detach one to the redoubt we had taken, and to join me with the other other two companies. No time on my part was loſt in gaining the town of New London. We were oppoſed by a ſmall body of the enemy with one field piece, who were ſo hard preſſed that they were obliged to leave the piece, which being iron, was ſpiked and left.

As ſoon as the enemy were alarmed in the morning, we could perceive they were buſily employed in bending ſails and endeavouring to get their privateers and other ſhips at Norwich river, out of our reach; but the wind being ſmall and the tide againſt them, they were obliged to anchor again. From information I received before and after my landing, I had reaſon to believe that Fort Griſwold on Groton ſide, was very incomplete; and I was aſſured (by friends to government) after my landing that there were only twenty or thirty men in the fort, the inhabitants in general being on board their ſhips and buſy in ſaving their property. On taking poſſeſſion of Fort Trumbull, I found the enemy's ſhips would eſcape, unleſs we could poſſeſs ourſelves of Fort Griſwold; I therefore diſpatched an officer to Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre, with the intelligence I had received, and requeſted him to make an attack upon the fort as ſoon as poſſible; at which time I expected the howitzer was up, and would have been made uſe of. On my gaining a height of ground in the rear of New London, from which I had a good proſpect of Fort Griſwold, I found it much more formidable than I expected, or that I had formed an idea of, from the information I had before received; I obſerved at the ſame time, that the men who had eſcaped from Fort Trumbull had croſſed in boats, and thrown themſelves into Fort Griſwold; and a favourable wind ſpringing up about this time, the enemy's ſhips were eſcaping up the river, notwithſtanding the fire from Fort Trumbull, and a ſix-pounder which I had with me. I immediately diſpatched a boat with an officer to Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre, to countermand my firſt order to attack the Fort, but the Officer arrived a few minutes too late. Lieutenant Colonel Eyre had ſent Captain Beck with a flag to demand a ſurrender of the Fort, which was peremptorily refuſed, and the attack had commenced. After a moſt obſtinate defence of near forty minutes, the Fort was carried by the ſuperior bravery and perſeverance of the aſſailants. The attack was judicious and ſpirited, and reflects the higheſt honour on the officers and troops engaged, who ſeemed to vie with each other in being firſt in danger. The troops approached on three ſides of the work, which was a ſquare, with flanks, made a lodgement in the ditch, and under a heavy fire, which they kept up on the works, effected a ſecond lodgement upon the freizing, which was attended with great difficulty, as only a few pickets could be forced out or broke in a place, and was ſo high that the ſoldiers could not aſcend without aſſiſting each other. Here the coolneſs and bravery of the troops were very conſpicuous; as the firſt who aſcended the freize were obliged to ſilence a nine pounder, which enfiladed the place on which they ſtood, until a ſufficient body had collected to enter the works, which was done with fixed bayonets, through the embrazures, where they were oppoſed with great obſtinacy by the garriſon with long ſpears. On this occaſion, I have to regret the loſs of Major Montgomery, who was killed by a ſpear in entering the enemy's works; alſo of Enſign Whillock, of the 40th regiment, who was killed in the attack. Three other officers of the ſame regiment were wounded; Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre, and three other officers of the 54th regiment, were alſo wounded, but I have the ſatisfaction to inform your Excellency that they are all in a fair way of recovery. Lieutenant-Colonel Eyre who behaved with great gallantry, having received this wound near the works, and Major Montgomery being killed immediately after, the command devolved on Major Bromfield, whoſe behaviour on this occaſion does him great honour.

Lieutenant-Colonel Buſkirk, with the New Jerſey Volunteers and artillery, being the 2d debarkation, came up ſoon after the work was carried, having been retarded by the roughneſs of the country; I am much obliged to this gentleman for his exertions, although the artillery did not arrive in time.

I have incloſed a return of the killed and wounded, by which your Excellency will obſerve that our loſs, though very conſiderable, is very ſhort of the enemy's, who loſt moſt of their officers, among whom was their commander Colonel Ledyard. Eighty-five men were found dead in Fort Griſwold, and ſixty wounded, moſt of them mortally; their loſs on the officers ſide muſt have been conſiderable, but cannot be aſcertained. I believe we have about ſeventy priſoners, beſides the wounded, who were left paroled.

Ten or twelve of the enemy's ſhips were burned, among them three or four armed veſſels, and one loaded with naval ſtores; an immenſe qnantity of European and Weſt India goods were found in the ſtores. Among the former, the cargo of the Hannah, Captain Watſon, from London, lately captured by the enemy; the whole of which was burnt with the ſtores, which proved to contain a large quantity of powder, unknown to us; the exploſion of the powder, and change of wind, ſoon after the ſtores were fixed, communicated the flames to part of the town, which was, notwithſtanding every effort to prevent it, unfortunately deſtroyed.

Upwards of fifty pieces of iron cannon-work were deſtroyed in the different works (excluſive of the guns of the ſhips) a particular return of which I cannot do myſelf the honour to tranſmit to your Excellency at this time. A very conſiderable magazine of powder, and barracks to contain three hundred men, were found in Fort Griſwold, which Captain Lemoine, of the Royal Artillery, had my poſitive directions to deſtroy; an attempt was made by him, but unfortunately failed; he had my orders to make a ſecond attempt; the reaſons why it was not done Captain Lemoine will have the honour to explain to your Excellency.

I ſhould be wanting in juſtice to the gentlemen of the navy, did I omit to acknowledge, that upon this expedition I have received every poſſible aid from them. Captain Beaſley has made every exertion to aſſiſt our operations, and not only gave up his cabin to the ſick and wounded officers, but furniſhed them with with every aſſiſtance and refreſhment that his ſhip afforded.

Lord Dalrymple will have the honour to deliver my diſpatches; I beg leave to refer your Excellency to his Lordſhip for the particulars of our operations on the New London ſide, I feel myſelf under great obligations to him for his exertions on the occaſion.

Captain Beckwith, who was extremely ſerviceable to me, returns with his Lordſhip. His ſpirited conduct in the attack of Fort Griſwold does him great honour, being one of the firſt officers who entered the works. I beg leave to refer your Excellency to him for the particulars of our operations on that ſide, and to ſay I have the higheſt opinion of his abilities as an officer.

I am greatly indebted to Captain Stapleton (who acted as major of brigade) for his ſpirited conduct and aſſiſtance; in particular, on the attack upon Fort Trumbull, and his endeavours to prevent plundering (when the public ſtores were burnt) and the deſtruction of private buildings.

The officers and troops in general behaved with the greateſt intrepidity and firmneſs.

I have the honour to be with the greateſt reſpect your Excellency's moſt obedient and moſt humble ſervant,
B. Arnold.

Return of the killed and wounded.

1 major, 1 enſign, 2 ſerjeants, 44 rank and file killed; 1 lieutenant-colonel, 3 captains, 2 lieutenants, 2 enſigns, 8 ſerjeants, 2 drummers, 127 rank and file wounded; of the wounded officers, 1 captain, 1 lieutenant, and 1 enſign are ſince dead.

John Stapleton.

In Fort Trumbull, 12 18-pounders, 3 6-pounders. A quantity of ammunition and ſtores of different kinds were deſtroyed in the magazine at Fort Trumbull, and in the meeting houſe at New London.

William H. Horndon,
Firſt Lieut. Royal regiment of Artillery.

LONDONDERRY, siege of. Formerly a fortified city in Ireland, in the province of Munſter, on the lake of Lough Foyle, 104 miles from Dublin. This memorable ſiege was conducted by King James in perſon, in 1689, being the laſt town (Inniſkilling excepted) which held out againſt him. It was but ill fortified, and worſe ſupplied, when King James came before it.

On the 13th of April, the Reverend Mr. George Walker, Rector of Donaghmore, in the county of Tyrone, having raiſed a regiment of Proteſtants for King William's ſervice, and receiving intelligence that James, who had taken Coleraine and Kilmore, after a vigorous reſiſtance, was drawing his forces towards Londonderry, in order to lay ſiege to it, and as there was at this time, a ſtrong report of an intended maſſacre, he induced the inhabitants of the city to ſhut their gates.

Colonel Lundee was the Governor, who would not give credit to King James's march, till he was certified of his being come ſo near as Cledyford. Mr. Walker returned from the city to Lyfford, and joined Colonel Crofton, reſolving to maintain a ſtrong poſt called the Long Cauſeway, but having ſuſtained the enemy a whole night, was obliged to retire into Londonderry, where he in vain attempted to perſuade the Governor, Lundee, to take the field. On the 17th, Lundee called a council of war, to which the Colonels Richards and Cunningham, who had juſt arrived with their regiments from England, were cited; who, intimidated by fear, or influenced by worſe motives declared the place not tenable, as there was not proviſion in Londonderry ſufficient to ſupport the garriſon, and the two regiments on board, for ten days; therefore, they were of opinion, that it was not for King William's ſervice, but the reverſe, to diſembark the two regiments; that conſidering the preſent circumſtances of affairs, and the liklihood of the enemy's poſſeſſing the place, it appeared the beſt expedient, that the principal officers ſhould withdraw themſelves, as well for their own preſervation, as in hopes that the inhabitants, by a ſeaſonable capitulation, might make better terms for themſelves.

Some

Some gentlemen ſigned this inſtrument, others not only refuſed, but growing jealous of ſome ill deſigns in the Governor and others, threatened to hang both him and his counſellors.

However, Captain White was ſent out to the King to receive propoſals from him concerning a treaty; and Lieutenant-General Hamilton, in conſequence of this ſuſpenſion, agreed to halt within four miles of the town. But James was over perſuaded, that the inhabitants and garriſon would ſurrender on appearance of ſo formidable an army; but he was miſtaken; for the inhabitants gave him ſo warm a reception as obliged him to retire into St. John's town in ſome diſorder. In the mean time, the inhabitants were thoroughly informed by the town-clerk, Muckeridge, of the reſolutions in the council, which ſo incenſed the garriſon and the inhabitants, that the officers, who had been inſtrumental in the deſign of a ſurrender, or even a capitulation, were obliged, at the hazard of their lives, to ſave themſelves by flight. The two colonels fled to their ſhips, and Lundee locked himſelf up in his chamber, reſolving to have no hand either in the ſiege or the ſurrender; and being adviſed by Mr. Walker and Major Baker, to continue his government, he was, upon refuſal, conducted to a boat, in which he was ſuffered to make his eſcape to the other ſide in diſguiſe, with a load of match upon his back.

The government was then offered to Mr. Walker and Major Baker, who firſt gave the refuſal to Captain Cunningham, being next in command; but he alſo, through cowardice or treachery, rejecting the offer, returned with Richards to England, where they were both caſhiered. As for Lundee he was taken up in Scotland, from whence he was ſent to London to anſwer for his perfidy and miſconduct.

Walker and Baker, being now by the general voice choſen governors, prepared for a vigorous defence; and it muſt be allowed, that their courage ſeems to have paſſed the limits of common prudence, though ſucceſsful as the event afterwards proved. The place being ill fortified, with only twenty pieces of cannon, wretchedly mounted, a ſmall party of horſe, very few diſciplined men, deſtitute of proviſions, cut off from ſupplies by land, deſpairing of any by ſea, without one engineer to conduct the operations; beſieged by an incenſed King, at the head of a great army, which was ſupplied with every thing they ſtood in need of. Several who could not face ſuch a dreadful proſpect, deſerted every day, and gave conſtant intelligence to the enemy, while others within endeavoured to betray the garriſon. In theſe circumſtances did King James, on the 20th of April, inveſt a garriſon firmly determined to die in the defence of it. The attacks were made with impetuoſity, wherein the beſiegers were repulſed with loſs. The garriſon made ſeveral ſucceſsful ſallies; but were now on the eve of a worſe calamity than any which had hitherto befallen them, an epidemic diſeaſe; ſo that now they had two dreadful enemies within, ſickneſs and famine, while the proſpect from without was equally diſmal. Some ſhips had, indeed, arrived in the river for their relief, but were prevented from coming up by the enemy's ſtrong batteries on either ſide, which difficulty had the ſhips ſurmounted, the enemy, to cut off all hopes of relief, had laid a boom acroſs the river. Meantime King James in perſon encouraged the beſiegers; but finding them dilatory, he ſaid warmly, had his army been Engliſh, they would have brought down the walls ſtone by ſtone. In this, however, he was miſtaken; for they were Iriſh who defended the place: the difference was, that thoſe within were Proteſtants, who fought for their religion and liberties, while the beſiegers were virulent Papiſts, influenced by motives.

On the 29th, King James went to Dublin to meet his parliament. Meantime one Roche found means to ſwim acroſs the river, and gave the garriſon an account, that Major-General Kirke, who had quitted King James's ſervice for that of King William's, was in the river, hourly waiting for an opportunity to relieve them; which, however, he did not effect with ſo much induſtry as he ſhould, having lain in the river ſix weeks without ſo much as attempting to advance, while the garriſon were almoſt periſhing; however, he ſent meſſengers to them, ſome of whom were taken; but a young lad having concealed a letter under his garter, and another within a cloth button of his coat, paſſed the enemy, and arrived with the letters at the garriſon, importing that Kirke would ſpeedily relieve them; and exhorting them to be good economiſts of their proviſions: that at preſent he found it impracticable to relieve them by the river, which was defended by batteries and a boom: that he had ſent a party to Inch, whither he was going, in order, if poſſible, either to beat off the enemy, or cauſe a diverſion in their favour: that he had ſent officers, arms, and artillery, to Inniſkilling, where there were at that time 3000 foot, 1500 horſe, with a regiment of dragoons, preparing to march to their relief: that he expected 6000 men every hour from England, being ſhipped for this place eight days ſince; and that, laſtly, he was ſure, if they could hold out a little longer, the enemy would abandon the ſiege, which he was well informed of from ſeveral deſerters.

About this time Baker, one of the Governors, died, and Colonel Michelburn was choſen in his room, that if one governor ſhould fall hereafter, the garriſon might not want a chief, or be expoſed to the inconveniences of a conteſted election. On the other hand, Marechal Roſen, the French General, arrived to command in chief at the camp of the beſiegers, in the room of King James, from whoſe valour and experience they expected to take the place. Commodore Rooke had, on the 8th of June, fallen in with the Bonadventure, the Swallow, and Dartmouth ſhips of war, and a fleet of tranſports, under the command of Kirke, and concurred with him in the ſervice. When they came to examine the methods taken by the enemy to cut off the communication by ſea, they found that they had laid a boom acroſs the river, compoſed of chains and cables, and floated with timber, there being ſtrong redoubts at each end, well furniſhed with cannon. On the 22d, the General having made himſelf maſter of Inch, an iſland in Lough-Swilly, ſent him a letter, wherein he informed him, that being ſatisfied tisfied the garriſon was reduced to the laſt extremity, he was determined to relieve it at all events, as he was well informed from undoubted intelligence, that the beſieged fatted their dogs on the bodies of the ſlain Iriſh, who lay without the walls, and then killed theſe animals for their own eating; not having at the writing this letter the third day's proviſion for 4300 mouths, being all that remained out of a garriſon of 7500.

While Rooke and Kirke, in conſequence of this advice, co-operated for their immediate relief, Roſen, the new commander, having viewed the fortifications, and finding how ſlowly the beſiegers had advanced, expreſſed himſelf with great fury and reſentment againſt the beſieged, ſwearing he would level the place to the ground, raze the walls to the foundation, bury the defendants in the ruins, put all to the ſword, without diſtinction of age, ſex, or rank, and lengthen by exquiſite torments, the miſery of ſuch as continued obſtinate: but neither his threats nor promiſes, of which he was very liberal, had any the leaſt effect upon thoſe, who had, as it were, devoted themſelves to die in the defence of the place, of their religion, liberty, and attachment to the intereſts of King William and Queen Mary; and leſt any one ſhould ſecretly, or openly deviſe the ſurrender, or even move ſuch a thing to the garriſon, the Governor made an order, that no perſon ſhould either by word or deed, writing or inſinuation, contrive any ſuch purpoſe, on pain of immediate death.

Mean time Lieutenant-General Hamilton ſent ſome plauſible offers to the garriſon, to which they ſeemed to liſten, in order to get time by that treaty to ſearch victuals; for they were now reduced to the neceſſity of eating horſe-fleſh, dogs, cats, rats, mice, tallow, leather, ſtarch, dried and ſalted hides; notwithſtanding which, they unanimouſly reſolved to eat the dead Iriſh, and then one another, rather than ſurrender. After which reſolution, they ſent Hamilton an anſwer, which was, that they were ſurpriſed he ſhould expect to find the beſieged place any confidence in him, who had ſo unworthily broke faith with King William, their ſovereign, who had once truſted him, though an enemy, and yet had betrayed his truſt; that, therefore, they had no reaſon to believe he could have learned more ſincerity in a Popiſh camp, under a French General. This bold anſwer ſo enraged the French General, Roſen, that he ſent a letter to the garriſon and inhabitants, importing, that if they did not deliver up the town to him in ſuch a limited time, therein preſcribed, he would wreak his vengeance on all the Proteſtants of that country, and drive them under the walls of Londonderry, there to periſh before their eyes, the dead monuments of their ſtubbornneſs and inſolence. But neither had this any effect upon the beſieged, though it was put in execution. The Biſhop of Meath, on hearing this execrable menace, endeavoured to prevail on King James that he might ſend Roſen an injunction to the contrary, who aſſured him he had ſent orders to the French General to ſtop ſuch rigorous proceedings. However, parties of dragoons were detached on this barbarous ſervice, who drove them from thirty miles round, after they had been ſtripped, the young, the aged, the women, nurſes, and children, even thoſe with child, and ſome newly delivered, under the walls. This expedient had quite another effect than was expected by Roſen; for inſtead of melting the beſieged, they were more highly exaſperated at this ſhocking act of inhumanity, vowing to eat one another, rather than ſubmit to ſo unprecedented a ruffian. They then erected a gibbet on the walls, in ſight of the enemy, and ſent a meſſage to the barbarian, that if he did not diſmiſs the Proteſtants whom he had ordered to be driven under the walls to their reſpective homes, the beſieged would immediately hang all the priſoners which they had taken during the ſiege; and theſe proving to be very numerous, together with the menace of a garriſon ſo brave and ſo reſolved, a negociation proved to be the conſequence of the meſſage, by which the French General diſmiſſed the wretched Proteſtants from under the walls, after they had been detained there three days, without being permitted to taſte food; ſome hundreds died of famine on the ſpot, and thoſe who ſurvived, either were murdered on their return by the ſtraggling parties of the enemy, or found their habitations ſacked and plundered; ſo that Roſen's intentions were nigh as effectually executed, as if they had been ſuffered to periſh under the walls; and yet thoſe very people had for the moſt part obtained paſſes and protections from King James, to which it ſeems no reſpect was paid by his General. Some ſay that at leaſt 5000, they themſelves owned 4000, were gathered for this inhuman purpoſe; and on King James's being informed of theſe execrable proceedings, he only ſaid, that Roſen was a foreigner, uſed to ſuch proceedings as were ſtrange to us, though common abroad, and that if he had been his own ſubject he would have called him to an account for it. Nor would the ſight of the gibbet, erected to hang the priſoners of war, have prevailed, had they themſelves not been permitted by the Governors to write a letter to Lieutenant-General Hamilton, before they ſhould be put to death, acquainting him, that the lives of twenty principal officers, beſides common priſoners, were at ſtake, and therefore requeſted him to repreſent their deſperate ſituation to the Marechal-General Roſen, that they were willing to die with ſwords in their hands for King James's ſervice, not to ſuffer like malefactors; nor could they lay their blood to the charge of the garriſon as the Governors had treated them with all imaginable civility; they therefore conjured him, for the mercy of God, to interpoſe his good offices with the Marechal to ſave them from an ignominious death, which they could no way deſerve, and from which their very impriſonment ought to protect them. To which affecting letter Hamilton anſwered, that their deaths ſhould be amply revenged on many thouſands of the Proteſtants, as well innocent as others, within and without that city.

The Governors had, in ſome meaſure, thinned the garriſon, by crowding 5000 or 6000 uſeleſs mouths unperceived among the Proteſtants under the walls, who, at their own requeſt, choſe that ſad alternative before the impending horrors of an inſtant famine, by which they got in exchange a few able men from without, capable of ſervice within. By this time the ſcarcity of the vileſt and moſt loathſome proviſion was increaſed to ſuch a degree, that the garriſon and inhabitants had nothing left, unleſs to prey upon one another; and it is no leſs remarkable than true, that a certain gentleman, an inhabitant of the town, locked himſelf up for three days, being apprehenſive (whether with or without foundation is not known) that the ſoldiers had looked upon him with an eye of appetite, being a perſon of conſiderable bulk. Mr. Walker being anxious for the garriſon, and juſtly ſuppoſing that ſuch diſcouragements might at length overcome that reſolution which the garriſon had ſo long expreſſed, conſidered all feaſible methods to ſupport them in their conſtancy and unſhaken ſteadineſs; and on the 30th of July he preached a ſermon in the cathedral, in which he endeavoured to confirm their perſeverance from all the motives of religion, reaſon, and virtue, reminding them of what valuable importance the Proteſtant religion was at that critical juncture, exhorting them not to deſpair, but manfully place that confidence in God, which his wonderful mercies during this long ſiege had juſtly demanded; and that they need not doubt but that he who had hitherto ſo long protected them under their ſufferings, was alſo able to deliver them entirely from their difficulties.

In this he proved to propheſy the truth, for an hour after the ſermon, the Mountjoy of Londonderry, Captain Browning commander, and the Phœnix of Coleraine, Captain Douglas, both laden with proviſions, were diſcovered, under convoy of the Dartmouth ſhip of war. The enemy made a moſt furious fire from Culmore fort, and their batteries on both ſides of the river, which the ſhips received and returned with undaunted bravery. The Mountjoy ſtruck againſt the boom to break it, which cauſed a little ſtop from the rebound, ſo that ſhe was run aground; upon which the enemy ſet up a loud ſhout and huzza, joyful to them, but terrible to the beſieged, who were eye-witneſſes of the misfortune, and whoſe ſhock to ſee their laſt hopes in this laſt extremity defeated at the very point of entrance, cannot be expreſſed. The enemy fired all their guns upon her while ſhe lay in this diſtreſs, and were putting out their boats in order to board her, when the Mountjoy firing a broadſide, the exploſion looſened her keel from the place where ſhe ſtuck, and ſetting her free, ſhe got clear and paſſed the boom. Captain Douglas was all this while engaged, as was the Dartmouth, who covering the Phœnix with her fire, ſhe alſo paſſed the boom, till in the end the Dartmouth got in with the others, to the inconceivable joy and tranſport of a garriſon who had ſuſtained a ſiege of 105 days, and which reckoned only upon two days life, having nothing left but nine lean horſes, and a pint of meal to each man. Hunger and the fatigue of the ſiege had ſo far affected them, that half of thoſe who remained of the garriſon were unfit for ſervice.

This reſolute and ſucceſsful defence of Londonderry ſo thoroughly diſpirited the enemy, that on the 31ſt of July, Dr. Roſen thought proper to raiſe the ſiege in the night-time with great confuſion, in their retreat burning and plundering all that lay before them for ſeveral miles. They loſt 9000 men before the place, and the beſieged 3000, moſtly by famine and ſickneſs. The enemy, beſides men, loſt 100 of their beſt officers, French and Iriſh. Upon their retreat they firſt encamped at Strabane, but hearing of the defeat of their forces under General Macarty by the Inniſkilling men, they removed further to the weſt.

Major-General Kirke was received with the general acclamations of the garriſon. The ſame day a council was called, in which it was reſolved that Mr. Walker ſhould be deputed to England to return their Majeſties, in the name of the garriſon, their unfeigned acknowledgments for their ſeaſonable ſuccours of relief; who, upon his arrival at court, was received with that welcome and reward which his eminent ſervices had merited.

LONG ISLAND TAKEN IN 1776. Situated near New York, North America; for an account of which, ſee the following official letter.

Camp at Newtown, Long Iſland,
September 3, 1776.

On the 22d of laſt month, in the morning, the Britiſh, with Colonel Donop's corps of chaſſeurs and Heſſian grenadiers diſembarked near Utrecht, on Long Iſland, without oppoſition, the whole being landed with forty pieces of cannon, in two hours and a half, under the direction of Commodore Hotham; Lieutenant-General Clinton commanding the firſt diviſion of the troops.

The enemy had only ſmall parties on the coaſt, who, upon the approach of the boats, retired to the woody heights, commanding a principal paſs on the road from Flat-buſh, to their works at Brooklyn. Lord Cornwallis was immediately detached to Flat-buſh with the reſerve, two battalions of light infantry, and Colonel Donop's corps, with ſix field pieces, having orders not to riſk an attack upon the paſs if he ſhould find it occupied; which proving to be the caſe, his Lordſhip took poſt in the village, and the army extended from the Ferry at the Narrows, through Utrecht and Graveſend to the village of Flat-land.

On the 25th, Lieutenant-General de Heiſter, with two brigades of Heſſians from Staten Iſland, joined the army, leaving one brigade of his troops, a detachment of the 14th regiment from Virginia, ſome convaleſcents and recruits, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Dalrymple, for the ſecurity of that iſland.

On the 26th, Lieutenant-General de Heiſter took poſt at Flat-Buſh, and in the evening Lord Cornwallis with the Britiſh drew off to Flat-Land. About nine o'clock the ſame night the van of the army, commanded by Lieutenant-General Clinton, conſiſting of the light dragoons and brigade of light infantry, the reſerve under the command of Lord Cornwallis, excepting the 42d regiment, which was poſted to the left of the Heſſians, the firſt brigade, and the 71ſt regiment, with fourteen field pieces, began to move from Flat-land, acroſs the country, through the New Lotts, to ſeize a paſs in the heights, extending from eaſt to weſt along the middle of the iſland, and about three miles from Bedford on the road to Jamaica, in order to turn the enemy's left poſted at Flat-buſh.

General Clinton being arrived within half a mile of the paſs, about two hours before day-break, halted, and ſettled his diſpoſition for the attack; one of his patroles falling in with a patrole of the enemy's officers, took them; and the General learning from their information that the rebels had not occupied the paſs, detached a battalion of light infantry to ſecure it, and advancing with his corps upon the firſt appearance of day, poſſeſſed himſelf of the heights, with ſuch a diſpoſition as muſt have inſured ſucceſs, had he found the enemy in force to oppoſe him.

The main body of the army, conſiſting of the guards, 2d, 3d, and 5th brigades, with ten field pieces, led by Lord Percy, marched ſoon after General Clinton, and halted an hour before day in his rear.

This column (the country not admitting of two columns of march) was followed by the 49th regiment, with four medium twelve-pounders, and the baggage cloſed the rear, with a ſeparate guard.

As ſoon as theſe corps had paſſed the heights they halted, for the ſoldiers to take a little refreſhment, after which the march was continued, and about half an hour paſt eight o'clock, having got to Bedford, in the rear of the enemy's left, the attack was commenced by the light infantry and light dragoons upon large bodies of the rebels, having cannon, who were quitting the woody heights before-mentioned to return to their lines, upon diſcovering the march of the army; inſtead of which they were drove back, and the army ſtill moving on to gain the enemy's rear, the grenadiers and 33d regiment being in front of the column, ſoon approached within muſquet-ſhot of the enemy's lines at Brooklyn, from whence theſe battalions, without regarding the fire of the cannon and ſmall arms upon them, purſued numbers of the rebels that were retiring from the heights, ſo cloſe to their principal redoubt, and with ſuch eagerneſs to attack it by ſtorm, that it required repeated orders to prevail upon them to deſiſt from the attempt. Had they been permitted to go on, it is my opinion they would have carried the redoubt; but as it was apparent the lines muſt have been ours at a very cheap rate, by regular approaches, I would not riſk the loſs that might have been ſuſtained in the aſſault, and ordered them back to a hollow way in the front of the works, out of the reach of the muſquetry.

Lieutenant-General de Heiſter began ſoon after day-break to cannonade the enemy in his front, and upon the approach of our right, ordered Colonel Donop's corps to advance to the attack of the hill, following himſelf at the head of the brigades. The light infantry about that time having been reinforced by the light company, the grenadier company, and two other companies of the guards, who joined them with the greateſt activity and ſpirit, had taken three pieces of cannon, and were warmly engaged with very ſuperior numbers in the woods; when on the Heſſians advancing, the enemy gave way, and was entirely routed in that quarter.

On the left, Major-General Grant, having the 4th and 6th brigades, the 42d regiment, and two companies of New York Provincials, raiſed by Governor Tryon in the ſpring, advanced along the coaſt with ten pieces of cannon, to divert the enemy's attention from their left. About midnight he fell in with their advanced parties, and at day-break with a large corps, having cannon, and advantageouſly poſted, with whom there was ſkirmiſhing and a cannonade for ſome hours, until by the firing at Brooklyn, the rebels ſuſpecting their retreat would be cut off, made a movement to their right, in order to ſecure it acroſs a ſwamp and creek that covered the right of their works; but being met in their way by a part of the 2d grenadiers, who were ſoon after ſupported by the 71ſt regiment, and General Grant's left coming up, they ſuffered conſiderably; numbers of them, however, did get into the moraſs, where many were ſuffocated or drowned.

The force of the enemy detached from the lines where General Putnam commanded, was not leſs, from the beſt accounts I have had, than 10,000 men, who were under the orders of Major-General Sullivan, Brigadier-Generals Lord Stirling and Udell. Their loſs is computed to be about 3300 killed, wounded, priſoners, and drowned; with five field pieces and one howitzer taken. A return of the priſoners is incloſed.

On the part of the King's troops, five officers, and 56 non-commiſſioned officers, and rank and file killed; 12 officers and 245 non-commiſſioned officers, and rank and file, wounded; one officer and 20 grenadiers of the marines taken by miſtaking the enemy for the Heſſians.

The Heſſians had two privates killed, three officers, and 23 rank and file wounded. The wounds are in general very ſlight. Lieutenant-General Monckton is ſhot through the body, but there are the greateſt hopes of his recovery.

The behaviour of both officers and ſoldiers, Britiſh and Heſſians, was highly to their honour. More determined courage and ſteadineſs in troops have never been experienced, or a greater ardour to diſtinguiſh themſelves, as all thoſe who had an opportunity have amply evinced by their actions.

In the evening of the 27th, the army encamped in front of the enemy's works. On the 28th, at night, broke ground 600 yards diſtant from a redoubt upon their left; and on the 29th at night the rebels evacuated their intrenchments, and Redhook, with the utmoſt ſilence, and quitted Governor's Iſland the following evening, leaving their cannon and a quantity of ſtores in all their works. At day-break on the 30th, their flight was diſcovered, the piquets of the line took poſſeſſion; and thoſe moſt advanced reached the ſhore oppoſite to New York as their rear-guard was going over, and fired ſome ſhot among them.

The enemy is ſtill in poſſeſſion of the town and iſland of New York, in force, and making demonſtration of oppoſing us in their works on both ſides of King's-bridge.

The inhabitants of this iſland, many of whom had been forced into rebellion, have all ſubmitted, and are ready to take the oaths of allegiance.

This diſpatch will be delivered to your Lordſhip by Major Cuyler, my firſt aid-du-camp, who I truſt will be able to give your Lordſhip ſuch further information as may be required.

I have the honour to be, &c.

W. Howe.

P. S. I have omitted to take notice, in its proper place, of a movement made by the King's ſhips towards the town, on the 27th at day-break, with a view of drawing off the attention of the enemy from our real deſign, which I believe effectually anſwered the intended purpoſe.

Return of priſoners taken on Long Iſland, Auguſt 1776.

Commiſſioned officers; their three generals: Sullivan, Lord Stirling, and Udell; three colonels, four lieutenant-colonels, three majors, 18 captains, 43 lieutenants, 11 enſigns, one adjutant, three ſurgeons, and two volunteers; privates 1006.

Miſſing.—Lieutenant Ragg, 2d regiment of marines, priſoner; one lieutenant, one ſerjeant, and 29 rank and file.

Heſſian troops.—Two rank and file killed; 23 ditto wounded.—Major Paoli, Captain O'Reilly, Lieutenant Donop, wounded.

W. Howe, Commander in Chief.

LONGWI a town in French Flanders, under the government of Mentz. It is regularly fortified. This fortreſs was taken by a corps of the Auſtrian army under General Clairfait, on the 23d of Auguſt 1792. The taking of this place was happily not attended by thoſe calamities too frequently inſeparable from conqueſt; and the beſiegers had only a few of their workmen wounded.

The Count de Clairfait, it ſeems, eſtabliſhed his batteries on the 21ſt, which on the following nights the garriſon attempted to diſmount by a vigorous fire upon them, but without effect, owing to a want of ſkill in their cannoniers. On the morning of the 22d the beſieging batteries opened on the place, and ſeveral bombs were thrown into it, which ſet it on fire in various parts; theſe fires were as repeatedly extinguiſhed; the fire of the beſieged began again the next night, but with as little effect, though it was ſmartly returned. In this interval the General ſent a trumpet to ſummon the French Commandant, threatening on his refuſal, to blow up a part of the place the neareſt to him: the beſieged demanded a capitulation.

The conditions were, that the garriſon from 12 to 1500 ſtrong, ſhould march out with all the honours of war, and ground their arms under the glacis of the fortreſs, with the liberty of retiring into the interior part of the kingdom, after ſigning an engagement not to ſerve any more during the war.

It ſurrendered to the French, October 22, following.

May 8, 1793.—An action took place near Longwi, between the French and the Imperial light-horſe, ſupported by the Eſclavonian troops. The French were defeated, and driven into Longwi. On this occaſion, an Eſclavonian ſoldier cut off, with one blow of his ſabre, an arm of one of the French officers.

LOPEZ, (CAPE), ENGAGEMENT OFF, IN 1720. Situated on the coaſt of Africa. The trade to the Weſt-Indies having being greatly annoyed by pirates, who, encouraged by the Spaniards, and the want of a force in the American ſeas to curb their inſolence, not only interrupted our navigation, but frequently ſpoiled the coaſts of our colonies; the merchants, by their repeated repreſentations, prevailed with the government to ſend orders to the officers of the navy, cruizing on the coaſt of Guinea and in the Weſt Indies, to exert themſelves with the utmoſt diligence, in cruſhing theſe enemies to mankind. There was amongſt theſe pirates on the coaſt of Africa, one Roberts, a man whoſe parts deſerved a better employment; he was an able ſeaman and a good commander, and had with him two very ſtout ſhips, one commanded by himſelf of 40 guns, and 152 men; the other of 32 guns, and 132 men; and to complete his ſquadron, he ſoon added a third of 24 guns, and 90 men. With this force Roberts had done a great deal of miſchief in the Weſt Indies before he ſailed for Africa, where he likewiſe took abundance of prizes, till in the month of April, 1722, he was taken by the then Captain, afterwards Sir Chaloner Ogle.

Captain Ogle was then in the Swallow, and was cruizing off Cape Lopez, when he had intelligence of Roberts being not far from him, of whom he went immediately in ſearch; and ſoon after diſcovered the pirates in a very convenient bay, where the biggeſt and the leaſt ſhip were upon the heel, ſcrubbing. Captain Ogle taking in his lower tier of guns, and lying at a diſtance, Roberts took him for a merchantman, and immediately ordered his conſort Skyrm to ſlip his cable and run out after him. Captain Ogle crowded all the ſail he could to decoy the pirate to ſuch a diſtance that his conſorts might not hear the guns, and then ſuddenly tacked, run out his lower tier, and gave the pirate a broadſide, by which their captain was killed; which ſo diſcouraged his crew, that after a briſk engagement, which laſted about an hour and a half, they ſurrendered. Captain Ogle returned then to the Bay, hoiſting the King's colours under the pirate's black flag with a death's head in it. This prudent ſtratagem had the deſired effect, for the pirates ſeeing the black flag uppermoſt, concluded the King's ſhip had been taken, and came out full of joy to congratulate their conſort on the victory. This joy of theirs was, however, of no long continuance, for Captain Ogle gave them a very warm reception; and though Roberts fought with the utmoſt bravery for near two hours, yet being at laſt killed, the courage of his men immediately ſunk, and both ſhips yielded. Captain Ogle carried theſe three prizes, with about 160 men that were taken in them, to Cape-Coaſt caſtle, where they were inſtantly brought to their trials. Seventy-four were capitally convicted of whom fifty-two were executed, and moſt of them hung in chains in ſeveral places; which ſtruck a terror in that part of the world, as the taking ſeveral pirates in the Weſt Indies towards the latter end of the year, did in thoſe ſeas. But theſe ſucceſſes were far from putting an end to the miſchief; ſo that it was found neceſſary ſoon after to ſend ſeveral ſhips of war to the northern Colonies and Jamaica, where by degrees they extirpated entirely this dangerous crew of robbers.

LOUVAIN, SIEGE OF. A ſtrong city of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in the province of Brabant, on the river Deule, fifteen miles from Bruſſels. This city was at the time of this ſiege in 1634, in the hands of the Spaniards. The French and Dutch having entered into an offenſive league againſt Spain, were determined to deprive the Cardinal Infant of the Spaniſh Netherlands, of which he was then governor. After the defeat of the Spaniards in the battle at Avein, thoſe confederate powers drove all before them. The Cardinal Infant had intrenched himſelf along the Demer, but on the approach of ſo numerous an army, retreated with precipitation to Louvain. The Confederate army having divided themſelves into two diviſions, the Prince of Orange advanced towards Bruſſels, while the French took the route of Louvain, but they rejoined on the 10th of May; and at this time it was owing to the debates and jealouſies of the Prince of Orange and the French marechals about precedency and command, that they loſt the faireſt opportunity of extending their conqueſts in the Spaniſh Netherlands, before the Spaniards could recover themſelves after the late defeats; for while they waſted ten days in fruitleſs conferences, the Cardinal Infant had time to throw himſelf into Louvain with 5000 foot, and 2000 horſe. But the French marching to Villeverdin, making a feint as if they intended to beſiege Bruſſels, the Cardinal Infant returned with his forces thither, leaving only 2000 men, under the Baron de Grobbendonk, for the defence of Louvain. After the retreat of the Cardinal Infant, the French and Dutch armies ſat down before the town on the 25th of June, expecting to be maſters of it in eight days; but the Governor had previouſly taken all neceſſary precautions, by ſetting ſome of the avenues under water, and fortifying the reſt by new outworks; his veteran troops in the ſeveral attacks, ſuſtained them with ſuch bravery and ſpirit, that it proved a greater difficulty than at firſt conceived to carry the works. Here too the intrigues of the Prince of Orange defeated the purpoſes of the ſiege; he could not bear the French marechals, and, reſolving to plague them, impeded their operations by throwing perpetual obſtacles in the way of every motion, while his own movements were entirely ſlow and remiſs. Theſe quarrels joined to the intelligence they had received of the approach of Picolimini, at the head of 27,000 Germans, cauſed them to raiſe the ſiege on the 4th of July.

LOUISBURG, SIEGE OF. The capital of the iſland of Cape Breton in North America. The poſſeſſion of Cape Breton, of which this is the metropolis, commands the navigation to Canada by the river St. Lawrence. At the commencement of the war, 1745, the Britiſh colonies in North America, began to be ſenſible of the utility of Cape Breton; for in a few months the inhabitants of this iſland infeſted the coaſts of the Britiſh ſettlement, ruining their fiſhery, interrupting their navigation, deſtroying Canſo, invading Annapolis, reducing the bordering colonies to many extremities, and carrying the natives priſoners to a place reported impregnable, being a ſafe aſylum for the Weſt and Eaſt India fleets, and their men of war and privateers. Theſe hoſtilities of the French were the cauſe which rouzed the Britiſh colonies to a true ſenſe of their danger and inſecurity, which they looked upon to be every day more and more fatal, while the French poſſeſſed this iſland, the richeſt gem in their American treaſures, and which had already coſt them nine millions of livres in eſtabliſhing. Senſible of what importance this place muſt be to England, Mr. Auchmuty, a native of Scotland, and judge-advocate of the court of admiralty in New England, candidly ſtated it to ſeveral of his friends, at whoſe deſire he reduced the ſeveral branches, of its conſequence into a regular plan; at the ſame time framing a ſcheme for the reduction of it, which by the means of William Vaughan, Eſq. a gentleman of great property in the colony, was communicated, and warmly recommended to William Shirley, Eſq. Governor of the Maſſachuſet colony, who laid it before the general aſſembly, then met at Boſton. The difficulties at firſt ſeemed ſo numerous, and the undertaking of ſo arduous a nature, that it was deemed impracticable without parliamentary aid, where the very debates on it muſt have tranſpired to the French, and put them on their guard; but Mr. Auchmuty, the original projector of the plan, ſecretly ſounded the thoughts of the principal inhabitants, and finding them willing and able to concur in the meaſures he propoſed, they examined ſeveral priſoners returned from confinement in that iſland, by whom they were informed of the facility of the enterprize, by a ſecret and early ſurpriſal. The ſtoreſhips from France had been newly driven off to Martinico, a fatal ſtroke of diſtreſs to Cape Breton at this juncture, as it was a happy incident in our favour. A redundancy of proviſions at the time enabled us to ſupply the intended armament with every thing neceſſary, ſo that the final reſolution was taken on the 25th of January, though it was then carried by the majority of one ſingle voice, to attack Louiſburg.

In conſequence of this, Commodore Warren was ordered by the government to repair immediately with three men of war from Antigua to Boſton, and contribute to the ſucceſs of the expedition, while the government of Boſton granted 27,000 pounds ſterling towards this undertaking, to be raiſed by way of lottery for their ſervice. While Mr. Warren commanded the naval department, there wanted a perſon of military capacity to carry on the land operations, and to ſuperintend the troops on diſembarking; Mr. Pepperel of Piſcataway, a gentleman of uncommon influence, and large fortune, was by the unanimous voice appointed to this command, to whoſe ſtandard numbers, from their great attachment to his perſon, flocked in a ſurpriſing degree.

It is generally believed that no perſon in Europe knew of theſe ſecret proceedings but his Britannic Majeſty, to whom in duty the Governor, Shirley, had communicated the deſign; the ſecreſy in councils, the extraordinary management, and great diſpatch in providing the levies and preparations both for the army and navy, were carried on with ſuch harmony, that the troops were aſſembled, and the fleet ready to ſail, before the reſt of the world had the leaſt intelligence of the apparatus. The inhabitants of the ſeveral colonies of New England, conſiſting of thoſe of the Maſſachuſet's Bay, New Hampſhire, Connecticut, and Rhode Iſland, ſo cheerfully concurred in ſeaſonably expediting the proſecution of the enterprize, that an army of 3850 volunteers, principally men of property or beneficial buſineſſes, were aſſembled at Boſton, with eighty-five tranſports, and eight privateers of twenty guns, and 100 men each, beſides ten ſnows, brigantines, and ſloops of force, for their convoy to Canſo in Nova Scotia, where they were to wait the arrival of Commodore Warren. This brave but undiſciplined band embarked from Boſton on the 20th of March for Canſo. "Pray for us while we fight for you," was the valiant, endearing, and laſt expreſſion, wherewith they comforted their parting countrymen, at their departure from their families, fortunes, and occupations. Mr. Pepperel's great intereſt among the country people both Indians and Meſtizos, to whom he truſted whatever goods they wanted, and who returned that confidence by exact and honeſt payments, greatly conduced to the ſucceſs of the expedition, for hundreds accompanied him as their father and protector, whom they had more in contemplation than any concern for the conqueſt of Louiſburg. How eaſy a taſk to procure love and reſpect! how difficult to create enemies, and contract the odium of our countrymen! Mr. Pepperel, who was not ignorant of his intereſt, and who ſaw all the height of the Governor's propoſals, yet modeſtly declined that honour, as being deficient in thoſe branches of military knowledge, which he knew were requiſite in ſo important a poſt; but was prevailed on at length by the repeated ſolicitations of his friends.

On the 2d of April, the fleet arrived at Canſo, a port town of Nova Scotia, near a narrow ſtrait which ſeparates that colony from Cape Breton, and about 167 leagues from Boſton. In three weeks, Commodore Warren appeared with the Superb of 60 guns, and the Launceſton and Eltham of 40 each; he was ſoon joined by the Mermaid of 40 guns, and was to be reinforced by others deſtined to join him there. Gabaron Bay was appointed for making the deſcent, which was within four miles of the rampart of Louiſburg; and there it was that the French firſt ſaw our armaments, the ſurpriſe of which prevented them from getting in the proviſions neceſſary for ſuſtaining the ſiege. The garriſon of Louiſburg, with all its forts, conſiſted only of 1200 French and Swiſs regulars, and 800 militia, formed of thoſe inhabitants who were able to bear arms. The Governor of Canada, without any knowledge of this expedition, but ſenſible of the diſcontents and diviſions which reigned in the town, and of the poſſibility of its being one time or other attacked by the Engliſh, had ſome time before offered the Governor of Louiſburg a reinforcement, which, from motives not to be juſtified, and for which he was afterwards called to an account, he declined. But now he ſaw himſelf ſurrounded by the enemy, all the ways for applying for ſuccour blocked up, and cut off from every communication of reſource. Thus he became beſieged in form, with forces unequal to the defence of the place, nay, without any probability of receiving a reinforcement from either Canada or Europe. This was the firſt, and not the leaſt error, to which his diſgrace for the loſs of the place was owing, as with the ſuccours offered him he would have been more than ſufficiently enabled to ſally out, and drive before him a body of undiſciplined troops, no way equal to the reduction of the place. The deſign of ſurpriſing it thus took place, and the Engliſh puſhed the enterprize with the greateſt diſpatch and vigour, in order to be beforehand with the annual ſupply from France, which, according to their plan, fell into their hands; and thus doubly profited the expedition, as at the ſame time it aſſiſted their meaſures, and broke thoſe of the enemy. A man of war and a frigate had previouſly been fitted out at Breſt, for carrying ſuccours to this place, laden with all kinds of military ſtores, and ready to put to ſea, when the man of war unfortunately took fire, and burnt to the water edge. The Vigilante was the only ſhip, juſt on the point of being launched, that could ſupply the loſs. This delay alſo co-operated with the expedition with which the Engliſh carried on the enterprize.

prize. When the Vigilante, therefore, arrived near this coaſt, it appeared extremely dangerous on account of a thick fog, to make a near approach to the iſland, ſo that the Marquis de la Maiſon Forte, the Commander, tacked till the weather ſhould clear up. About the latter end of May, he diſcovered near him a frigate of forty guns, which, as had been concerted, feigned to fly; the Marquis chaſed, and thus was decoyed into the middle of Commodore Warren's ſquadron; ſhe was ſo deeply laden with military ſtores that her lower tier became uſeleſs, and ſhe was after a vigorous defence taken, another previous and fortunate incident in our favour; for about the time of taking the Vigilante, the troops were nearly diſguſted at the enterprize, which they began to look upon as romantic; and, as it is ſaid, a reſolution was entered into of abandoning the ſiege, if the place was not taken in a fortnight at fartheſt.

The debarkation of the troops was immediately put in agitation, though no ſooner were the whale boats got out for their landing, than Captain Morepang came from the city with a detachment of 100 men, to prevent the attempt. The Engliſh privateers which lay at anchor, covered the landing with their fire, while 200 of the forces having got on ſhore, defeated the detachment, with the loſs of ſix men killed on the enemy's ſide, five taken priſoners, and the reſt diſperſed among the woods, being cut off from returning to the city. Being thus diſpoſed, ſo as at once to poſſeſs the ſhore all the way to Louiſburg, and to purſue the enemy, they found in ſeveral places by them abandoned ſeveral arms, a good quantity of ammunition and proviſions, which being ſecured, they marched directly up to the ramparts, through a very boggy country, full of rocks, hills, and thickets, ſo as to incloſe the town, while Commodore Warren, with the men of war and cruizers, poſted himſelf off the harbour, ſo as to intercept all reinforcements and ſupplies by ſea. They next formed two ſeparate camps, the one on the ſouthern part of the harbour, to make their approaches to the town; the other to attack the grand battery. The Britiſh ſcouts in the beginning of May, reconnoitred the adjacent country to the grand battery, and the ſame night ſet fire to the ſtorehouſes, which were full of combuſtible matter, burning in ſo dreadful a manner, as made the French imagine that the whole force of the Engliſh was entering the fort. At the ſame time another party threatened the royal battery, which was commanded by a very inexperienced officer; the garriſon was weak, without guns to the landward, the part only from whence the enemy which faced it could be annoyed. The Commandant of the fort went over to view it, and gave directions that in caſe the enemy approached on that ſide, they ſhould remove the guns which pointed ſeaward, and uſe them to the beſt advantage; and in caſe they were forced to capitulate, or the royal battery fall into the hands of the Engliſh, who would then turn the cannon againſt the fort, they ſhould immediately paſs over to the fort, firſt nailing up the cannon; but the imprudent officer availed himſelf of theſe inſtructions, for without trying his cannon on the Engliſh, who lay quiet in their camp, he embarked his men that very night, and made over to the fort in confuſion, pretending that the enemy had made an aſſault on the battery with a large force, which was abſolutely falſe, the French flag flying ſome time after, which was an evident ſign there was no perſon in it to lower it. The Engliſh obſerving from the camp that no perſon appeared on the parapet of the royal battery, concluded that the garriſon was employed in ſome ſecret attempt, and therefore in prudence made no further approaches, till believing at length that it was really abandoned, a Boſton Indian, without any arms, went in a rambling manner, as if diſordered in his ſenſes, towards the gate, by which he entered the fort, cleared up the doubt, and lowered the French colours, which till then had been flying. On this ſignal the Engliſh entered it, and the artillery having been very badly nailed up in the hurry of retreat, was pointed againſt the town, which it battered in flank with great effect, beating down the roofs of ſeveral houſes, the chimnies and embrazures of the other batteries. The other part of the Britiſh forces on the other ſide of the harbour, drew up a large train of artillery to an eminence called the Green Hill, about three quarters of a mile from the city, from whence they briſkly cannonaded it.

On the 12th of May they had erected a faſcine battery of twenty-eight guns within 200 yards of the walls, and broke down part of the circular battery with their ſhot. As the principal effort was to be made from this battery, not yet completely mounted, Colonel Pepperel ordered ſeveral guns, forty-two pounders, to be brought from the grand to the faſcine battery, though two miles diſtance, over hills and vallies, rocks and moraſſes, the men being up to the middle in mire. The ſucceſs was equal to the fatigue; for they ſoon diſmounted their cannon, and deſtroyed their houſes, walls, and flankers.

On the 23d of May the iſland battery, which incommoded both the men of war, and alſo the grand battery, began to be the object of attention; and about twelve o'clock the whale-boats, with paddles, ladders, and other neceſſaries for the attempt were all ready; 500 men of the land forces and marines, embarked from on board the men of war, with a view of reducing that battery; but the fog ariſing, gave the French time to reinforce the battery with 320 men, which before conſiſted only of fourteen. On the 27th, 300 men attacked the iſland battery, and began to ſcale the walls; but being diſcovered, this deſign was defeated, with the loſs of 36 men killed, and 118 priſoners, being thoſe who had landed; ſome boats were alſo ſunk by the French cannon from the battery in this hardy attempt. This, far from intimidating the bravery of our troops, ſpirited them up to revenge the death and impriſonment of their fellow-ſoldiers, which they began with erecting a new battery on the 1ſt of June, at the light-houſe, and dragged up ſome of the heavieſt cannon and mortars on the cliff, which overlooked and commanded the iſland battery. The French were amazed to ſee a work of ſuch labour executed in one night, juſtly apprehenſive of its great ſucceſs, as one flanker faced the ſea, and the other the battery, commanding at once that and all the ſhips entering or going out of the harbour. It was in the greateſt greateſt exigence and want of powder, that 600 barrels of gunpowder arrived from Boſton, with ſtores for the forces: intelligence was alſo brought from thence, that 1000 men were raiſed in New England to reinforce the troops; and that the French fleet deſtined for the relief of Cape Breton was blocked up at Breſt by the Britiſh ſquadron; a piece of information which greatly added to the ſucceſs of the operations of the ſiege; ſeveral ſhips meanwhile fell into the Commodore's hands, who little expected ſo unwelcome a reception in a port which they had thought their own. We were alſo informed by deſerters, that the Governor on the intercepting ſo many ſhips, ſome deſtined for his relief, and having only 100 barrels of gunpowder in the whole iſland, had begun to deſpair of keeping the town, which cauſed the beſiegers to redouble their fires againſt the city and the iſland battery, erecting another faſcine battery of five guns, forty-two pounders, about a mile weſtward to the grand battery, and fronting the circular battery; therefore on the 14th of June all things were preparing for a general aſſault by land and ſea, when the French finding themſelves diſtreſſed to a great degree in the iſland battery, by our ſhot and bombs from the light-houſe battery, ſent a flag of truce on the 15th from the city, about four o'clock in the afternoon, to the Britiſh camp, with offers to deliver up the city; upon which a council of war was called, and all the batteries commanded to ceaſe firing. The flag of truce being ordered to attend the next morning, was punctual, and received the terms of capitulation, written by Commodore Warren and Colonel Pepperel, which were agreed to by M. Chambon, the Governor of Louiſburg, whereby the French were permitted to enjoy all their perſonal effects, and to be tranſported to France at the expence of the beſiegers.

The French flag was ſtruck on the 17th, and the Britiſh hoiſted in its place at the iſland battery, of which the beſiegers took poſſeſſion early in the morning. At two o'clock Commodore Warren with all the men of war, privateers, ſtoreſhips, and tranſports entered the harbour; and at four the Britiſh forces marched to the ſouth gate of the city, which they entered, and proceeded to the parade near the citadel, the guard and watch of the city, the garriſon's magazines, and other places were delivered up.

On the 4th of July, the garriſon and a great number of the inhabitants embarked on board fourteen cartel ſhips, convoyed by the Launceſton man of war, who convoyed them to Rochfort, where the clemency of Commodore Warren, and General Pepperel ſhewn to thoſe priſoners, was but ill requited by Commodore M'Namara, the Commander of the French ſquadron in that port, who treated the Britiſh captain and ſailors with an unexpected ſeverity, and even denied them the liberty of going on ſhore for freſh proviſions, ordering the centinels to ſhoot every Engliſhman who attempted to land; though it muſt be obſerved, that this rigour was not the effect of any reſentment occaſioned by the loſs of Louiſburg and Cape Breton, but owing to the detention of Marechal Belleiſle, at that time a priſoner of war in England.

This was a continued ſiege of forty-ſeven days, almoſt ſeven weeks, from the 1ſt of May to the 15th of June, the day of ſending the flag of truce. Few hiſtories can furniſh inſtances of a braver, more reſolute, and well-conducted attempt; let it be recorded to the immortal honour of this brave band of undiſciplined ſoldiers, that a French officer of diſtinction reported, that it was thought by the Governor and the citizens, as well officers as ſoldiers civil and military, impracticable for leſs than 30,000 men to ſubdue ſo ſtrong and well fortified a city. And let poſterity be alſo informed, that no leſs a ſoldier, no leſs a politician than Marechal Belleiſle was heard to ſay, that the whole plan was too well concerted, too ſecretly conducted, and too vigorouſly executed, to be the ſcheme of a Britiſh miniſtry, who had they been the projectors of ſo noble an enterprize, it would have been early known, ſoon tranſpired, and from thence cautiouſly guarded againſt, and ſo defeated by the French miniſtry.

The beſiegers, from the inveſtiture to the ſurrender of the city, fired 9000 ſhot, and 600 bombs, which deſtroyed the principal part of the city, demoliſhed the citadel and hoſpital, and killed 240 men, though the beſiegers had not in the whole more than 100 killed, and 100 by ſickneſs. This memorable exertion of the ſpirit of the Britiſh colonies, diffuſed a general joy through all the American ſettlements, and was celebrated with every public demonſtration of rejoicing over every part of the Britiſh nation; it ſeemed a compenſation for our loſs at Fontenoy; congratulations from every quarter were ſent to his Britannic Majeſty, and the government engaged to reimburſe the expences of the expedition. General Pepperel was made a baronet, and Commodore Warren raiſed to be admiral of the blue. Neither the framer of the plan, the conductors of the operation, or the ſoldiery, were of the Engliſh nation; Mr. Auchmuty was a North Briton, Admiral Warren an Hibernian, and Sir William Pepperel of Piſcataway, of New Hampſhire in New England, ſeventy miles north from Cape Breton. A train of artillery, and ſeveral engineers were ſent from Woolwich, with all convenient expedition, for the better ſecurity of this important conqueſt: two American regiments were raiſed and put in garriſon at Louiſburg, the one commanded by Colonel Shirley, and the other by Sir William Pepperel.

In the ſeſſions at the cloſe of the year 1747, the Britiſh parliament thought proper to reimburſe the people of New England for their expences in the expedition. The following draught ſhews at one view the ſeveral coſts of each colony.

The terms granted by the Engliſh to the beſieged were the more honourable, as there was certain intelligence ligence of a large reinforcement expected to relieve the place, which, notwithſtanding, the enemy was too much diſtreſſed to wait for; the New England men were alſo willing to put an advantageous period to a ſtate of life, which had drawn them from their domeſtic concerns, and like Cincinnatus, the Roman, were willing to return from the field of war to the field of agriculture, as this kind of warfare was no way ſuitable to their diſpoſitions. The officers of the beſieged were not ignorant, that the moſt favourable occaſion of repelling the enemy was to fall on them when they were beginning their works, in forming their approaches; yet ſuch was the miſtruſt they entertained from the late mutinies of the regular troops, that though theſe made an offer to make a ſally, it was judged not adviſeable for fear of a general deſertion, in revenge for the oppreſſion and ſeverities which they met with from their commanders.

Thus, from a combination of contrary events, croſſes, and a weak garriſon, the Engliſh made an acquiſition of new dominions, while the colony of Boſton acquired an increaſe of territory, proſperous as it was before, throughout its large inland extenſions, which wanted only this iſland to command the whole coaſt.

The garriſon conſiſted of 1200 regulars, French and Swiſs, and about 800 militia, with ſome Indians and ſavages, which was by no means a force ſufficient to make a brave and long defence, but was a plain proof of the opinion which the French miniſtry entertained of the ſupineneſs and indolence of the Britiſh.

The poſſeſſion of Cape Breton in the reduction of Louiſburg, was doubtleſs a valuable acquiſition to Great Britain. It not only diſtreſſed the French in their fiſhery and navigation, but removed all fears of encroachments and rivalſhip from the breaſts of the Engliſh fiſhermen on the banks of Newfoundland. It freed New England from the terrors of a dangerous neighbour and invader, over-awed the Indians of that country, and ſecured the poſſeſſion of Acadia to the crown of Great Britain. By this fiſhery Great Britain received the annual return of two millions ſterling, for the manufactures yearly ſhipped to the plantations; many thouſands found employment from it, who were otherwiſe unſerviceable to the public, and therefore a burden; it increaſed the ſhipping and mariners, extended navigation, cut off all communication between France and Canada by the river St. Lawrence, ſo that Quebec would neceſſarily fall (as it afterwards proved) into the hands of the Engliſh, who then might expel the French entirely from America, open a correſpondence with the Canada Indians behind Montreal, and thus become maſters of the fur trade, ſo long ingroſſed by the enemy. Great Britain had done well to conſider the importance of this acquiſition, as the northern colonies could one day become the aſylum of Britiſh liberty, when the nation (it is not impoſſible) ſhall be enſlaved by domeſtic deſpotiſm or foreign dominion; when her ſubſtance is waſted, her ſpirit broke, and the laws and conſtitution of Britain are no more; then theſe colonies, long ſince ſent off by our fathers, may receive and entertain their ſons as helpleſs exiles and ruined refugees. More eſpecially ſhould the Britiſh Colonies reclaim the attention of their mother country, when our trade at home is viſibly decaying; the French have underſold our cloths, and ſpoiled our trade in the Levant; Spain is no longer ſupplied as uſual with Engliſh commodities. The exports to Germany were conſiderably diminiſhed by our miſunderſtanding with the Emperor and the Houſe of Auſtria, conſequently her chiefeſt reſources for riches, (then loaden as ſhe was with 100 millions of debt) could be in her communication with her own colonies, which conſumed her manufactures, and made immenſe returns in rum, ſugar, tobacco, fiſh, timber, naval ſtores, irons, furs, drugs, rice, and indigo, while the ſouthern plantations produced ſilk, and with care might furniſh every thing that can be expected from the moſt fertile ſoil, and the happieſt climate.

Who that is thoroughly ſenſible of the importance of this conqueſt will believe, that after three years poſſeſſion, the captors reſtored it; during which time they razed many of the old fortifications, and erected new ones in their ſtead, and in every place repaired ſuch as were damaged, to obtain the repoſſeſſion of Madras in the Eaſt-Indies, which the enemy had almoſt totally deſtroyed, and which belonged to a private monopolizing company, whoſe exiſtence has ever been deemed prejudicial to the commonwealth, yet this was actually done, and the very men who ſigned the articles took on themſelves the title of friends to their country!

LOUISBURG, ENGAGEMENT OFF, IN 1756. Commodore Holmes, in the Grafton, with the Nottingham, Hornet, and Jamaica ſloops, engaged two French ſhips of the line and four frigates off this place; for the particulars of which ſee the following accounts.

The French account of this engagement ſays, That M. Beauſier, Commander of the ſquadron, which ſailed in April with land forces for Canada, in his return with the Heros, the Illuſtre, and the Le Corne and Syrene frigates to Louiſburg, diſcovered on the 26th of July, about three leagues ſouth of that port, two Engliſh ſhips and two frigates, who kept their wind as much as they could in order to come up with them. Beauſier taking advantage of a gale which ſprung up from the north, bore down upon the Engliſh, who haſtily tacked in order to ſtand off. But the nature of his orders obliging him to land proviſions at Louiſburg, and fearing that a purſuit would carry him to leeward of the port, he was obliged to quit the chaſe and to enter the harbour. He landed the proviſions and his ſick men with the utmoſt expedition; and next morning by five o'clock, he got under ſail in queſt of the Engliſh cruizers; and about noon he deſcried the two ſhips he had given chaſe to the day before, which now had but one frigate in company. He crowded all the ſail he could to get up with them; and they did the ſame to get off. Captain Breugnon of the Syrene ſoon came up with the Engliſh frigate, and attacked her ſo briſkly, that ſhe fell back under the cannon of the men of war, and was ſheltered from the Syrene which durſt not follow. However this attack gave Beauſier time to come up with the two Engliſh ſhips, one of ſeventy-four and the other of 64 guns. He immediately engaged one of them, expecting that the Illuſtre, which was upon his quarter, would attack the other: but a calm coming on in that inſtant hindered the latter from getting up; ſo that Beauſier had both the Engliſh ſhips upon him, and the engagement continued very warm till ſeven o'clock at night; when a gale of wind ſpringing up, enabled the Illuſtre to make ſail, and the Engliſh took advantage of it to ſheer off, leaving the Heros ſo diſabled in her rigging and ſails, and injured in her hull and maſts, which had received upwards of 200 ſhot, beſides thoſe between wind and water, that ſhe could not purſue them. It further ſays, that he ſpent the night in repairing his damages, in hopes of another bruſh with the enemy; but next morning, the 28th, he found them at ſuch a diſtance, as gave him no hopes of getting up to them, and therefore returned to Louiſburg, with the loſs of eighteen men killed and forty-eight wounded.

Commodore Holmes on board the Grafton, off Louiſburg, in a letter to the admiralty, informing their Lordſhips of this ſame action, ſaid, that having diſcovered the above ſhips from the maſt-head to the N. E. directly to windward, the Grafton, the Nottingham, Hornet, and Jamaica ſloops gave chaſe, and made their firſt board to the ſouth, they ſteering directly for us till within two leagues; that the Engliſh ſhips then tacked, not to ſtand off, but in hopes to cut the French off from their port; and that they hauled in for it. That his ſhips purſued them and brought to, about a league from the harbour, where they were come to an anchor, about half an hour paſt one at noon. That at four o'clock he made ſail to the eaſtward, and at dark diſpatched the Hornet to Hallifax for ſome of Captain Spry's ſhips to come and join him, and then ſtood on as before till three o'clock, when he tacked and ſtood in for the land. That ſeeing four French men of war come out of the harbour and in chaſe of his ſhips, about eight in the morning, he ſtood from them to the ſouth-eaſt, about a point from the wind, not to get off, but to draw them from the harbour, judging from the expedition with which they were returned, that they were full of men and above his match. That when a frigate of thirty-ſix guns fired upon the Jamaica ſloop, ſhe returned the fire, and rowed at the ſame time up to the Nottingham. That on the men of war firing at the frigate, ſhe hauled her wind, and the Jamaica bore away to the ſouth-weſt. That about two o'clock the Nottingham fired her ſtern chaſe at the French commandant, which he returned with his bow, and ſoon after the Grafton fired her ſtern chaſe alſo. That finding the ſhot reached each other, the Grafton hauled up her courſes, bunted her main-ſail, and bore down upon the French Commodore, being about a quarter of a mile from him. That it fell calm at the beginning of the engagement, he being on the Grafton's ſtarboard ſide, the other large French ſhip aſtern of him, and the Nottingham on the Grafton's larboard bow, the two frigates a mile off, and the Jamaica ſloop ſomewhat more. That the French Commodore finding his error in permitting his frigates to ſheer off ſo far, made ſignals for them to rejoin him as ſoon as the wind ſprung up; and leſt they ſhould not come faſt enough to his aſſiſtance, he bore down to them, and was followed by his partner. That at ſeven o'clock the French ſquadron was all cloſe together, and at duſk the action ceaſed, they (not the Engliſh) ſheering off to the ſouthward, and the Engliſh ſquadron ſtanding to the S. S. E. That our men lay at their quarters all night, expecting to renew the action in the morning, but were diſappointed by the French ſhips bearing away N. W. by W. diſtance about five miles by day-light, and going away with little wind at E. S. E. right before it for the harbour of Louiſburg. That our ſhips wore and ſtood to the weſt; but that theirs never offered to look at ours. That they ſailing better than our ſhips, and the wind freſhening, and the weather alſo growing hazy, were out of ſight about noon: that their chief fire was at the maſts and rigging, which they wounded and cut pretty much; and that the Grafton had ſix men killed and twenty-one wounded.

LOUISBURG, EXPEDITION AGAINST, IN 1757. The experience of our fruitleſs campaigns in 1755 and 1756, had convinced our miniſtry, as well as our commanders in chief, that there would be no end of a war, whoſe operations aimed no farther than traverſing from place to place, either for the defence, or attack of a few ſtraggling forts in a woody country. A more unpromiſing method of making war than in depopulated Spain, (ſince her Indian acquiſition) where, as the Earl of Peterborough obſerved, a general might march to eternity, with a large army at his heels, and never meet any thing to conquer. A more deciſive blow was therefore meditated for the campaign of 1757, and the reduction of Cape Breton (ceded to the French by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle) was propoſed, as the firſt ſtep to promote either a glorious peace, or the entire conqueſt of Canada.

The Earl of Loudon, who propoſed this ſcheme to the miniſtry at the fall of 1756, with an eſtimate of the requiſite force and expence, was informed early that his ſcheme was approved of, and that he ſhould be ſupplied with the ſuccours neceſſary in the beginning of the ſpring. However, little more was effectually done than conſultation, till Sir Charles Hardy, governor of New York, towards the latter end of April, iſſued warrants for a hot preſs, in which 400 ſeamen were procured for the ſervice; but Sir Charles being well aſſured there were five French ſhips of the line deſtined for Louiſburg, and not being able to engage them, lay quiet till the 9th of July. Admiral Holbourne appeared at laſt, after an unaccountable delay of nine months, the time waſted ſince the plan was approved of. The naval force conſiſted then of 17 ſhips of the line, with 14 frigates and fireſhips, and 179 tranſports, 27 victuallers, two hoſpital ſhips, and 11,000 effective men. Strong as this armament was, councils of war ſtill delayed the execution till the 30th of Auguſt, when it was thought too late in the ſeaſon to go on with the expedition; meanwhile Admiral Holbourne cruized off Louiſburg, expecting the the French fleet to come out, when a ſtorm ſcattered his own, and put an end to an expenſive and fruitleſs expedition.

LOUISBURG TAKEN IN 1758. The Honourable Edward Boſcawen, Admiral of his Majeſty's blue ſquadron, ſailed the 19th of February from England, as Commander in Chief of all his Majeſty's ſhips and veſſels employed and to be employed in North America, and had under him Sir Charles Hardy, Knight, Rear-Admiral of the White; and Philip Durell, Eſq. Commodore; the fleet conſiſted of, Frigates, &c.—Juno, Diana, Boreas, Trent, Grammont, Shannon, Hind, Port-Mahon, Nightingale, Kennington, Squirrel, Beaver, Hunter, Scarborough, Hawke, Ætna, Lightning, and Tyloe armed ſhip.

And the army conſiſted of 11,936 men, officers included, together with 324 men of the train; under the command of Major-General Jeffery Amherſt, Commander in Chief of his Majeſty's forces to be employed in the iſland of Cape Breton, &c. Brigadier-General Edward Whitmore, Brigadier-General Charles Laurence, Brigadier-General James Wolfe, Colonel Baſtide, chief engineer, Colonel George Williamſon, commander of the train of artillery.

The armament arrived ſafe without any material accident in the harbour of Hallifax, the capital of Nova Scotia, on the 9th day of May. The Admiral immediately prepared for action; being joined by all his forces and ſhips; and they well provided with water and ſtores of all ſorts, and the ſick men recovered fit for ſervice, he proceeded with 157 ſail, tranſports included, from Hallifax, and ſteered to the ſeat of action.

Gabarus Bay, about ſeven miles weſt of Louiſburg, was the place deſigned for the landing of the army; where the fleet with about a third of the troops came to anchor, about five o'clock in the afternoon of the 2d of June; and at ſix the Admiral made a ſignal for all barges and pinnaces, manned and armed, to attend the General and the Brigadier-Generals Laurence and Wolfe, who went that ſame evening to reconnoitre the ſhore as near as poſſible, and made a diſpoſition for landing in three places next morning, in caſe the troops arrived; who made this obſervation, that every place where it was probable or practicable for our troops to land, was defended by works or batteries, and that the enemy had a chain of poſts along ſhore from Cape Noir to Flat Point, and irregulars from thence to the bottom of the Bay. But the troops did not come in till next day.

Several hints were thrown out to the Admiral, about the impracticability of landing on a ſhore ſo ſtrongly fortified and guarded, and concerning the danger of his Majeſty's ſhips riding in a bay, where the pilots had no knowledge of the anchorage. Theſe ſpeeches alarmed the Admiral, and put him upon the prudential method of coming at the real ſentiments of his officers, by inviting them on board one after another, and diſcourſing with them ſeparately upon the ſubject of their immediate ſervice. The general opinion leaned towards the impracticability in ſo rough a ſea, and ſo well fortified a ſhore; and for a council of war, of both ſea and land officers, to come to a final reſolution; when it coming to the turn of Captain Ferguſon, an old, brave, and experienced officer, whom Mr. Boſcawen had requeſted from the Lords of the Admiralty to attend him in this ſervice, and in whoſe opinion and conduct, on the moſt trying occaſions, he could place great confidence; this Captain having delivered himſelf in the moſt reſpectful terms, in regard to the opinions of his brethren, whoſe reaſons the Admiral ingenuouſly related to him, and deſpiſing the arguments, drawn from the danger of the ſervice, for proving an impracticability, without an actual attempt to land and to force the enemy's poſts with all the art and ſtrength in their power, he adviſed the Admiral, for his own honour and the glory of his country, to exert that power with which he was inveſted; and not to leave it to the uncertain reſolutions of a council of war, which had been ſo fatal at Minorca, at Rochefort, and even at Hallifax, to the diſgrace of all concerned, and to the extreme loſs of the nation. Upon this remonſtrance of one brave officer in private converſation, we ſhall ſee the turn this grand expedition took for the intereſt of Great Britain. The Admiral acquieſced in the juſtneſs of the Captain's obſervation on councils of war; thanked him for his open and honeſt advice; reſolved to call no council of war, but ſtrictly to adhere to his inſtructions, which were to land the troops on the iſland of Cape Breton. Here, ſaid he, I will abide, and put them all aſhore, and cover their retreat if they think proper to reimbark.

This reſolution diſperſed the cloud of difficulties that ſeemed to be gathering from every quarter. The Admiral miral declared his determination not to depart out of of that Bay, till every way was tried to carry his inſtructions into execution. A ſignal was made for all lieutenants; to whom he gave ſtrict charges to be diligent in the execution of thoſe orders they then received, for landing of the troops, and for aſſiſting the military in every thing in their power, towards completing the ſervice in which they were jointly engaged; and about eleven that ſame day (the 3d) at noon, the Kennington was brought to an anchor cloſe in ſhore of a cove at the north-eaſt end of Gabarus Bay, which ſeemed to promiſe a convenient coaſt for the intended deſcent; but was well guarded by ſeveral encampments and a battery. The Kennington had orders to ſilence this battery, and to clear the coaſt of the enemy.

It was intended to attempt a landing that evening: but the weather growing hazy, and freſh gales blowing in ſhore, creating a great ſurf every day, there could be nothing done effectually till the 8th; though the Hallifax ſnow was likewiſe ordered in ſhore againſt another battery on the 4th; and both ſhe and the Kennington performed effectual ſervice. Theſe two were ſtationed on the left at the little Bay in the north-eaſt, to which was given the name of Kennington Cove; the Sutherland and Squirrel on the right, near White Point, and the Grammont, Diana, and Shannon frigates in the centre. A diſpoſition made by the Admiral's direction to terrify and annoy the enemy's fortified camps, and to cover the boats employed to land the ſoldiers.

On the 6th, the wind down, and a thick fog, the Admiral made the ſignal for landing; but before the boats were manned, the wind riſing, and a great ſea tumbling, the deſcent was put off till the 8th; when the wind being favourable, and the weather clear, (and Commodore Durell having reported, that it was his opinion the troops might land on the left, without any great interruption from that morning's ſurf) the troops were debarked in the boats belonging to the men of war and tranſports; the former under the direction of a lieutenant, mate or midſhipman; and the latter under the direction of the officers of the troops in each boat; the General having given proper orders to each for landing them in three diviſions. The ſignal for this debarkation was made about two o'clock; and as ſoon as the boats were prepared to ſet off from the ſhips, a moſt furious cannonading was continued from about ſun riſe from the Kennington and Hallifax, and all the other ſhips in their reſpective ſtations along the ſhore, until about eight o'clock, with only ſome neceſſary intermiſſions in favour of the attempt.

The diſpoſition for landing was made in three diviſions, in order to divide the forces, and to diſtract the enemy's attention. One diviſion under the command of Brigadier-General Wolfe, which was intended to attempt a landing on the left of Kennington Cove, conſiſted of 550 light infantry, commanded by Major Scott, and four of the oldeſt companies of grenadiers, the companies of rangers, ſupported by the Highland regiment, and thoſe by the eight remaining companies of grenadiers. The boats with theſe ſoldiers on board rendezvouſed near White Point, under cover of the ſhip guns about four o'clock. A feint was made by the ſecond diviſion, conſiſting of the Royal, Laſcelles, Monkton, Forbes, Anſtruther, and Webb, at the ſame time to the right towards White Point, under the conduct of Brigadier-General Whitmore; and the third diviſion, commanded by Brigadier-General Laurence, in the centre, was formed of Amherſt's, Hopſon's, Otway's, Whitmore's, Laurence's, and Warburton's, and at the ſame time made a ſhew of landing at the freſh water cove.

The enemy had expected this viſit for ſome years, which put them upon many devices to prevent, or to make a deſcent upon the coaſt of this iſland very difficult and hazardous to them that would attempt an invaſion; for this purpoſe they had finiſhed a very ſtrong breaſt-work, which was defended by 3000 regulars, irregulars, and native Indians, poſted along the ſhore in all the probable places of landing, fortified at proper diſtances with heavy cannon, and ſwivels of an extraordinary calibre, mounted on very ſtrong perpendicular wooden ſtocks, driven deep in the ground; beſides other cannon mounted on redans, erected in the moſt advantageous ſituations for flanking an invading army.

The fortifications were the moſt complete of their kind; yet they had an extraordinary addition by an artful diſpoſal of trees, which being laid very thick together, at the diſtance of twenty yards in ſome places, and of thirty in other places, between the lines and the water's edge, with their branches towards the ſea, quite round the cove, rendered the approaches to the front lines extremely difficult, even if there had been no fire to defend them. For the bare attempt of poſſeſſing theſe lines, ſays one that was preſent, would have been like penetrating with incredible fatigue and endleſs labour through a wild foreſt, where the branches of one tree are interwoven with thoſe of another. What ſtill contributed to the great ſtrength of this kind of fortification, was the manner of diſpoſing the foreſt work in front; ſo that it only appeared at a diſtance one continued green of little ſcattered branches of fir. Very few guns on their lines were diſtinguiſhable out of the reach of their metal; and the reſt were concealed with ſpruce branches, until the boats advanced towards the ſhore, with a reſolution of forcing the works.

Our boats rowed up to thoſe places of deſtruction with the moſt undaunted courage. But as they approached in line of battle, the brave adventurers were preſently convinced of their miſtake, in regard to the appearance of the enemy's ſtrength; and the enemy, too preſuming of their own ſtrong intrenchments and fortifications, unmaſked the latent deſtruction ſomewhat before the proper time for its due execution. Before our boats came near the water's edge, the batteries began to play, and to fire red-hot balls, grape, and round ſhot, with great activity; and a continual diſcharge of ſmall arms ſhowered upon them from the lines, which were about fifteen feet above the level of the boats.

This obliged the left wing to deſiſt, and to withdraw from from the impregnable ſhore of Kennington Cove; and the conſequence had been much more fatal to our people, few or any of them could have eſcaped, had the enemy ſuffered our men to land quietly upon that narrow ſhoal beach, for then they muſt all have laid down their arms, or have been ſlaughtered upon the ſhore. But our troops were rather exaſperated than diſcouraged by this unforeſeen and maſked way of firing, and making all the expedition they were able towards their centre, it was determined with united force to defy all oppoſition and ſtratagem, and to land wherever there appeared a probability of any degree of ſucceſs. Fortune favoured the attempt of the brave. Lieutenants Hopkins and Browne, with Enſign Grant, and about 100 light infantry, opened an entrance to the ſhore on the right of the Cove, over rocks and ſteeps, which had been deemed inacceſſible and impracticable.

Brigadier Wolfe ſeized the advantage, gave orders for the remainder to improve the preſent opportunity, and to ſupport their comrades on ſhore. Their impatience was ſuch, that they caſt off all reſtraint, and with impetuous emulation, the grenadiers, light infantry, rangers, and Highlanders, ſtrove who ſhould get firſt on ſhore, though expoſed the whole time to the furious fire of a battery of three guns, which ſometimes raked and ſometimes flanked them; and to the continual diſcharge of ſmall arms within twenty yards of them. But what was able to ſtop their fury! One boat was ſtove in the hurry, and ſome grenadiers were thereby drowned; and ſeveral overſet and broke to pieces. The loſs by the fire was ſo trifling as not to be mentioned; and chiefly amongſt the ſeamen that had the care of the boats. The landing was effected at this place.

Amongſt the foremoſt in this hot ſervice we find Brigadier Wolfe himſelf, who jumped out of his boat into the ſurf, which kept them dancing on the water, and expoſed to the enemy's fire. His example was followed by all the troops. Brigadier Laurence, with the reſt of the brigades did the ſame, a little to the left, ſoon after; and they were ſupported with all convenient expedition by the remainder of the centre from the ſhips, and by the diviſion of the right wing, which alſo gained the ſhore amidſt a continual diſcharge of ſhot and ſhells from the enemy's lines. The rear was brought up by Major-General Amherſt, bearing teſtimony to the reſolution and bravery with which thoſe troops he had to depend upon in his future arduous undertakings, had ſurmounted difficulties and deſpiſed dangers.

It was not the ſtrength and ſtratagem of the enemy they had ſolely to combat, the boiſterous ſurf, which drove on moſt parts of the ſhore at that time, ſtove a great number of the boats; by which ſeveral of the men were ſo much hurt and bruiſed, as to be very incapable of helping and taking care of themſelves, and ſome were cruſhed to pieces between the boats and the rocks. Moſt that did land were obliged to do it without order and in much confuſion, wading through the great ſwell, and their arms much wetted, then to ſcramble up ſuch rugged rocks, and almoſt upright precipices, as had been deemed inacceſſible, and in no need of fortifications for their defence by the enemy's ſkilful and wary engineers; their own ſteep, rough aſcent having been judged beyond the attempt of men under arms before this glorious day. Theſe were not the only diſcouragements; they were in a ſituation that would not allow them to make a proper uſe of their arms, and were themſelves the whole time expoſed to the utmoſt fury of the enemy's fire in landing and climbing the rocks. A ſpirit that will always exert itſelf where Engliſhmen are allowed to act againſt an enemy. A danger which a council of war would never encounter; which makes good the obſervation, that national virtue is to be ſought for in the ſpirit of the ſoldiery, and not ſolely in the councils of their officers, where a majority has frequently deprived the nation of the advantages that might have ſucceeded by the vigorous and brave minority. For this national ſpirit of our ſoldiery was never known to flag under the conduct of ſuch commanders as ſignalized themſelves on this occaſion.

Such an unexpected gaining of what had till now been thought an inacceſſible ſhore, and landing in the moſt incredible places, terrified the aſtoniſhed foe; and our men acquired ſuch an increaſe of ſpirit and fortitude by every difficulty they ſurmounted, that being arrived at a convenient place to unite, they inſtantly attacked the next battery to them in flank with ſo much vigour, as drove the enemy from that ſtrong poſt with great precipitation; and with one continued exertion of the greateſt bravery, in ſurrounding and attacking the enemy's extenſive lines, they ſaw themſelves maſters of the whole ſhore and all its works before they had hardly time to give one regular ſtroke of true Engliſh bravery.

The ſlackening of their fire, when the enemy ſaw our men land pretty near them, and the faint reſiſtance they made when our troops attacked their lines and batteries, ſhew that the French placed their whole confidence in the ſtrength of their coaſt; that they never had dreamt of being driven to the neceſſity of defending their poſts ſword in hand; that they had formed no plan of retreat, nor a place of rendezvous for them to rally and give us battle, before our troops could be ſuccoured and ſupplied with artillery from the ſhips; in a word, they were diſciplined to fight under cover, and where the maſk was pulled off by force and dint of courage, their cowardice appeared, and they ran away with the utmoſt conſternation and confuſion into the woods; leaving ſome of them killed in the flight, and about ſeventy priſoners; amongſt whom were two captains and two lieutenants of grenadiers.

The next and immediate care of the Commander on ſhore, was ſo to diſpoſe of his troops, as at once to poſſeſs the ſhore, to purſue the enemy, and to prevent a ſurpriſe; which was done by detached parties; one of which ſecured the poſſeſſion of the ſhore for ſeveral miles, as far as Louiſburg; and found in different places abandoned by the enemy, ſeventeen pieces of cannon, fourteen large ſwivels, two mortars, one of braſs, eight inches, and another of iron, ten inches diameter, with a ſhell in it ready to be fired; a furnace nace for red-hot balls, ſeveral ſmall arms, and a good quantity of proviſions and ammunition, tools, and ſtores. The other party employed in the purſuit of the diſperſed enemy, was commanded by Wolfe and Laurence, who drove them over rocky hills and boggy moraſſes, till they got under the protection of the guns of Louiſburg; from whoſe ramparts, about ten in the morning, our purſuing party was ſaluted with a diſcharge of ſeveral pieces of cannon; by which we gained an exact diſtance for encamping with ſecurity from the town to inveſt it; and it did not damage our troops; and the general officers did, that very afternoon, mark out a camp on the very ſpot which they afterwards occupied during the whole ſiege. The enemy no ſooner ſaw the preparations for a camp ſo near them, than the Governor of Louiſburg ordered the barrack at the grand battery, already diſmantled and ruined, to be burnt. He gave the like orders relative to all the outbuildings, and left nothing ſtanding within two miles of the town walls, but the tower at the grand battery, and ſome chimneys and gable ends of wretched hovels.

Such was the incredible ſervice and extraordinary achievements of a day, that muſt be ever glorious in the annals of this nation, and convince poſterity that no difficulties or dangers are ſufficient to withſtand the impetuoſity of a Britiſh army; and that every thing ought to be tried, before a council of war ſhall venture to pronounce an attempt impracticable. How that might have been, had Admiral Boſcawen left the practicability of this ſervice to the reſolutions of a council of war, from which he was diſſuaded by the advice above related, is uncertain; but, if we may be allowed to judge from events, there would be very little hopes in trying ſo deſperate an experiment in tactics, had theſe hazards been foreſeen, and coolly weighed with the balance of perſonal ſafety.

Being in poſſeſſion of the ſhore, the next attention devolved upon the meaſures to be purſued againſt the famous fortification, that terror of North America, Louiſburg, the principal object of this expedition, whoſe garriſon conſiſted of 2500 regular troops, 300 militia, formed out of the burghers, and 350 Canadians, who, during the ſiege, found an opportunity to get into the town; and in the harbour there lay ſix ſhips of the line and five frigates; which, with the difficulties they foreſaw in the communication with the fleet, through the badneſs of the weather, and the continual ſurf on the coaſt, that greatly endangered the navigation of the ſmall craft, and in the length of their approaches over very bad marſhy ground, prognoſticated a long, tedious, and hazardous ſiege. However, the Commander in Chief took every precaution, by ſecuring his camps with redoubts and epaulements, from any attempt by the Canadians, who might be expected to make a powerful effort to relieve the town, and from the fire of the French ſhips in the harbour, to ſecure his communication with the fleet; and with a reſolution and conduct becoming one in his circumſtances, he was determined and prepared to meet the greateſt dangers.

The ſurf continued ſo extremely bad, that he could only get ſome tents aſhore. Nor could any thing more be landed for the army till the 11th, when the remainder of the troops, the light ſix-pounders, and ſome artillery ſtores were carried aſhore. Had the enemy with their ſuperiority of numbers, and other conſiderable advantages, attacked our little army, in want almoſt of every thing, and their communication with the fleet precarious, during this interval, they might have greatly perplexed our ſituation. But a fatal timidity confined their attention to their town's defence, till it was too late to think of attacking our trenches. On the contrary, General Amherſt on the 12th, detached Brigadier Wolfe, with 1200 men, four companies of grenadiers, three companies of rangers, and ſome light infantry, round the north-eaſt harbour, with orders to proceed to the Light-houſe Point, with an intention to ſilence the iſland battery, and to attempt the deſtruction of the ſhips in the harbour; and at the ſame time ſent by ſea the artillery, tools, &c. which had been ordered for that ſervice. As Brigadier Wolfe approached, the enemy abandoned every poſt in his route, leaving their artillery, &c. and a great quantity of fiſh, at a place called Lorembec; all which were deſtroyed or rendered uſeleſs; and our troops took poſſeſſion of Light-houſe Point, and all the poſts on that ſide the harbour.

At laſt, on the 13th, the French thought of ſallying out of their ſtrong fortifications. Our men were employed in making a communication from the right to the left in the front of the camp, and in erecting three redoubts on the moſt advantageous ground in the front alſo. A French party put on a vigorous countenance, and marched towards our works; but they were ſoon driven back, with the loſs of five killed and forty wounded by the light infantry. On the 14th, the cannonade from the town continued almoſt all day; and their iſland battery and ſhips gave our men ſome trouble till the 25th, when the iſland battery was ſilenced by the batteries we had made at the Light-houſe.

The perpetual duty, either in working on the roads, in draining of bogs, in erecting of redoubts, batteries, block-houſes, &c. and in watching the motions and reſiſting the efforts of the enemy, fell very heavy upon ſo ſmall an army, that was obliged to have ſeveral parties out; beſides Colonel Meſſervey, and moſt of his carpenters, were taken ill of the ſmall-pox; of which the Colonel, his ſon, and ninety-ſix of his carpenters died before the 27th of this month; therefore Admiral Boſcawen ordered 200 marines to guard the coaſt at Kennington Cove, which proved a great eaſe to the army.

On the other ſide, the beſieged endeavoured to throw further obſtacles in the way to retard our operations; not doubting if they could prevent an attack by ſea, that they would be able to hold out againſt the land forces till the ſeaſon would be ſo far advanced as to oblige the troops to reimbark. With this view the Governor of Louiſburg, on the 29th at night, ordered the Apollo, a two-decked ſhip, La Fidelle, a thirty-ſix gun frigate, La Chevre, and La Biche of ſixteen guns each, to be ſunk in the harbour's mouth, mouth, with moſt of their maſts cut off, to obſtruct the paſſage of our great ſhips. And as our works advanced, the cannonading from the town and the ſhipping increaſed alſo; and ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened daily between parties from the town and our light infantry, but with no ſucceſs, nor with much advantage on our ſide. But on the 9th of July the enemy made a ſortie, where Brigadier Laurence commanded. They came from Cape Noir, and ſurpriſed a company of Forbes's grenadiers, commanded by Lord Dundonald, poſted in a fleche on the right. Major Murray, who commanded three companies of grenadiers, immediately detached one, and drove the enemy back, with the aſſiſtance of Whitmore's and Brag's, who behaved very well. In this ſkirmiſh Lord Dundonald was killed, Lieutenant Tew was wounded and made priſoner; Captain Bontein of the engineers was taken priſoner; one corporal and three men killed; ſeventeen men wounded, and one ſerjeant and eleven men were miſſing. On the part of the ſortie, Chevalier de Chauvelin, a captain, was killed; one lieutenant was wounded and taken priſoner, ſeventeen men were killed, four wounded and made priſoners, beſides others wounded and carried into the town, amongſt whom was a captain that died immediately.

The works being advanced within 650 yards from the covered way, under the direction of Brigadier Wolfe, on the 13th four batteries were traced out, with an intention to place twenty-four pounders, to deſtroy the defences, and a battery of ſeven mortars, with ſome twelve pounders to ricochet the works and the town. And on the 16th, towards night, the ſame Brigadier puſhed on a corps and took poſſeſſion of the hills in the front of the Baraſoy, where a lodgement was made in the midſt of a very briſk fire from the town and the ſhipping; yet there appeared no great hopes of ſpeedy ſucceſs againſt the town, till on the 21ſt, when it was greatly alarmed with an exploſion of gunpowder on board a ſhip in the harbour that blew up, and ſet fire to the ſails of two more. They burnt very furiouſly, being deprived of all aſſiſtance from the town, by the continual fire from our batteries to prevent boats going on board. By which accident the enemy loſt the Entreprenant, the Capricieux, and Superb men of war; ſo that there remained no more than the Prudent and Bienfaiſant in the harbour, to guard againſt any ſurpriſe or aſſault by ſea.

Two of the batteries with thirteen twenty-four-pounders, and that of ſeven mortars on the right, were opened on the 22d, and played with great ſucceſs, and at laſt our ſhells put the citadel in flames, though the enemy fired well from the town, threw their ſhells into our works, and fired all ſorts of old iron, and any ſtuff they could pick up. For which reaſon the French mortars we had taken, were ſent to throw ſtones into the town from the trenches.

On the 23d, the cohorns were uſed at night, and the batteries ſucceeded ſo well that they ſet fire to the enemy's barracks, which burnt with great violence. But the Admiral, dubious of the time the ſiege might take with the preſent ſtrength on ſhore, on the 24th ordered 400 ſeamen to aſſiſt in working the batteries, &c. and 200 miners were added to a corps of 100 already eſtabliſhed; which had the deſired effect. From this time the fate of the beſieged ſeemed to be determined; for, on the 25th, they had brought all their batteries to bear; and the Admiral concerted meaſures with the General to deſtroy the Prudent and Bienfaiſant in the harbour. Six hundred ſailors were detached from the fleet in boats to perform this ſervice, to take or to deſtroy thoſe two men of war, whoſe intention and proceedings were covered by an extraordinary cannonading from our batteries, to keep the enemy's attention fixed altogether to the land ſervice. The fire never ceaſed; and the ſailors boarded the two ſhips, burnt the Prudent, which was aground, and towed off the Bienfaiſant to the north-eaſt harbour. In the mean time, the miners and workmen went on very well with their approaches to the covered way, under a continued and very ſmart fire from it with grape-ſhot, and all ſorts of old iron from the guns of the ramparts.

Every thing concurring to diſcourage any longer reſiſtance or defence, there being no hopes of relief from Europe, nor any further aid from Canada; their ſhips entirely deſtroyed; their harbour untenable; their fortifications ruined in many places; divers practicable breaches made; the garriſon in no condition to repulſe an aſſault in breach, nor even an eſcalade; and ſenſible that every advantage gained by the beſiegers was a nearer approach to their ruin, diſpoſed the Governor to the humane conſideration of putting a ſtop to the further effuſion of Chriſtian blood. For which purpoſe he wrote to General Amherſt, requeſting a capitulation upon the ſame conditions as had been granted to the Engliſh at Port Mahon. But the General having been previouſly informed by Admiral Boſcawen of his intention to ſend ſix ſhips into the harbour next day, to accelerate the operations by land, as the moſt effectual way to oblige the garriſon to ſurrender priſoners of war, he rejected the French Governor's propoſal, inſiſted upon his ſurrender at diſcretion, and threatened him with a general aſſault by Admiral Boſcawen next morning, in caſe he did not chooſe to ſubmit on thoſe terms. M. Drucour could not reliſh the thoughts of yielding to thoſe arbitrary impoſitions; and as an officer that had behaved well in his preſent capacity, thought himſelf and the brave fellows under his command intitled to ſome ſort of diſtinction and favour, and to the honours of war: ſo that he ſeemed reſolved, and did declare, that he would riſk a general aſſault before he would comply with ſuch ſevere terms. However, his ſtomach was brought down by the petitions and repreſentations of the traders and inhabitants of the place, and of the commiſſary and intendant of the colony; who foreſaw immediate and univerſal ruin, ſhould the enemy be provoked to make a general aſſault by ſea and land. Accordingly the French Governor accepted and ſigned the following capitulation.

Articles

Articles of capitulation between their Excellencies Admiral Boſcawen and Major-General Amherſt, and his Excellency the Chevalier Drucour, Governor of the iſland of Cape Breton, of Louiſburg, the iſland of St. John, and their appurtenances.

I. The garriſon of Louiſburg ſhall be priſoners of war, and ſhall be carried to England in the ſhips of his Britannic Majeſty.

II. All the artillery, ammunition, proviſions, as well as the arms of any kind whatſoever, which are at preſent in the town of Louiſburg, the iſlands of Cape Breton and St. John, and their appurtenances, ſhall be delivered without the leaſt damage, to ſuch commiſſaries as ſhall be appointed to receive them, for the uſe of his Britannic Majeſty.

III. The Governor ſhall give his orders that the troops which are in the iſland of St. John and its appurtenances, ſhall go on board ſuch ſhip of war as the Admiral ſhall ſend to receive them.

IV. The gate called Porte Dauphine ſhall be given up to the troops of his Britannic Majeſty to-morrow at eight o'clock in the morning; and the garriſon, including all thoſe that carried arms, drawn up at noon on the eſplanade, where they ſhall lay down their arms, colours, implements, and ornaments of war. And the garriſon ſhall go on board, in order to be carried to England in a convenient time.

V. The ſame care ſhall be taken of the ſick and wounded that are in the hoſpitals, as of thoſe belonging to his Britannic Majeſty.

VI. The merchants, and their clerks, that have not carried arms, ſhall be ſent to France, in ſuch manner as the Admiral ſhall think proper.

Louiſburg, July 26, 1758.

(Signed) Le Chevalier de Drucour.

In conſequence of this capitulation, Major Farquhar, with three companies of grenadiers, took poſſeſſion of the weſt gate on the 27th in the morning, and Brigadier-General Whitmore was charged with the diſarming of the garriſon upon the eſplanade. He alſo received the ſurrender of their colours, and placed proper guards in the ſeveral poſts, and over the ſtores, magazines, &c. The conquerors behaved with great humanity towards the priſoners; but to remove from them all temptation of breaking their capitulation, the General ordered all their arms to be carried out of the town.

Thus we may obſerve with ſurpriſe, that Louiſburg, and therewith the whole iſland of Cape Breton, which had been repreſented ſo formidable and almoſt impregnable and impracticable on former occaſions, fell to the arms of a much leſs force than had been ſhipped in the foregoing year for the ſame ſervice, with the inſignificant loſs of 21 commiſſioned and non-commiſſioned officers, 146 private men, one gunner, and three matroſſes killed; and 30 commiſſioned and non-commiſſioned officers, two drummers, 315 private men, one corporal, one gunner, and three matroſſes wounded.

The loſs of the enemy in killed and wounded was much more conſiderable, beſides 5637, which the garriſon conſiſted of at the ſurrender, and artillery, ſtores, &c. Nor was this their whole loſs, for the iſland of St. John in the Gulf of St. Lawrence ſhared the ſame fate. See that article.

An account of the guns, mortars, ſhot, ſhells, &c. found in the town of Louiſburg, (errors excepted).

Iron ordnance mounted on ſtanding carriages with beds and quoins; 38 of 36 pounders, 97 of 24, 23 of 18, 16 of 12, 10 of 8, 28 of 6, 6 of 4.

Mortars, braſs, with beds, 3 of 12½ inch; 1 of 9, 3 of 6½ inch.

Of the affair reſpecting the two French men of war, Admiral Boſcawen ſent the following account to Mr. Pitt, dated the 28th of July, 1758.

I cannot help mentioning a particular gallant action, in the night between the 25th and 26th inſt. the boats of the ſquadron were in two diviſions, detached under the command of Captains Laforey and Balfour, to endeavour either to take or burn the Prudent of ſeventy-four guns, and Bienfaiſant of ſixty-four, the only remaining French ſhips in the harbour; in which they ſucceeded.

ſucceeded ſo well as to burn the former, ſhe being aground, and take the latter, and tow her into the north-eaſt harbour, notwithſtanding they were expoſed to the fire of the cannon and muſquetry of the iſland battery, Point Rochford, and the town, being favoured with a dark night. Our loſs was inconſiderable, ſeven men killed, and nine wounded. I have given the command of the Bienfaiſant to Captain Balfour, and the Echo, a frigate, to Captain Laforey.

About noon, by the Admiral's order, two boats, a barge and pinnace, or cutter, from every ſhip of the fleet, except the Northumberland, an invalid, manned only with their proper crews, and armed with muſquets and bayonets, cutlaſſes, piſtols, and pole-axes, each boat under the direction of a lieutenant and mate, or midſhipman, rendezvouſed at the Admiral's ſhip; from thence they were detached by two and three at a time to join thoſe of Sir Charles Hardy's ſquadron off the mouth of the harbour. There they were in the evening ranged in two diviſions, under the command of the two ſenior maſters and commanders in the fleet, the Captains Laforey and Balfour.

In this order they put off from Sir Charles's ſquadron about twelve o'clock, and by the advantage of the foggy darkneſs of the night, and the inviolable ſilence of their people, paddled into the harbour of Louiſburg unperceived either by the iſland battery, they were obliged to come very near to, or by the two men of war that rode at anchor at no great diſtance from them. There was no great probability of their being perceived from any part of the garriſon, not only on account of their greater diſtance, but alſo of the preconcerted briſk diverſion made upon them from all our batteries about that time. Beſides, the beſieged themſelves left nobody an opportunity to hear any noiſe; for, from having in the day-time obſerved the numerous ſcaling ladders that were brought into our trenches, they were under ſome apprehenſions of an eſcalade intended as this night, and kept a conſtant fire with their muſquetry from the ramparts during the whole time, with the deſign, if poſſible, to deter the beſiegers from that attempt, by ſhewing them how well they were upon their guard in all the places it could probably be made.

During this ſeeming ſecurity and prudent precaution on both ſides, the bold ſtratagem of the boats for ſurpriſing the two remaining ſhips in the enemy's harbour, every moment ripened for the execution. After puſhing in as far almoſt as the grand battery, leſt the ſhips ſhould be too ſoon alarmed by their oars, they took a ſweep from thence towards the part of the harbour where the gentlemen knew the ſhips were, who had before very well reconnoitred it, and preſently diſcovered them. Each diviſion of the boats was no ſooner within ſight and hail of the noble object of their attempt, Captain Laforey's of Le Prudent, and Captain Balfour's of Le Bienfaiſant, than the centinels on board having hailed them in vain, began to fire on them; each of the commanders ordered his boats to give way alongſide their reſpective ſhips, and to board them immediately, with all the expedition and good order they could obſerve.

The boats crews, no longer able to contain themſelves in ſilence, after their manner gave loud cheers as they were pulling up alongſide, and with the moſt intrepid activity, armed ſome with muſquets, bayonets, and cutlaſſes, others with piſtols, cutlaſſes, and pole-axes, followed their brave leaders, and boarded the ſhips in an inſtant with great ſpirit, on each bow, quarter, and gangway, and after very little reſiſtance from the terrified crews, ſoon found themſelves in poſſeſſion of two fine ſhips of the enemy, one of ſeventy-four, and one of ſixty-four guns, with the loſs of very few of the ſeamen, and but one mate.

The beſieged were now ſufficiently alarmed on all ſides by the noiſe of the ſeamen at boarding, the cheers leaving them no room to doubt that it was from Engliſh ſeamen, and the direction of the confuſed ſound of voices, and firing afterwards, ſoon leading them to ſuſpect the real fact, an attempt upon their ſhips. The heroic, ſucceſsful adventurers were employed in ſecuring their priſoners in the ſhips holds, and concerting the moſt effectual methods for ſecuring their prizes out of the reach of the enraged enemy; when both the ſhips and boats received a moſt furious fire of cannon, mortars, and muſquets, from all parts whence it could be directed to them, from the iſland battery at no great diſtance, from the battery on Point Maurepas a little farther off, and from all the guns of the garriſon that could be brought to bear on that part of the harbour.

After endeavouring in vain to tow off Le Prudent, they found ſhe was on ground, with ſeveral feet water in her hold. There now remained nothing in their power to do, to prevent her being recovered by the enemy, but to ſet her on fire, which they did with all poſſible expedition; leaving alongſide her a large ſchooner, and her own boats, for her people to eſcape in to the ſhore, which was at no great diſtance from her. On board of this ſhip they found a deſerter from our camp, who was killed in the little buſtle at our people's taking poſſeſſion of her, and by that means reſcued from ignominious execution by military juſtice.

The boats from Le Prudent now joined the others about Le Bienfaiſant, and helped to tow her off triumphantly in the midſt of a formidable fire from the mortified enemy; which they did with great ſpeed, by the aſſiſtance of a little breeze, and what ragged ſails, yards, and rigging ſhe had left of any ſervice after the conſtant fire ſhe had ſo long received from our batteries. When they had thus got her out of the diſtance and direction of the enemy's guns, they ſecured her till the next day by an hawſer in the north-eaſt harbour, and enjoyed on board her the firſt joyful moment's leiſure of ſecurely congratulating each other on their ſucceſs and ſafety in this hazardous enterprize.

The taking of theſe two ſhips by our fleet's boats, on this memorable occaſion, as it muſt be a laſting, indelible honour to the vigilance and activity of thoſe who projected, and to the bravery and conduct of thoſe who executed the bold deſign, will alſo be a new, and perhaps a ſeaſonable conviction to the world, that however arduous, however apparently impracticable any purpoſed naval attempt may be, the Britiſh ſeamen are not to be deterred from it by any difficulty or danger, but will exert themſelves as far as men can do, and at leaſt deſerve ſucceſs, when led on to it by ſuch as are worthy to command them.

And the bold and ſucceſsful execution of this enterprize, with the preparations made for a general aſſault, ſo terrified the garriſon, that next day they ſurrendered.

LOUVAIN, A CITY OF BRABANT, BATTLE NEAR, March 22, 1793. An account of which is given in a letter from the Prince of Saxe Coburg, as follows:

At break of day our army marched forward in three columns. The firſt advanced on the right of the cauſeway of Louvain, the ſecond on the left, and the third, which formed the vanguard, directed its march towards Tourine.

When the ſecond column arrived at the heights, where it was to encamp, it found them occupied by numerous bodies of French cavalry, and the village of Blamden, which was intended to cover their left wing, by a great number of their infantry.

The enemy were attacked on all ſides, but they made an obſtinate defence, procuring reinforcements and ſupplies, by freſh troops, whom they brought from Louvain, and their camp behind that town, relieving thoſe who had been repulſed.

The battle was bloody; our ſecond column loſt 400 men, and the enemy more than 2000. They were, however, overcome by the bravery of the Imperial troops, driven from all their poſts, and forced to evacuate the town of Louvain, to quit the rivulet of Dyl, and to retire behind Louvain towards Bruſſels.

The firſt column fell in, near Belemberg, with a body of the enemy, who occupied the heights between that village and Louvain, in order to cover the latter. The enemy defended themſelves there, for ſeven hours, with the greateſt obſtinacy, but they were at length overcome and driven beyond the rivulet Dyl.

This battle was ſtill more bloody than that of the ſecond column, and we reckon our loſs, which is not yet properly aſcertained, at more than 500 men; the enemy loſt above 2000. Our column took poſſeſſion of three cannon and one carriage.

The enemy abandoned at Louvain a conſiderable magazine. Terror and diſorder have again increaſed among their troops. They have quitted the advantageous poſt which they occupied on the Iron Mountains, and have encamped before Bruſſels, between the canal and the foreſt of Soignes.

SAXE COBOURG.

LOWOSITZ, BATTLE AT. A village of Bohemia, ſituated on the river Egra, about two or three miles northweſt of Baden, and about ſix or ſeven ſouth of Leitmeritz.

In the ſummer of the year 1756, it was obſerved by all Europe, that Germany was on the eve of a war. The King of Great Britain dreading that the French would enter Hanover, concluded a ſubſidy treaty with the Czarina of Ruſſia, whereby that princeſs promiſed to furniſh 40,000 foot and 15,000 horſe, in caſe Hanover ſhould be attacked, for that was the true intent of the treaty.

The King of Pruſſia, not liking the Ruſſians ſhould be ſuch near neighbours to him, offered to take Hanover under his protection, and by a treaty at that time made, the two monarchs agreed to keep all foreign troops out of Germany. The courts of Dreſden, Vienna, Verſailles, and Peterſburg, having long whiſpered a confederacy, now openly eſpouſed it, and determined to ſtrip the King of Pruſſia of all his dominions. That monarch ſaw the ſtorm, and wiſely reſolved on laying the ſcene as far from home as poſſible. Before they were ready to invade his country, he all on a ſudden entered Saxony, (the 29th of Auguſt, 1756), demanded a paſſage into Bohemia, and ſeemed to threaten to beſiege Dreſden. The King of Poland, who had aſſembled his Saxons near his capital, in conſequence of directions from the court of Vienna, was ſtruck with terror and amazement at his tremendous appearance, and neither offered to repel the invader, nor come to terms; but began to fortify himſelf among the vallies and mountains of Pirna. Frederick knew no time was to be loſt, he took poſſeſſion of the defiles of Bohemia, and entered that kingdom at the head of his army, having ſent ſome detachments before to ſcour the country of the enemy's parties. He alſo left a detachment behind, to block the Saxons up in their camp at Pirna, which was no ſooner made known to Mareſchal Brown, the commander of the Auſtrian army, than he determined on their relief, which the King of Pruſſia was preſently appriſed of, and therefore reſolved to bring him to a battle. The King marched with rapidity to where the Auſtrians lay encamped. On the 29th day of September, his advanced guard was in ſight of the camp. The army arrived in the night at Welmina, where the King only formed his battalions behind one another, and the ſquadrons in the ſame manner, which remained the whole night in this place, the King himſelf ſitting up with them, covered with his cloak only, before a little fire at the head of his troops. On the 1ſt of October, he ſhewed his generals the ground he intended to occupy; the infantry to form the firſt line, and to occupy the two hills, the bottom lying between them; ſome battalions to form the ſecond line, and the third line to be compoſed of all the cavalry. From the hills the Pruſſians firſt perceived the town of Lowoſitz, filled with a numerous body of infantry, a large battery of twelve pieces of cannon placed before them, the cavalry formed chequer-wiſe, and in a line between Lowoſitz and Sauſchitz. With a view to drive back the enemy, which ſtood in his front, he ordered his cavalry to advance, forming them before his firſt line of infantry; the cavalry attacked and broke the enemy's infantry, but were galled by a great body of infantry, which was placed behind the cavalry, in hollow places and ditches, which obliged them to return and form again; which having done, they returned to the attack, in the face of ſixty pieces of cannon, and the body of infantry, on which they defeated the Auſtrian cavalry and forced the enemy from the ditches. The enemy attempted to flank the Pruſſian infantry, infantry, and diſpoſitions were made to ſupport them; when the whole left of the Pruſſian infantry marching in gradually, wheeled about, attacked the town of Lowoſitz in flank, in ſpite of the cannon and muſquetry, ſet the ſuburbs on fire, carried the poſt, and put the whole army to flight.

Mareſchal Brown retired to the other ſide of the Egra, encamping at Baden, and the King having gained the field of battle, eſtabliſhed his head-quarters at Lowoſitz. The enemy's army was 60,000 ſtrong, and their loſs was computed about 6000 or 7000 killed and wounded. The Pruſſians took 500 priſoners, among whom was Prince Lobkowitz, with five pieces of cannon, and three pair of colours. The Pruſſians loſt 2000 men killed and wounded, and by this victory were become maſters of all the defiles, ſo that the whole Saxon army finding themſelves ſurrounded, and being reduced to the greateſt extremity for want of proviſions, they ſurrendered to a man priſoners of war, and the King incorporated all who were willing to enter into his ſervice with the Pruſſian army, which broke up the camp at Lowoſitz, and arrived at the quarters at Seidlitz, which ended the campaign of 1756. The King of Poland was obliged to quit his electorate; the Pruſſians took up their winter quarters in Saxony, ſeized upon the revenues, levied contributions, and obliged the country to furniſh recruits. The King poſſeſſed himſelf of the archives at Dreſden, from whence he took copies of the triple alliance, formed againſt him in time of peace, by the courts of Vienna, Verſailles, and Peterſburg, and which he publiſhed to all Europe.

The capitulation of the Saxon army, with all the articles at large, as propoſed by Field-Mareſchal Count Rutowſki, with the King of Pruſſia's anſwer to each of them.

Art. I. The army of the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony, juſt as it is actually poſted at Ebenhert, at the foot of Lilienſtein, ſhall ſurrender to the King of Pruſſia priſoners of war.—Anſ. If the King will give me that army, it is needleſs to make them priſoners of war.

II. The generals, the field-officers, the perſons employed as commiſſaries and purveyors, and all the other officers of the army, ſhall keep their baggage and effects, as well thoſe which they have actually with them, as what they may have left in other places; and the ſubaltern officers and ſoldiers ſhall be allowed to keep their cloathing, arms, and knapſacks.—Anſ. All that can be preſerved or recovered of their baggage, ſhall be faithfully reſtored to them.

III. His Pruſſian Majeſty is chiefly requeſted to cauſe the army to be furniſhed with the neceſſary proviſions and forage; and that he would be pleaſed to give proper orders for this purpoſe.—Anſ. Granted, and rather to-day than to-morrow.

IV. The generals, commandants, and all perſons ranking as officers, engage themſelves in writing, not to bear arms againſt his Majeſty the King of Pruſſia till peace be reſtored; and they ſhall be left at liberty to ſtay in Saxony, or to retire whitherſoever they think proper.—Anſ. Thoſe that intend to enter into my ſervice, muſt from this very moment have liberty to do ſo.

V. The life-guards and the grenadier-guards, ſhall not be included in the firſt article; and his Pruſſian Majeſty will be pleaſed to appoint the place in the electorate of Saxony, or in the territories depending thereon, where the ſaid two corps ſhall be diſtributed. The Field-Mareſchal Count Rutowſki, as captain of the grenadier-guards, the Chevalier de Saxe, in quality of commandant of the life-guards, and all the other officers of thoſe two corps, verbally engage, and even in writing, if deſired, not to make, under any pretext whatever, nor without the approbation of the King of Pruſſia, any change in the quarters that may be aſſigned them.—Anſ. There is no exception to be made, becauſe it is known that the King of Poland did give orders for that part of his troops which is in the ſaid kingdom, to join the Ruſſians, and to march for this purpoſe to the frontiers of Sileſia; and a man muſt be a fool to let troops go which he holds faſt; to ſee them make head againſt him a ſecond time, and to be obliged to take them priſoners again.

VI. The generals and field-officers, and all the officers ſhall keep their ſwords, but the arms, belts, and cartridges, both of the ſubalterns and ſoldiers, horſe and dragoons, &c. ſhall be carried to the caſtle of Koningſtein, together with the colours, ſtandards, and kettle-drums.—Anſ. Kettle-drums, ſtandards, and colours, may be carried to Koningſtein, but not the arms, no more than the cannon belonging to the regiments, the warlike ſtores and the tents; the officers no doubt ſhall keep their ſwords; and I hope that ſuch of them as are of willing mind, will make uſe of them in my ſervice.

VII. The ſame thing ſhall take place with regard to the field artillery and the proviſion-waggons.—Anſ. Granted.

VIII. His Pruſſian Majeſty ſhall give aſſurances, that no officer or ſoldier ſhall be obliged, againſt his will, to take on in his army; and that after peace is reſtored they ſhall all be ſent back to the King of Poland; and, on the other hand, his Poliſh Majeſty may not refuſe diſmiſſion to the generals and other officers of his army, who may engage in any other ſervice.—Anſ. Nobody need trouble his head about this. No general ſhall be forced to ſerve againſt his will, that is ſufficient.

IX. As to what is to be furniſhed to the life-guards and grenadier-guards, if his Pruſſian Majeſty pleaſes, we ſhall agree about the manner of proceeding therein, and ſettle at the ſame time with that monarch the funds out of which the ſalaries of the generals, officers, and other perſons attendant on the army, are to be paid monthly, according to the eſtimates that ſhall be drawn up by Major-General Zeutſch, commiſſary at war.—Anſ. It is very reaſonable I ſhould pay thoſe who will ſerve; and this payment ſhall be made out of the cleareſt receipts of the contributions. As to the generals, they ſhall be treated like men who have honourably ſerved, and it will be very eaſy to provide for their ſubſiſtence.

X. His ſaid Majeſty ſhould alſo explain himſelf about the quarters and ſubſiſtence to be granted to the ſeveral regiments of cavalry and infantry, as well as to the engineers and the artillery corps.—Anſ. I take upon me the maintenance of the army; and it ſhall be paid more regularly than heretofore, on the ſame footing as my own troops.

XI. The King of Pruſſia will be ſo good as to order when and how the generals, and the whole army without exception, with the baggage, ſhall file off from the poſt in which they are at preſent.—Anſ. This point may be ſettled in a quarter of an hour. One muſt chooſe the moſt commodious road, and the places neareſt at hand for giving them ſubſiſtence.

XII. His Pruſſian Majeſty will be pleaſed to allow the neceſſary meaſures to be taken for removing and lodging the ſick that are incapable of following the army, and that they may be properly attended.—Anſ. Granted.

XIII. The generals, the field and ſubaltern officers, as alſo the ſoldiers, who have hitherto been made priſoners, or have been left behind, ſhall be included in the preſent capitulation.—Anſ. Granted.

Done at Ebenhert, at the foot of Lilienſtein.

Signed, RUTOWSKI.

Art. XIV. and ſeparate. I am authoriſed to oblige the army to lay down their arms, but I have no authority to free them from the oath of allegiance they have taken, nor to oblige them to take another. As for all the reſt, it is left to his Pruſſian Majeſty's diſpoſal. Lieutenant-General Winterfeld made me hope this monarch would have made no difficulty to grant one ſquadron more of life-guards. His Majeſty will be ſo good as to reſolve about the fortreſs of Koningſtein, where the company of cadets and the grenadier-guards are at preſent with his Poliſh Majeſty.

LUCCA.—May, 1799, a corps of General Macdonald, which had advanced through Tuſcany, for the purpoſe of joining the army of Moreau, was attacked by the Auſtro-Ruſſian army near Lucca, and totally defeated, and their commander made priſoner.

LUCIA, (ST.) TAKEN IN 1779. An iſland in the Weſt Indies, and ſituated near Martinico; for an account of which ſee the following letters from the Commanders on that expedition.

Copy of a Duplicate of a Letter from Major-General Grant, Commander in Chief of his Majeſty's Forces in the Leeward Iſlands, to Lord George Germain, dated St. Lucia, Morne Fortunée, December 31, 1778.

MY LORD,

The troops deſtined for the Weſt-Indies were put under my orders the 24th of October. The embarkation being completed, I received Sir Henry Clinton's inſtructions the 29th, and we ſailed from Sandy Hook the 3d of November, in a gale of wind that continued ſeveral days; notwithſtanding of which Commodore Hotham, by his care and attention, contrived to keep the fleet together, and brought us ſafe to Barbadoes the 10th of December, without the loſs of a tranſport.

The Count d'Eſtaing by chance, certainly not from information, ſailed from Boſton the very day we left the Hook. His fleet was diſperſed in the gale of wind, which our tranſports weathered. He was, however, in courſe of the voyage, ſo near us with a part of his ſquadron, that a brigantine with horſes, which we loſt the 27th of November in the night, fell into d'Eſtaing's hands the next day.

Having fixed the plan of debarkation with Admiral Barrington, the fleet ſailed from Barbadoes the 12th of December.

The reſerve, which conſiſts of the 5th regiment, the grenadiers, and light infantry of the army, was landed at the Grand Cul de Sac, upon the iſland of St. Lucia, the 13th in the evening, with which Brigadier-General Meadows forced the heights upon the north ſide of the Bay, which were occupied by the Chevalier de Micoud, with the French troops under his command, and the militia of the iſland. He took a field-piece which fired upon the boats that carried the troops aſhore, and a four-gun battery which annoyed the ſhipping at the entrance of the harbour.

Brigadier-General Preſcott having been landed with five regiments, guarded the environs of the Bay, and his advanced poſts kept a communication with the reſerve, which marched the 14th in the morning at day-break, and ſupported by General Preſcott, took poſſeſſion of Morne Fortunée, the Governor's houſe, the hoſpital, the barracks, with all the ſtores and magazines belonging to the iſland, Monſieur de Micoud being obliged to retire from poſt to poſt, having made in fact the beſt defence he could. General Preſcott was ſent to take poſſeſſion of all the batteries, to put them in a ſtate of defence, to appoint artillery, officers, and men to command them, and to fix poſts for their ſupport.

General Meadows, after a ſhort halt, was directed to continue his march, and to occupy the important poſt of the Vigie, which commands the north ſide of the Carenage Harbour.

Brigadier-General Sir Henry Calder, with four battalions guarded the landing-place, kept up the communication with the fleet, and occupied ſeveral poſts upon the mountains, which look down upon and command the ſouth-ſide of the Grand Cul de Sac, from whence it afterwards appeared that the French intended to bombard our ſhips, if they had not been prevented by our prior poſſeſſion of ground from which we could not be forced.

The laſt white flag was not ſtruck an hour before the French fleet and army were diſcovered from the Gouvernement, juſt become my quarters.

The 15th in the morning, the French fleet ſtood in for the Carenage, believing that we had not got poſſeſſion of the iſland; but the Languedoc being fired upon and ſtruck by one of our own batteries, M. d'Eſtaing favoured favoured us with a broadſide, and then bore away with his fleet and tranſports. They in appearance were much diſconcerted, and at a loſs how to act; but at laſt, after much heſitation, they bore down with twelve ſail of the line upon our little fleet, which covered the tranſports with our proviſions in the Grand Cul de Sac. He made two attacks upon Admiral Barrington, one in the morning, and the other after dinner, both without effect.

The 16th d'Eſtaing landed about 9000 men, which had been collected from the French iſlands, with an intention to take poſſeſſion of Barbadoes, Grenada, and St. Vincent; in ſhort, according to our information from French reports, every Britiſh ſettlement in the Weſt-Indies.

The 17th in the morning, I withdrew two advanced picquets from poſts which I never intended to defend, and from whence a ſhot was not fired. That move, I imagined, encouraged the enemy to attack General Meadows's corps, which was well poſted in very ſtrong ground upon the Vigie.

The French were formed in three columns, conſiſting of 4000 or 5000 men, commanded by M. d'Eſtaing, the Marquis de Bouille, and Lovendahl. Their two firſt attacks were made with the impetuoſity of Frenchmen, and they were repulſed by the determined bravery of Britons. They made a third attempt, but were ſoon broke, and retreated in confuſion, leaving their killed and wounded in our power. They were permitted to bury the dead, and carry off the wounded. M. d'Eſtaing is by agreement to account for them as priſoners of war.

The diſpoſition made by General Meadows for the defence of his poſt was maſterly. He was wounded in the arm early in the day, but remained in the field, rode about and gave orders every where, till the attack was over. He has never quitted his poſt, and continues to command the reſerve, which the ſurgeons did not think he would have been equal to. Major Harris, who commands the grenadiers, and Major Sir J. Murray, who commands the light infantry, diſtinguiſhed themſelves. The officers and men were brave and determined; they even ſurpaſſed, if poſſible, their uſual ſpirit and bravery. The French artillery that had been taken were of great uſe. The ſhot in the magazines at the different batteries were 100 rounds for each gun. Three twelve-pounders, which were placed upon the Vigie, did amazing execution; and the batteries upon the ſouth ſide of the Bay, which were well ſerved by the artillery, flanked the enemy's columns, annoyed them exceedingly, and obliged a French man of war, which endeavoured to aſſiſt in the attack from the entrance of the harbour, to ſlip her cable.

The enemy had 400 killed upon the ſpot, 500 dangerouſly wounded, ſo as to render them unfit for ſervice, and 600 ſlightly wounded. This is their own account. We had only 10 men killed, and 130 wounded; ſome of them have already joined their corps, and our loſs upon the whole will be under fifty.

This is the moſt difficult country, war was ever made in. It is impoſſible to deſcribe in a letter the complicated ſituation of our poſts, but an incloſed ſketch will give his Majeſty a very clear idea of the poſition taken by the fleets and armies. Monſieur d'Eſtaing, without ſeeming to have formed any plan for recovering the iſland, remained with his fleet and army till the 28th. He embarked his troops that night, and went off the 29th in the morning.

The moment he was gone, Monſieur de Micoud and the inhabitants offered to capitulate. The capitulation was ſigned the 30th, by which your Lordſhip will ſee, that they obtained favourable terms, though they were at our mercy, and without hopes of aſſiſtance. It is to be hoped it will have a good effect.

The fleet and army act with the greateſt unanimity. It is a pleaſure to ſerve with Admiral Barrington, Commodore Hotham, and the gentlemen of the navy in general, The Commodore took a fatherly care of us from New York, and brought us ſafe to Barbadoes, without the loſs of a tranſport.

Captain Hamerton, my aid-de-camp, who goes in the Weaſel, will have the honour to deliver my diſpatches to your Lordſhip, and can inform you of circumſtances which I have omitted, or that have not occurred to me.

I have the honour to be, &c.

JAMES GRANT.

Admiralty-Office, March 24, 1779.

Copy of a Letter from the Honourable Rear-Admiral Barrington, to Mr. Stephens.

[Quadruplicate.]

Prince of Wales, in the Grand Cul de Sac in the Iſland of St. Lucia, December 23, 1778, at Night.

SIR,

In my letter of the 24th of laſt month, from Barbadoes (No. 21.) I informed you of the Venus's arrival there with an account of Commodore Hotham's being on his way to join you; and you will now pleaſe to acquaint my Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty, that the Commodore arrived there the 10th inſtant, with his Majeſty's ſhips the Nonſuch, St. Alban, Preſton, Centurion, Iſis, and Carcaſs, and fifty-nine tranſports, having on board 5000 troops, under the command of Major-General Grant.

To ſave time, and prevent the confuſion naturally ariſing from a change of ſignals among the tranſports, I adopted thoſe of the Commodore; and, directing him to lead with the landing diviſion, put to ſea the 12th in the morning, in order to carry into execution their Lordſhips ſecret inſtructions, and about three o'clock on the day following, anchored there with the whole ſquadron, except the Ariadne, Ceres, Snake, Barbadoes, and Pelican, which I had ſtationed along the coaſt to intercept any veſſels attempting to eſcape from the land.

More than half the troops were landed the ſame morning, under the direction of the Commodore, aſſiſted by the Captains Griffith, Braithwaite, and Onſlow, and the remainder the next morning, the 14th, when they immediately got poſſeſſion of the Carenage; and it was my intention to have removed the tranſports thither thither as ſoon as poſſible, had not that meaſure been prevented by the appearance of the French fleet under Count de d'Eſtaing, of which I received notice in the evening by ſignal from the Ariadne.

It therefore became neceſſary to ſecure the tranſports as well as we could in the Bay, and the whole night was accordingly employed in warping them within the ſhips of war, and diſpoſing of the latter in a line acroſs the entrance, the Iſis to windward, rather inclining into the Bay, and the Prince of Wales, being the moſt powerful ſhip, the outermoſt and the leeward, and the Venus, Aurora, and Ariadne, flanking the ſpace between the Iſis and the ſhore, to prevent the enemy's forcing a paſſage that way.

Almoſt all the tranſports had fortunately got within the line before half paſt eleven in the morning of the 15th, when the Count thought proper to bear down and attack us with ten ſail of the line, happily without doing us any material injury; and at four in the afternoon he made a ſecond attack upon us with twelve ſail of the line, with no other ſucceſs, however, than killing two men, and wounding ſeven on board the Prince of Wales, and alſo wounding one on board the Ariadne, who is ſince dead. But I have reaſon to believe the enemy received conſiderable damage, as their manœuvres betrayed great confuſion, and one of their ſhips in particular, which fell to leeward, ſeemed diſabled from carrying the neceſſary ſail to get to windward again.

The next day, the 16th, the Count ſhowed a diſpoſition to attack us a third time, but on the appearance of a frigate ſtanding for his fleet, with ſeveral ſignals flying, he plied to windward, and in the evening anchored off Gros Iſlet, about two leagues from us, where he ſtill continues with ten frigates, beſides his 12 ſail of the line; and notwithſtanding this ſuperiority of force, he has been accompanied from his firſt appearance by ſeveral American privateers, one of them commanded by the outlaw Cunningham, who laſt winter infeſted the coaſt of Portugal.

That night and the following day the enemy landed a large body of troops from a number of ſloops and ſchooners, which had anchored in Du Choc Bay, and the 18th made a ſpirited attack both by land and ſea, on the poſt at the Carenage, but met with a very ſevere check having been repulſed with great carnage, by a ſmall detachment of our troops under Brigadier-General Meadows.

They have attempted nothing of conſequence ſince, and what may be their future plan of operations I cannot conjecture; but their continuance at anchor has offered us an opportunity not only of getting in all the cruizers, except the Ceres, and all the tranſports except one (with only the baggage of the officers of three companies on board) which has fallen into the enemy's hands, but alſo of ſtrengthening ourſelves by warping the ſhips of war farther into the Bay, and making the line more compact, removing the Venus aſtern of the Prince of Wales, to flank that paſſage, and erecting batteries at each point of the Bay; that to the northward under the direction of the Captains Cumming and Robertſon, and that to the ſouthward under Captain Ferguſon.

This being the ſituation of the ſquadron, and the army being in poſſeſſion of all the ſtrong holds in the neighbourhood of the Bay, ſuch a ſpirit of cheerfulneſs, unanimity, and reſolution, actuates the whole of our little force, both by land and ſea, notwithſtanding the amazing fatigue they have undergone, that we are under no apprehenſions from any attempts the enemy may meditate; and from the accounts which have been tranſmitted to me from Captain Linzee of the Pearl, who arrived at Barbadoes the 13th inſtant, that Vice-Admiral Byron was to ſail from Rhode Iſland for Barbadoes the 19th of laſt month, with ſixteen ſail of the line, and ſeveral frigates, there is every reaſon to hope he will ſoon be here; in which caſe, affairs in this country muſt ſoon take a very deciſive turn in favour of his Majeſty's arms.

Should any unforeſeen accident, however, prevent the Vice-Admiral's arrival, their Lordſhip's will nevertheleſs be pleaſed to aſſure his Majeſty, that every thing which can poſſibly be done by ſo ſmall a body of troops, and ſo few ſhips, againſt a force ſo very ſuperior, will be effected.

I cannot conclude my letter without acquainting you, that, in all probability, our operations here have hitherto ſaved the iſlands of St. Vincent and Grenada, which we underſtand from ſome officers who are priſoners, were the object of Count d'Eſtaing's expedition, when a ſloop that had eſcaped from this iſland falling in with him, and giving him notice of our being here, directed his attention towards us.

I am, &c.

SAM. BARRINGTON.

P. S. I have the ſatisfaction to add, that this morning the ſquadron got poſſeſſion of an American privateer of eighteen guns, called the Bunker's Hill, which at day-break was diſcovered within reach of our guns; and having ſtruck upon finding ſhe could not eſcape, the boats towed her within the line before any of the French fleet could get to her aſſiſtance. She ſailed from Salem the 2d inſtant, and was intended to cruize fifteen leagues to windward of Barbadoes, but had miſſed that iſland, and fallen to leeward.

Extract of a Letter from the Hon. Rear-Admiral Barrington to Mr. Stephens.

[Triplicate.]

Prince of Wales, in the Grand Cul de Sac, in the Iſland of St. Lucia, January 6th, 1779.

You will herewith receive the duplicate of a letter I wrote to you on the 23d and 24th of laſt month (No. 23), and diſpatched to Governor Hay of Barbadoes, to be forwarded from thence to England by ſome faſt ſailing veſſel, that my Lords Commiſſioners of the admiralty might have it in their power to refute any miſrepreſentation repreſentation which the Count D'Eſtaing may have tranſmitted to his court, of the ſituation and ſtrength of his Majeſty's forces in theſe ſeas.

From the ſtate of inactivity in which the Count continued for ſeveral days after, I began to conceive it was his intention to form a blockade, with a view of ſtarving us into a ſurrender; but to my utter aſtoniſhment, on the morning of the 29th (having reimbarked his troops during the preceding night) he retired with his whole force towards Martinique, and left us in quiet poſſeſſion of the iſland, which capitulated whilſt his fleet was ſtill in ſight."

It was attacked by the French in 1781, as appears by the following Extract of a Letter from the Honourable Major-General Vaughan to Lord George Germaine, dated Barbadoes, June 16th, 1781.

My Lord,

On the 10th of May, the French fleet, conſiſting of twenty-four ſhips of the line and frigates, landed troops at St. Lucia, and ſummoned Pigeon Iſland to ſurrender; but on viewing the Vigie and Morne, with other parts of the iſland under military government, they judged it prudent to re-embark their troops, and quitted St. Lucia very quickly.

On this occaſion I beg leave to obſerve, for your Lordſhip's kind repreſentation to his Majeſty, the very great exertions and attention ſhewn by Brigadier-General St. Leger, who commands in that iſland, to its ſtrength and ſecurity, and the great ardour and chearfulneſs with which the troops in that important poſt have executed their duty; and permit me, my Lord, to add, that I conſider myſelf and the ſervice much indebted to the alacrity and aid given by Captain Robert Linzee and Captain Rodney, and the other officers and ſeamen of his Majeſty's frigates, poſted at the Vigie and Pigeon Iſland at the time the enemy made their landing.

Nor can I omit taking notice of the very ſpirited and meritorious part of the merchants, who embodied themſelves for the defence of his Majeſty's iſland.

On this expedition of the enemy to St. Lucia, the only loſs on our part, that I have heard, is a few ſick men of the 46th regiment, which, with their comforts and neceſſaries, they carried off.

Upon the 27th, hearing that a flying ſquadron of the enemy had appeared near Tobago; Sir George Rodney diſpatched Rear-Admiral Drake with ſix ſail of the line, and ſome frigates, in which were the 69th regiment, a flank company of the 60th, and a volunteer company, under the command of Brigadier-General Skeene, to ſuccour and relieve that iſland. On the Rear-Admiral's approach, finding the whole French fleet had inveſted the iſland, he apprized Sir George Rodney of it, and returned with his ſquadron to form a junction with the reſt of the fleet. On receiving this information the 2d current, I immediately embarked with Admiral Rodney, who ſailed on the 3d, with the whole fleet, to the relief of Tobago. Arriving on the 4th near the iſland, we ſent on ſhore an officer to procure the neceſſary intelligence, and guides to conduct the troops to relieve the garriſon. On his return I was informed that the iſland had capitulated, a circumſtance I learned with much concern; but not having received any accounts as yet from that quarter, prevents my giving your Lordſhip the particulars.

Copy of a Letter from Brigadier-General St. Leger, to Major-General Vaughan, dated St. Lucia, May 14, 1781.

Sir,

From what I could obſerve of the motions of the enemy at Martinico, I was convinced they meant an attack on this iſland, which made me very diligent in preparing for them. On Thurſday the 10th inſtant they embarked at St. Ann's, and that evening landed at L'Eſperance and Port Dauphin. They had twenty-five ſail of the line and ſome frigates, which kept abreaſt and to windward of Pigeon Iſland. The next morning early, the 11th, they took poſſeſſion of Gros-Iſlet, and ſummoned Pigeon Iſland to ſurrender, which was rejected with proper contempt. They advanced detachments to take poſſeſſion of the heights oppoſite the Morne Fortunée, where we diſcovered them at day-break on the 12th, after a tireſome march. About one o'clock P. M. their fleet came to an anchor in Choc Bay, their windward ſhips juſt within reach of Pigeon Iſland battery, which ſtruck ſeveral of them, made them weigh, and come to an anchor out of ſhot. I was much pleaſed to ſee that battery ſo effectual againſt every ſhip that came within reach of its guns. This movement of their fleet induced me to think they either intended to land their marines, or take on board their advanced detachments; it proved the latter, which they did that night; the reſt re-embarked to the windward of Gros-Iſlet; their numbers I have not yet been able to learn; they were commanded by the Marquis De Bouille and a major-general. Their deſign was to cut off the 46th regiment, and make a puſh at the Morne Fortunée; being diſappointed in that, and having reconnoitred this hill (from a neighbouring plantation), which they found very well prepared for them, they thought proper to retreat. Juſt as the enemy was preparing to land, the Thetis, Santa Monica, and Sybil frigates, with the Scourge ſloop, were off the Carenage; Captain Linzee of the Santa Monica, came up to the Morne, to conſult what was beſt to be done for the good of the ſervice. I ſtrongly recommended their coming into the Carenage, which they did, and afforded a great ſtrength to the garriſon. The Thetis unfortunately ſtruck on a rock, and is now ſunk near the Cornwall. Captain Robert Linzee made every effort to ſave his ſhip; that being impoſſible, he came up with his men to Morne Fortunée, where he was of eſſential ſervice. Captain Linzee of the Santa Monica commanded in the Carenage, and had the direction of the Vigie, which was well manned, as well as all the batteries, with the captains of merchantmen and their ſailors. Upon the enemy's firſt appearing I formed all the Engliſh in the Carenage into a corps of militia, who ſhewed a great deal of ſpirit. I aſſure your Excellency the troops and ſailors have gone through a great deal of fatigue, in preparing for the enemy, with more more chearfulneſs than I am able to deſcribe. Though I have every reaſon to believe all their troops are re-embarked, I ſhall be very much upon my guard againſt any coup they may hereafter meditate. Captain Linzee and I have thought it right to diſpatch the Scourge in ſearch of Sir George Rodney, to let him know how matters ſtand, and have diſpatched a ſchooner to Barbadoes, to put them on their guard.

On the approach of the enemy, on the 10th, a ſloop went off for Barbadoes, by which I wrote to General Cunningham; as I firmly believed, if they did not attack me, they would go there.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) A. St. Leger.

A Diſpatch, dated St. Lucia, April 4, 1794, received from General Sir Charles Grey, K. B.—ſays:

In my diſpatch of the 25th ultimo, I had the happineſs to acquaint you of the ſurrender of Fort Bourbon (now Fort George) and the Iſland of Martinico, on that day; and that I would not loſe time to embark troops, ordnance, &c. to proſecute vigorouſly ſuch other objects and ſervices as his Majeſty had been pleaſed to entruſt me with the execution of.

I have the honour to acquaint you with the further ſucceſs of his Majeſty's arms, in the conqueſt of this fine iſland; the French garriſon, under the command of General Ricard, in the works on Morne Fortunée, having marched out and laid down their arms this morning by nine o'clock; at which time his Royal Highneſs Prince Edward, with his brigade of grenadiers, and Major-General Dundas, with his brigade of light infantry, marched in and took poſſeſſion. On the 13th ultimo the brigade of grenadiers, commanded by his Royal Highneſs Prince Edward; the brigade of light infantry, by Major-General Dundas; and the 6th, 9th, and 43d regiments, by Colonel Sir Charles Gordon, with engineers, &c. under Colonel Durnford, and a detachment of royal artillery, with ſome light ordnance, under Lieutenant-Colonel Paterſon, embarked on board his Majeſty's ſhips in the Bay of Fort Royal, having left the tranſports and heavy artillery at Martinico; and alſo left there the 15th, 39th, 56th, 58th, 64th, and 70th regiments, artillery, &c. as a garriſon, under Lieutenant-General Preſcott, Brigadier-General Whyte, and Colonel Myers; but that day proving very rainy, hazy, and calm, we did not ſail till the 31ſt, and reached St. Lucia the 1ſt inſtant. Every neceſſary matter being previouſly concerted and arranged with the Admiral, we proceeded, and effected three different landings with little reſiſtance, and no loſs, viz. Major-General Dundas's diviſion, conſiſting of the 3d battalion of light infantry under Lieutenant-Colonel Cloſe, and conducted by Captain Kelly and Lord Garlies of the navy, at Ance Du Cap; and the 2d light infantry, under Lieutenant-Colonel Blundell, conducted by Commodore Thompſon, at Ance De Choc, who were ordered to join, taking the enemy's batteries in reverſe, and to occupy a near poſition for the purpoſe of inveſting the works of Morne Fortunée, on the ſide of the Carenage, which was executed with the uſual ſpirit and ability of that Major-General, and the flank battalions. His Royal Highneſs Prince Edward's diviſion, the 1ſt and 3d grenadiers, diſembarked at Marigot Des Roſeaux, immediately under the Admiral's own direction, aſſiſted by Captain Hervey, and immediately proceeded to co-operate with Major-General Dundas, to inveſt Morne Fortunée. Lieutenant-Colonel Coote, with the 1ſt battalion of light infantry, did not diſembark till ſeven o'clock the ſame evening from the Boyne, and landed at Ance De La Tocque, proceeded to and took the four gun battery of Ciceron, inveſting Morne Fortunée on that ſide, at the ſame time covering Cul De Sac, or Barrington Bay for our ſhipping, which anchored there next morning, the 2d inſtant. The 2d grenadiers, and Colonel Sir Charles Gordon's brigade (the 6th, 9th, and 43d regiments), were kept in reſerve on board ſhip. About ſeven o'clock in the evening of the 2d inſtant, Lieutenant-Colonel Coote, with four light companies, ſtormed a redoubt and two batteries by my order, cloſe to the enemy's principal works on the Morne, killed two officers and near thirty men, made one priſoner, and releaſed one Britiſh ſailor from captivity, ſpiking ſix pieces of cannon. The ability and meritorious conduct of that excellent officer Colonel Coote, on this enterprize, are ſuch as do him the higheſt honour, and cannot be ſurpaſſed, in which he was ſo well ſupported by the whole detachment; particularly by Major Evatt, Captains Buchanan, Croſbie, Welch, J. Grey, aid-du-camp to the Commander in Chief, and Stobin; and by Major of Brigade Viſſcher, with Lieutenant Drozier, and the detachment of Royal Artillery, who ſpiked the guns

The exemplary good conduct of the brigade of grenadiers, under the immediate command of his Royal Highneſs Prince Edward, and of the brigade of light infantry, under Major-General Dundas, and, indeed, of all the troops, affords me the higheſt ſatisfaction.

When his Royal Highneſs Prince Edward had hoiſted the Britiſh colours on Morne Fortunée, the name of it was changed to Fort Charlotte; and the entire conqueſt of this iſland has been effected without the loſs of a man, although there has been a good deal of cannonading from the enemy's batteries and works.

I tranſmit the colours to be preſented to his Majeſty. Captain Finch Maſon, one of my aids-de-camp, will have the honour of preſenting this diſpatch, being an officer well-qualified to give any further information you may deſire to receive.

I tranſmit herewith a general return of ordnance and ſtores found in the Fort of Morne Fortunée, and alſo a general return of the batteries on the coaſt of St. Lucia.

J. PATERSON, Lieutenant-Colonel, commanding the Royal Artillery.

Blanche, Carenage, St. Lucia, April 18, 1795.

SIR,

I beg to acquaint you, that I have juſt arrived at this place, (for the purpoſe of returning their boats to the tranſports), from Vieux Fort, which town and its vicinity, I have the ſatisfaction to inform you, the enemy abandoned the day before yeſterday, and which was immediately taken poſſeſſion of by Brigadier-General Stewart and his Majeſty's troops. I forthwith got under weigh from the place where we had diſembarked the troops, and came to an anchor off the town of Vieux Fort, where I found an empty French ſloop and ſchooner, and an American brig, partly laden with produce.

My ſtay at Vieux Fort, after the capture of the place, was not ſufficient to enable me to tranſmit you an account of the ſtores and ammunition found there; but I underſtand that there was in the church and other large buildings a conſiderable quantity of proviſions and ſome produce.

I have the pleaſure to inform you, that yeſterday, in my way hither, I had the good fortune to capture a ſmall privateer, which, for the preſent, I uſe for a tender. I am now getting under weigh to return to Vieux Fort, for the purpoſe of co-operating with the Brigadier-General in his future plans; and I hope very ſhortly to be able to inform you that Souffriere, which is the principal poſt of the enemy, is once more reduced to his Majeſty's authority, and that peace and tranquillity are again reſtored to this colony.

(Signed) C. SAWYER.

Blanche, Choiſeul, St. Lucia, April 23, 1795.

It is with much concern I relate to you that the enemy, with a force infinitely ſuperior to any Brigadier-General Stewart imagined they could collect, attacked the troops under his command yeſterday, on their march to Souffriere; and, after an engagement which laſted ſeven hours, compelled them to retreat to this place. I am ſorry to obſerve our loſs has been very conſiderable.

We are now embarking the troops, with which the General propoſes to return to Vieux Fort, which place he thinks his preſent force equal to maintain.

As Negroes could not be procured to drag the cannon, the General applied to me for men to aſſiſt the ſoldiers in that fatiguing duty. I accordingly ſent Lieutenant Barrett on ſhore, with twenty ſeamen, and ten marines, for that purpoſe. I feel it my duty to inform you, Sir, that the General expreſſes, in the ſtrongeſt terms, his approbation of Lieutenant Barrett's conduct in this inſtance, as alſo that of the ſeamen and marines under his command.

C. SAWYER.

Diſpatches from General the Honourable Sir John Vaughan, 22d and 23d of June.

It is with infinite concern I acquaint you, that Brigadier-General Stewart, was under the neceſſity of evacuating the Iſland of St. Lucia on the 19th inſtant.

The natural ſtrength of Morne Fortunée had encouraged me to hope that I ſhould be able to maintain that poſt until the arrival of a reinforcement; but by the capture of Pigeon Iſland, when leaſt expected, and the ſubſequent loſs of the Vigie on the 17th inſtant, on which alone depended our uninterrupted communication with the Carenage, this evacuation was judged abſolutely unavoidable. It accordingly took place on the evening of the 18th, and was happily effected undiſcovered by the enemy.

We are indebted to the great aſſiduity and uncommon exertions of Captain Barrett, of his Majeſty's ſhip Experiment, that the garriſon was brought off with the loſs of only a few ſick, who were unavoidably left behind.

I have the honour to forward you ſome letters, which will give you a full account of the ſucceſs that has attended his Majeſty's arms in the Iſland of Dominique. The whole body of the enemy, amounting to 400, having conſented to become priſoners of war, has relieved us from the anxiety we were under for the fate of that iſland.

Extract of a Letter from Lieutenant-Colonel Edward Madden to Sir John Vaughan, dated Prince Rupert's, June 22. 1795.

Captain Bathe, having made a moſt judicious diſpoſition of his detachment, ſo as nearly to ſurround the enemy in both their encampments, on the 17th inſtant the firſt encampment ſent in a flag, requeſting liberty to lay down their arms, which Captain Bathe aſſented to. Captain Bathe on the 19th inſtant ſent a flag to the ſecond encampment, offering the ſame terms that had been granted to the firſt, which they immediately ſubmitted to. I have now twenty-five officers priſoners here, two they call generals, and 249 rank and file. Captain Bathe, who is ſtill in camp, has ſeventy-nine more with him.

Extract of a Letter from Lieutenant-Colonel Madden to Sir John Vaughan, dated Prince Rupert's, June 27.

The invaſion of and the rebellion in this iſland is now entirely ſettled, every Frenchman that landed being either killed or priſoner, and the inhabitants of the rebellious pariſhes ſent priſoners to Roſeau, there to be diſpoſed of by the Governor.

The following Diſpatches were received from the Weſt Indies reſpecting the Forces deſtined for the taking of St. Lucia.

Head-quarters, St. Lucia, May 2, 1796.

I have the honour to inform you, that on the 22d of April the fleet, with the troops deſtined for the attack of St. Lucia, ſailed from Carliſle Bay, and anchored on the evening of the 23d in Marin Bay, Martinique, Admiral Sir John Laforey ſtill retaining the command. On the 24th Sir John reſigned the command to Rear-Admiral Sir Hugh C. Chriſtian, K. B. and on the evening of the 26th we ſailed for St. Lucia. The diſpoſition for landing was arranged in the following manner. Major-General Campbell was ordered to diſembark with 1000 men at Longueville's Bay, which he accordingly effected without oppoſition, except ſome ſhots fired from Pidgeon Iſland.

In the morning of the 27th, he advanced to Choc Bay. As ſoon as the head of the column began to appear, the centre diviſion of the army diſembarked near the village of Choc, upon which about 500 men, who had faintly oppoſed Major-General Campbell on his march, retired from Angier's plantation to Morne Chabot. This Morne is one of the ſtrongeſt and moſt commanding poſts in the neighbourhood of Morne Fortunée, and as it was abſolutely neceſſary to occupy it to be able to inveſt Morne Fortunée on the north ſide, two detachments from the army, under the command of Brigadier-General Moore and Brigadier-General Hope, were ordered to march that evening to attack it on two different ſides. Brigadier-General Moore marched at twelve that night, by the moſt circuitous road, with ſeven companies of the 53d regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Abercromby, and 100 of Malcolm's rangers, with fifty of Lewenſtein's. Brigadier-General Hope, with 350 men of the 57th, 150 of Malcolm's, and fifty of Lewenſtein's took the ſhorter road.

From a miſcalculation of time, ariſing from the information of guides, Brigadier-General Moor's diviſion fell in with the advanced piquet of the enemy an hour and a half earlier than was expected, Finding that his march was diſcovered, and that it was impoſſible to halt the troops, who, from the narrowneſs of the path, were obliged to march in ſingle files, the Brigadier inſtantly decided to riſk the attack with his own diviſion, in which he was well ſeconded by the ſpirit of the troops, who formed with all the expedition which the ground would admit of, and after a conſiderable reſiſtance carried the poſt. Brigadier-General Hope's diviſion marched with ſo much preciſion that they arrived exactly at the hour appointed; and if fortunately the attack could have been executed as was directed, the whole force of the enemy would have fallen. Brigadier-General Moore ſpeaks handſomely of the behaviour of the troops under his command. A return of the loſs is herewith incloſed. From forty to fifty of the enemy were found killed, and 200 ſtand of arms, with ſome ammunition taken. The next day Brigadier-General Moore occupied Morne Duchaſſaux, in the rear of Morne Fortunée.

The diviſion under the command of Major-General Morſhead, which was deſtined to land at Ance La Ray, did not complete their diſembarkation for ſome days, owing to their ſhips falling to leeward. They are now in poſſeſſion of the bar of the Grand Cul De Sac, and inveſt Morne Fortunée on the ſouth ſide.

It is impoſſible to deſcribe the difficulty of communication in this country, and as Morne Fortunée is now in a reſpectable ſtate of defence, it will require time and much labour to erect the neceſſary batteries to reduce it.

Yeſterday the enemy attacked the advanced poſt of the grenadiers, who are commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Macdonald, of the 55th regiments, but were repulſed with conſiderable loſs, though I am ſorry to add that we had ſeveral officers and forty or fifty men killed and wounded, a return of which I herewith incloſe. The only officer killed was Captain Kerr of the York rangers, the reſt are ſlightly wounded, among whom is Major Napier of the 63d.

From the beſt information I can obtain, the enemy have a garriſon of about 2000 well-diſciplined black troops, ſome hundred whites, and a number of black people who have taken refuge in the fortreſs.

Sir Hugh Chriſtian has, upon every occaſion, exerted himſelf to afford me every poſſible aſſiſtance from the royal navy.

RA. ABERCROMBY.

P. S. I ſhould be guilty of a great omiſſion, if I did not particularly mention the zeal and intelligence of Lieutenant-Colonel Roſs, of the 21ſt infantry, in Brigadier-General Moore's attack on the 28th of April, at Morne Chabot. To this officer I am under great obligations.

Liſt of killed, wounded, &c.

In the 53d regiment of foot, on the 28th of April, 1796; 1 drummer, 12 rank and file killed; 1 captain, 2 lieutenants, 2 ſerjeants, 44 rank and file wounded; 2 drummer, 8 rank and file miſſing.

Return at the out-posts under Lieutenant-Colonel Macdonald, May 1, 1796; general battalion.—5 rank and file killed; 2 officers, 15 rank and file wounded. 48th foot.—1 rank and file killed; 1 officer, 1 serjeant, 10 rank and file wounded.—York Rangers. 1 officer, 4 rank and file killed; 1 officer, 8 rank and file wounded.

Names of officers killed and wounded.

Major Napier and Lieutenant Tonins, of the battalion of grenadiers wounded.—Captain Coghlan, 1ſt Weſt India regiment, attached to the 48th regiment wounded.—Captain Kerr, York Rangers, killed.—Captain Baker, ditto wounded.

Thunderer, Choc Bay, St. Lucia, May 4, 1796.

I tranſmit a duplicate of my letter of the 21ſt of laſt month, by which their Lordſhips will have been informed of my arrival at Barbadoes.

The ſquadron and tranſports weighed on the next day; and on the 23d, at ſeven P. M. anchored in Martin Bay, Martinico. The day following Admiral Sir John Laforey reſigned the command of the ſquadron, and ſailed with the Majeſtic.

I made the ſignal to prepare to ſail early the next morning; and quitted Martin Bay, with his Majeſty's ſquadron and troops, about the cloſe of day.

The time for preparation was but ſhort, the Admiral having propoſed to make his arrangement for the expedition in Martin Bay; but I felt the neceſſity of prompt exertion, and therefore ventured upon a haſty arrangement rather than delay the ardour of the troops, or loſe time in ſo advanced a ſeaſon. The General's plan of attack required ſupport in three ſeparate diviſions by ſhips of force; the firſt was to take place in Longueville Bay, at Ance Du Cap and Ance Bequene; the ſecond in the Choc Bay; and the third at Ance La Raye, ſome diſtance to the ſouthward of the Cul De Sac.

The firſt point of landing was commanded by a battery of five guns, placed on the low point of Pigeon Iſland; and it was ſuppoſed that another battery commanded the Bay of Longueville.

I therefore directed the Vengeance, Ganges, Hebe, and Pelican brig, to cover this landing, with inſtructions for the Hebe to lead into Ance Du Cap, the Ganges to ſupport her, and the Pelican to anchor in the Ance Bequene. The Vengeance I kept upon the weather-beam of the Aſtrea, in order that ſhe might, if neceſſary, cover the Ganges, by anchoring in the angle of Pigeon Iſland battery. The poſition was taken by the three ſhips with great ſpirit and judgment: the fire from the ſhips kept the battery at check, diſmounted one of the guns, and the troops landed without oppoſition.

The ſecond diviſion was directed to be led by the Alfred to the anchorage of Choc Bay; the third by Captain Dilkes, of the Madras, ſupported by the Beaulieu. A ſtrong lee current had driven the body of the tranſports ſo far to leeward, that it was not poſſible to effect the landing in Choc Bay; and the one intended for Ance La Raye was, for the ſame reaſons deſerted; but the Vengeance, Arethuſa, and Victorieuſe brig, were ordered to take the ſeveral covering ſtations in Choc Bay at break of day on the 27th, when the landing was effected at half paſt ten A. M. and equally without oppoſition. The ſignal was made at the ſame time to Captain Dilkes to put his orders into execution, but this diviſion did not land until the 28th.

The enemy retreated from their diſtant ports, and have entered the Morne Fortunée, which height the General is ſurrounding and preparing to attack, to aſſiſt the meaſure; I have, in conſequence of the General's requiſition to that effect, landed 300 ſeamen, under the command of Captain Lane, of the Aſtrea, and Captain Rymes, of the Bull Dog.

The General directed, on the 2d inſtant, an attack to be made againſt the batteries on the northern ſide of the Grand Cul De Sac, with a view to obtain that anchorage, and thereby facilitate the landing artillery and erecting batteries: the attack was propoſed to take place at day-break on the 3d, by three columns, commanded by Major-General Morſhead: two of the columns reached, with ſucceſs, their directed ſtations; but the centre column having met with ſome unexpected difficulty, did not effect their junction

The Madras, Beaulieu, Pelican, and Victorieuſe were to ſupport this attack; the Beaulieu had three ſeamen ſlightly wounded, and the head of her foremaſt injured. The attack on ſhore not having been ſucceſsful, the Madras and Beaulieu have returned to Marigot Des Rouſſeaux, to co-operate with Major-General Morſhead.

It would be unjuſt to the merit of Captain M'Doual, of the Ganges, and the officers acting under him at Bay Longueville, were I to omit reporting their juſt claim to my commendation; Captain Rymes, of the Bull Dog, and Captain Meares, of the tranſport department, commanded the diviſion of boats at Longueville Bay.

Captain Evans, of the Fury, Dobrée, of the Woolwich, and Captain Hill and Lieutenant Skipſey, of the tranſport ſervice, commanded the ſeveral diviſions of flat boats at Choc and Ance La Raye landing, and I had good reaſon to be ſatisfied with their aſſiduity and proper exertions.

The natural ſtrength of this country is ſuch, that time and great exertions will be neceſſary for its reduction. There exiſts the moſt perfect deſire, on the part of the officers and ſeamen of the ſquadron, to ſhare the fatigue and hazard with the army; and I truſt that this deſire may be kept awake to eſſential advantage.

Head-quarters, St. Lucia, May 4, 1796.

It having been part of the original plan for the inveſtment of the Morne Fortunée, to drive the enemy from the batteries they had on the baſe of the mountain on the ſide of the Grand Cul De Sac, and by that means to open this bay to the ſhips of war, it naturally fell to the ſhare of Major-General Morſhead to execute this ſervice.

To render the ſucceſs more ſecure, Brigadier-General Hope was detached from the ſide of Morne Chabot with 350 men of the 42d regiment, the light company of the 57th regiment, and part of Malcolm's corps, on the night of the 2d of May, ſupported by the 55th regiment, which was poſted at Ferrands; and yeſterday morning Major-General Morſhead was ordered to march in two colums, the right to croſs the river of the Grand Cul De Sac, at Cool, and the left at the mouth of the ſame river, where it falls into the Bay of the Grand Cul De Sac. Major-General Morſhead being taken ill, was obliged to reſign the command to Brigadier-General Perryn.

Brigadier-General Hope carried the battery of Seche, within a ſhort diſtance of the works of the Morne Fortunée, with an inconſiderable loſs, had not the brave Colonel Malcolm unfortunately fallen upon this ſpot. Colonel Riddle, who commanded the column on the left, got poſſeſſion of the lower battery, called Chapuis, and remained poſſeſſed of it for a conſiderable time; but the column under the command of Brigadier-General Perryn, never having croſſed the river at Cool, Lieutenant-Colonel Riddle remained unſupported, and Brigadier-General Hope's diviſion alſo became unconnected, and conſequently placed in a very critical ſituation. From theſe untoward circumſtances, the plan failed in the execution, and the troops retired to their former poſition. The ſhips of war which were deſtined to enter the Cul De Sac, returned to their anchorage. Brigadier-General Hope has mentioned to me the very gallant behaviour of Captain Weſt, who commanded the light company of the 57th regiment.

I have the honour to incloſe herewith a return of the killed, wounded, and miſſing. From the intricate nature of this country, and the difficulty of approaching the Morne Fortunée on any ſide, except by Morne Duchaſſaux, I have been obliged to undertake a laborious communication from Choc Bay to that Morne, and to form a road capable of allowing the tranſportation of heavy artillery.

RA. ABERCROMBY.

St. Lucia, May 22, 1796.

In my letter of the 4th of May, I had the honour to acquaint you of the unſucceſsful attack on the enemy's batteries on the ſide of the Grand Cul De Sac; and as it had been previouſly determined, that the principal attack on the enemy's works ſhould be made on the north ſide of Morne Fortunée by the ridge of Duchaſſeaux, every exertion was made to complete the road for erecting the neceſſary batteries, and to bring forward the artillery and ammunition. On the 16th inſtant the batteries, conſiſting of eighteen pieces of ordnance, were opened. Theſe could only be conſidered in the light of a firſt parallel. The ſecond parallel is now nearly complete, and the lodgment for the laſt or third is to be made to-morrow. If this operation ſhould be attended with the effect expected from it, it is probable that we ſhall, in the courſe of ten or twelve days, be in poſſeſſion of the enemy's works upon Morne Fortunée. It is difficult for me to give an adequate idea of the ground on which we are obliged to act. The natural obſtructions, as well as every obſtacle that the enemy could throw in our way, render the poſt of Morne Fortunée not only reſpectable, but in a high degree difficult to be ſubdued.

As the enemy ſtill retained poſſeſſion of the Vigie, and as they only held it with a ſlender force, it appeared of conſequence to get poſſeſſion of it, as it would ſhorten our line of attack, and cover our right flank; and alſo as it gave us in ſome degree the command of the Carenage. For this purpoſe, on the night of the 17th inſtant, the 31ſt regiment, happening to be the regiment neareſt at hand, was ordered to march immediately after it was dark to take poſſeſſion of the Vigie, where the enemy had not apparently more than from 150 to 200 men. The firſt part of the attack ſucceeded to our wiſh; a battery of three eighteen-pounders, which was feebly defended, was ſeiſed, the guns ſpiked, and thrown over the precipice. There remained on the ſummit of the hill one large gun and a field piece, which the regiment was ordered to take poſſeſſion of; unfortunately the guide was wounded, and the troops became uncertain of the right approach to the hill: while in this ſituation the enemy's grape ſhot took effect to ſuch a degree, as induced Lieutenant-Colonel Hay to order the regiment to retreat, which it did with conſiderable loſs. Lieutenant-Colonel Macdonald handſomely advanced with part of the grenadiers to cover the retreat of the 31ſt regiment, which he accompliſhed. It is proper to obſerve, that a night-attack on the Vigie was indiſpenſably neceſſary, as three batteries of the enemy flanked the neck of land which connects the Vigie with the Main; and in general in this country, when you have to march to attack an enemy's poſt, who have artillery, and where it is impoſſible for you to advance with any on your part, it is almoſt a matter of neceſſity to attack at night.

Hitherto the troops continue healthy, notwithſtanding their exertions and fatigue.

R. ABERCROMBY.

Head-quarters, St. Lucia, May 31, 1796.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th of March. In my letter of the 22d of May, I acquainted you that on the day following we intended to make a lodgement as near to the enemy's works as poſſible. This, however, was deferred, from neceſſity, till the 24th.

The 27th, 53d, and 57th regiments had been previouſly placed near the point of attack. On the morning of the 24th, the 27th regiment lodged themſelves upon two different points, the neareſt of which was not more than five hundred yards from the fort. The enemy made a vigorous effort to diſlodge them, but, by the good conduct and ſpirit of Brigadier-General Moore, and the ſteady and intrepid behaviour of the officers and men of the 27th regiment, the enemy were twice repulſed with conſiderable loſs; and before night the troops were completely under cover: at the ſame time the communication to the poſts occupied by the 27th regiment, was carried on with the utmoſt vigour, and two batteries for eight pieces of artillery were begun.

Upon the evening of the 24th the enemy deſired a ſuſpenſion of arms until noon the next day, which was granted till eight in the morning: a capitulation for the whole iſland enſued, a copy of which I have the honour to incloſe. On the 26th the garriſon, to the amount of two thouſand men, marched out and laid down their arms, and are become priſoners of war. Pigeon Iſland is in our poſſeſſion: the 55th regiment has been detached to Souffriere and Vieux Fort, to receive the ſubmiſſion of the garriſons of thoſe places. From Souffriere we have been informed that peaceable poſſeſſion has been given; from Vieux Fort there is no report. The principal object of the blockade of Morne Fortunée has been obtained. The enemy has been prevented from eſcaping into the woods; their troops, whom they call regulars, have been made priſoners of war, and the armed negroes have been in a conſiderable degree diſarmed.

Our operations have been attended with conſiderable labour and fatigue, roads were every where to be made through a mountainous and rugged country, artillery and ammunition to be carried forward, and the line of inveſtment, extending about ten miles, to be ſupplied with proviſions, without the aſſiſtance of carriages, and with few horſes.

It is but juſtice to the troops to ſay that their conduct has been meritorious; that they have undergone an uncommon ſhare of fatigue with cheerfulneſs, and in ſeveral inſtances have given proofs of the greateſt intrepidity. We are under great obligations to Brigadier-General Knox for planning and executing the road of communication from Choc Bay, by Chabot to Morne Duchaſſeaux. Brigadier General Lloyd, of the royal artillery, and Captain Hay, the chief engineer, may juſtly claim their ſhare of praiſe. Brigadier-General Hope has on all occaſions, moſt willingly come forward and exerted himſelf in times of danger, to which he was not called from his ſituation of adjutant-general.

Rear-Admiral Sir Hugh Chriſtian and the royal navy have never ceaſed to ſhew the utmoſt alacrity in forwarding the public ſervice. To their ſkill and unremitting labour the ſucceſs which has attended his Majeſty's arms is, in a great meaſure due. By their efforts alone the artillery was advanced to the batteries, and every co-operation which could poſſibly be expected or deſired, has been afforded in the fulleſt manner. I have the honour to incloſe the return of killed and wounded during our operations in this iſland; together with a return of the artillery, ſtores, and ammunition, as far as we have been enabled to collect. This will be delivered to you by Major Forbes, my aid-du-camp, whom I beg leave to recommend to your protection.

Articles of capitulation of the iſland of St. Lucia.

I. The iſland of St. Lucia, the Morne Fortunée, and its dependencies, together with all effects belonging to the French Republic, ſhall be faithfully delivered to the generals of the Britiſh forces. — Anſ. Agreed to.

II. Property and perſons of every deſcription ſhall be placed under the protection of the laws; and paſſports ſhall be granted to ſuch perſons as may wiſh to leave the iſland.—Anſ. All property and inhabitants will be ſubject to, and under the protection of, the Engliſh laws. Perſons wiſhing to quit the iſland, muſt obtain the permiſſion of the governor or commander of the iſland.

III. No inhabitant ſhall be diſturbed, moleſted or baniſhed, on account of his opinions, or for having held any place under the French Republic.—Anſ. Agreed to; as anſwered in the ſecond article.

IV. The agent-general, the commander in chief, and the forces of the Republic, who have defended the iſland, ſhall march out with the honours of war, and deliver up their arms; the officers only being allowed to keep their ſwords: they ſhall be treated as priſoners of war, and ſent back to France as ſoon as poſſible.—Anſ. The firſt part of this article granted; but the troops muſt remain priſoners of war until exchanged.

V. The Britiſh forces ſhall take poſſeſſion of the Morne Fortunée at the hour which may be appointed for that purpoſe; and the French garriſon ſhall march out with their arms and baggage, drums beating and colours flying.—Anſ. The fort to be put into the poſſeſſion of the Britiſh troops to-morrow at noon; the garriſon to march out of the fort in the manner deſired. The garriſon to occupy houſes in the neighbourhood of the fort, until veſſels can be provided for their reception.

VI. The garriſon ſhall pile their arms at the place which may be appointed for that purpoſe, and ſhall immediately be ſent to France. The officers ſhall be allowed to take with them their wives and children.—Anſ. The arms to be piled on the glacis without the fort. Anſwer has already been given as to the diſpoſal of the garriſon. The officers may diſpoſe of their wives and children as they pleaſe.

VII. The agent-general of the Executive Directory, his aids-du-camp, ſecretary, and other perſons attached to him, ſhall be allowed to keep all papers and effects belonging to his office. The ſame favour ſhall be granted to the commander in chief and all the officers of the garriſon.—Anſ. Agreed to; but all papers relating to the ſtate of the iſland, public works, and all plans and maps, to be given up.

VIII. The volunteers, ſerving with the French forces, ſhall be allowed to keep their knapſacks.—Anſ. Agreed to, according to the return given in by the commander in chief.

IX. No perſon ſhall be plundered, or inſulted on account of the opinions he has hitherto profeſſed.—Anſ. Agreed to.

X. Two veſſels of the Republic lying in the harbour, ſhall be granted to the agent of the Executive Directory, to ſerve as covered boats. The crews of theſe two veſſels ſhall, however, be conſidered as priſoners

Morne Duchaſſeaux, St. Lucia,
May 25, 1796.

Abſtract of the return of the killed, wounded, and miſſing, in the iſland of St. Lucia, from the 28th of April to the 24th of May inclusive.

At the attack of Morne Chabot, the 28th of April, 1796.—Total 13 killed; 49 (including 1 captain and 2 lieutenants), wounded; 9 miſſing.

Attack at the out-poſts, the 1ſt of May.—Total, 11 killed, (including 1 captain); 38 wounded (including 4 officers).

Attack upon the enemy's batteries, the 3d of May.—Total, 12 killed; 57 wounded, (including 9 officers); 32 miſſing, (including 4 officers).

Attack upon the Vigie, the 17th of May.—Total, 1 lieutenant killed; 116 wounded, (including 6 officers); 67 miſſing, (including 2 officers).

Attack at Ferrand's, the 17th of May.—Total, 1 killed; 26 wounded, (including 2 captains, and 2 enſigns); 14 miſſing.

Attack upon the enemy's advanced poſts at Morne Fortuné, the 24th of May.—Total, 25, (including 1 major), killed; 87 wounded, including 8 officers).

At different attacks from Morne Petit, from the 3d to the 24th of May.—3 killed, and 5 wounded.

Thunderer, Choc Bay, St. Lucia,
SIR, June 1, 1796.

I am to communicate to you, for the information of my Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty, that the iſland of St. Lucia and its dependedcies ſurrendered by capitulation on the 25th of May, and that the Morne was taken poſſeſſion of by his Majeſty's troops on the 26th at noon; the terms of capitulation are herewith tranſmitted.

In the progreſs of the ſiege great difficulties were to be ſurmounted, and much ſervice of fatigue undertaken. The more effectually to aſſiſt the operations of the army, I directed eight hundred ſeamen to land, under the command of Captain Lane, of the Aſtrea, and Captain Ryves, of the Bulldog: the merit of their ſervices will be better reported by the commander in chief of his Majeſty's troops; but I feel it an indiſpenſable duty to acquaint their Lordſhips, that the conduct of the officers and ſeamen equalled my moſt ſanguine expectations, and that it has been in every inſtance highly meritorious.

Captain Lane, of the Aſtrea, is charged with my diſpatches; that officer having ſerved at St. Lucia from the moment of my arrival, will be enabled to afford their Lordſhips correct information of the naval occurrences connected with the ſiege.

The ſtate of the Aſtrea, by Captain Lane's report to me, is ſuch, that her proceeding to England became a neceſſary meaſure.

Captain Ryves, of the Bulldog, will proceed immediately to join his ſhip; but I ſhould be unjuſt to the merits of his exertion were I to omit recommending him to their Lordſhips' notice and protection.

I ſtated to their Lordſhips, in my letter of the 4th inſt. the ſervices of Captain Searle, of the Pelican, on the firſt landing; ſince that period he has, with unremitting diligence and ability, effectually blocked the ports of the Carenage.

The Madras, under the command of Captain Dilkes, had been, in the firſt arrangements, detached to land, and co-operated with a diviſion of troops on the left wing of the army anchored for that purpoſe at Marigot des Roſeaux, where his exertion and aſſiduity has been highly commendable: he took poſſeſſion of a point at the ſouthern entrance of the Grand Cul de Sac, with great labour and perſeverance, placed upon the pinnacle of the hill two eighteen-pounders and two carronades, from which he conſiderably annoyed the batteries of Siſſeron and Agille. The general wiſhing to eſtabliſh batteries on the ſouthern ſide of the Grand Cul de Sac, Captain Wolley, of the Arethuſa, was detached to join Captain Dilkes, and directed to land a proportion of ſeamen to aſſiſt this ſervice, which was very ſpeedily and cheerfully executed: more exertion has not been evinced, and I believe there never has occurred an inſtance of more cordial co-operation than has ſubſiſted between the army and navy during this ſiege. Great have been the ſervices of fatigue, conſidering the nature of the country and the ſituation of the Morne, and very rapidly have they been brought to effect the reduction of the iſland.

On the morning of the enemy's attack on the 24th inſtant with a view to re-poſſeſs themſelves of the advanced poſt from the Morne, it became neceſſary to detach the 14th regiment to the ſupport of the troops employed at that poſt, in conſequence of which 320 marines marines were landed to take the ground occupied by the 14th. The conduct of the marines upon this, as upon all other occaſions, was moſt perfectly correct.

The General's opinion of the conduct of the ſeamen and marines will be beſt underſtood by the ſentiments expreſſed in his public orders, an extract of which is herewith tranſmitted.

I tranſmit a liſt of the ſmall veſſels found at this anchorage.

HUGH C. CHRISTIAN.

Extract of General Orders.

Head-quarters, St. Lucia, May 27, 1796.

During the ſervices which have been carried on in the iſland of St. Lucia, all the courage and every exertion of the army would have proved ineffectual, if Rear-Admiral Sir H. C. Chriſtian, and the royal navy, had not ſtepped forward with the alacrity which has been ſo conſpicuous in forwarding the moſt arduous part of the public ſervice: to their ſkill and unremitting labour is, in a great meaſure, owing the ſucceſs which has attended his Majeſty's arms. It will afford the Commander in Chief the greateſt ſatisfaction to be able to lay before his Majeſty the eminent ſervices which have, on this occaſion, been performed by the royal navy, and Admiral Sir Hugh Cloberry Chriſtian will confer a particular obligation on Lieutenant-General Sir Ralph Abercromby, and the army at large, if he will be ſo obliging as to communicate to the royal navy, and in particular to Captains Lane, Ryves, and Stephenſon, and the other officers who acted on ſhore, and to the corps of marines, the great obligation which they conſider themſelves under to them.

T. BUSBY, Aſſiſt. Adj. Gen.

Return of ſhips and veſſels taken poſſeſſion of in the Carenage of St. Lucia, by John Clarke Searle, Eſq. commander of his Majeſty's ſloop Pelican, May 26, 1796.

One ſhip.—An American, called the Victoria, of New York, William Henry, maſter, in ballaſt, has twenty-two perſons on board, one a Frenchman; left in charge of Lieutenant Forteſcue, of the Pelican.

Three brigs.—An Engliſh-built brig, with her ſails, rigging, and anchors and cables on board, but has no cargo or any perſon on board her; her yards and top-maſt ſtruck.

An American brig, the Harriot, late of New-York, taken, condemned, and ſold here, with her rigging on board, but no ſails to be found; has her anchors and cables; both brigs left in charge of Mr. Troad, from the General Abercromby.

An Engliſh-built brig, with her yards and top-maſt ſtruck; has no cargo on board, or any perſon in her; left in charge of Mr. Nixon, maſter's mate of the Pelican.

LUCONIA. See MANILLA.

LUNDEN, OR LUND. In Schonen, S. Gothland, Sweden, a few miles diſtant from the ſea, twenty-four miles from Copenhagen, which place was an archbiſhopric in 1658, when the Swedes took it, and that dignity was removed to Copenhagen.

LUNDY ISLE. Situated in the mouth of the Briſtol Channel. It was fortified in the reign of Henry VIII. by one William Moriſco, who having conſpired to aſſaſſinate that King, was diſcovered, and fled hither for ſhelter; but it was taken by ſurprize, and Moriſco and ſixteen accomplices put to death.

LUNENBURG, a town ten leagues W. of Halifax North America, ſurprized in 1782.—See the following account from an American concerned in the enterprize.

Boſton, July 15.

Captains Babcock of the Hero, Stoddard of the Scammel, Woodbury of the Hope, and Tibbets of the Swallow, having determined to ſurprize and poſſeſs themſelves of Lunenburg, landed ninety men two miles below it, under the command of Lieutenant Barteman, on Monday the 11ſt day of July inſtant, at half after ſeven o'clock A. M. This gallant corps, with amazing rapidity, reached the town, and amidſt many heavy diſcharges of muſquetry from the enemy, burnt the commanding officer's houſe, a block-houſe in the north weſt part of the town, ſpiked up two 24-pounders, and forced the enemy into the ſouth block-houſe, from whence they kept up a briſk animating fire, and declared their intention to hold out to the laſt extremity. But their animation ſubſided upon the receipt of a few four-pound ſhot from the Hero, and they reluctantly ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war. The victorious party, with a natural vivacity, fell to plundering, and quickly emptied the ſtores of a variety and conſiderable quantity of dry goods, twenty puncheons of good Weſt-India rum, and the King's beef, pork, and flour. Upon the near approach of the Combined Army, two 18-pounders were ſpiked up and diſmounted, and the royal magazine was ſafely depoſited in the hold of the Scammel. The ſtricteſt decorum was obſerved towards the inhabitants, and their wearing apparel and houſehold furniture invariably preſerved for their uſe. The town was ranſomed for 1000l. ſterling, and Captain Creighton, with ſome of the principal inhabitants, were ſhipped on board the Scammel. On the ſide of the Americans three were wounded ſlightly, one dangerouſly; on the part of the enemy the number of ſlain and wounded unknown, only one of the ſlain being found.

LUSIGNAN, SURPRISED IN 1569. A city in Poitou, France, with a ſtrong caſtle, on the river Vonne, between Bourdeaux and Rochelle. This caſtle was eſteemed impregnable, till ſurprized by M. Teligny for the French Proteſtants in 1569, but it was retaken four months after, and diſmantled.

LUTZEN, BATTLE NEAR. A town in Upper Saxony, Germany, eight miles from Leipſic, where, in 1632, the Swedes obtained a victory over the Germans, but loſt their heroic King, Guſtavus Adolphus, who was killed in the field of battle.

LUXEMBURG, is reckoned one of the ſtrongeſt towns in Europe.—It is the capital of the Duchy of Luxemburg, Luxemburg, one of the ſeventeen provinces of the Netherlands.

This place had ſuffered much by the wars between the French and Spaniards in the Netherlands. In 1529 Charles V. took it from Francis I. of France. In 1542 it was ſacked by the Duke of Orleans. and retaken and ſacked again in the year following. In 1681 the French blocked it up, but the Spaniſh Governor ſallied, and having inveſted one of their ſtrong quarters, drove the French back, and conducted a convoy in before the face of the beſiegers.

The French in 1684 ſat down before it on the 28th of June, and it ſurrendered on the 10th of June, the Mareſchal de Crequi having thrown 3000 bombs into it.

It was reſtored to the Spaniards by the treaty of Ryſwick, but they took it again 1701. By the peace of Utrecht it was given to the States-General of the United Provinces, as a barrier-town, but it was ſurrendered to the Empire in 1715.

It was attacked by the French, and ſurrendered to them, June 7, 1795, when its magazine conſiſted of 467 pieces of braſs cannon, 352 pieces of iron, ditto, 16,244 muſkets, 1,800,000 pounds of powder, beſides a proportionate quantity of ammunition and ſtores.

February 23, 1796.—The ſeverity of the ſeaſon obliged the French to ſuſpend their operations. As ſoon as froſt had ceaſed, they reſumed offenſive meaſures, threw up additional intrenchments, and made every preparation neceſſary for a ſiege of ſuch importance.

The city, though it is not very large, requires nevertheleſs a circumvallation of conſiderable extent, on account of the advanced works which defend the garriſon, and which, on all ſides, are half a league from the fortreſs itſelf. The fortifications are cut out of the ſolid rock, and thereby render mining impracticable. The heavieſt artillery could produce no effect on a rock ſo high and ſo thick.

There ſeems to be only two ways of reducing Luxemburg—by blockade and bombardment.

February 24.—The bombardment of the fortreſs of Luxemburg commenced with unexampled vigour. The beſieged neglected nothing to interrupt the works of the beſieging army, either by very briſk ſallies, or by firing on the working parties; but all their efforts were vain. A ſubaltern Auſtrian Officer lately brought to the camp, reported, that the inſtructions of General Bender, Commandant of Luxemburg, were to defend the place till the 1ſt of May, at which period, if not on the point of being relieved, he might ſurrender.

May 14.—The Auſtrian garriſon in Luxemburg defends itſelf obſtinately. When they found the French had mounted their heavy artillery and mortars, they on the 10th made a ſally. Two columns, conſiſting each of 1000 men, advanced along the road from Arlon, and obliged the French advanced poſts to retreat. They then took an intrenchment in flank, which their pioneers began to deſtroy. The French now collected a number of troops, and marched againſt the Auſtrians, who were at length repulſed, and the French regained their former poſition, and ſet about repairing their damaged works. A number of priſoners were taken on both ſides.

LUZZARA, BATTLE AT. A town of Italy, in the dukedom of Mantua, belonging to the Houſe of Auſtria. The Modeneſe being reduced by the united arms of the French and Spaniards, againſt Germany in 1702, Prince Eugene found himſelf ſo ſtraitened, that being in no condition to come to a general engagement againſt a ſuperiority, conſiſting of 40,000 men to 24,000, being 16,000 difference under, declined fighting, and went to Luzzara, whither the Duke of Anjou followed him.

The Duke expected a reinforcement from Prince Vaudemont, and Eugene finding he could not avoid coming to an action, reſolved to fight him before he was ſtrengthened by a reinforcement, being already near double his number; in conſequence of this, he attacked the Duke of Anjou marching out of his intrenchments on the 15th of Auguſt, 1702.

The victory was diſputed, as the engagement was long and bloody, being only ended by interpoſition of night; a great many ſtandards and priſoners were taken by the Imperialiſts, but in the end the French and Spaniards became maſters of Luzzara.

LYONS, BATTLE NEAR. A town of the Lyonnois in France, ſituated on the conflux of the Rhine and the Soane, 225 miles from Paris. At the time Albinus and Severus were rivals for the empire of Rome, in the year 189 after Chriſt, Albinus declared war againſt Severus, who attempted to poiſon him. With this view he aſſumed the Imperial purple, croſſed the Rhine, and gained the army over to his party; while Severus advanced to give him battle, and thus to decide the contention by force of arms.

Theſe two powerful rivals met in a large plain near Lyons in Gaul (then ſo called), and a terrible battle enſued, in which was diſputed no leſs than the empire of the world.

The ſucceſs was dubious a long time, the Britiſh troops under Albinus, having charged the army of Severus with ſuch an impetuoſity, that the latter was well nigh worſted, when his General, Lætus, coming to his aſſiſtance with a freſh body of men, changed the fortune of the day; ſo that Albinus ſeeing the Britiſh legions routed, fell on his ſword in deſpair.

This unfortunate city, in Auguſt and September 1793, by oppoſing the meaſures of the Republicans of France, experienced dreadful carnage, though at the firſt they were ſucceſsful; in the end the city was nearly deſtroyed by thoſe diſturbers of public repoſe.

The ardour of the Lyoneſe was without bounds, eſpecially after they intercepted ſome diſpatches from the Convention to Dubois Crance, containing orders to march in force againſt the town; and to make it a dreadful example of national vengeance. All ſuſpicious perſons were diſarmed, and all people of property raiſed in arms. The women were employed in making lint for the wounded, and viſited the intrenchments and batteries under the roaring of cannon, without the leaſt ſign of fear. They were foremoſt in inſpiring courage into their huſbands and children.

of the town amounted to four millions in ſpecie, to pay ſuch ſoldiers as received pay. The ſtreets and coffee-houſes often reſounded with "Vive Louis XVII. et le Prince de Conde!"

Dubois Crance, on his approaching the town, ſummoned it to a contribution of ten millions of livres, and the heads of one hundred of the inhabitants. He was anſwered, "that all the priſoners of the Regicide Army ſhould account for the leaſt violence committed againſt the Lyoneſe." Three actions had been fought, and all in favour of the beſieged. In the firſt, which happened at Caluire, about a league diſtance from Lyons, on the road to this place, the Lyoneſe killed 200 men, and made 100 priſoners: The ſecond was fought at Sathaupay, between the Rhone and Saone; and the third near Veſpilliére in Dauphine, about two leagues from Lyons. The Republicans loſt in theſe two engagements about 200 men.

At the end of the firſt affair, the National Regiment of Dauphine Infantry went over to the Lyoneſe, who received them very kindly; and new deſertions were daily ſeen among the cavalry and the troops of the line.

On the night of the 2d of September, a moſt dreadful ſortie was made by the Lyoneſe; the Republican camp was ſurprized, 4000 of the beſiegers were killed, and twenty-two pieces of heavy artillery were taken. The remainder of the army retreated with the utmoſt precipitation. In conſequence of the city's conduct it was ordered to be deſtroyed by the Convention in October 1793, and its name changed to Ville Affranchize, and 148 inhabitants were executed.

MACHIAS, EXPEDITION AGAINST IN 1777. A town in the province of New England, North America. Sir George Collier, in order to defeat an invaſion deſigned to be made from this place on the province of Nova Scotia, ſailed in the Rainbow, together with the Blonde, Mermaid, and Hope ſloop, where he not only deſtroyed the fort, but three magazines of flour, rice, tanned hides, &c. &c. He then proceeded along the coaſts of New England and New Hampſhire, and there deſtroyed a ſhip ready to ſail for France with maſts, alſo three brigs, eleven ſloops, and fifteen ſchooners. The muſquet-balls fired by the rebels were all chewed or jagged.

MACZIN, TOWN OF, TAKEN IN 1771. It is ſituated in Bulgaria, a province of European Turkey, and near Babadagh. Major-General Moloradowitz having forced the Turkiſh intrenchment near this town, attacked and made himſelf maſter of it; alſo the caſtle, where he found a great quantity of ſtores, baggage, and proviſion.

MADRAS, SIEGE OF. The capital of the Eaſt-India Company's ſettlements on the Coaſt of Coromandel. After our ſucceſsful expedition to North America, and our acquiſition of Louiſburg, the Britiſh miniſtry were concerting meaſures for reducing Quebec. While this was on the carpet, the court of Verſailles, knowing us to be weak on the ſide of the Eaſt-Indies, reſolved to be before-hand with us in that part of the world, and had in contemplation the driving the Britiſh Company from their ſettlements on the Coaſt of Coromandel, whither Commodore Barnet had been ſent on an expedition, with inſtructions offenſive and defenſive. Madras, or Fort St. George, became the object of their attention, which is the ſeat of the Britiſh preſidency in the Aſiatic Indies, in the province of Arcot, being ſeventy miles north of Pondicherry. The Britiſh Company had purchaſed this ſettlement, and the adjacent country, from the King of Golconda; but the Great Mogul, who afterwards made a conqueſt of that country, looked upon this as his own from that title, as well as the other towns in that kingdom. The principal commodities purchaſed of the natives were callicoes, chintz, muſlins, and ſometimes diamonds, which was an extenſive and advantageous commerce, enjoyed by the Company for more than a century. The proximity of it to Pondicherry, the French ſettlement, injured it in ſome branches of its trade, ſince the peace of Utrecht, from which time the French ſeemed to be more intent upon our ſettlement here. But notwithſtanding their intereſts claſhed, yet Madras acquired ſome new advantages: the troubles in Perſia induced many rich Armenians to ſettle here: the irruption of the Mahrattas in 1740, brought ſeveral wealthy merchants to reſide in our preſidency, which on this account became the envy of our French neighbours: for Madras had many years brought in a clear annual revenue of 70,000 pagodas, each pagoda computed to be at ſeven ſhillings and eight-pence, which reduced to ſterling-money, is 26,833l. 6s. 8d. by the duties on trade and conſumption, which was a ſum far exceeding the whole charges of the place, civil and military, according to the eſtabliſhment in peace. The neat gain, communibus annis, on the head of profit and loſs, in the Madras books, ariſing from the revenue, ſilver coinage, together with the ſale of woollen, and other European goods, amounted to near 90,000 pagodas, or 34,500l. ſterling annually, after all charges of the coaſt, civil and military, were paid. Beſides, the factory generally inveſted 1,000,000 of pagodas, or 383,333l. 6s. 8d. ſterling, in the commodities of the country, uſually ſending 60,000 bales of callicoes yearly to Europe, which brought a very great accumulation of treaſure to the proprietors of the India ſtock.

The French were, on the contrary, loſers by their ſettlement, and had contracted debts in the Indies. On their rupture with us, they wiſely put Pondicherry in a proper ſtate of defence; and ſent M. Mahe de la Bourdonnais, with a ſquadron of large ſhips, and 1500 men, who arrived on the Coaſt of Coromandel in 1741. The French, notwithſtanding their ſuperiority, were deſirous of a neutrality, for their own private reaſons, and the Cardinals de Fleury and Tencin, approved of the treaty: but the directors of the Eaſt-India Company penetrating into the reaſons of the French for obtaining ſuch a neutrality, were of opinion, that it would be conducive to their intereſts, to ſend a ſquadron of men of war to the Indies, as the French ſhips being richly laden, would be a ſtrong temptation to look after them. The French pretended, that as their only aim in the propoſed neutrality, was to preſerve the tranquillity and peace of the ſettlements on both ſides, they were the more more ſurpriſed that the Engliſh ſhould reject it, who having greater advantages in trade, had more to loſe. But the directors, in 1744, ſent Commodore Barnet to the Indies, who made conſiderable captures; and as the hopes of a neutrality were now diſſipated, the French directors reſolved to give a vigorous exertion of their force in this part of the world. The French King, in conſequence of this, ſent the above M. Mahe de la Bourdonnais a commiſſion the 11th of April, 1746, with full powers over the whole naval department in the Indies, which he received on the 1ſt of January, 1740, at Pondicherry, upon which he applied his whole attention to oppreſs the Britiſh Company, and as the moſt effectual and deciſive way, determined to reduce Madras, together with the other ſettlements.

On the death of Commodore Barnet, Captain Peyton ſucceeded to the command of Commodore, who had five ſhips of war, from ſixty to twenty guns. This ſquadron ſeemed calculated only for a cruizing ſcheme, either to intercept the trade, or to prevent the ſucceſs of their cruizers.

On the 24th of June, Captain Peyton anchored in Negapatam road, where perceiving ſome ſhips in the offing, and believing them to be trading ſhips, he came up to them, but found them to be M. Bourdonnais's ſquadron. About four in the afternoon they came to an engagement, in which, though we had the confeſſed ſuperiority, yet Peyton, after calling a council of war, declined farther trials, and proceeded to Trincomale, being on the north eaſt part of the iſland of Ceylon, as did the French to Pondicherry. Commodore Peyton having refitted his ſquadron by the 3d of Auguſt, appeared off Negapatam, and the French Commodore came after him to bring him to a general engagement, which, in regard to the preſervation of his Majeſty's ſhips, (being only ſix to ſeven, (for the Inſulaire was loſt in the Bay of Bengal), he prudently declined, and in conſequence of which, he diſappeared on the 10th of Auguſt; upon which the French returned to Pondicherry, where they arrived on the 13th. Commodore Mahe de la Bourdonnais, deſirous of knowing whether the Britiſh Commodore would attempt to fruſtrate his deſigns on Madras, appeared again before that place on the 18th of Auguſt, and fired on the Princeſs Mary, one of the Company's ſhips, which fire was returned from the ſhip and the fort. Each ſhip of the French gave a broadſide as ſhe ſtood to the northward, and another as ſhe returned to the ſouthward. Then he ſtood for Pondicherry, to ſee if Commodore Peyton would come to the relief of it. But he ſtood into Pulicat road, to the northward of Madras, whither he ſent Lieutenant Wemys on board a veſſel in the road, who was there told of every circumſtance which happened, and of the French fleet's being then between Madras and Pondicherry, and of which, though the Lieutenant informed his Commodore, yet he thought proper to withdraw, abandoning the ſettlement to its fate, and to the fury of its enemies.

M. Bourdonnais, on this, arrived before it on the 23d of September, having 3200 Europeans on board, with 500 Caffres, and a conſiderable number of Seapoys and Peons, natives of the coaſt of Coromandel.

The city of Madras is divided into the black town and the white town: in the latter and centre of the white town was the fortreſs, called Fort St. George, with the road before it, and a river behind it. The black town was indefenſible, the walls too low, and thoſe on the eaſt and weſt ſide without ſo much as a ditch. The white town was deemed tenable, if properly ſupplied. At the north end of this part of the city ran a hollow curtain, 600 feet long from eaſt to weſt, which divided the white town from the black; at each end of the curtain was a baſtion; one flank at each end, mounted with two guns each, defended the wall, but no ditch or defence on the outſide. In the walls were two gates, ſixty feet diſtant from the black town; but where the wall was tolerably high it was very narrow, which rendered it extremely weak and defective. At the ſouth end of the white town run another hollow curtain, 400 feet in length, defended in the ſame manner from eaſt to weſt, with this difference, that there was but one gate, cloſe under one of the baſtions. The weſt ſide towards the land, was moſtly without any wall; and where there was, quite defective, with only one ſmall battery, midway, and having no proper flanks to ſcour the river: in the whole, entirely indefenſible and neglected. Such was the ſtrength and condition of this important ſettlement, when Commodore Mahe de la Bourdonnais came before it, and ſuch had been its condition for eight years before. The whole ſtrength, as Commodore Barnet informed the Company at London, in a letter dated on board the Deptford in Madras road, the 24th of September, 1745, being no better than a garden wall. The baſtions placed contrary to all rules; the curtain unflanked and irregular; the garriſon ſo weak as to be ſurpriſed by 500 Seapoys, and taken; no embrazures of any ſignification towards the ſea, there being no ramparts to mount guns upon; ſo that in his opinion, two ſhips of ſixty guns would in two hours battering, form an entire breach from baſtion to baſtion: ſo that between Commodore Peyton's and the directors' negligence in defence of Madras, it was in a very bad ſtate to make any oppoſition. Governor Morſe then ſuperintended the garriſon, which did not conſiſt of more than 200 effective men, beſide eighty failors, being the crew of the Princeſs Mary, and 200 Topazes, a black, degenerate, wretched race of the ancient Portugueſe. The principal officer was one Peter Echman, an ignorant, ſuperannuated Swede, formerly a common ſoldier, now a lieutenant, who was aſſiſted by two other lieutenants, and ſeven enſigns. Though there were 200 pieces of cannon, ſuch as they were, yet there wanted men to play them; and military ſtores were in proportion to the want of military men and abilities. The French Commodore knew all this, and on the 1ſt of September he landed 600 men, twenty miles to the ſouthward of Madras, who marched over land to St. Thomé, within three miles of the city. On the 4th another landing was effected without any oppoſition. The town was inveſted on the land ſide, and the enemy encamped at Chindadre Pelah, while the ſquadron prevented any relief from the ſea, where Mr. Peyton had no ſuch thing in his intention. During the ſiege, moſt of the Aſiatic inhabitants deſerted their dwellings, with their valuable effects, flying up into the country. The Nabob, or Viceroy of Arcot, our pretended ally, was bribed not to help us, and he preferred the gold of France before the ties of honour, or the ſecurity of that ſettlement, from which he had frequently received many and valuable preſents to engage his friendſhip. The garriſon abandoned the black town, having firſt withdrawn or nailed up the cannon.

On the 6th their mortars played; and as they depended chiefly on the execution of them for their ſucceſs on the town, by the 9th they had thrown 1200 ſhells. The Topazes, and all thoſe of the gun room department, deſerted. The garriſon had no place to ſleep in that was tenable; and the beſiegers had ſent for moſt of their ſeamen to play a large battery of eighteen pounders, and to join in a general aſſault.

On the 10th, the Governor and garriſon came to a capitulation, and the following are the articles agreed upon, between M. De La Bourdonnois, and the Engliſh Governor and Council of Madras.

Art. I. The Roman Catholics, their miſſionaries and churches, ſhall have the ſame rights, privileges, and immunities preſerved to them as they enjoyed before.

II. Half of the warlike ſtores, mortars, bombs, cannon, bullets, arms of what kind ſoever, balls, powder, and grenades, ſhall belong to the French; and as the time between this and October is too ſhort for the embarkation of the ſaid ſtores, there ſhall be made a juſt inventory of them by two officers of artillery, the one a Frenchman, and the other an Engliſhman; and in January next, the Governor of Madras and his council, ſhall faithfully deliver half of the ſaid ſtores, without preference or partiality; ſo that if there be any difference betwixt two pieces of cannon, the choice ſhall be determined by lot. If by any accident, the French cannon cannot be ſent to Pondicherry, the Engliſh ſhall not by any means make uſe of them againſt the French; and the ſaid cannon, with the other ſtores, ſhall be looked upon as depoſits which muſt not be taken, nor uſed, upon any pretence whatever.

III. The rigging and naval ſtores that belong to the King of England, the Eaſt India Company, or to any private perſons, ſhall altogether belong to the French. Mr. Morſe having demanded that ſome ſhould be left him for the Engliſh merchant ſhips that trade here, provided always by parole of honour, that none of it be given to ſhips of war, it has been agreed, that M. De La Bourdonnais take for his own ſquadron all he pleaſes, and as to what remains after his departure, it ſhall be amicably divided between the French Eaſt India Company and the Governor of Madras by equal parts. The tools, nails, bars, and chains, proper for ſhipping, ſhall likewiſe be looked upon as rigging.

IV. The corn, meal, flour, biſcuit, wine, arrack, beer, ſalt meat, and all other proviſions, ſhall be at the diſpoſal of M. De La Bourdonnais, who ſhall take what he pleaſes of it to victual his ſhips, and what ſhall remain after their departure, ſhall wholly belong to the Engliſh; provided always, that none of the Engliſh ſhips of war ſhall be ſupplied with any of the ſaid things, upon any pretext whatever, under the pain of failure in the parole of honour, which the Engliſh have given upon this article.

V. All the merchandize, of what nature or kind ſoever, belonging to the Engliſh Company, ſhall belong to the French Company: the French may put them on board their ſhips, and if any remain at their departure, the Engliſh ſhall ſend them in January next, according to the inventory which ſhall be made: and the council engages upon parole of honour, to diſcover to the French whatever merchandize, ſtores, gold, or ſilver, belong to the Engliſh Company.

VI. As the French cannot, before their departure, put on board what belongs to them in the place, after evacuating it, if a veſſel remain in the road of Madras, it ſhall not be attacked by Engliſh ſhips, and ſhall be ſecure until it has joined M. De La Bourdonnais's ſquadron. As he muſt in January ſend two ſhips to take on board the effects, which cannot be done at this time of the monſoon, the Governor and his council ſhall give them paſſports, in order to come ſafely to take in their loading, and return to Pondicherry, and from thence to the iſles, without being moleſted upon any pretence whatever: and it is only upon this condition that the French evacuate the place, which they would not elſe have done till January. (This clauſe is amended by the laſt of the five additional articles to this treaty) provided always, tnat the French ſhips carrying an Engliſh paſſport, ſhall not take any veſſels belonging to that nation, as long as they ſhall have the benefit of their paſſports. A neutrality ſhall be obſerved in the road after the evacuation of the place, while M. De La Bourdonnais lies at anchor therein; and the French embarkations, which ſhall remain after him, ſhall be free from all inſults until they arrive at Pondicherry. If by any accident the two veſſels which ſhall have paſſports fail to come, or cannot carry off all the goods, Mr. Morſe ſhall, at the requeſt of M. Dupleix, furniſh paſſports to the embarkations from Pondicherry, which ſhall come to carry off the remainder.

VII. It not being poſſible to take the general inventory of the Company's effects to be divided, and that of the other effects belonging to the French, before their departure, there ſhall remain at Madras three commiſſaries, nominated for that purpoſe, together with aſſiſtants, who ſhall be treated with all neceſſary ſecurity and regard. They ſhall be provided with a houſe in the white town, and the neceſſary aſſiſtants and ſuccours afforded them, as ſoon as they ſhall require it, in order to carry their artillery or effects on board the ſhips that ſhall come to fetch them. The French ſhall pay the ſaid ſhips their freight; and beſides, they ſhall be furniſhed with a ſufficient ſtore-houſe on the ſea-ſhore, in order to put their effects therein that are ready to be embarked; as alſo the neceſſary proviſions, paying at the ſame time for them, and all the charges attending thereon. The commiſſaries may demand the opening of all the magazines, in order to ſee that there are no rigging or naval ſtores therein; and alſo have the liberty of looking into the Company's books when they ſhall deſire it.

VIII. The Governor of Fort St. George, and the town of Madras, and its ſupreme council, ſhall engage to pay for the ranſom of the ſaid fort and town, by the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company to the French Eaſt-India Company, the ſum of 1,100,000 pagodas of Madras, at the times, and on the conditions following:

To wit, 500,000 pagodas ſhall be paid in Europe, for which purpoſe, M. De La Bourdonnais ſhall have an act, drawn in proper form, given him, in which it ſhall be mentioned, that the 500,000 pagodas have been paid at Madras, by five bills of exchange, of 100,000 pagodas each, the duplicates marked 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, drawn upon the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company in favour of that of the French; the firſt at four months ſight, the ſecond at five, the third at ſix, the fourth at ſeven, and the fifth at eight months ſight. The other 600,000 pagodas ſhall be paid at ſix equal terms; namely, in the month of January of each year, to begin in 1747, 1748, and 1749, 100,000 pagodas each January, and 100,000 pagodas in the month of September of each of the aforeſaid years; which makes 200,000 pagodas each year; and for the three years, 600,000 pagodas ſtamped with a ſtar, or ſilver, or rouples, at the current price of the ſaid pagodas. But ſhould the Engliſh happen to have no current coin to make the firſt payment good, they ſhall give M. Dupleix merchandize, at the current price of the country, to the amount of the ſaid 100,000 pagodas, for the payment which they ſhould make in January, 1747. And after making this firſt payment, ſhould it happen that the funds from Europe ſhould fail coming for a year, the Engliſh Company ſhall pay at the rate of ſix per cent. intereſt, for the terms which they ſhall fail paying; but any other pretext ought not to poſtpone the ſaid payments. The council of Madras engage, upon faith and honour, not to ſend a piece of cloth into Europe, nor expedite any veſſel thither, before ſatisfying the payment according to theſe terms. If the Engliſh will advance any payment, there ſhall be given them a diſcount of ſix per cent.

The council, Governor, the gentlemen of the ſword, and thoſe of the long robe, and the inhabitants, ſhall give their parole of honour, that if the Engliſh Company fail in the ſaid payments, they ſhall reſtore to the French the town of Madras, that they may raiſe thereon the ſum due, by the different effects that ſhall be found in it, either belonging to the Company, or to particular perſons; or to diſpoſe thereof as ſhall ſeem good to them; it being reaſonable to reſtore either the town or its value.

IX. For the ſecurity of the ſaid payments mentioned in the preceding article, the town of Madras ſhall give for hoſtages the two children of Mr. Morſe, the Governor of the ſaid fort and town, the one called Nicholas, and the other Elizabeth Morſe; two counſellors and their wives, namely, Mr. Stratton, his wife, Mr. Harris, and his wife; two interior merchants, to wit, Mr. Harke and Mr. Walſh; and two Armenians, the one Coja Joannes, and the other Coja Michael. If the Governor deſires to have one of his children with himſelf, he may, upon giving his parole of honour to return him in caſe of non-payment as an hoſtage to the French. Should it happen that any of the hoſtages die, the place muſt be ſupplied by a perſon of the ſame rank. If the hoſtages chooſe to remain at Pondicherry, they ſhall not be ſent any where elſe; and when they have a mind to come to Madras, they ſhall be at liberty ſo to do, provided that others of the ſame quality come in their ſtead. If they do not chooſe to remain at Pondicherry, they ſhall have liberty to go to the Iſle of France. In like manner, ſhould the hoſtages happen to be taken by the Engliſh, either in war or otherwiſe, they ſhall be reſtored, and the payments ſhall not become the leſs due at the limited terms. The ſaid hoſtages ſhall live at the expence of the Engliſh Company, who ſhall defray their charges at Pondicherry or the Iſles.

X. Notwithſtanding the above conditions, all the priſoners taken in Madras ſhall be ſet at liberty, upon the following terms:

To wit, All thoſe who have a mind to remain in Madras, may ſerve to defend and keep the town againſt all attempts.

But thoſe who will not remain in Madras, ſhall continue priſoners of war, on the terms and conditions accepted on the 24th of September, 1746.

Notwithſtanding the liberty given to the priſoners of Madras, the Engliſh ſhall be obliged to reſtore to the French French the ſame number and quantity, quality for quality, preferably in the Indies, and next in Europe.

XI. Fort St. George and the town of Madras, their dependencies, and, in a word, all that belonged to the Engliſh, before the taking of the ſaid fort and town, ſhall be put into their hands again, except what is mentioned in theſe articles, which ſhall continue in their full force.

XII. All the effects and merchandize belonging to the Engliſh, and to thoſe of the black town, ſhall be reſtored to them entirely as they are; and when that place is evacuated, there ſhall no more complaints be received, as to robberies and pillagings, the French only engaging to put things in the condition in which they ſhall be found, at the time of ſigning theſe preſents.

XIII. It is not meant to compriſe, in the ranſom of the town, the moveables, the effects, and the houſes of the Engliſh, theſe being exempted from pillaging through pure complaiſance and generoſity, except the rigging, naval ſtores, and proviſions, which entirely belong to the French, as ſaid in the third article.

XIV. The fort, town, and dependencies of Madras, ſhall not be attacked by the French, nor any others bearing their commiſſion, till the preſent engagements of the Engliſh are become null and void, according to the laws of war.

XV. The place ſhall be evacuated from the 10th to the 15th of October, and delivered up in ſuch condition as it ſhall then be in. The hoſtages ſhall be given the day before.

XVI. When the French ſhall quit the place, the Governor and his council ſhall further ratify the preſent capitulation, and ſhall give their parole of honour to maintain the preſent articles.

XVII. If any French ſoldiers, ſailors, and Caffres, have deſerted, the Engliſh ſhall do their endeavour to ſecure them, and ſhall reſtore them to the French.

The above treaty was going to be ſigned, and put entirely into execution, when three ſhips arrived from France, that brought freſh orders for M. de la Bourdonnais, which made him write to M. Dupleix, to obtain from him ſome eclairciſſements on that head. During this interval, the French ſhips of war underwent a terrible hurricane at Madras, in which two of them were loſt, and four were diſmaſted. This accident made it impoſſible for M. de la Bourdonnais to perform completely the above conditions. Here follows the alteration that was made therein:

M. de la Bourdonnais being obliged to follow the wreck of his ſquadron, and not being able to remain here to put the capitulation into execution, ſhall give up the command of Madras to M. Deſpremeſnil, to be under the orders of the council of Pondicherry; which council engages with M. de la Bourdonnais, by articles ſigned the 13th of October, and by their letter dated the 4th of the ſame month, to keep the capitulation on the following terms.

Art. I. The council engages, and gives its parole, to obſerve the articles of the treaty, of which M. de la Bourdonnais ſent them a copy, as long as the Engliſh ſhall keep their part.

II. They engage to evacuate the fort and town of Madras, as ſoon as the French Company's effects ſhall be carried out; but at the fartheſt, at the end of January. The fortifications of the ſaid fort and town, ſhall remain in the ſame condition in which they are at preſent: till then, ſuch of the Engliſh as ſhall not be upon their parole, ſhall be ſent to Goudelour, according to the terms of the capitulation. The French garriſon ſhall live at Madras upon their own charges; and if any ſoldier ſhall ſteal any thing, the French Commandant ſhall cauſe it to be made good.

III. Though the place be occupied by French troops, and their ſtandard ſet up therein, Mr. Morſe, the Engliſh Governor, and all the clerks, aſſiſtants, and inhabitants, may do their buſineſs, and carry on their commerce both by land and ſea; and the Engliſh policy ſhall have its courſe among the native Engliſh and the inhabitants, as uſed to be done before, without prejudice to that of the French.

IV. M. Dupleix and his ſupreme council, ſhall receive the hoſtages in the manner in which they have engaged with M. de la Bourdonnais, by their letter of the 14th of October, and they ſhall be delivered ſix days before the evacuation of the place; as alſo the bills of 600,000 pagodas, payable at Pondicherry, by Mr. Morſe and the council of Madras; and the bills of exchange of 500,000 pagodas, drawn upon the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company, which ſaid bills ſhall be in three packets for each year reſpectively; to wit, for the year 1747, five bills of exchange, marked 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, of 100,000 pagodas each, payable at four, five, ſix, ſeven, and eight months ſight. In the ſame packet two bills, of 100,000 pagodas each, payable to the order of the ſupreme council; that is to ſay, the firſt payable in January, 1747, in ſilver or effects; and the other payable, in ſilver, in the month of September the ſame year. In the ſecond packet two bills, of 100,000 pagodas each; the one payable in January, 1748, and the other in September the ſame year, in gold, ſtar pagodas, or value. And in the third packet two other bills; the one payable in January, 1749, and the other in September the ſame year, in gold, ſtar pagodas, or value. The ſaid three packets ſhall be ſealed with the Company's ſeal, and with M. de la Bourdonnais's family-ſeal, the writing upon each of theſe being done with his own hand, and counterſigned by him. The three packets ſhall be put into the hands of the ſupreme council of Pondicherry, as has been ſaid, ſix days before the evacuation of the place, at the ſame time as the hoſtages ſhall be delivered; and then the garriſon of Madras, that ſhall be at Goudelour, may with ſafety return to Madras.

V. The road of Madras ſhall be as ſafe till the evacuation of the place, for the French merchants as for the Engliſh. The garriſon of the town ſhall not make uſe of their cannon but to defend the French, ſhould they happen to be attacked by the Engliſh, upon condition that there ſhall never be aſhore thirty Engliſh from from their ſhips, how many ſoever there ſhall be of theſe lying in the road; and that all thoſe who ſhall be taken aſhore, without having expreſsly a permiſſion to this effect in writing, from the French Commandant, ſhall be directly ſecured, and looked upon as priſoners of war.

If ſhips of war ſhould ſtop or take any French veſſels, contrary to the capitulation, the Engliſh Company ſhall make good the damages to the French Company; and the ſaid Companies ſhall be judges of the differences that may ariſe. If any effects ſhould happen to remain, provided it be not artillery, to the end of January, the Engliſh ſhall be obliged to deliver them in February at Pondicherry, and ſhall give a valuable ſecurity for that purpoſe.

The ſeventeen articles of the preſent capitulation, and the other five added thereto ſince, having been communicated by M. de la Bourdonnais to Mr. Morſe and his council, and accepted by them, M. de la Bourdonnais in the name, and on the behalf of the King of France, promiſes and engages his parole to the Engliſh, that the ſaid capitulation, and the articles added thereto, ſhall be obſerved and performed in their full extent; and, as he cannot attend in perſon at the execution of theſe preſents, he gives the Engliſh for ſecurity of his parole, that of M. Dupleix and his council, who have engaged themſelves by a ſolemn act of the 13th of October laſt, to obſerve and ſee performed the articles of the capitulation agreed upon with the Engliſh by M. de la Bourdonnais, for the ranſom of their town, of which he will give them a copy.

Concluded at Madras this 21ſt of October, 1746.

M. de la Bourdonnais having ſent the above treaty to the ſupreme council of Pondicherry, he at the ſame time wrote to them to this effect:

"Gentlemen, this is the capitulation, which I thought proper to make with the Engliſh, for the ranſom of their town and its dependencies, the evacuation of which muſt be, at the fartheſt, in January next. You will anſwer, in your own names, for the contraventions committed againſt it by the French; and, conſequently, for the default of payment of the bills of 500,000 pagodas, therein drawn for Europe, or the delay made therein by reaſon of the ſaid contraventions; the whole as in the 600,000 pagodas payable at Pondicherry. And, moreover, you will anſwer to the King for failing in a capitulation, ſigned and concluded at Madras, the 21ſt of October, 1746.

(Signed) MAHE DE LA BOURDONNAIS."

The following are the bills of exchange given by the Engliſh for the ranſom of Madras.

We have ſeen ſealed by M. de la Bourdonnais three packets, in which are contained the bills of exchange, which we have given him for the ranſom of Madras, each year reſpectively; upon which ſaid packets he has written as follows:

To wit, No. I. 1747.—This packet contains five bills of exchange of 100,000 pagodas each, and the letters of advice in conſequence thereof, marked 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, drawn by the Engliſh council of Madras upon the Engliſh Eaſt-India Company, in favour of the French Company, for value received of me, on account of the ranſom of Fort St. George and the town of Madras; the firſt of which is payable at four months ſight, the ſecond at five, the third at ſix, the fourth at ſeven, and the fifth at eight months ſight. In the ſame packet is a quadruple bill of 100,000 pagodas, agreed to by the Engliſh council of Madras upon the ſame account, payable in January, 1747, to the council of Pondicherry, or order; and likewiſe another quadruple bill, payable to the ſame in September, 1747.

The preſent packet is ſealed with the King's ſeal, with two of my ſeals, and with other two of my family ſeals, and ſhould be put into the hands of the ſupreme council of Pondicherry, ſix days before the French evacuate the town of Madras.

Done at Madras, the 21ſt of October, 1746.

(Signed) MAHE DE LA BOURDONNAIS.

No. II. 1748.—In this packet there is a bill of 100,000 pagodas drawn by the council of Madras, for value received of me, on account of the ranſom of Madras, payable to the ſupreme council of Pondicherry, or order, in the month of January, 1748.

Beſides another quadruple bill of 100,000 pagodas, upon the ſame account, and payable at the ſame place in September current of the ſame year, 1748.

The preſent packet is ſcaled, &c. the ſame as before.

No. III. 1749.—In this packet there is a bill of 100,000 pagodas, payable in January, 1749, &c. beſides another quadruple bill of 100,000 pagodas, &c. payable in September 1749; which makes the complete payment of the ranſom of Fort St. George and the town of Madras.

After which, M. de la Bourdonnais put the ſaid packets into our hands, that we might ſend them to the ſupreme council of Pondicherry, or their order, ſix days before the evacuation of the place, which we promiſe to do; upon the faith of which we have ſigned the preſent obligation: of this there are ſix copies made out, one of which being performed and acquitted, the other five ſhall be of no force.

The following are the inſtructions which were given to M. Mahe de la Villebague and Desjardins, who were nominated the commiſſaries, according to the agreement made October 22, 1746, between the ſupreme preme council of Pondicherry and M. de la Bourdonnais.

Theſe two gentlemen are to take their orders from the ſupreme council of Pondicherry; conſequently, I have no more to do than to give them a ſhort hint as to what relates to myſelf.

A great many ſoldiers, and ſtill more blacks, have deſerted from us at Madras. Theſe gentlemen are to do their endeavour to recover them, and put them into a place of ſafety, until they can ſend them to the iſles.

I recommend to theſe commiſſaries the ſoldiers, mariners, workmen, and the Negroes of our iſles. They will be aſſiſting to them in all that they can.

At the time of dividing the artillery, theſe gentlemen ſhall be accountable for thirty-five pieces of cannon, which I received of M. Dupleix. If the Bourbon, or any other veſſel ſhould happen to be condemned, their cannon ſhall be reckoned as part, and after that there will be made an equal diviſion of what Madras yields; half ſhall be for the iſles, and half for Pondicherry.

I leave to aſſiſt theſe gentlemen, M. Barat, an officer of the artillery; M. Duparc, principal clerk, and M. Soulas as commiſſary. Theſe gentlemen ſhall take care to pay them their ſubſiſtence-money, with all proper encouragements.

They ſhall be very careful to forward the work, ſo as to have done time enough to evacuate the place before the end of January, and conſequently have the bills of exchange in time to tranſmit them to Europe, in order to be paid this year; which would otherwiſe be a hindrance of between four and five millions to the Company. I recommend to M. de la Villebague and Desjardins, to put the ſupreme council of Pondicherry in mind of this, and them to diſpatch in conſequence thereof; this is an eſſential article.

When the place ſhall be evacuated, and the Engliſh ſtandard hoiſted, theſe gentlemen ſhall be very careful to ſee ratified the capitulation and engagements of the Engliſh, according to the articles thereof.

All that I here recommend to theſe gentlemen, is only a ſhort ſketch of the repreſentations which they ſhall make, upon occaſion, to the Council of Pondicherry, to whoſe orders they are to remain ſubject.

No ſooner was M. de la Bourdonnais gone, than the Moors, who durſt not ſtir during his ſtay, began to raiſe their heads and threatened Madras; they ſent a deputy, who talked in high terms to M. Deſpremeſnil, the new Governor of Madras, which extremely ſurpriſed him.

The Moors, who, before the taking of Madras, had been called in by the Engliſh, arrived from Arcot every day in large bodies at St. Thomas's and at Mont; ſo that the roads being no longer free and open, they ſtopped the French and whatever belonged to them. M. Deſpremeſnil deputed, or rather forced M. Goſſe, one of the council, and M. de Kerjean, an officer, to go to Mont and demand back, from the chief of the Moors, the ſon of M. de Bury, who had been taken at Sadras on the road to Pondicherry. They had alſo orders to demand of the chief of the Moors, the reaſon of their coming, and why they threatened Madras. The deputies had no ſooner arrived at the river of Mont, than they were arreſted and ſtripped by a large body of horſe, who diſarmed and likewiſe ſtripped fifty cipayes, or ſoldiers, that had been given them at Madras to do honour to their deputation. After the Moors had very much maltreated the cipayes, they ſent them back, and carried with them from St. Thomas's the two deputies to preſent them to the Nabob's grand analdor, who told them that ſuch treatment as they had met with, was only in order to be revenged for the little regard M. Deſpremeſnil had paid to the deputy he had ſent to Madras ſome days before, and that he had come and gone without receiving any honours, and to whom they had neither ſhewn nor done any acts of civility; and that he had returned from thence loaded and exaſperated at the haughty menaces which this Governor made him.

This chief of the Moors likewiſe proteſted, that he would make himſelf maſter of Madras, in conſequence of the promiſe which M. Dupleix had given them of abandoning that town to them, after they had taken it from the Engliſh; and would take whatever he pleaſed out of it; that the Nabob's ſon was juſt upon coming from Arcot with cannon, in order to make himſelf maſter of Madras, either with conſent, or by open force. M. Deſpremeſnil, who did not at all wait to get intelligence of what paſſed at St. Thomas's, reſolved the ſame day to admit M. Barthelemy Governor of the place in his abſence, and, in order to give M. Dupleix an account of the menaces of the Moors, he quitted his government; and, at ten o'clock at night he embarked on board a veſſel, and arrived by ſea at Pondicherry, for the roads by land were blocked up.

M. Barthelemy remained Governor, having only M. Bruyere, Desjardins, and Villebague for his council; when by M. Dupleix's orders, his nephew, M. Friel, was admitted one among them. The new Governor ſeeing the Moors approach Madras, happily determined to defend the place. M. Villebague had orders to deſiſt from refitting the Princeſs Mary, that had been ſhattered and diſmaſted in the late hurricane; and, having taken all the ſailors and Caffrees out of her, he went with the officer of artillery and mounted new cannon quite round the Black Town; for the Engliſh had nailed up the old ones before they ſurrendered Madras.

The Moors, unwilling to copy after the French in the attack of Madras, came from St. Thomas's to form their general camp where they had pitched theirs; and afterwards took poſſeſſion of the Governor's garden, where the French had erected their mortar-battery. In this place they made a great number of gabions and ſcaling ladders, they had already mounted ſome bad cannon. From thence they ſpread over the villages to the the north, and, in ſhort, they blocked up Madras; ſo that no perſon durſt come out of the town, without being made priſoner by them.

We were obliged, in order to have water, to ſend detachments out along the ſhore to favour and cover the veſſels that went to fetch ſome, half a league from the place. What appeared ſingular was, that we had orders every day from Pondicherry to have patience, and not to be the firſt to begin hoſtilities. This inaction on our part made the Moors ſay, that we durſt not fire upon them whilſt they had the Nabob's ſon at their head, who was ſovereign of the coaſt, to whom, if we refuſed entrance into the town, he was in a condition to ſcale it, without our daring to fire upon his troops; ſo that they made their preparations ſafely and quietly.

The Naynard, or Grand Prevot of the Aſiatic troops belonging to the Engliſh, had joined with them, who had been their ſpy, and whom we had oftentimes neglected to arreſt in Madras for want of courage. He had got together all the Paliageras, Cipayes, and Peons that had deſerted from the Engliſh, and joined the Moors army. It is even pretended, that they were all enliſted by the Engliſh, in order to inſtruct the Moors by that means they might make themſelves maſters of the place. It is certain that this Naynard, by the intelligence which he had learned, cauſed us a great deal of uneaſineſs. Upon the preſumption which the Moors had conceived, that we muſt not attack them, they walked very boldly on the outſide of the place, within a muſquet-ſhot of our baſtions, and even inſulted our advanced guards, who firing ſome ſhot, wounded a ſoldier and two Cipayes. This beginning of an inſult made M. Barthelemy reſolve, on the 30th of October, to ſend out an officer at the head of a detachment of 150 men, to tell them to quit the Governor's garden, and to retire ſomewhat farther, or the town would fire upon them. They came and ſpoke with this officer from the middle of a bridge that ſeparated them from us, and haughtily told him, they were free to encamp wherever they pleaſed; that the country belonged to them, and that if he would advance with his detachment to the middle of the bridge, they would fire upon him. The officer, who had orders not to fire but in caſe of being purſued, returned to the town to inform us of their haughty anſwer.

On the morning of the 31ſt they acted in conſequence of their arrogance; for they came to cut that bar of mud, or neck of ſand, which divides the freſh water from the ſea; upon which we ſent a ſerjeant with a detachment of men to hinder their going on with that work. Thoſe who were about making this drain in the ſand, fled at the ſight of our men; but, as ſoon as they retired, they began their work anew. They were ſupported by the Mooriſh cavalry; at length they finiſhed their work, and at two in the afternoon, we found that the water in the town ditch had fallen about half, and that they ſtill continued to the ſouth, to cut the ſecond bank that ſtopt the waters which had riſen in rainy weather, and which made the approaches to the town difficult.

M. Barthelemy, to whom it had been recommended from Pondicherry, not to begin hoſtilities, however, gave orders to fire ſome cannon, charged only with powder, upon the Mooriſh workmen, who were buſy to the ſouth of the town, in order to let the waters run; and, that if they perſiſted, to fire ball. This the officer who had orders executed, and by this means they very ſoon put the workmen to flight, and the horſe that ſupported them.

The firing of theſe ſharp ſhot from their cannon was, however, the cauſe of an open war with the Moors; for, as ſoon as the officers who commanded the other baſtions to the weſt ſide heard the two firſt balls whiſtle by them, they took, or were willing to take, this firing of ball as a ſignal to fire upon them, and at the ſame time they fired from all the batteries, both in the White and Black Towns, where all the cannon were pointed upon the Governor's garden. In leſs than a quarter of an hour there was not a man to be ſeen, and all the Moors retired with precipitation, and encamped the third part of a league farther in the country, very much ſurpriſed to have ſeen the Black Town fire upon them; for they had been aſſured that they had no cannon, and the ſole intention they had in letting the waters run out, was to ſcale the walls.

The 1ſt of November all the officers in a body made a repreſentation in writing to M. Barthelemy, that it was proper to make a ſally upon the Moors, in order to drive them from our neighbourhood, to get proviſions and water readily; and that the ſoldiers, who began to be in want of both, murmured very much upon their poſts, and that they had much to do to reſtrain them; all they deſired was to fight.

M. Barthelemy, who was ſenſible of the neceſſity of the officers demand, ordered M. de la Tour, to make a ſally the next day with a detachment of 400 men. Accordingly on the 2d of November, M. de la Tour came out with his detachment and two field-pieces, and took a circuit round the north part of the town, in order to drive the Moors from thence; but finding only a few deſerters there, he marched to the north-weſt, where, at the third part of a league diſtant from the town, he met with their camp and all their tents. He divided his detachment into two bodies, and gave orders with a great deal of bravery and judgment. The Mooriſh cavalry mounted their horſes, and, after having joined in ſquadrons, they intended to ſtand firm; and wanting to ſurround M. de la Tour, he let them draw near to him, when he ſuddenly made his troops open, and cauſed his two pieces of cannon to play, which M. Danſy, an officer of the artillery, ſerved ſo briſkly, that the Moors gave way very faſt, and betook themſelves to flight. M. de la Tour burnt all their tents; he found in thoſe of the Nabob's grand Genſidar, letters from the Engliſh in the Perſian language, that afterwards contributed to prove their intelligence againſt us.

M. de la Tour, after having put all the Moors to flight, with the loſs on their ſide of a great many ſlain and wounded, returned in good order to the town, with a great number of horſes, cattle, and camels, which he had taken from the Moors. The ſoldiers pillaged their camp; M. de la Tour likewiſe took two of their ſtandards, and two bad pieces of cannon, which he nailed up up and threw into a well, not being worth the pains of carrying into the town.

The whole number of Moors were about 10,000, both horſe and foot and their attendants; but they were not all joined in the place where M. de la Tour attacked them; for theſe people encamp in a ſtraggling manner. This is certain, that if M. de la Tour had marched at break of day, as he wanted to do, directly to their camp, he would have found them all aſleep, and made a terrible ſlaughter among them. But when the detachment went out of the town, they did not know where they were, for want of proper care in retaining good ſpies and paying them well.

After M. de la Tour's detachment had returned again to the place, they ſent many out to go and look for proviſions, and patrol round the town; which pleaſed the ſoldiers very much, who ſaw themſelves on a ſudden in the midſt of plenty; for, by the flight of the Moors, they took a great many cattle. The advantage which we gained over them, gave us the liberty of going out of the town. The Engliſh ſeemed to be very ſorry, and were aſtoniſhed to ſee that with ſuch a ſmall handful of men, we had put to flight ſo great a number of people united together.

The Moors encamped to the weſt of the town, about half a league in the country, where they kept a better look out than ordinary, ſuppoſing that we ſhould come to attack them a ſecond time; having had advice that there was on the road from Pondicherry a ſtrong detachment of French coming againſt them to our relief, they quitted the parts about Madras, and encamped at St. Thomas's upon the bank of the river, in order to diſpute the paſſage with this detachment, and they even mounted their cannon there.

We had likewiſe advice at the ſame time, that it was M. Paradis who was coming from Pondicherry, and who commanded a detachment of 400 men; and he even wrote to us, that without fail he would, on the 4th of November at break of day, be at the paſſage of the river of St. Thomas. M. Barthelemy again ordered M. de la Tour to go to St. Thomas's with another party of 400 men, in order to ſupport and facilitate the paſſage of the troops from Pondicherry, and being joined in a body to fall upon the Moors. The ſcheme was well laid, but badly executed for want of activity, and by marching the detachment from Madras too late, which did not arrive at St. Thomas's till after the action; for M. Paradis having got at break of day to the paſſage of the river, as he had promiſed, ſaw the Moors drawn up in order of battle, to diſpute the paſſage with him. As he depended upon the party from Madras, which they had promiſed him, he advanced towards the Moors, who, after firing upon us with their bad cannon, began to be in diſorder, upon the firſt diſcharge of our ſmall arms; which M. Paradis perceiving, he ordered his troops to fall upon them ſword in hand. The Moors but little acquainted with fighting ſo near, betook themſelves to flight. There were a great many killed, and even ſome perſons of diſtinction; there were alſo a great many wounded, who eſcaped. The Nabob's ſon commanded this army, who was one of the firſt that fled with his elephant and grand ſtandard.

After the flight of the Moors, M. Paradis's detachment entered victorious into St. Thomas's. After he had gone through the town, he met with M. de la Tour with his party from Madras, who had done nothing; and who, had they come two hours ſooner, would have put the Moors between two fires, and cut off their retreat by land, on account of the ſituation of the ground, which is ſecure with rivers. But, in the Indies, the French do not mind this, and neglecting geography, they fight as they can, and oftentimes at a venture.

M. Paradis left M. de la Tour in St. Thomas's, and returned to Madras in triumph, well pleaſed with himſelf, and not leſs for having conquered alone. He carried off with his detachment a great number of camels, cattle, and horſes, which he had taken from the Moors after he had put them to flight. This ſecond action ſurprized the Engliſh ſtill more.

M. de la Tour undertook, while he ſtaid at St. Thomas's, to burn all the carriages of the Mooriſh cannon, and nail up all the pieces he found there, which they had carried from Arcot. He had done well if he had ordered his detachment not to ſtraggle too far, but he was not maſter of his ſoldiers; for they entirely pillaged the town of St. Thomas, and broke open all the houſes, and beſides ſlew a great many Moors who had fled thither for refuge; of which the Portugueſe, Armenians, and others of that place made good advantage; for, after the retreat of our troops, every one appropriated to himſelf whatever he found abandoned.

M. de la Tour, having perceived this diſorder too late, aſſembled his men and returned with them to Madras, carrying with him a great many more horſes and cattle taken from the Moors, which cauſed great joy in that town, where proviſions were but ſcarce.

M. Barthelemy remained Governor of Madras. This gentleman, not liking the orders he received from the Council of Pondicherry, obtained leave to reſign his commiſſion, and M. Paradis was made Governor in his room. As ſoon as this was known at Pondicherry, they directly diſpatched to him the authentic act of their Council, &c. by which they had entirely diſannulled the capitulation that the Engliſh had concluded with M. de la Bourdonnais, and at the ſame time deſired him to ſignify this to Mr. Morſe, the Engliſh Governor and his whole Council, to publiſh it in Madras, and have it read at the head of his men under arms; and laſt of all, to declare formally that Madras and all its dependencies for the future belonged to the King of France, and the French Eaſt-India Company. All which was accordingly done on the 10th of November, 1746.

The Engliſh, who, ſince the arrival of M. Paradis, foreſaw that ſome fatal blow was intended, had only two days given them to quit Madras and pitch on the place of their retreat; a term which was prolonged on account of the badneſs of the ſeaſon. From this epocha we may date the complaints of ſome, the deſpair and fury of others, the deep melancholy that ſeized the principal perſons in Madras, and the deſertion of the moſt enterprizing among them. They carried with them in the night-time their wives in diſguiſe, that were bold enough to follow their huſbands in ſuch a raſh reſolution, leaving to the French officers quartered in their houſes all their effects; but M. de Brain, who was nominated Commiſſary, and the worthy nephew of M. Paradis, very ſoon diſcovered the houſes that were abandoned, and took care to put their mark upon them.

The officers of the Engliſh garriſon likewiſe deſerted in the night-time with a great number of perſons, and threw themſelves into Fort St. David, alleging that they were free to ſerve againſt the French, ſince, contrary to the faith of treaties, and without any juſt reaſon, they had diſannulled a treaty of ranſom that was authentically and formally concluded in the name of two illuſtrious Kings, by perſons veſted with authority, ſolely that they might pay a proper deference to every act paſſed in the ſacred name of their reſpective maſters.

Such were the declarations of the officers that deſerted from Madras, who at the ſame time openly declared, that they were freed from the obligation they had ſigned to M. de la Bourdonnais as priſoners of war till they were exchanged; for, ſince they were again made priſoners at Madras, and the treaties were no longer in force, as they eſcaped by ſtratagem, they were free from all engagements.

The better to ſhew that all M. de la Bourdonnais had done in this town was abſolutely null and void, M. Paradis formerly arreſted thoſe who refuſed to abandon the place, and alſo ſuch as quitted Madras with the paſſports M. de la Bourdonnais had given them; and, upon their being brought back before him, he aſked them with an air of ridicule, Why they went out with falſe paſſports? Here, ſays he, is one I will give you in the proper form, by means of which you may go freely about your buſineſs.

It would be endleſs to mention particularly all the inſults they committed againſt the poor inhabitants, by making each individual bring his plate to the Governor, and impriſoning ſuch as were detected in ſaving any. There was a prohibition publiſhed by beat of drum, under the pain of corporal puniſhment, for all Frenchmen, of what rank ſoever, upon their conviction of aiding or aſſiſting any Engliſhman to ſave the leaſt article of their effects. This expreſſion—"corporal puniſhment," was far from pleaſing the French officers.

At length the poor inhabitants, who had ſo much extolled the civilities of the French, and who declared that they had not loſt any thing in the taking of their town, had reaſon to be of a very different opinion ſince this revolution. Complaints were frequently made to M. Paradis, who anſwered them coldly, that he thought they were very happy, and that the French were more rigorouſly treated by the Engliſh when they took Louiſburg. This the Engliſh would hardly believe; but, if it be true, the French made them ample return at Madras, for every body robbed with impunity, as ſoon as the capitulation was declared null and void, for want of keeping proper diſcipline; there being only M. Paradis, Maſter and Governor, and M. Brain, his nephew, his commiſſary, his aſſociate in his robberies, and at laſt his enemy, on account of the partition of certain effects, the receipt of which was but little known.

Mr. Morſe the Governor, and his Council, made formal proteſts againſt ſuch proceedings, which they ſignified to M. Paradis, in the name of the King of England, againſt the infraction of the treaty of ranſom made in his name, which they had taken care to ſend to England by all poſſible ways of conveyance, but eſpecially by the hands of Mr. Monſon, the ſecond perſon in the Engliſh Council, who took his paſſage to Europe in a Daniſh veſſel that ſailed from Tranquebar.

Mr. Morſe and his Council always refuſed to give up the keys of their own particular ſtore-houſes; but M. Paradis cauſed the doors to be broke open, whereupon theſe gentlemen entered new proteſts, in which they always made uſe of the following expreſſion, "a certain perſon called M. Paradis, who ſtyles himſelf Governor of Madras." In ſhort, nothing was done in the town but by the authority of the King on the one ſide, and proteſts on the other; and this laſted till all the Engliſh were entirely driven out of the place. M. Paradis made inſtances to M. Barthelemy to ſign the act of diſannulling the treaty of ranſom, but he refuſed it as a very unjuſt proceeding, adding, that he quitted the government becauſe he would not be concerned in ſuch monſtrous actions.

On the 16th of November, 1746, in the morning, there appeared a ſhip in ſight, which ſeemed as if ſhe intended to come to an anchor before Madras. At that time the French were buſy in loading the Princeſs Mary with goods, in order to be ſent to Pondicherry. She let go her anchor at ſome diſtance from the town, on account of the bad weather, in twelve fathom water. M. Paradis acted very ignorantly on this occaſion. He let the ſhip approach Madras without giving any orders, ſuffering the greateſt part of the chelingues to go from the harbour with their lading of bales on board the Princeſs Mary, as he had ordered the evening before.

M. Desjardins and Villebague, though diſmiſſed from their employments, being apprehenſive that the Princeſs Mary might be taken, as they had diſcovered by their glaſſes that it was an Engliſh ſhip, went to acquaint M. Paradis with it, and repreſented to him the danger the Princeſs Mary was in, being loaded, quite unrigged, and but a few hands on board; they told him it would be a ſhame for the French nation, if an enemy's ſhip ſhould either carry off or burn the Princeſs Mary in the road, and in ſight of all Madras.

He liſtened to them but coldly, and aſked them, in ſome confuſion, What he muſt do? Send, ſaid they, early in the morning, ſome chelingues to bring the ſhip under the cannon of the town; which is more proper to be done, than ſending goods unſeaſonably on board, which muſt be landed again.

At laſt, when the Engliſh ſhip was not far off, he detached an officer with ſixty men to defend the Princeſs Mary. In order to embark this detachment, they were were obliged to unload the laſt chelingues that remained aſhore, which M. de Brain, his worthy nephew, the intendant of the marine, had very wiſely cauſed to be loaded with bales of goods, as if it had been a time of peace.

The officer that commanded the party was no ſooner got on board the Princeſs Mary, than he took the command of the veſſel upon himſelf, which the Captain was fool enough to ſuffer. Thus the ſoldiers ſoon overpowered the ſailors, with a great deal of confuſion cut from the bow two fine European cables, quite new, that had no buoys to them, hoiſting ſome old ſails, in a very aukward manner, upon their ſtumps of maſts, and ſtill in great confuſion and diſorder, approached a little nearer the land, falling to the ſouthward more than to the ſhore. At length when they ſaw they were juſt oppoſite to the laſt baſtion of the ſouth, they let go their beſt anchor, which was the only one they had now left. All this time the Engliſh colours were hoiſted, both in the town, and on board the Princeſs Mary.

The Engliſh ſhip ſtill diſtruſted nothing, but came to an anchor before that place, within a cannon-ſhot of the Princeſs Mary, and ſaluted the town with ſeven guns, one after another. By the advice of M. Desjardins and Villebague, there was diſpatched to her a Catimaran, the maſter of which they took care to caution as to the anſwering of any queſtions She carried a note in Engliſh, to aſk, as uſual, the news of the ſhip juſt arrived. This ſtratagem was very well begun, but very miſerably executed, through want of reſolution in M. Paradis.

However, he ſent for M. Desjardins and Villebague to conſult them, whether he might, according to the rules, return the ſalute of this ſhip of the enemy, under Engliſh colours. They told him their opinion, and propoſed two ſchemes to him, neither of which he followed. The firſt was, that Mr. Barnet and Mr. Peyton had often hoiſted French colours when they fired, as if they had been their own, and told the French officers, who were their priſoners, that all the ſtratagems of war were allowable to deceive an enemy. The ſecond propoſal they made him was, to ſend a Chelingue on board this ſhip, cautioning, at the ſame time, the maſter from Pondicherry to ſay nothing; and that a letter in Engliſh might be ſent to the Captain, to deſire him to come aſhore with his packets, telling him, that if the ſalute was not returned, it was only owing to the town's being then in conference about a peace with the Moors, and that policy would not admit of firing any guns at that time from the town. It is certain, that if this laſt ſtratagem had been followed, it would have ſucceeded; and after having been informed of the force of that ſhip, and detaining the Captain aſhore, it would have been very eaſy to have taken her, the Captain being entirely ignorant of the taking of Madras.

But M. Paradis, who from the morning had taken no reſolution, appeared all at once to loſe courage: he hearkened to and followed the advice of ſome young giddy-headed people, without any experience, who diſconcerted him, by repreſenting that the Engliſh ſhip might eaſily carry off the Princeſs Mary, and aſſured him that ſhe was within reach of the cannon of the place. The apprehenſion M. Paradis was in leſt the Engliſh ſhip ſhould make ſome attempt upon the Princeſs Mary, which his irreſolution had not ſuffered him to ſecure ſufficiently, made him, contrary to all reaſon and experience, take the precipitate reſolution to change the colours in the town. The French colours were no ſooner hoiſted, than all the baſtions towards the ſea fired their guns, at the ſame time that the Catimaran landed with the anſwer from the Engliſh ſhip.

The Princeſs Mary likewiſe changed her colours, and in like manner fired upon her: but all this mighty farce came to nothing. The Engliſh ſhip perceing the balls ſtrike half way between her and the land, weighed anchor quietly; and as ſhe was getting under ſail, fired in defiance, three ſharp ſhot at the Princeſs Mary, and got ſafe to Fort St. David, from whence ſhe was ſent to Negapatam to unload her ſilver.

Thus the French failed of taking an Engliſh Eaſt-India ſhip, which almoſt put herſelf in their hands, and which coming to an anchor in the road of Madras, was ſaluted by the town with upwards of 200 ſharp ſhot, by order of M. Paradis, and contrary to the advice of all the officers of artillery, who told him the ſhip was far beyond the reach of their cannon, yet he ſtill continued firing. The whole very much diverted the Engliſh in Madras, who were all on their terraces, and very glad to ſee one of their ſhips get off quietly, when the French, if they had done their parts, might have taken her by ſtratagem. But the engineer-governor knew no better, and he ſhewed upon this occaſion, that the knowledge of the marine was no part of his talent, no more than computing the range of a cannon ball. He had better have referred himſelf to thoſe converſant in theſe affairs: but as ſoon as a man is nominated a Governor, he immediately knows every thing. It was in this manner the Engliſh and Dutch laughed at the French.

The Catimaran having returned, left the Engliſh ſhip before the French colours were hoiſted. The Captain, ignorant of the fate of Madras, returned an anſwer to the note that had been ſent him, and withal equainted them, that the ſhip's name was the Briton, that he came from London, and was bound to Bengal; but that he had a good deal of money to remit at Madras, and eſpecially ſome ſecret packets, and that he waited impatiently for the firſt opportunity that Mr. Morſe, the Governor, would give him to come aſhore and deliver him his letters. He likewiſe told him that his rigging was very much out of order, and that he had a good many of his men ſick on board, and but very little proviſions left.

It was alleged in full council in Madras, that it would have been an eaſy matter to have ſurprized and taken this ſhip with ſome armed Chelingues, had meaſures been taken accordingly early in the morning. And all the world was of the ſame opinion with M. Villebague, that had he remained Captain of the Princeſs Mary, as M. de la Bourdonnais had left him, this ſhip would, on the 16th of November, have been maſted, well rigged, and well armed, and in a condition to have embarked fifty men for a reinforcement; and ſailing under Engliſh colours, have come back to the road, boarded, and in a little time taken this ſhip of the enemy, whoſe rigging was diſabled, the hands on board ſick, and which was not even in a condition to have reſiſted two armed boats.

As the annulling the capitulation of Madras was the work of M. Paradis, and as he had promiſed M. Dupleix, that he ſhould find in this town merchandizes and ſums of money, over and above the price of the ranſom which M. de la Bourdonnais agreed for with the Engliſh, he fell to his original trade of land-meaſurer and overſeer, ſetting men with pick-axes to work, as ſoon as word was brought him that they ſuſpected money was concealed any where. His labour not at all ſucceeding, he next fell to taking inventories of the warehouſes of private perſons; but ſeeing that he could not diſcover what he had promiſed, he wrote to Pondicherry, that he was not at all ſurpriſed at not finding in Madras the riches he expected, ſince the former governors had, without any orders, and through their negligence, given leave for carrying out of the town what any perſon deſired.

On the 18th of November, he ſent the Princeſs Mary to Pondicherry, on board of which were put thirty bales of goods of a ſort for the Company's account, and a good many boxes, broke up by private perſons, through the little care that was taken in ſhipping them, and the little order that was obſerved on board the veſſel, where the captain, who was only a pilot, had not experience nor authority enough to reſtrain a parcel of European hands, whom M. Paradis had forced on board; for nobody would run the riſk in November along the coaſt, in a veſſel that was diſmaſted, very ill commanded, and leaky.

After diſpatching this veſſel, he had thoughts of ſending away the detachment by land, which M. Barthelemy had got ready to come to Pondicherry, with thoſe who had been diſmiſſed and recalled thither, and which M. Paradis had detained to ſerve his own ends; which now he began to diſcover, by ſignifying to Mr. and Madam Morſe to make ready to go to Pondicherry, together with Mr. Monſon. Mr. and Madame Barneval, were alſo appointed to make two in this journey, according to the letters of M. Dupleix, who ſent to M. Paradis a liſt of all thoſe he would have with him at Pondicherry, and whoſe ſtay at Madras he was apprehenſive of. This liſt chiefly conſiſted of the officers of the iſles M. de la Bourdonnais had left, whom M. Dupleix taxed as mutineers. In ſhort, M. Paradis expelled from Madras all thoſe who were not agreeable to him, retaining ſuch only as approved of his deſigns and ſecret ſchemes.

The command of the detachment deſtined to convoy the Engliſh Governor, his lady, and other perſons of note from Madras to Pondicherry, was given to M. Bury and M. de la Tour, who deſired to be recalled, not being willing to ſerve under M. Paradis. M. Bury was ſecretly ordered to inſpect the conduct of Mr. Morſe and all the Engliſh, for whoſe ſafe convoy there was a ſtrong party appointed, rather to ſecure them from eſcaping upon the road, than to do them any honour, or to defend them from the Moors, who were now retired, and only ſerved as a pretence for ſending a ſtrong eſcort.

M. Desjardins and Villebague, who had obtained leave from Pondicherry, took the opportunity of the detachment to return to that place, in order to eaſe themſelves of the trouble and fatigue they had undergone for the intereſt of the French Company, and at M. de la Bourdonnais's ſolicitation. A noble recompence for two ſuch perſons!

At length, on the 27th of November, M. Paradis gave orders for the detachment, conſiſting of 400 men, to march for Pondicherry, with all the Engliſh and French who were deſtined for this journey. They were four days on the road. Every night M. de Bury ordered a guard, which he pretended was to do honour to the Engliſh Governor, One evening this gentleman, finding himſelf out of order, walked out for the benefit of the air, but found that his guard followed him, as if they attended a criminal; upon which he returned to his palanquin, and appeared greatly incenſed at ſuch baſe uſage.

M. de Bury might, without theſe precautions, have been always ſure of ſuch a priſoner of war; but no ſuch delicacy muſt be expected from this old major, who knew no better. This mortification was not, however, the greateſt the Governor received, though he had given his parole of honour to deliver himſelf at Pondicherry, and his family being with him, were a kind of ſecurity for his perſon; for at their arrival in the wood of Calapette, four leagues from Pondicherry, the officers of that place were drawn up at the head of 300 men, under pretence of doing honour to the Engliſh Governor, although it was eaſy to ſee they were preparing a triumphal entry for him into Pondicherry.

This was indeed the real intention; for orders were given at Tirvangadon, two leagues from Pondicherry, for the detachment to halt, in order to refreſh themſelves. From whence they were ordered to march at three in the afternoon, the very hotteſt time of the day, in order to reach the capital before evening. The troops from Pondicherry took the precedence of thoſe from the iſles; which laſt, being diſguſted at this treatment, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by branches of green palm in their hats, marching, as it were, in triumph. This ceremony, which probably owed its riſe merely to the humour of the troops that came from Madras, ſeemed to be a farther mortification to the Engliſh.

Another halt was ordered to be made at a place about a cannon ſhot from the town, and all the Engliſh palanquins to be taken down in the middle of the road, which was quite clouded with duſt. It is probable that the French Governor had came out of Pondicherry, in order to inſpect the Engliſh Governor and his retinue. After they had made theſe priſoners of war wait almoſt an hour in the middle of the road, word was brought that M. Dupleix was arrived. He appeared laſt in the train, being preceded by all his guards on horſeback, in new equipages, before whom marched the grand prevot, with all his men armed, who had received orders to bring with them their colours, elephants, &c.

M. Dupleix was attended by three ſenators of Pondicherry: and when he arrived at the place where the Engliſh were, he was more ſolicitous of ſhewing his grandeur and pride, than ever Alexander the Great was when he received into his tent the diſconſolate family of the unhappy Darius. There was, however, one capital circumſtance wanting to complete this heroic compariſon, M. Dupleix not being the conqueror of this deſolate family which he received with ſo much pomp and ceremony.

M. Dupleix ſhewed all imaginable politeneſs to Mr. Morſe and his lady, and to all the Engliſh in his retinue. They marched on to the town at the head of this little army, and as they entered at the Madras port, the baſtions ſaluted them with twenty-one pieces of cannon. Mr. Morſe, his family, and all his train, were conducted to M. Dupleix's houſe. It was here his French grandeur was more conſpicuous than elſewhere: the Engliſh Governeſs was received by Madame Dupleix, attended by ſeveral ladies, all richly dreſſed. She, in particular, had not forgot to add to her natural accompliſhments all the diamonds and gems ſhe thought neceſſary to raiſe the luſtre of a reception, which to her was as flattering, as humbling and melancholy to the ſtranger, who like a queen beheld this oſtentatious ceremony with ſcorn.

It was thought at Pondicherry, that this detachment from Madras, was poſſeſſed of all the riches of that town, and in conſequence of this notion a ſtrong guard was placed at the gate, in order to ſtop all effects in general, whether belonging to the Engliſh or French. The baggage of M. Barthelemy, late Governor of Madras, was not exempted from a very ſtrict ſearch, which was done by two commiſſaries appointed for this worthy purpoſe. He was extremely mortified at ſuch proceedings, and the little regard they ſhewed for him on this occaſion, putting him in the ſame claſs with the reſt. The officers and others were treated in the ſame manner, not excepting M. Desjardins and M. Villebague, who, as commiſſaries of Madras, had their effects more ſtrictly examined, though they had a better title to be exempted than any of the reſt.

Theſe ſtrict inquiries and injurious precautions, uſed towards perſons of credit, did no honour to M. Dupleix. M. Barville paid dear for this ceremony; for being ſuſpected of aiding the Engliſh to ſave their effects, and of being too great a friend to Mr. Morſe and his lady, he was arreſted and carried to the fortreſs, and his ſervant ſent to priſon by order of M. Dupleix: ſo that his effects remained at the gate of the town, without any perſon belonging to him to look after them. He had unluckily charged himſelf with a gilt box, between 4000 and 5000 rupees value, belonging to an Armenian, for which he had granted his receipt. This merchant had intreated him to carry the box for him till this nation, who were ſtrangers to the Engliſh, had leave give them to tranſport their effects to Pondicherry, upon condition of ſettling there. A thing they never will do, for they love freedom of trade. M. Barville, being priſoner in the fortreſs, wrote about his effects, and mentioned particularly the box, but it was not to be found. No legal inquiry was made, nor was the guard queſtioned that had the care of the effects, or ſtopped on ſuſpicion. A report was ſpread, that this young man might have left it at Madras on his own account, or ſecreted it by the way. Upon theſe injurious reports, which Barville did not appear by his conduct to have deſerved, the Armenian ſent an attorney to arreſt him, founded upon his own receipt. M. Barville proteſted againſt this proceeding, and ſhewed that he could be anſwerable for nothing, as he was deprived of his liberty. He alſo proved to the Armenian, that the box was ſeen among the effects ſtopped at the gate of the town.

This box was not the only valuable thing loſt in the midſt of this confuſion. Such as had not proper perſons to look after their effects till the ſearch was finiſhed, complained to no purpoſe of their loſſes; for they were never regarded.

Several of the Engliſh, upon their arrival, deſired leave of M. Dupleix to withdraw to Goudelour, which he granted them, though they had been long enough in Pondicherry to be appriſed of the preparations that were making for the ſiege of Fort St. David, as had been before reſolved on.

Madras was at this time quiet; and M. Paradis, the Governor, being wanted in another ſtation, it was neceſſary to ſend a governor in his room. M. Deſpremeſnil was pitched upon, he being a proper perſon for their purpoſe, notwithſtanding he had formerly told M. Barthelemy, that the government of a place in time of war was a matter of too great importance for merchants like them. However, he accepted of the command at Madras, upon the ſolicitation of his father-in-law, M. Dupleix.

No ſooner was M. Deſpremeſnil arrived, than M. Paradis gave up the government of the place to him, and immediately ſet out for Pondicherry, at the head of a detachment of 300 men, which he took with him from Madras, in order to join the little army deſtined for the abovementioned ſiege of Fort St. David.

The Engliſh, attentive to the proceedings of the French, knowing that there was a neceſſity for ſending ſome troops from Madras to Pondicherry, gave notice of this to Maſon Kam, the Nabob's ſon, the very day the French had beat him, and who ſwore he would rather turn Faquir, than not be revenged of the French.

The Mooriſh General being appriſed that M. Paradis was on his way from Madras to Pondicherry, ſent part of his troops to intercept his march. Accordingly he was met by the Mooriſh cavalry three leagues to the ſouth of Sadraſs. The Moors attacked the detachment, while M. Paradis fought and retreated, ſtill advancing towards Sadraſs.

In ſhort, they followed the French even in ſight of Sadraſs, continually increaſing in numbers, and coming from all quarters; M. Paradis, who was afraid that theſe very Moors, whom he had beat at St. Thomas, would now be revenged on him, prudently retreated at the head of his detachment, leaving the rearguard, under the command of the brave M. Mainville, who was engaged with the Moors, and continually ſending word to M. Paradis to halt, but to no purpoſe; for on the contrary, he cauſed his baggage to march before him, as he was very deſirous of ſecuring about fifty boxes of effects, which he had carried out of Madras on his own account. As ſoon as he reached the town of Sadraſs, he pitched his camp at the Dutch redoubt, which he entered with a number ſufficient to make himſelf maſter thereof, and be able to defend himſelf in caſe the Moors had purſued and attacked him in Sadraſs. The Dutch were not willing to receive the French; and to ſecure themſelves from the reproaches, not only of their ſuperiors, but likewiſe the Moors, they cauſed themſelves to be forced by M. Paradis to conſent that the chief officers of his detachment ſhould be admitted into the lodgement, and that the troops ſhould encamp at their gate, and under the cannon of the place.

M. de Mainville had great difficulty to extricate himſelf with the rear-guard from the Mooriſh army, which preſſed very hard on him ſeveral times. At length, however, he got to Sadras, very much enraged againſt M. Paradis, who had abandoned him, in order to ſave the plunder he had got at Madras, rather than the troops of his detachment. He told him, the poſt of a commander ſhould always be next the enemy; and that he ought to have continued in the rear-guard, where the action was hotteſt, rather than file off at the head of the troops, as he had done.

The French had ſome men wounded on this occaſion, and fourteen taken priſoners by the Moors, who were drivers to the baggage, that had remained behind through their own fault; ſome of whom endeavouring to defend themſelves, the Moors killed one of them, and carried the reſt of them away priſoners.

M. Paradis promiſed to obtain the freedom of four Caffres, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in this action againſt the Moors. They drew lots, and this promiſe was made good at Pondicherry, where four of the braveſt among them, according to the report of all the officers, obtained their liberty. Theſe Caffres belonging to the iſles did wonders; for they could hardly be reſtrained, ſo enraged were they againſt the Moors. They likewiſe were of great ſervice in ſaving M. Paradis's baggage, upon which account he became their ſtrenuous advocate.

M. Paradis ſent an account immediately to Pondicherry of this action, and the ſituation of the troops, which were well intrenched under cover of the Dutch cannon. Upon which a new detachment was ſpeedily ſent to aſſiſt and extricate this Don Quixote hero. At length he got to Pondicherry with the two detachments, which he entered without any of the boxes and baggage he had carried from Madras being ſearched, as had happened to the very furniture of M. Barthelemy, when he returned, like him, from the government of Madras. This remarkable preference was ſhewn to all the effects which he carried with him, and eſcorted by the detachment, as well as all thoſe he had before ſent by chelingues.

Affairs being thus ſettled, they prepared to attack Fort St. David, which expedition is inſerted here, as related by an officer of the artillery in the French ſervice.

We left Pondicherry, and marched the 18th of December, 1746, in order to beſiege Fort St. David, with ſeven field pieces. We had orders to go and take poſſeſſion of the Engliſh Company's garden, which lies to the north-weſt of Fort St. David, within the reach of a thirty-ſix pounder, where there was a battery of ſix cannon. We were alſo ordered, in caſe the Moors oppoſed our deſign, to cut ourſelves a paſſage through them; a thing eaſily ſaid. On the 19th, our troops joined at the poſt of Ariancoupan, where was the general rendezvous for the whole army, together with the baggage and proviſions that were to follow it.

On the 10th of March, our troops, conſiſting of 1700 men, at break of day croſſed a river about a quarter of a league from the garden, under the fire of ſome cannon, ſupported by between 4 and 500 Moors, and defended by a little village. This poſt was carried on the firſt onſet. In puſhing on to the garden, we perceived on our right a body of about 3000 men, under ſome trees near the walls. We, however, diſlodged them by firing our cannon briſkly among them. Two hundred and fifty men, with five pieces of cannon, were ordered to go and make themſelves maſters of the houſe and garden. They had already poſſeſſed themſelves of the avenue or firſt court, when we perceived on our right a large body of Mooriſh cavalry coming out of a thick wood in order of battle, advancing ſlowly into a plain, with all their ſabres drawn, which glittered by the reflection of the ſun.

We put ourſelves in order of battle, and were in an inſtant drawn up in the little plain, in ſuch a manner that we were near at hand to aſſiſt our people, who endeavoured to make themſelves maſters of the battery in the garden. Our right was covered by the battery of four pieces of cannon, defended by fifty men, in a thicket before the village; our left ſupported by the firing from the garden, where our people lay with fifty men in ambuſh, about fifty paces from the left of the main body, and two pieces of cannon on our wings, thirty paces before the line of battle, the ſun being at our backs.

The firing began on both ſides at five in the morning. We had between 5000 and 6000 horſe to encounter with, beſides between 3000 and 4000 Mooriſh infantry, and fifty Engliſh horſe, who encouraged this great body of people, who were but little inured to war, though on this occaſion they drew up very well. Our cannon broke their ſquadrons, and not being able to ſtand againſt a very briſk fire from our ſmall two pounders, that diſcharged between fifteen and eighteen ſhot every minute, they were diſperſed in little parties, which attacking us in front and rear, coſt us a great deal of ammunition, being obliged upon that account to be upon the defenſive; whereas we reckoned we ſhould have become maſters of the field, ſuppoſing there were only between 1200 and 1400 men, as our ſpies had aſſured us at Pondicherry.

After having ſtood firm till eight in the morning, and and finding that if we poſſeſſed ourſelves of the garden, we could not keep any communication open with Pondicherry, we made an inventory of our ammunition; whereupon, finding only what might reaſonably ſerve to make a retreat for four leagues, we reſolved to retire. Accordingly orders were ſent to bring back the baggage, proviſions, and warlike ſtores, and the troops that were in the firſt court of the houſe in the garden, who had almoſt made themſelves maſters of the enemy' battery; but when theſe troops quitted their ſtation, in order to join the main body, the Moors, to the number of between 400 and 500, entered this fore court, and ſabre in hand, made themſelves maſters of all our baggage, proviſions, and ſtores; as alſo our camels, oxen, beaſts of carriage, tents, and in general, every thing that a vaſt number of coulis had brought hither, and who alone guarded this equipage; but were ſoon put to flight at the ſight of the Moors. So that there was none of our baggage ſaved, but ſuch as was not yet arrived in the garden, and which was immediately ſent back to Pondicherry.

The courage of our troops began to fail, who inſiſted upon retreating, as ſoon as they had been informed that there was but little ammunitiou left. They had notice of this through the imprudence of an officer of dragoons, who publiſhed it aloud at the head of the troop.

Our commander, M. Bury, judging the party too ſtrong to be able to receive them with advantage, wiſely ordered a retreat. The main body retired in good order as far as the river of Maricquichena, within a quarter of a league from the garden, where the party being haraſſed all the way, and after having ſuſtained a continual and very briſk fire in going through narrow defiles, arrived in confuſion, and even in diſorder; for they flung themſelves into that river, without knowing whether it was fordable or not, more like a flock of ducks than a body of troops, who always endeavour to make their flight appear to be a prudent and honourable retreat.

However, the French of this little army would have been entirely cut off, had the enemy, in that favourable inſtant, had the courage and experience to have fallen upon us ſword in hand; for the river was four feet deep where we croſſed it, and a hillock on the other ſide. When they found that we were retiring, the fifty Engliſh horſe, with between 8,000 or 10,000 Moors, galled us continually with a very briſk fire, a part of the cavalry having croſſed the river to the left, where there was but little water. All theſe circumſtances ſtruck ſuch terror into our men, that they refuſed to return the continual fire made upon them from all quarters. But our artillery, commanded by brave and experienced officers, who ſoon brought over their cannon, ſupported by no more than fifty dragoons, and having only Mooriſh cavalry at their head, were the firſt that made themſelves maſters of the little eminence, and by a very briſk and regular fire, ſeaſonably made on the enemy that charged the rear of our troops, abated their ardour, and gave our men, who croſſed the river in confuſion, time to form themſelves as they reached the oppoſite ſide. The troops having all paſſed, the officers drew them up in good order. We marched along the banks of the river, and gained the ſea ſhore. All our baggage we put between us and the ſea, and in this order continued our march to the fort of Ariancoupan, where we arrived at ſeven in the evening, in a very faint condition, having had no time to refreſh ourſelves; for we were haraſſed during our whole march by the Engliſh, who followed us pretty cloſe, as well as the Moors, and galled us greatly with their cannon, notwithſtanding the continual fire we likewiſe kept with our artillery, and which was of great ſervice in facilitating our retreat.

But notwithſtanding our fighting in the morning, and the different attacks made upon us on the road, we had only twelve men killed upon the ſpot; though we had between 120 and 130 wounded, that were carried to the hoſpital of Pondicherry. Among theſe was only one officer, a lieutenant of the artillery, who in diſengaging a cannon, which was very near falling into the enemy's hands, was ſhot through the arm with a muſquet ball, which did not, however, hinder him from ſaving the piece.

Beſides the baggage in the garden, we loſt, in croſſing the river of Mariquichena, a camel that carried a ſmall mortar and a ſtand of arms: the creature having tumbled in the river, we killed him, and overturned his load into the water, to hinder the enemy from making any uſe of it. The ſoldiers loſt a great many of their arms in croſſing the river, eſpecially ſuch as were wounded.

The loſs of the Moors was reckoned to be about 600 killed, and a great many wounded, beſides two elephants killed, which was a conſiderable loſs to them. Among their ſlain and wounded were found a great many of their leaders. As for the Engliſh, they loſt few of their men, as they did not come very near us, leſt, no doubt, we ſhould fire at them preferable to the Moors.

It is certain that this unhappy expedition did the French very little honour. Poor M. Bury, the commander, did all he knew, and all he could. In it all the officers loſt their tents; but he in particular, by loſing his, alſo loſt his ſcrutoire, in which were depoſited M. Dupleix's orders; whereby the Engliſh might find out at their leiſure our intentions, and the projects we were then going to execute. Had the Engliſh and the Moors acted in a proper manner, and known how to take advantage of the diſorder the French were in, for they muſt have ſeen themſelves juſt upon the point of defeating our troops and hacking them in pieces, and marched directly afterwards to Pondicherry, they might have eaſily ſcaled it without any hazard, as there were only about 200 very bad troops to guard the place.

The French troops being returned to Ariancoupan, encamped there without going to Pondicherry. All the reſt of the month of December was taken up in making ſeveral incurſions with ſtrong detachments on the ſide of Fort St. David, to keep the Engliſh and the Moors in continual apprehenſions of ſome new attack, and to ruin the Engliſh, by keeping up the exorbitant orbitant pay they had promiſed for the maintenance of the Mooriſh army. Theſe incurſions were made even in ſight of Fort St. David. But the French troops, haraſſed with fatigue and with continual marching, ſhared in the fears of the enemy: for once, as they were encamped half way from Goudelour, it happened that ſome horſes of our detachment had broke looſe, and eſcaping in the night, run quite round the detachment that lay upon their arms. The centinels cried, Who is there? but received no anſwer, the horſes ſtill continuing to ramble about; whereupon ſome wild fellow of a ſoldier cried out, being, doubtleſs, half a ſleep, "Here comes the Mooriſh cavalry." At thoſe words each man haſtened to decamp, by which means the whole detachment returned in diſorder, one after another, to Ariancoupan. It being a common obſervation, that when an enemy is once beat, we are no longer afraid of him; but when he firmly ſtands his ground, he ſtrikes us with terror.

The laſt day of the year was diſtinguiſhed by an enterprize as badly executed as concerted. The French had ſent a great number of Indian veſſels called chelingues to Ariancoupan, under pretence of carrying to Pondicherry the reſt of the army's baggage. Theſe boats were ordered to be in readineſs, about the beginning of the night, at the mouth of the river on the ſouth ſide. As ſoon as night came on, they privately cauſed a detachment of 500 men to file off from Ariancoupan, in order to embark on board theſe veſſels, and enter during the night into the river of Goudelour, and as ſoon as they had reached that place, at break of day, to ſet fire to it in ſeveral places, and afterwards return; but the winds and the ſea quite balked theſe airy projects, which might have been attended with a thouſand difficulties and inconveniences. The detachment, according to their orders, aſſembled at the place of rendezvous appointed for the veſſels, and embarked; but the winds proving contrary, and blowing a freſh gale, the ſea ran ſo high that the chelingues, overloaded with men, could not for the moſt part get over the bar, and many of them ſinking, and being full of water, the ſoldiers in order to ſave themſelves left their arms, which were by that means loſt. So that the whole detachment debarked, and returned to Ariancoupan, wearied and as wet as ducks. Such was the ſucceſs of this fine enterprize!

The French army ſtill remained at Ariancoupan; but finding that they could give no diſturbance to the enemy on the ſide of Goudelour, where they were very much upon their guard, M. Dupleix, in order to make a diverſion, projected a ſcheme to remove the Moors; agreeable to which, he wrote to M. Deſpremeſnil, Governor of Madras, ordering him to ſend from that place a ſtrong detachment upon the road to Arcot, in order to burn and deſtroy all the aldees or villages that belonged to the Moors. M. de Mainville, the officer who was ordered upon this ſhocking enterprize, was terrified at it; as was alſo M. Deſpremeſnil, who was, however, obliged to cauſe it to be put in execution.

The commanding officer would not ſtir before he had a written order. This was given him; and accordingly he ſet out, burning and deſtroying about fifteen aldees, or large villages, that belonged to the Moors, only as ſovereigns of the country; whereas the houſes, and every thing in them, belonged to the Malabars and Parias, two neutral nations, who had nothing to do with this war. In this expedition, the ſoldiers, who generally exceed their orders, committed the moſt ſhocking violences: ſo that robbing, pillaging, rapes, and all the infamous practices of which common ſoldiers are capable of, were perpetrated; notwithſtanding the officers did all in their power to reſtrain them, and were extremely ſhocked to be obliged to execute ſuch orders, which entirely ruined a whole country, by the great quantities of grain which was conſumed by the flames, and in which the wealth of thoſe people conſiſts.

It is impoſſible to conceive what advantage the French hoped to reap from ſuch an action, which gave them the character of incendiaries and brutal ſavages throughout the whole coaſt. On the contrary, they might have ſaved every thing, and thereby have reaped conſiderable advantage from this expedition, by carrying off with the detachment 2000 coulis, with all the beaſts of carriage, and brought to Madras all the rice and other grain which had been very imprudently burnt; whereby the French might have flowed in plenty; whereas all their garriſons were in great want, by reaſon of the war with the Engliſh, who being maſters of the ſea, ſuffered nothing to paſs them that way: ſo that they could not get any corn but from the lands, which being ruined by means of the drought, &c. as alſo by the conſumption of the Mooriſh army, could not furniſh enough for their preſſing wants.

The burning of the Mooriſh aldees, not only contributed to increaſe the rage and hatred of the Moors againſt the French, but did not make them ſtir a foot from Goudelour; ſo that the projected diverſion had not the deſired effect, and was looked upon as a very ill-concerted ſcheme. The old Nabob, who was at Arcot, only called in ſome other troops that were diſperſed elſewhere, and kept them in his capital, in order for the future to oppoſe the like invaſions, on the part of the French, ſhould they attempt any more.

M. Dupleix, finding his warlike projects all fruſtrated, by the little ſucceſſes that attended them, reſolved to lay aſide the thoughts of beſieging Goudelour, till a more favourable opportunity. He ordered the army back from Ariancoupan, and every day, in ſmall detachments, they entered Pondicherry. The reſt of the baggage was likewiſe brought back; and the twenty chelingues, and the Bourbon, were unloaded of their mighty implements of war which were intended for this ſiege, which they had looked upon as very eaſy to execute.

The French were made ſenſible, but too late for their honour, that whilſt the Moors aſſiſted the Engliſh, nothing could be done in the attempt on Goudelour. When the French troops were all returned to Pondicherry, the Moors, ſeeing them quiet, loſt all patience before Goudelour, ſince the Engliſh could not pay them the money they expected to receive. The people of Pondicherry took occaſion, from the diſpoſition which they ſuppoſed the Moors to be in for deſert-

ing the Engliſh, to make them propoſals of an accommodation; but they were too much exaſperated againſt the French to hear of any ſuch terms with coolneſs; ſo that the firſt anſwer was haughty and inſolent, demanding an immenſe ſum of money by way of damages before they would talk of any accommodation. About the end of December, M. Dordelin's ſquadron, conſiſting of the Centaur, Brilliant, Mars, and St. Louis, arrived at Madras from Achen; when, after taking in ſome of the Company's effects, as alſo ſome moveables and goods belonging to particular perſons, and to the Armenians, whom they obliged to quit this town, they arrived at Pondicherry January the 18th, 1747. The Moors finding the French were arrived, and conſequently ſome reinforcements with them, they diſtruſted more than ever the promiſes of the Engliſh, and appeared willing to hearken to propoſitions of a peace with the French. The old Nabob of Arcot ſent to the French from that place M. Goſſe, a counſellor, and M. Kerjean, an officer, whom he had kept priſoners ſince the 27th of October, deſiring them to endeavour to bring about an accommodation when they arrived at Pondicherry; telling them, that it was upon theſe conditions he ſet them at liberty. The French actually entered into a negociation with the Moors, but the latter demanded a great deal of money, which the French refuſed to give, pretending to make peace upon an equal footing: ſo that this contraſt, and claſhing in the French ſchemes, farther retarded its concluſion.

MADRAS. By the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, Madras was reſtored to the Engliſh; but the reſtleſs French in this war had ſtill a view to our Eaſt-India ſettlements. To which end they ſent a ſtrong ſquadron in 1757 to that part of the world, under the command of Mr. d'Ache, conſiſting of nine ſhips of the line from ſeventy-four guns to fifty, and two frigates. The Engliſh ſquadron conſiſted of ſeven ſhips of the line from ſixty-ſix to fifty, and one frigate, with a ſtoreſhip under Admiral Pococke; the French, however ſuperior, loſt 500 men; our loſs was far ſhort of it, which is the more probable, they having been double manned. This engagement was off Alemparve, or Lampraavy, in the Bay of Bengal, and coaſt of Coromandel, on the 29th of April, 1758. The Captains Brereton, Vincent, and Legge, were accuſed of deſerting the Admiral in the action, or, it is ſaid, he would have very nigh deſtroyed the French fleet. The Admiral tried Vincent and Legge, who were both ſuſpended; Brereton was removed to another ſhip.

A ſecond engagement was fought on the 3d of the following Auguſt, which proved rather a running fight than an action, and the Admiral drove them into Pondicherry.

Fort St. David's was in the mean time taken by M. Lally; after which he marched at the head of 2500 men to inveſt Madras by land, and on the 14th of December hoiſted their flag at Egmore, and St. Thomé, and then attacked the black town. Colonel Draper, newly arrived with a regiment of the Company's, made a grand ſally, in which he was warmly received by the regiment of Lorraine; and had Draper been ſeconded by his two platoons of grenadiers, he would have brought in eleven officers, and fifty men; but he was forced to ſuſtain the whole force of two French platoons, having received ſeveral balls through his coat, as did Captain Beaver, without any other injury. M. Lally's brigade of freſh men then came up to ſupport the regiment of Lorraine, and Colonel Draper was forced to retire into the garriſon, after a very hot action, in which the Captains Billhock and Hume were killed; Captain Paſchal and Lieutenant Elliot wounded; and about 150 men killed, wounded, and taken. On the ſide of the enemy, by M. Lally's own account, two chief officers killed, ſix wounded, and a brigadier-general, one of the beſt of their officers taken priſoner.

On the 6th of January, the batteries were opened againſt the fort, which kept a continual firing of ſhot and ſhells till the 26th, which diſmounted twenty-ſix pieces of cannon and three mortars, but did not deſtroy the defences. The General Lally then advanced his trenches, and erected a battery quite up to the head of the glacis, which they opened on the laſt of January; but the ſuperior fire of the fort obliged them to cloſe their embrazures again. He next advanced his ſap along the ſea-ſide, ſo far as to incloſe entirely the north-eaſt angle of the covered way, from whence the Engliſh then retired; the enemy endeavouring to enter the ditch by a mine, failed by an injudicious ſpringing it. On the 16th of February the enemy fired very hot upon the town; but on the arrival of his Majeſty's ſhip the Queenſborough, with 600 men to reinforce the garriſon, M. Lally thought proper to raiſe the ſiege; and was on the point of ſetting fire to the black town, when he ſaw the Queenſborough and Revenge, which prevented him. The Engliſh found forty pieces of cannon in his batteries, moſt of which were rendered unſerviceable by our batteries.

This brave defence of Madras was chiefly ſupported by the intrepid conduct of Colonel Draper, Major Brereton, and Captain Beaver, the place having ſuſtained a ſiege of thirty-three days. See CONJEVERAM.

On Sunday the 24th of July, 1780, late in the evening, an alarm was given throughout Choultry-plain, that Hyder Ally's horſe were at the Mount. Almoſt all the families in the ſuburbs and neighbourhood of Madras, moved that night into the fort; and in the courſe of a few days, not a houſe was inhabited beyond the iſland, except the government garden-houſe, which the Governor gave up to the General, who had it guarded by two field-pieces, with artillery, and a company of ſepoys. Freſh intelligence came in every day; and although the Nabob, as well as others, endeavoured to conceal it, the public had good ground of apprehenſion, which was not a little heightened by the ſupineneſs of government, and the obſtinate contempt with which the General ſpoke of Hyder and his army.

The burning of all the villages between the Mount and Madras, the depredations committed at St. Thomé, and the attack upon Mr. Brodie, who went one morning to his garden-houſe for ſome papers, and who ſhewed great ſpirit and addreſs in effecting his eſcape, did not rouze the Governor or General to a ſenſe of their ſituation. It was the faſhion to treat the name of Hyder with ſcorn, and to look upon thoſe parties of horſe as banditti.

The Armenians and others in the Mahratta town, and black town, were, at laſt, ſo very uneaſy, as to offer to raiſe and pay for a force ſufficient for the defence of the black town wall; but the offer was laughed at by the General, and ſlighted by Mr. Whitehill, the governor: and many days elapſed even after that offer, before any active ſteps were taken to repair the black town, to mount the guns, to finiſh the ſtockade on the north-eaſt, and to complete a ditch and ſtockade from the hoſpital to the bridge. All this however, was almoſt effected; and when government ſeemed in earneſt about that, as well as in their preparations for the field, they were enabled to raiſe money for their preſſing emergencies. Their preparations, however, for the campaign went on ſo ſlowly, and the meaſures intended to be purſued appeared to be ſo impolitic, that Mr. Sadler gave in a minute in council, remonſtrating ſtrongly againſt the idea which the General then entertained of not taking the field, and ſtill more againſt his deſign to form the junction at Conjeveram, inſtead of the Mount.

Lord Macleod, on being appointed to the command, wrote to the committee in ſtrong terms againſt forming at any place far diſtant from the preſidency, and it is ſaid that this letter gave great offence to the General. Mr. Sadler had ſcarcely delivered in his minute, and finiſhed ſuch obſervations as he had made uſe of in introducing the ſubject, when Mr. Whitehill ſaid, that for his part, he ſhould not anſwer him; and that, if Sir Hector Munro did not take proper notice of Mr. Sadler, he was not fit for the ſtation he held. On the next council day, Mr. Sadler was ſuſpended, and on the committee day following, Mr. Davidſon was propoſed as a proper perſon to fill Sir Hector Munro's ſeat at the committee during the General's abſence, to prevent Meſſrs. Smith and Johnſon from having a decided majority in committee, and interrupting the operations of the General in the field.

Having arranged theſe matters at the preſidency, and hearing that Colonel Braithwaite had reached the Mount with his detachment from Pondicherry, Sir Hector Munro ſent an expreſs to Colonel Baillie, on Wedneſday the 30th of Auguſt, to Gumero Ponda, about twenty-eight miles N. N. W. of Madras, to proceed to Conjeveram, although by that route he muſt have a river to croſs at Tripoſore; although he could have reached the Mount as ſoon as the camp was intended to move; and although (as the diſmal event has proved) he riſked his detachment, by expoſing it alone to Hyder Ally's horſe, while the main army were on a different route.

On Friday afternoon, the General accompanied by the Governor and Mr. Davidſon, joined the army at the Mount; and on Saturday morning at two o'clock, he moved toward Conjeveram with the following army.

The main army, conſiſting as above of 5,700 men, reached Conjeveram on Tueſday the 5th of September. The ſame day Colonel Baillie paſſed the river at Tripaſou, after having been ſtopped on the north ſide of it eleven days in conſequence of the heavy rains. He then proceeded to Perembaukum, a village diſtant about fourteen miles from Conjeveram, where he encamped; and on the 7th, the enemy under Hyder's ſecond ſon (Reze Cawn) attacked him with 8000 good horſe, and many infantry, fourteen guns, beſides rocketmen and others, all of whom he repulſed with very great ſlaughter, though the cavalry charged him ſeveral times very daringly, from ten to three o'clock. He then adviſed General Munro of his ſituation, and it is ſaid he declared to him, that he had been ſo haraſſed, and was ſtill ſo cloſely preſſed by the enemy, and ſo much in want of proviſions and ammunition, as to have doubts of his being able to effect a junction; and that he deſired the General to move towards him.

Colonel Baillie moved, on the evening of the 8th, to a ſmall fort of the Nabob's, called Tackolum, about four miles from Perembaukum, where he could procure no other refreſhment than a little light grain, called Natchinee, which he ſerved to his Sepoys with great frugality; and after that ſlight refreſhment, he marched at twelve at night on his way to Conjeveram, but he found himſelf very much annoyed by the enemy, the moon ſhining very brightly.

At

At nine in the morning of the 9th, he was joined by Lieutenant-Colonel Fletcher, with the grenadiers of the 73d regiment, the light-infantry company, and two others; Captains Phillips' and Farrier's veteran grenadier companies; five companies of grenadier Sepoys, commanded by Captain Rumley, and a company of marksmen.

At eight at night of Saturday the 9th, the enemy began to annoy him, and continued to do so all night, insomuch that throughout the General's camp at Conjeveram, where their firing was distinctly heard, every person was in a state of inexpressible anxiety. In this distressing situation Lord Macleod solicited the General strongly to move with his whole army, which he declined to do; and it was with difficulty he was persuaded to send off the reinforcement, which went under Colonel Fletcher. To that reinforcement he allowed 200 rounds of ammunition, and twenty to each of the ten field-pieces. But although the General refused to hearken to Lord Macleod's reasoning at first, he at last seemed to see the force of it, and gave hopes tnat he would move; whereupon his Lordship retired to his palankin, and told one of his Captains not to move from him—that the camp was to move; that he would take a little rest; and that he desired to be awaked if any thing particular should happen. Soon after he asked, if the front line was in motion, and seemed astonished and chagrined when he heard that they had not begun to move. He seemed very uneasy, started often, could not sleep, and was so much hurt at the General's conduct, as to be unable to reconcile himself to the idea of any farther solicitation on the subject.

Colonel Baillie, before Colonel Fletcher who commanded the reinforcement had joined him, fought his way towards the camp, and after the junction continued to do so with such perseverance, that he was within five miles of the main body when the engagement began, the particulars of which were as follow:

Colonel Baillie marched his men in an oblong square, with his ammunition and baggage in the centre; and inspired by the happy prospect of effecting a junction with the main army, withstood all the efforts of the horse, till they suddenly filed off to the right and left on Colonel Baille's right, and discovered to him six field-pieces, which he ordered Captain Rumley to storm. Captain Rumley executed his orders with his usual alacrity and ardour, and had scarcely got possession of them and spiked them, when a second battery opened upon him from a spot of low ground; which, however, he had in view to storm also, had not the only remaining tumbril of ammunition at that instant blown up; on which he told the brave Sepoys that were with him, that they must return to assist their friends in distress—They did so, and fought to the last man.

It is said that Colonel Fletcher pointed out to Colonel Baillie the Frenchman in a bush, on the side of the road, who he was sure was pointing the gun at the tumbril, and that the moment he had spoken it, it blew up. In this engagement Colonel Baillie, with many other officers, were made prisoners; and Colonel Fletcher, Captains Rumley and Powell, and all the flower of the army were killed.

It appears that Hyder Ally was manœuvring with his whole army, from the time when our troops arrived at Conjeveram, to the day previous to the attack on Colonel Baillie, with a view to lead our General into a belief, that he meant to advance on them with his horse, in regular columns from the south west. His manœuvres plainly indicated, however, that this was not his intention, but that it was his object to cut off Colonel Baillie.

Major Kelly, who was appointed to the command of Conjeveram Pagoda, used frequently to take a view of the enemy and Colonel Baillie, and by signals to recommend what he thought proper to be done; but Sir Hector Munro directed his march, as is said, in direct contradiction to them. The march from Conjeveram towards the scene of action, was begun at eight o'clock in the morning of Sunday the 10th, and continued till ten o'clock, when Colonel Baillie's tumbril blew up, on which the General said, it was all over, and that they might as well return. The officers remonstrated, saying, they were sure they could save some of the troops; to which the General replied, that it was too late, and that they ought not to lose their party at Conjeveram. About twelve o'clock that night General Munro put the front lines in motion towards Conjeveram, without giving Lord Macleod the least intimation of his intention; and the rear of the army, in which were the remains of the 73d regiment, were asleep; nor had they any other notification to march, than that some of those in motion perceiving others asleep, called on them to follow. Major Kelly came up to Lord Macleod, and after observing that he had no official orders to inform him of the sudden motion of Sir Hector Munro, and the front of the army, said, that the fact was so, and advised him to order his men to march; Lord Macleod did so, but his Highlanders, as well as the Company's troops in the rear, were so much fatigued, that before he could get them on their feet, the front were a great way a-head, insomuch, that on the parting of two roads, they were at a loss which to take, and were also so apprehensive of being cut off, that they were obliged to send repeated messages to the General to stop till they should come up, which he was at last prevailed on to do. He sent them proper guides, and they proceeded altogether to Chingliput, where they arrived at day-break on Tuesday the 21st.

Colonel Cosby fortunately met one of the fugitive Sepoys from Colonel Baillie's camp, just as he was about to make a forced march to Conjeveram; and after having been much harassed in his route, arrived safely at Chingliput, within twenty-four hours of the General. At Chingliput the troops staid all Tuesday, and on Wednesday the 13th, at six o'clock, they began their march, and arrived at the Mount at one o'clock on Thursday the 14th, after having been harassed very much by Hyder Ally's horse all the way, and having suffered some loss in their rear-guard. The gentleman to whom chiefly we are indebted for the above account of this campaign in India, observed to an officer of the army, that the length of way from Conjeveram to Chingliput, which is twenty-four miles, and that from Chingliput to the Mount, which is twenty-eight miles, muſt have greatly fatigued them. To this obſervation the officer ſeemed to reply, that they were in ſome meaſure prepared for this fatiguing journey, by the exerciſe the General had been pleaſed to give them on Sunday the 10th, when, although they had moved but about three miles of a direct line, from Conjeveram towards Colonel Baillie, they had, by one manœuvre or other, marched fourteen miles of ground.

The retreat of our army to Madras, filled the whole inhabitants at once with ſorrow for their wounded or ſlaughtered friends, and anxiety for their own ſafety. The more timid were eager to find opportunities of returning, with as much of their ſubſtance as poſſible, to Europe; while thoſe of greater courage caſt their eyes to Bengal, looking with great ſolicitude for ſuccour from that rich and extenſive province. There was not an inhabitant in the Preſidency, who did not wear mourning. Civilians and ſoldiers united in their murmurs againſt Sir Hector Munro and Sir Thomas Rumbold, through whoſe egregious negligence and folly ſo great calamities had overtaken the Britiſh in India; in paying a tribute of praiſe to the memory of Colonel Fletcher, and the other brave officers who periſhed in the unequal conteſt; and in applauding the bravery of Colonel Baillie and his fellow-priſoners; and the councils as well as the intrepidity of Lord Macleod, who ſtrongly ſeconded the advice of Mr. Sadler, to form a junction of the forces at the Mount. To this effect he wrote a letter to the Committee; and by this conduct incurred the diſpleaſure of the General to ſuch a degree, that he refuſed the civilities due to his Lordſhip's ſtation.

As ſoon as the intelligence of the diſaſter of our army reached Madras, a requiſition was made to Bengal of a ſuitable reinforcement to be ſent from that province with all expedition. Whereupon it was reſolved, that a ſupply of money ſhould be ſent to the relief of Fort St. George, and that a large detachment of European infantry and artillery ſhould proceed thither immediately; and likewiſe that Lieutenant-General Sir Eyre Coote ſhould ſail directly to take upon himſelf the command of the army on the coaſt. Theſe reſolutions were accordingly carried into execution; but in the mean time Hyder Ally made himſelf maſter of Arcot.

It might have been expected that this fierce Commander would have marked his journey into the Carnatic with devaſtation and ſlaughter. But his fury was wholly directed againſt the Engliſh. To the natives he made the ſtrongeſt profeſſions of regard and affection. He told them he was not their foe, but their friend; and that his only object was to deliver them from the common enemy of India. He reſtrained his ſoldiers from rapine and plunder by the terror of his diſcipline; encouraged the country people to ſow their land, telling them, that if they were in want of ſeed, he would furniſh it; and that henceforth they would enjoy the fruits of their induſtry, for that againſt the next monſoon there would not be a white face in the Carnatic.

All the accounts we have received of late from India, are full of complaints againſt the General, Sir Hector Munro. But, doubtleſs, that Commander has ſome reaſons for his conduct, with which we are not acquainted. It would be but juſtice, therefore, until we know thoſe reaſons, to ſuſpend, if poſſible, our judgment, and not haſtily condemn a man, who, on many occaſions, has acquitted himſelf with equal integrity, courage and ability. That he did not march his troops to the ſuccour of Colonel Baillie from Conjeveram, when it appeared that he was ſuccumbing under the fury of Hyder Ally's forces, and the ſuperiority of their numbers admits of this obvious apology, that the flower of his army had already been diſpatched for that purpoſe, and that the remainder under his command, had they advanced, muſt, in all probability, have alſo fallen a ſacrifice to the numerous and victorious troops of the enemy. It was, therefore, more prudent to fall back to Madras, for the protection of that place, than to riſk at once all our hopes in the Carnatic. There is ſometimes greater magnanimity in ſubmitting to a ſuſpicion of cowardice, than in blindly ruſhing into action without any hope of ſucceſs.

The circumſtance in which the General's conduct ſeems moſt expoſed to cenſure is, his not having provided an earlier junction of the troops. But it appears that if Colonel Baillie had not been detained on his march eleven days, by a ſudden and unexpected ſwelling of the river, he would have reached Conjeveram, the place of rendezvous, in time to have joined Sir Hector Munro, which might have prevented the fatal conſequences that followed that interruption which he met with in his march thither. It is, indeed, alleged, that there was another, and even a ſhorter route, by which that interruption might have been avoided. It would, however, be candid to know the truth of that allegation, before we finally pronounce ſentence againſt that General, who was lately ſo great a favorite on the reduction of Pondicherry.

Of one error General Munro has undoubtedly been guilty, an error common to him; and to almoſt the whole Britiſh nation, a raſh and unjuſtifiable contempt of the enemy. It was an error of this kind that ſhook the power of Britain in America; and a ſimilar miſtake, it would ſeem, has endangered her authority in India.

There is a common opinion, that the Northern nations poſſeſs a ſuperior degree of courage and ferocity to that of the inhabitants of warm climates. Yet it is remarkable, that the Arabians and Mahrattas have preſerved their liberty, while the fierce Maſſagetæ, Germans, and other Northern tribes, have ſubmitted to the yoke of ſlavery. The Saracens, according to the obſervations of an eminent writer, leaving the deſerts of Arabia, carried their conqueſts northwards upon all the fertile provinces of the Roman empire, and met the Turks half-way, who were coming ſouthwards from the deſerts of Tartary. One of the moſt formidable enemies that was ever encountered by Alexander the Great, according to the unanimous teſtimony of ancient hiſtorians, was Porus, an Indian Prince, whoſe dominions dominions lay beyond the river Hydaſpes. Hyder Ally was the modern Porus of India: nor had he yet been oppoſed by an Alexander. If the natives of Bengal, and other provinces in Indoſtan, are a timid and unwarlike race, their effeminacy does not ariſe from the immediate operation of the climate on their bodies or minds, but from the fertility of the ſoil, the fewneſs of their wants, and the deſpotiſm of government; circumſtances which ſupercede that exertion of mind, and activity of body, which exiſt in the ſame latitudes, where ſuch circumſtances have no place. Where ſhall we find, after all, greater force of mind, more undaunted intrepidity, than among the gentle ſons of the Eaſt? They have been known to periſh by famine, rather than taſte of food by which they would have loſt their Caſt, or been degraded from their rank in ſociety. The practice of wives burning themſelves on the ſame funeral pile which conſumed the dead bodies of their huſbands, which was once ſo common in the Eaſt, is not wholly obſolete. A Roman poet could ſay in the fervour of his imagination, "Ah, thou half of my ſoul! if thou haſt left me, why do I, the remaining half, linger in pain behind?" But it is in India only that we find, in reality, the ſtrength of love prevailing over the fear of death. Might not this noble energy of mind be converted into another channel, and receive a different direction? Might not a mind that has courage to meet certain death in the forms of fire and famine, be trained to riſk their lives in the field of battle? But, ſays the celebrated Monteſquieu, the Indians are a daſtardly race, though the ſame ſenſibility which makes them afraid of death, makes them alſo afraid of other things more than of death. Such an obſervation was not to have been expected from the author of the Spirit of Laws. Where is the nation that is not afraid of death? Wounds and death are no pleaſant things to any people. And if, notwithſtanding this, they are brave in the field, it is becauſe there are evils ſtill more terrible: and any people who are of this opinion, are capable of being made as brave as the braveſt troops of Europe. However, this modern Porus's conqueſts were but ſhort-lived, for early in January the Britiſh troops took the field, Hyder's army being then encamped near Ponamalee; being apprized by his Hieras of their approach, he moved to Coverepauke, from thence he marched to Colar, where Sir Eyre Coote came up with the rear of his army; the advanced of the Britiſh engaged, and cut off great part of his bazar, or market, a conſiderable quantity of different ſorts of baggage, with ſome heavy artillery, moſtly country pieces. By Mulawaugle they had another ſkirmiſh, in which the Britiſh were victorious. Hyder, after getting into the Tanjore country, imagined that he ſhould have prevailed upon that Sovereign to have aſſiſted him with troops and proviſions; the King, finding Sir Eyre was cloſely following Hyder, refuſed to grant any aſſiſtance, upon which his army pillaged ſeveral villages, &c. The King likewiſe ordered 20,000 men to aſſemble, to prevent any further depredations, and were ready to join the Engliſh army in driving him entirely from that quarter. Hyder finding himſelf deſerted by his former allies, the Nizam Van Ally Cawn, the Mahrattas, and the King of Tanjore; but above all, being neglected and diſappointed by the French, ſent his ſon to Bangalore, his principal fort in the Myſore country, with all his infantry, and kept the field with his cavalry, burning and deſtroying every town and village he paſſed through in his retreat.

Hyder Ally loſt more than 18,000 men in the different ſkirmiſhes, beſides ſome artillery, baggage, &c. The ſum Hyder was to pay to the French Government for their aſſiſtance, was nearly 1,800,000l. ſterling, very near 120 lacks of rupees, allowing each lack at 12,500l.

MADRAS.—On the 8th of February, 1782, Sir Edward Hughes anchored in this road, and the ſame day he received advice from Lord Macartney, the Governor of this place, that the French ſquadron, conſiſting of thirty ſhips and veſſels, was at anchor about twenty leagues to the northward of this port. In the afternoon of the 9th Captain Alms, in his Majeſty's ſhip the Monmouth, with the Hero, Iſis, and the armed tranſport Manilla, joined him in the road. He continued to uſe every poſſible diligence in getting the neceſſary ſtores and proviſions on board the ſeveral ſhips until the 15th of February, when the enemy's ſquadron, conſiſting of twelve ſail of line of battle ſhips, ſix frigates, eight large tranſports, and ſix captured veſſels, came in ſight to the northward, ſtanding for Madras Road, and about noon the ſame day anchored about four miles without the road. In the mean time Sir Edward Hughes placed his Majeſty's ſhips in the moſt advantageous manner to defend themſelves, and the other ſhips in the road, with ſprings on their cables, that they might bring their broadſides to bear more effectually on the enemy, ſhould they attempt an attack.

At four in the afternoon the enemy weighed and ſtood to the ſouthward, when he immediately made ſignal to weigh and ſtand after them, having received on board a detachment of 300 officers and men of his Majeſty's 98th regiment, who were diſtributed to the ſhips of the ſquadron; bearing to the ſouth all that night under an eaſy ſail, and in the morning at day-light found the enemy's ſhips had ſeparated in the night; their twelve line of battle ſhips and a frigate, bearing eaſt of Sir Edward Hughes's ſquadron diſtant about four leagues, and ſixteen ſail of their frigates and tranſports, bearing S. W. diſtant about three leagues, and ſteering a direct courſe for Pondicherry; on which the Engliſh Admiral inſtantly made a ſignal, a general chace to the S. W. if poſſible, to come up with them and take their tranſports, he well knowing the enemy's line of battle ſhips would follow to protect them all in their power. In the courſe of the chaſe the copper-bottomed ſhips came up with them, and captured ſix ſail of ſhips and veſſels, five of which were Engliſh, taken by the French when to the northward off Madras, out of which he ordered the French to be taken, and the veſſels to proceed with their own crews to Negapatam; the ſixth was the Lauriſton, a tranſport, having on board many French officers, 300 men of the Lauſanne, and laden with guns, ſhot, powder, and other military ſtores. The 17th at five minutes paſt four in the afternoon, the enemy's enemy's three ſhips began their fire on the Exeter, which was returned by her, and her ſecond a head.

At ten minutes paſt four, he made the ſignal for battle, and at twelve minutes paſt, the action become general from rear to centre, the commanding ſhip of the French with three others on the ſecond line, leading down to their enemy's centre, yet never at any time advancing farther than oppoſite to the Superbe, the Engliſh centre ſhip, with little or no wind, and ſome heavy rain during the engagement.

Under theſe circumſtances, the enemy brought eight of their beſt ſhips to the attack of five of the Engliſh, as the van of their line, conſiſting of the Monmouth, Eagle, Burford, and Worceſter, could not be brought into action, with tacking on the French; and although the ſignal for that purpoſe was at the maſt head ready for hoiſting, they were neither ſufficiently enabled to tack, nor were the centre and rear, then engaged with the enemy, hard preſſed, and much diſabled in their rigging able to follow them, without an almoſt certainty of ſeparating their van from the rear.

At ſix in the afternoon, a ſquall of wind from the S. E. took the Engliſh ſhips, and laid them round, head on to the enemy to the north eaſtward, when the engagement was renewed by the Engliſh five ſhips, with great ſpirit and alacrity, from their ſtarboard guns; and at twenty-five minutes paſt ſix juſt before dark, the French ſhips engaged, having viſibly ſuffered ſeverely, the whole of them hauled their wind, and ſtood to the N. E.

After the action the Engliſh ſtood ſouthward under little ſail all night, and in the morning, at day light, found the Superbe's main-maſt, fore-maſt, and bowſprit, ſo much wounded, as to render it exceedingly dangerous to carry ſail on them, the Exeter's maſts were alſo much damaged, and the ſhot holes, in all the ſhips that had been engaged, ſo far under water, as to render it impoſſible to ſtop them, but by giving the ſhips deep heels in ſmooth water; all which, and the wind continuing to blow from the northward, determined him to proceed to Trincomalé, as the only proper place to refit the diſabled ſhips, and he accordingly arrived there on the 24th. On their paſſage from the iſlands to this coaſt, the enemy fell in with his Majeſty's ſhip the Hannibal, Captain Chriſtie, off the weſt coaſt of Sumatra, and took her, this raiſed the number of the line of battle ſhips to twelve, againſt nine of the Engliſh.

Abſtract of the killed and wounded on board of his Majeſty's ſhips:

Ships	Killed	Wounded	Total
Superbe	11	25	36
Exeter	10	45	55
Monarca	1	5	6
Hero	9	7	16
Iſis	1	3	4
	32	85	117

On the 20th of July, 1782, Sir Edward Hughes's ſquadron being in tolerable condition for ſervice, he left the road with the ſquadren under his command, and uſed all diligence poſſible to get to the ſouthward of Trincomalé; being apprehenſive the French would endeavour to make themſelves maſters of that harbour, in the abſence of that ſquadron; but the wind blowing ſtrong from the ſouthward, he did not arrive with the ſquadron off Trincomalé till the night of the 2d of September; and, in the morning following, he diſcovered French colours, on the forts, and their ſquadron reinforced by the Illuſtre, of ſeventy-four guns, St. Michael of ſixty-four, and the Elizabeth, formerly a companies ſhip, of fifty guns, with ſeveral tranſports, in all, thirty ſail, at anchor in the ſeveral bays there.

On the appearance of his Majeſty's ſquadron on the morning of the 3d, the French ſquadron, conſiſting of fourteen line of battle ſhips, the Elizabeth, three frigates, and a fire-ſhip, got under ſail, and about ſix A. M. ſtood out to the Back Bay to the S. eaſtward, the wind blowing ſtrong at S. W. off the ſhore, which placed them to windward of the Engliſh ſquadron.

At ten minutes paſt ſix A. M. he made the ſignal for the line a battle a head at two cables length diſtant, ſhortened ſail, and edged away from the wind, that the ſhips to form the van of their line might the more ſpeedily get to their ſtation. At twenty minutes paſt eight the French ſquadron began to edge down on the Engliſh line, and then formed in good order.

From that time till half paſt eleven A. M. Sir Edward Hughes ſteered under topſails in the line E. S. E. with the wind blowing ſtrong at S. W. in order to draw the French ſquadron as far as poſſible from the port of Trincomalé; they ſometimes edging down ſometimes bringing to, and in no regular order, as if undetermined what to do.

At noon the French ſquadron appeared to have an intention to engage. At half paſt two P. M. the French line began to fire, and the Engliſh made ſignal for battle. At five minutes after the engagement was general from van to rear, the two additional ſhips of the French line fell furiouſly on the Engliſh rearmoſt ſhip the Worceſter, but were well reſiſted by that ſhip and the Monmouth, her ſecond a head, which backed all her ſails to aſſiſt.

About the ſame time the van of the French line, to which five of their ſhips had crowded, bore down on the Exeter and Iſis, the two headmoſt ſhips of the Engliſh line, and by an exerted fire on them, forced the Exeter, much diſabled out of the line, then tacked, keeping their wind, and firing on the Iſis and other ſhips belonging to the Engliſh van as ſhe paſſed. In the mean time, the centre of the two lines were warmly engaged, ſhip to ſhip. At twenty minutes paſt three, the mizen-maſt of the French Admiral's ſecond aſtern was ſhot or cut away, and the ſecond a head loſt her fore and mizen top-maſts.

At thirty-five minutes paſt five, the wind ſhifted from S. W. to E. S. E. Sir Edward Hughes made ſignal for his ſquadron to wear, which was obeyed inſtantly in good order. The French ſhips either ſtaying or wearing at the ſame time, and the engagement was renewed on the other tack, cloſe and vigorouſly on the Engliſh part.

At

At twenty minutes paſt ſix, the French Admiral's main-maſt was ſhot away by the board, and ſoon after his mizen-maſt: and about the ſame time the Worceſter, one of the Engliſh line of battle ſhips, loſt her main-top ſail.

At about ſeven P. M. the body of the French ſquadron hauled their wind to the ſouthward, the ſhips in the Engliſh rear continued a ſevere fire on them till twenty minutes paſt ſeven, when the engagement ceaſed; and the Engliſh ſhips had ſuffered too much to attempt to purſue.

A Diſpatch from the Governor and Council of Madras, dated Fort St. George, June 22, 1796, gives the following Account.

We have particular ſatisfaction in offering to you our ſincere congratulations on the complete ſucceſs which has attended the operations of Rear-Admiral Rainier in the eaſtern ſeas; and judging that an early communication of this event might be of material uſe to his Majeſty's miniſters, we have determined to forward this letter by the route of Buſſorah.

It appears by the Rear-Admiral's diſpatches, dated the 27th of March and 11th of Apriſt laſt, and which reached us on the 18th inſtant, by the Orpheus frigate, that the Britiſh troops were in poſſeſſion of the iſlands of Amboyna and Banda, with their ſeveral dependencies, comprizing, as it was thought, the whole of the Dutch iſlands, excepting Ternate, yielding cloves, nutmegs, and mace. This acquiſition has been attained without the ſmalleſt loſs on our ſide.

Amboyna and its dependencies were delivered up on the 16th of February, and Banda and its dependencies on the 8th of March.

The Admiral ſpeaks in the handſomeſt manner of the activity and alacrity with which every duty was performed by the forces under his command, both naval and military; and dwells particularly on the perfect harmony which all along ſubſiſted between the officers and men in both ſervices. It behoves us on this occaſion to convey to you the high ſenſe we entertain of the able and ſpirited conduct diſplayed by Rear-Admiral Rainier, whoſe hearty co-operation with us in every meaſure conducive to the public weal demands our warmeſt acknowledgements; and whilſt we feel aſſured of your entire approbation of all the means employed by this government, to give effect to the arrangements framed by his Majeſty's miniſters for ſecuring the Dutch ſettlements in India, it is nevertheleſs incumbent upon us to declare, that the accompliſhment of this great object has been chiefly obtained by the zealous and chearful ſupport which we have had the good fortune to experience from the officer entruſted with the execution of it.

We ſhall do ourſelves the honour of tranſmitting, by the firſt ſea conveyance, copies of all the papers received from the Admiral, which will enable you to form an accurate opinion of the value of thoſe iſlands. At preſent we can only give you a ſummary of his proceedings.

The Admiral found in the treaſury at Amboyna 81,112 rix-dollars, and in ſtore 515,940 pounds weight of cloves; and in the treaſury at Banda 66,675 rix-dollars, and in ſtore 84,777 pounds of nutmegs, 19,587 pounds of mace, beſides merchandize and other ſtores at each place, upon which no value had been then put.

We are preparing to ſend a reinforcement of troops for the better protection of thoſe valuable iſlands; and, as the Admiral has adviſed us that he is ſhort of proviſions, and in want of a ſupply of naval and military ſtores, it is our intention to forward an adequate ſtock of every neceſſary article.

We have great pleaſure in acquainting you, that the Company's poſſeſſions on this coaſt are in a ſtate of perfect tranquillity; and that we have no reaſon to believe that any deſigns are in agitation by the native powers hoſtile to your intereſts.

We have the honour to be, &c.

Capitulation of Amboyna.

Tranſlated from the original in Dutch, Feb. 16, 1796.

Not finding ourſelves equal to withſtand the great force with which we have been ſurprized, we the underſigned Governor and Council do hereby give up this ſettlement, with all its dependencies, and place the ſame under the protection of his Britannic Majeſty, upon the conditions mentioned to us in the letter of of the Right Honourable the Governor of Madras; that is, upon condition that we may keep all our private property, and be allowed a reaſonable ſubſiſtence, that the inhabitants be guaranteed in the ſecure poſſeſſion of their private properties, and that the ſenior and junior ſervants of the civil eſtabliſhment, the clergy, the military, and marine, receive their uſual pay.

It is upon the above conditions that we ſhall, tomorrow morning, give over all the guards of the fort to the troops of his Britannic Majeſty, after receiving the ratification of this inſtrument by his Excellency the Commodore.

Done at Amboyna, in the Caſtle of Victoria, on the above date.

Capitulation agreed upon between his Excellency Peter Rainier, Eſq. Commodore, commanding the ſea and land forces of his Britannic Majeſty in theſe ſeas, and F. Van Boeekholtz, Governor of Banda, &c. &c.

In conſideration of our great want of proviſions, and the great force with which the Britiſh have appeared before this ſettlement, and to reſiſt which would bring deſtruction and deſolation on the harmleſs inhabitants of this place, we therefore think it prudent, for the ſak-ſake of humanity, and from our confidence in the honour and generoſity of the Engliſh, to accept of the terms offered to us, and to deliver into their hands the fort and ſettlement, with all its dependencies upon the following conditions, viz.

That private property be kept ſecure to every individual of this ſettlement, whether in or out of the Company's ſervice; that the ſervants of the Company, civil and military, be kept in their reſpective ſtations, as far as may be thought neceſſary for the adminiſtration of juſtice, and the civil government of the place, the Governor alone particularly excepted, as the government muſt, of courſe, be veſted in the Engliſh; that the military continue to receive their pay, and are not to be forced into the Britiſh ſervice contrary to their wiſhes; and the civil ſervants alſo to be continued on their preſent pay; and ſuch an allowance made for the proviſion of the Governor as his Excellency the Commander of the Britiſh forces may think adequate. The Governor, however, and any other ſervants of the Company, ſhall be permitted to retire from the ſervice, either to Batavia or elſewhere, whenever a convenient opportunity ſhall offer.

Upon theſe conditions we, the underſigned, conſent to deliver up Fort Naſſau, the ſettlement of Banda, and all its dependencies, to the troops of his Britannic Majeſty to-morrow morning, upon receiving a copy of this capitulation, ratified and ſigned by his Excellency the Britiſh Commander. The keys of all the public property, and all accounts properly authenticated, ſhall be immediately delivered over to the Britiſh, and the government entirely veſted in them.

Extract of a Private Letter from a General Officer, at Madras, dated September, 1798.

The Vakeels of Tippoo Sultaun have, for theſe three months paſt, been exceedingly buſied in deputations to his Highneſs the Nawaub Aſtoph Jab. Independent of this, they have endeavoured to eſtabliſh a communication with the Nabob and Mahrattas, and to open an intercourſe, by no means with a good view. However public reports may exaggerate Tippoo's movements, I will boldly aſſert, that not a man on this ſide of India diſbelieves his intention of moving in a ſudden and hoſtile manner, ſo ſoon as events accompliſh the meridian of his wiſhes. Whatever may be his abſolute expectations, he moſt certainly will find himſelf deceived in his hopes of aſſiſtance from the native powers; and I have reſpectable authority for aſſerting, that not one of the Indian Princes will be fond of making an alliance with him, for he is himſelf too avaricious for a weak ſtate to be benefited by his friendſhip, which would only exiſt in the act of ſervice or tribute. We are far from being depreſſed, even ſuppoſing this reſtleſs Prince ſhould eventually take the field againſt us, the augmentation we have had made to our forces being very conſiderable, and the treaſury overflowing. The preſent effective ſtrength of all the eſtabliſhments was never exceeded in point of reſpectability and good diſcipline. The memorable year of 1792 afforded a brilliant termination to a war carried on with every difficulty to encounter. We have now the path fairly marked out, and a glorious example to follow; and I flatter myſelf, from the information I have been enabled to obtain, that our advances, if we are compelled to draw the ſword in defence of a ſolemn treaty, will be followed by that energy which ſo conſpicuouſly governed the late war, and at once ſhew the Indian world that the Company are not to be trifled with. The ceded countries will be an object of our firſt care, and our late allies, who reap a conſiderable advantage from their's, being an annual revenue of ſix crore of rupees, will give us all the aſſiſtance that may be demanded, as it deeply involves their own ſecurity. The courts of Poona and Hydrabad are now happily free from thoſe cabals which once retarded their deliberations, and made their promiſes vapid. Our reſidents there give us the livelieſt hopes.

MADURA taken in 1757. A ſtrong fort on the coaſt of Coromandel, near Trichinopoly in the Eaſt Indies.

Captain Chailland having delivered Trichinopoly from the French, returned with the utmoſt diligence to his ſmall corps left to blockade Madura, and took ſuch part of the garriſon with him as could be ſpared, without expoſing that town to a ſurpriſe from the enemy; making in all ninety military and 400 Sepoys, ſupported by two twenty-four pounders. Having joined the troops under Lieutenant Rumbold, who had maintained his ſtation before Madura, and erected a battery, he began to play his cannon from thence on the 9th of July; made a breach before noon, and without delay, to prevent new works being thrown up in the night, he formed the attack, and advanced to the breach by two o'clock of the ſame day. But the beſieged gave them ſo brave a reception, that the beſt of his men fell in the attempt, or were ſo wounded, that it was not poſſible to perſiſt in the aſſault, for the remainder retreated, nor was it in his power to ſpirit them up to a ſecond attack, having loſt between thirty and forty Europeans and Caffres, and 100 Sepoys. However, this brave and ſkilful officer did not deſpair of ſucceſs, either by compelling the town to capitulate by famine, or to accept of reaſonable terms to deliver up that fortreſs, ſo neceſſary for the ſecurity of the Company's affairs, into his hands. He made the proper diſpoſitions to reduce the place by famine. But as this method might take up ſo much time, as to prolong his ſtay till the arrival of the French fleet, and all the ſtrength that could be collected was neceſſary for the the defence of their garriſons againſt that event, he had orders to break up the blockade, and return to his command at Trichinopoly. Therefore he tried what could be done by negociation; and at length prevailed with Mauphaus Cawn's people to give Madura up to the Company for the ſum of 170,000 roupees; and it was accordingly delivered into his power, juſt at the time the French fleet arrived. Having ſecured this acquiſition, with a large garriſon of Sepoys, under the command of Iſouf Cawn, the Captain marched with the utmoſt expedition to Trichinopoly.

MAESTRICHT, SIEGE OF. A town on the Maeſe, in the Dutch frontiers, thirteen miles from Liege. This town was taken and retaken ſeveral times. After the death of Don John of Auſtria, King Philip gave the government of the low countries to Alexander Farneſe, Prince of Parma, his nephew. This General reſtored the credit of King Philip, who carried on a war with the States of Holland, at this time forming themſelves into an independent republic. Maeſtricht with ſeveral other towns were conquered by the Prince of Parma for the Spaniards, though Maeſtricht ſuſtained a ſiege of ſome months, and was carried by aſſault in 1580.

MAESTRICHT. The Dutch having been very ſucceſsful under the Prince of Orange in 1632, in the province of Gueldres, were encouraged to recover Maeſtricht, taken from them by the Prince of Parma in the laſt century. The Prince of Orange came before it on the 10th of June; the garriſon conſiſted of 2500 men, under the command of the Baron de Leyde, deputy governor for the Spaniards. The Prince of Orange having formed four ſeveral attacks, three againſt the city, and one againſt the ſuburb called the Wick, on the oppoſite ſide of the Maeſe, in the duchy of Limburg, the batteries began to play the 14th, while the beſieged made ſeveral ſucceſsful ſallies, to prevent the beſiegers from carrying on their trenches. Neither men nor women, eccleſiaſtics or laities, of what age or rank ſoever, were exempt from defending the place. The Spaniards knowing of what great importance it was to retain Maeſtricht, ſolicited ſeveral of their allies to relieve them, by obliging the Dutch to raiſe the ſiege.

Gonzales de Cordova arrived with a great body of troops on the laſt of June at Harca, with an intention of paſſing the Maeſe, and relieving the town; but they were ſo warmly received by ſix companies of French, of the regiment de Candale, that they were forced to retreat with great loſs; the Count of Saluzzara, Lieutenant-General, being ſlain upon this occaſion; though the French might have availed themſelves more of the conqueſt, if they had not been too eager in the purſuit. The three ſubſequent weeks were waſted in ſkirmiſhes between the Dutch and Spaniards with various ſucceſs. On the 22d of July, the Marquis de St. Croce being come to Stocken with the whole Spaniſh army, endeavoured the paſſage of the river; but 200 Italians who had begun to intrench themſelves at Virmont, being either cut to pieces or taken priſoners by ſix companies of Dutch, the Spaniards retired to their camp, and left the ſiege to the two contending parties, thoſe before it, and thoſe within.

In the mean time a ſecond attempt was made for the relief of the Spaniards in Maeſtricht. Count Pappenheim, with a large body of Imperialiſts, having paſſed the Rhine, arrived the 9th of Auguſt at Virmont, where having laid a bridge over the Maeſe, defended by two forts, he demanded a neutrality from the Prince of Orange for the Wick, or ſuburb of Maeſtricht, and the town itſelf, which being denied, the Imperial General prepared to attack the Dutch lines on the ſide of the Wick, at the attack of Count Stirum; of which intention the Prince of Orange having got intelligence, he ſent Prince William of Naſſau, with a body of troops lately arrived from Nimeguen, to defend that quarter. The beſieged, encouraged by the approach of Pappenheim, made a moſt furious ſally upon the Engliſh, of whom many were killed, among whom were the Earl of Oxford, and Major-General Williams. The 18th of Auguſt, the whole body of the Imperial infantry made a moſt furious aſſault upon the quarter of Count Stirum, with ſo much bravery, that for three hours the ſucceſs remained dubious, till the Prince of Orange, the Dukes of Candale and Bouillon, charging the enemy in flank with the choiceſt of the French troops, they were forced to retreat with loſs, while the Spaniards in the town remained ſpectators of the combat. Pappenheim though repulſed, renewed the aſſault the ſame afternoon in two other quarters, but finding the works of the beſiegers to be impenetrable, he retired in great confuſion, leaving 2000 dead on the ſpot, beſides officers of note. After Pappenheim's defeat, and the march of the Imperialiſts back into Germany, the Dutch found themſelves more at liberty to puſh on the ſiege. The Engliſh having ſprung a mine on the 20th of Auguſt, ſeconded the ſucceſs with a vigorous aſſault, but they were repulſed with the loſs of 300 men, even the bowmen ſignalizing themſelves in the defence of the breach now made. But the French making at the ſame time a furious aſſault upon all the outworks, which they carried the next night, and their mines being ready to play, the inhabitants prevailed with the Governor to come to a capitulation, which being granted upon honourable terms on the 22d, the garriſon, conſiſting only of 1200 men (having loſt 1300 in the ſiege) marched out with the uſual inſignia on the 24th, to the camp of the Marquis de St. Croce, having ſuſtained a ſiege of ſix weeks.

MAESTRICHT, SIEGE OF. The French ſat down before it in 1673, in the reign of Louis XIV. who knowing it to be one of the main bulwarks of Dutch Brabant, and the key of the neighbouring provinces, reſolved to reduce it. The Dutch, under the Prince of Orange, took it in 1632, after a ſiege of ſix weeks. At the time that monarch inveſted it the Dutch had made it very ſtrong, having fortified it with regular ravelins, deep ditches, many horn-works, half-moons, glacis, and other neceſſaries; the magazines at this time were well provided, and the garriſon conſiſted of about 5000 of their beſt troops, under the command of an old experienced rienced general, Farjaux, a man no leſs brave than expert in all the meaſures of defence; while the Dutch ſeemed as reſolved as Louis to ſacrifice every thing for the preſervation of the place. The French King was no ſooner arrived in the camp, but having taken an exact view of the whole ſituation of the place, he ordered immediately the lines of circumvallation and contravallation to be drawn; five of theſe were ready to play, and the lines were perfected in three days, though the former were eight leagues in circuit, and both of them ten feet high, and twelve broad. The next day the trenches were opened, and advances were made the firſt night very near to the covered way. The two attacks made in the counterſcarp by the French, and the defence by the Dutch, it is ſaid by all hiſtorians exceeded any action ever recorded; it was obſtinate and bloody, laſting from evening till break of day. The half-moon was taken and retaken three times in twenty-four hours, before the French could lodge themſelves in it from the fury of the Dutch, which, notwithſtanding the Governor's attempt to drive them from, they at length became maſters of. Two days after they took the horn-work, from the ill ſucceſs of a mine which the Dutch ſprung, in hopes to deſtroy one of the beſiegers, but it ſprung backwards, and carried a great number into the air. This diſaſter, with the fear of being plundered, and the miſchief which the ſhells and bombs had done, made the inhabitants unwilling to ſtand out, and applied to the Governor to capitulate, which he refuſed; but they at length obliged him to it by menaces; ſo dreading a rebellion within more than a ſiege without, he beat a parley, having loſt one third of the garriſon, which he defended thirteen days; and for his bravery, was by Louis treated honourably, being allowed to march out with drums beating, colours flying, with two pieces of cannon, and matches lighted.

MAESTRICHT, SIEGE OF. It had been beſieged by the Spaniards in vain under d'Agetone in 1634; and now the Dutch determined to take it from the French, who in 1673 had wreſted it from them; and in 1676 the Prince of Orange, afterwards King William, in concert with the Spaniards and German princes, laid ſiege to it, being the only town of the Dutch provinces remaining in the hands of Louis XIV. of all his conqueſts during the courſe of this war. The place was very ſtrong when he took it, to which he had made many additional works; and beſides it had a garriſon of 8000 men, under a daring and intrepid governor, M. Calvo. The ſiege was carried on vigorouſly for three weeks, and ſucceſs ſeemed to incline to the Prince of Orange; but the failure of the German ſupplies, on the aſſurancee of which the ſiege was begun, co-operating with an epidemic ſickneſs in his army, made the beſiegers grow ſick of it alſo; ſo that the Prince, who could not hinder the Marechal de Schomberg from marching through the heart of the Spaniſh Netherlands to the relief of it, reſolved to raiſe the ſiege, though they had thrice taken the baſtion of Dauphine by aſſault, ſword in hand, under the Count de Solmes, and alſo the counterſcarp, but were beaten from the horn-work. This ſiege laſted from the 7th of July to the 24th of Auguſt.

MAESTRICHT, SIEGE OF. This town having been ceded to the Dutch by the French, as a frontier town for the ſecurity of their provinces, according to the treaty of Nimeguen in 1678, became again in the war of 1748, the principal object of the Grand Monarch; and the Confederates ſeemed as attentive to its preſervation. Marſhal Bathiani drew together the Auſtrian forces to cover it; but not being ſupported by the other Confederates, he was obliged to quit his ſituation on the firſt appearance of the French in the neighbourhood of the place. Saxe and Lowendahl had by this time over-run the Dutch frontiers, having taken Lillo and Bergen-op-Zoom. While the Dutch barrier lay ſo much expoſed, and worſe provided for, Marſhal Bathiani wrote a letter to the Britiſh miniſtry, that ſome force might be ſent over, to act in concert with the Prince of Orange and himſelf, promiſing, that with a body of 25,000 men, poſted upon Mount St. Pierre, and another of 45,000, on the other ſide of the Maeſe, he would undertake to cover it at the peril of his head; which requiſition, notwithſtanding his importunate inſtances, was never attended to, and moſt ſhamefully neglected, to the great diſhonour of thoſe who were at the helm. He wrote for aſſiſtance on the 31ſt of January; and it was far gone in the month of April before the Duke of Cumberland was thoroughly enabled to co-operate with the Marſhal's intentions of covering the place; he had 50,000, the Dutch 30,000, and Bathiani 30,000; ſo that the whole Confederate army, which ſhould have been 192,000, were no more than 110,000, being 82,000 deficient in their quota, as ſettled by them. The French were ready to take the field with a much ſuperior force; add to this, that there were only four battalions in the garriſon of Maeſtricht, which would have obliged that city to have ſurrendered on the firſt ſummons; but General Chandos, at the riſk of his head, and the favour of his ſovereign, gallantly threw twelve battalions into the place, which rendered it more defenſible. The chief ſtrength of the city lies in the ſeveral detached baſtions, great and ſmall, the horn-works, crown-works, and covered way, in ſome places double, in others treble. Wick, or the ſuburb in the biſhopric of Liege, is well fortified with a rampart, near a mile in compaſs, flanked by three large baſtions, adjunct to the body of the place, with an incloſure of earth, flanked alſo by ſeveral ſtrong baſtions, ravelins, and a covered way. Werdt iſland, above the bridge, is fortified with redoubts; and St. Pierre, on the brow of an eminence, has a large baſtion, with caſemates, a counterſcarp, and covered way.

This was the ſtrength of Maeſtricht when the French came before it in 1748. The French artillery being come up, they opened the trenches on the 16th of April, forming three attacks, the firſt at the Tongres gate, the ſecond at Fort St. Pierre, on the hill, and the laſt on the ſuburb, or Wick; in theſe three they were ſeverally defeated, and obliged to retire with the loſs of 1400 men. On the 19th, the Governor d'Aylva, d'Aylva, a moſt intrepid and experienced officer, ordered a ſally, which was ſucceſsfully made, at the expence of 600 more on the ſide of the French, having alſo filled part of the trenches, and deſtroyed two batteries. In a week after they made another ſally, tore up the beſiegers' gabions, and levelled part of their works; however, the French were as reſolute as the beſieged, advancing the works to the covered way, which they attacked the 28th, headed by Saxe and Lowendahl, who carried it with the loſs of 900 grenadiers, and 1200 of the battalions. During the attack of the covered way, d'Aylva the governor ſallied on the Wick ſide, nailed up fourteen pieces of cannon, killed 1000 men, and on the 30th drove the French from the covered way. The French loſt 6000 men by the fire and ſallies of the garriſon, while the Confederates never attempted to relieve the place. Saxe and the Governor d'Aylva were well matched in the operations of this ſiege, the former being determined to force the place at the expence of half his army, and the latter to defend the garriſon till he had not a man to play his cannon; and no doubt great would have been the bloodſhed on both ſides, but for the arrival of the preliminary articles, ſigned the 19th of April, which put an end to the diſpute; and the town was moſt ingloriouſly ceded to the French after ſo obſtinate a defence on the part of the garriſon, though conditionally to be reſtored on the pacification.

MAESTRICHT, was inveſted by 15,000 French troops on February 28, 1793. On the 3d of March following, the Prince of Saxe Cobourg obtained a complete victory over the French near this place, and chaſed them as far as Liege with the loſs on their part of 4000 killed, 1600 taken priſoners, and twenty pieces of cannon.

The French retired from before this place with great precipitation and left ſome baggage and cannon. They had thrown about 6000 ſhells into the town. In the midſt of the confuſion into which the beſiegers were thrown, the Dutch garriſon made a ſally upon them in their retreat, and made a great many priſoners, poſſeſſing themſelves at the ſame time of two mortars, a number of tents, a conſiderable quantity of baggage, and five waggons of ſcaling ladders.

In September 1794, General Clairfait with about 70,000 men under his command, was attacked by the enemy in immenſe force, on the 17th, between Maeſtricht and Liege. He ſuſtained the vigorous aſſault with his wonted courage and intrepidity, and in a manner which, although eventually overpowered by ſuperiority of force, muſt reflect on him immortal honour. The engagement, it appears, laſted near three days, with very little intermiſſion; the two firſt of which he had apparently the advantage; but on the third, the enemy unfortunately ſucceeded in turning his left wing, and obliged him to make a precipitate retreat to Aix-la-Chapelle, with the loſs of upwards of 12,000 men.

The French immediately after this battle inveſted Maeſtricht with great force for three weeks, with great ſucceſs; when on the 14th of October, a French officer, accompanied by a trumpeter, made his appearance at the Bois-le-Duc gate, and was conducted to the Governor. He brought a letter from General Kleber, commanding the beſieging army, wherein he informed his Highneſs, that the Auſtrian army had croſſed the Rhine ſome days ago; that the French head-quarters were at Cologne; that Bois-le-Duc, Coblentz, and Juliers, were taken by the French; and that they had alſo inveſted Venlo and Nimeguen. At the ſame time he offered the Governor the moſt honourable capitulation, and deſired him to ſend an officer to his head-quarters, before whom he ſhould lay the moſt convincing proofs of what he had ſtated in his letter.

The Governor having aſſembled a council of war, returned the next day in anſwer, that without expreſs orders from his ſovereign it was not in his power to accept the French General's propoſal, and requeſted leave to ſend an eſtafette to the Hague, for the purpoſe of demanding theſe orders, which having been refuſed by General Kleber, all negociations were entirely broken off.

Though they had no reaſon to doubt the retreat of the Auſtrians beyond the Rhine, the reduction of Bois-le-Duc, Coblentz, and Juliers, and the progreſs of the enemy on the Dutch territory, yet there was ſome ſmall hope that a ſpeedy concluſion of peace might ſave the place from the impending fate of being taken by the French.

In the night between the 22d and 23d of October, the enemy completed his firſt parallel; and on the 23d commenced with the ſecond, which proved a ſerious intention to form a regular ſiege againſt the place.

The batteries, which, till then had remained rather ſilent, began now to thunder and ſhower down upon the enemy's works, balls, bombs, ſhells, and grenades; whilſt the fort of St. Peter continued alſo a ſevere cannonade on their works on the Limberg. From theſe works, they ſometimes cannonaded the fort; and their rangers and chaſſeurs haraſſed the out-poſts.

The caſemates within the place being not ſufficient to hold that part of the garriſon which was not on duty, ſome new ones, or rather caverns, were dug under the ramparts. A houſe oppoſite to St. Nicholas church was choſen for the chief guard-houſe, and, as much as poſſible, ſecured againſt balls and bombs.

On the 29th of October, the enemy, who had hitherto only now and then fired on the fort of St. Peter, began to cannonade without intermiſſion, and alſo puſhed their works nearer the town with great activity.

On the 30th, in the afternoon, another French trumpeter was admitted into the town by the Bois-le-Duc gate, and conducted to the Governor. He brought a letter to the magiſtrates, chiefly requeſting their anſwer to the ſummons of the French General, which was delivered to them within a ſhort time.

The critical moment was now come, when the town was to experience the moſt dreadful fate. The above trumpeter had ſcarcely left the gate, when the enemy began to ſalute the town with ſome bombs and balls from their batteries on the Limberg. This fire laſted the whole night, till ten o'clock the next morning, at which time, not only from theſe batteries, but from all their other works around the place, the enemy commenced a cannonade ſo tremendous, that the air was inſtantly filled with balls, bombs, and howitzer ſhells, and ſcarcely a place of ſecurity was left through the whole town. A number of public and private buildings were either burnt down to the ground or otherwiſe deſtroyed, and the groans of wounded inhabitants and ſoldiers were every where heard.

Three days were paſſed in this diſtreſſing ſituation, when the Governor, moved by the entreaties of the magiſtrates, and ſeveral other circumſtances, began to treat with the French General about the terms of a capitulation, which were ſoon ſettled, and the capitulation was ſigned on the 4th of November.

About two hundred inhabitants and ſoldiers were either killed or wounded during the three days bombardment; more than 2000 buildings were either entirely deſtroyed or greatly damaged; 12,000 bombs, balls, and howitzer ſhells were thrown into it (ſome of the firſt weighed two cwt). And it was the enemy's intention, on the 4th, to attempt a general ſtorm, which it would have been utterly impoſſible for a garriſon, conſiſting of 5600 Auſtrian horſe and foot, 200 huſſars, and 1500 Dutch troops, worn out by fatigue, to have defended themſelves from.

Terms propoſed to General Kleber, general of the French army before Maeſtricht.

Art. I. The garriſon of Maeſtricht ſhall march out on the 8th of November. The troops of the Allied Powers who compoſe the garriſon ſhall be conducted to their reſpective countries.—Anſ. Granted with the under-mentioned modifications.

Art. II. The Imperial troops ſhall march out by the gate d'Allemagne, with drums beating, colours flying, and arms and baggage; they ſhall keep all their arms and baggage, and ſhall be eſcorted to the advanced poſts of the Imperial army by a detachment of French troops.—Anſ. The garriſon ſhall ſurrender priſoners of war; they ſhall march out on the 17th Brumaire, (November 7), at nine o'clock in the morning, with the honours of war; the Auſtrian troops ſhall march out by the gate d'Allemagne, and the Dutch troops by the gate of Bois-le-Duc; they ſhall lay down their arms on the glacis, and ſhall be conducted to the firſt poſt, mentioned in the above article, after having taken an oath not to bear arms againſt the French Republic, until they ſhall have been exchanged according to their rank.

Art. III. The Dutch garriſon ſhall march out by the gate of Bruſſels, with drums beating, colours flying, lighted matches, and their cannon; they ſhall preſerve their arms and baggage, and ſhall be eſcorted by Campine, to Grave or Nimeguen, by a detachment of French troops.—Anſ. Granted in the ſame manner as the preceding article.

Art. IV. Each of the beſiegers ſhall be forbidden to interrupt, under any pretence, the march of the garriſon, or to enter the ranks, for the purpoſe of inducing the ſoldiers to deſert; and ſhould even the ſoldiers conſent to deſert; they ſhall be immediately delivered up.—Anſ. Granted.

Art. V. The arſenal, magazines, the cannon and ammunition, ſhall be delivered to the French commiſſaries by the clerks of the magazines.—Anſ. Granted, with the plans and memorials of the places and forts.

Art. VI. The priſoners on each ſide ſhall be reciprocally exchanged, whatever may be their number, from the day when the garriſon was inveſted to the period of the ceſſation of hoſtilities.

Art. VII. The troops of the garriſon ſhall march three ſucceſſive days, and on the fourth ſhall be permitted to reſt, the eſcort taking care to regulate the cantonments, proviſions, and forage, which ſhall be furniſhed to the troops if what they take with them ſhall be inſufficient.—Anſ. Granted.

Art. VIII. The garriſon ſhall be furniſhed with a ſufficient number of waggons and boats.—Anſ. Granted.

Art. IX. The officers and ſoldiers, as well as every individual belonging to the garriſon ſick or wounded, ſhall remain in the hoſpitals or lodgings which they at preſent occupy, with the neceſſary perſons to take care of them until they ſhall be cured, and in a ſituation to leave the place; when they ſhall be furniſhed with paſſports and the neceſſary eſcorts, in the ſame manner as the maſs of the garriſon to which they belong, in order that they may go to the ſame place as the garriſon.—Anſ. Granted.

Art. X. The lawful debts contracted for the ſervice of the ſovereign, or by the officers or other perſons belonging to the garriſon, ſhall be acknowledged, and ſecurity given for their diſcharge, without any hoſtages or other ſecurity being required.—Anſ. Granted.

Art. XI. The receiver-general, the officers belonging to the arſenal, to the magazines, and hoſpitals and perſons employed by them, ſhall be furniſhed with paſſports for the purpoſe of proceeding with their effects to Holland.—Anſ. Granted.

Art. XII. The generals, officers, and ſoldiers, domiciliated at Maeſtricht, or penſioned by the ſtate, and in general all thoſe who have not borne arms, ſhall be conſidered and treated as inhabitants of the town, and allowed the privilege of remaining there, or of obtaining paſſports to convey them to their reſpective homes with all their effects.—Anſ. Granted.

Art. XIII. Every offence and injury committed by all perſons, eccleſiaſtic as well as ſecular, not only before, but during the ſiege, ſhall be buried in oblivion.—Anſ. Referred to the French generoſity.

Art. XIV. The free exerciſe of the Roman Catholic and Reformed Religions ſhall be continued in the city without any hindrance, as well as the Lutheran, Mannonite, and other religions.—Anſ. Granted, with this obſervation, that no one, under the cloak of religion, ſhall endeavour to diſturb the new order eſtabliſhed.

Art. XV. The clergy, miniſters, and others belonging to the churches and the hoſpitals for the poor and for orphans, ſhall be maintained in the peaceable poſſeſſion of all the property, privileges, and franchiſes which

MAHON, SIEGE OF. A port town, and metropolis of Minorca, in the Mediterranean, on a fine bay at the ſouth-eaſt end of the iſland. The iſland of which this is now the capital (in the Spaniards time, Ciudadella was ſo) being a commodious harbour for ſhips, was firſt conquered by the firſt naval power, the Phœnicians, or the Carthagenians, from whom it was taken by Metullus, the Roman, many centuries before Chriſt. At the abolition of the Roman empire it was taken by the northern nations, who had conquered Spain in 421, after the Chriſtian æra; theſe held it 300 years. The Moors took it from them, from whom Charlemagne forced it in 801; the Moors recovered it in 807, eſtabliſhing a Mahometan king over the Belearic iſlands, with the title of King of Majorca, Yvica, &c. it was then a neſt of pirates, who infeſted thoſe ſeas. James I. King of Arragon, invaded Majorca with 20,000 men, took Palma, the capital, by aſſault on the laſt day of December, 1229, and Minorca fell in conſequence about three years after. In 1289, Alphonſo, King of Arragon, drove the Moors out of it, who had found means to repoſſeſs it, which he did after a long ſiege, on the 17th of January, ſtill obſerved by the Spaniards on that account as a high feſtival. Minorca continued a province of Spain to the year 1708, when Sir John Stanhope, who firſt projected and had the principal ſhare in the reduction of it, ſailed from Barcelona with one Britiſh regiment, a battalion of Neapolitans, one of Portugueſe, and a ſmall detachment of Spaniards, obtained from King Charles of Anjou, for whom we had gained Barcelona juſt before. Sir John Leake was then admiral on that ſtation, who arrived off Mahon the 25th of Auguſt, 1708; but not finding Lieutenant-General Stanhope, who was to direct the ſiege, he ſent two third rates to Majorca to haſten the embarkation, which returned with ſome ſettees on the 1ſt of September, laden with arms, ammunition, and other materials. On the 3d, the Milford, and three Dutch men of war, with five third rates, and fifteen tranſports, with the forces, arrived with General Stanhope; the garriſon ſeeing ſo many ſhipping, and two flags, Leake and Whitaker at their head, apprehended our land forces to be much greater than they were. The little army, not exceeding 3284, landed on the 26th to the ſouth-weſt of Fort St. Philip, and within two miles of it. The General marched them to a riſing ground facing the fort, and formed them in as long a line as they could poſſibly extend, by this artifice concealing his weakneſs, as the Spaniards could not ſee whether there was a ſecond or third line behind it. The garriſon conſiſted only of 1000 Spaniards, weary of the Spaniſh yoke, and 600 French marines, under the command of Colonel la Jonquiere. Batteries were erected by the Engliſh next day at the bottom of the hill where they encamped, and began their fire on two of the four towers, which were built at proper diſtances, like little baſtions in a wall of ſtones, without cement, and covered the fort from ſea to ſea; theſe towers were ſoon battered down by the beſiegers, and had four pieces of cannon in each. General Stanhope, the ſooner to induce the garriſon to a ſpeedy ſurrender, ſhot papers on the points of arrows into Mahon, importing, that he would give honourable conditions, if they did not oblige him to raiſe batteries, otherwiſe he would have recourſe to the ſeverities of war. The walls were ſoon levelled to the ground with the towers, and General Wade marched through it to a redoubt, which he took, leaving a party in it, and returned unattacked. The next day, a battery of large cannon was erected againſt St. Philip's fort itſelf, and the ball falling in the ditch, was carried to the Governor, La Jonquiere, who ſeeing the weight of the metal, was again deceived in our ſtrength; ſo that he beat a parley, to the great joy of the inhabitants, who were willing to change their maſters; hoſtages were exchanged, and General Wade was ſent to agree on a capitulation. When he arrived at the Governor's, he was not a little ſurpriſed to ſee the large cannon-ball lying on the table; the effect of which he ſoon judged.

The garriſon were ſhipped off immediately to Spain; but the French were detained as priſoners of war, contrary to the expreſs articles of capitulation granted them them by Count d'Asfield. Fort Fernelli, or Formelli, held out four days longer; it was ſtrong and well fortified, having four baſtions, on which were mounted twelve pieces of braſs cannon. In the garriſon of Port Mahon they found 100 pieces of cannon, 3000 barrels of gunpowder, and all things neceſſary for a longer defence. The ſiege laſted near three weeks, with the loſs on the ſide of the Engliſh of forty men killed and wounded. The Spaniards landed at Murcia in Spain, whither when the Governor arrived he was put under arreſt, and going up into a chamber, he threw himſelf out of a window, and died on the ſpot.

At that juncture this port and iſland might have been of ſervice to the intereſts of Charles of Anjou, the rival king, whom we had ſupported againſt Philip, at a great expence of blood and treaſure; but it is a matter of debate, whether it has, ſince the taking it, defrayed its own expence, by any ſervice it is or can be to the crown of England. The place was ceded to the Engliſh by the treaty of Utrecht, who kept poſſeſſion of it till 1756.

MAHON, SIEGE OF. On the repeated and poſitive accounts of a ſtrong ſquadron's being equipped at Toulon, conſiſting of twelve ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, bomb-ketches, fireſhips, under Galliſſoniere, and on the greateſt aſſurances of General Blakeney, then governor of St. Philip, that ſuch a ſquadron was ready for ſea, and deſtined for Minorca, which was not defenſible for want of men. Appriſed of this formidable preparation, of the number and deſtination of this armament, the miniſtry of England did not, or would not believe the reports made to them, not only repeatedly, but on the beſt authority from conſuls, ambaſſadors, agents, and ſeveral other channels, which reports all agreed, being conſiſtent with each other in every particular. Was not this evidence ſufficient to convince, alarm, and actuate thoſe at the helm? who, nevertheleſs, were by a moſt ſtrange infatuation lulled into the moſt torpid ſtate of inattention and ſupineneſs: nor was it till the beginning of April, 1756, after all theſe continued corroborations, that the miniſtry awoke to any ſenſe of danger; for they were either really or affectedly aſſured, that the armament at Toulon was deſtined for Canada, and ſent to Admiral Byng, then at Portſmouth, to ſail to the Mediterranean, in order to ſtop or intercept the expedition; nay, they laid very high wagers, that ſuch armaments, even then ready to ſail, were not deſtined for Minorca; and when they were told that the French were landed on the iſland, gave ſo little credit to the report, that thouſands were won and loſt in the betting.

The Admiral on the 7th of April ſet ſail with his inſtructions, with only ten ſhips, ſome of theſe not fit for ſervice, and without their proper complement of men. The Admiral had not ſo much as one fire-ſhip, or hoſpital ſhip, neither tranſport ſhip or frigate; he was ordered to land the few ſoldiers he had, either in Gibraltar or Mahon, which muſt render his ſhips deficient of their neceſſary number of hands, and diſable him, weak as he was before, to oppoſe the Toulon ſquadron; therefore he was obliged to diſpoſe of Major-General Stuart, Governor of Minorca, the Lord Effingham, and Colonel Cornwallis, whoſe regiments were in the garriſon of St. Philip's, together with about thirty officers belonging to that garriſon, and a number of recruits deſigned for it, in all about 100 men on board his own ſhips; nay, ſo diſconcerted were our meaſures, ſo precarious our intelligence, at leaſt in the eye of our miniſtry, that even the Admiral's orders and inſtructions were vague implications, not founded on the certainty of intelligence, but framed to acquire information, as the tenor of them commanded him on his arrival at Gibraltar to make ſtrict enquiries whether any French ſquadron had paſſed through the Straits. The orders proceeded to enjoin, that as it is probable the ſquadron may be intended for North America, the Admiral was to draught ſo many forces out of his ſhips, as when joined with a ſquadron going to Halifax, ſhould become ſuperior to the enemy's ſquadron; and this done, he was to diſpoſe of them under Rear-Admiral Weſt, whom he ſhould appoint to haſten his voyage to Louiſburg.

Fatal as theſe inſtructions were, calms and contrary winds co-operated with every other circumſtance to deſtroy the effect of his expedition, for he did not reach Gibraltar till the 2d of May. When he arrived there he met Captain Edgecumbe, Commander of the Princeſs Louiſa man of war, with the Fortune ſloop, from whom he learned that the Toulon ſquadron of twelve ſhips of the line, &c. had not only ſailed with 200 tranſports, but had actually landed 20,000 men on the iſland, near Fort Fernelles, to the north-eaſt of St. Philip. This advice the Admiral diſpatched away to the miniſtry, in which he imprudently throws a reflection on the miniſtry, in ſending him too late to prevent the landing of the enemy, his expreſſion plainly inſinuating ſo much, viz. If I had been ſo happy as to have arrived at Minorca before the enemy had landed, I flatter myſelf I ſhould have had it in my power to have hindered them from eſtabliſhing a footing there. To this malevolent and oblique ſentence, it is more than probable he owed his ſubſequent misfortunes, which terminated in his deſtruction; for now the truth was all out! he had been ſent too late, and the affair was all over; for this he never was forgiven: and thoſe, whom by this imputation he charged with tardy remiſſneſs, found it their intereſt to turn the tables on himſelf, and throw off the load of imputed negligence, which no doubt lay too heavy to be wiped off. His letter goes on to acquaint thoſe at the helm of their own negligence in downright aſſeverations, that Gibraltar wanted the neceſſary magazines for ſupply a ſquadron's exigence, that the ſhips could not be properly cleaned, as the pits, careening wharfs, ſtorehouſes, &c. were gone to decay, and almoſt uſeleſs; he alſo acquaints them, that though it were admitted poſſible to throw any ſmall number of men into Mahon, this ſtep would only be productive of a further loſs in the deſtruction and impriſonment of ſuch, who muſt fall a ſacrifice to the ſuperiority of the enemy, then in poſſeſſion of the place, though not of the fort; but that even this was not feaſible at this time, ſince the engineers and artillery men concurred with him in opinion, that the French batteries, ſuppoſed to be erected at the mouth of the harbour, muſt effectually invalidate any ſuch proceeding, ſince in this ſituation, the paſſage of boats towards the ſally-port of the garriſon was rendered impracticable; that on theſe conſiderations a council of war, held at Gibraltar by the Governor and members, judged it not expedient to detach any force from that garriſon to the iſland. He tells them that Captain Edgecumbe had landed a ſmall detachment out of his ſhips at the caſtle of Mahon, which General Fowke had made good to him.

However candid and ingenious this declaration of the Admiral's might be, yet in the main, and at that criſis, it was indiſcreet to the laſt degree, as it produced all thoſe ſubſequent ill conſequences and calamities which befel him. The old adage, "Truth ſhould not be told at all times," and the other trite proverb, "Children and fools tell truth," might have directed him not to impeach firſt, but make the beſt of a broken meaſure, and come off as well as he could, eſpecially as he was at the head of an operation, the ill ſucceſs of which he might very well calculate would be imputed and charged by the enemies, now created, to his own miſconduct. In fact it proved to be ſo afterwards, and proud of an occaſional, or an incidental handle of error in judgment, or an inſufficient exertion of what force he had, they began the popular outcry. Byng loſt Minorca, which had been to all intents and purpoſes loſt before he came to Gibraltar! this the unanimous agreement of a court-martial, ſigned by all the chief officers naval and militry, atteſted to be true, allowing that all further operations towards the relief of Minorca were become fruitleſs and dangerous. This matter being thus ſet in its true and faireſt proſpect, with all that candour and impartiality which our plan keeps ſtill in view, ſo as never to loſe ſight of it; proceed we now to the real operations of the French in contradiſtinction to ours.

The court of Verſailles, in order to blind, amuſe, and put our miniſtry upon a wrong ſcent, had by their partizans induſtriouſly reported and propagated their reports, that all their formidable preparations by ſea, at the harbours of Breſt, Rochefort, Toulon, and elſewhere, were intended and deſtined for either a deſcent on Great Britain, or in favour of their North American plantations. Theſe reports had their deſired effect, they were believed throughout, and all along, till they had ſtruck the coup-de-main ſo long meditated in the reduction of Minorca. Let us then trace their proceedings to the latent ſprings and original ſources whence they took their riſe. Minuteneſs and preciſion are, next to truth and matter of fact, to be the great objects of hiſtorical attention, and in no affair are they more requiſite than in the inveſtigation of the ſeveral particulars relative to this article of Mahon; not for the importance of the poſſeſſion, or the conſequences of the loſs, but on the account of the peculiarity of the whole tranſaction from beginning to end, the colouring of which ſeems to require more than common addreſs, or curſory information.

Richlieu and Galliſſoniere were at the head of this expedition from Toulon, each in his reſpective department. The expreſs naval force was twelve ſhips of the line, from 84 guns to 50, and five frigates from 46 to 24 guns. It appears with great perſpicuity, from a recapitulation, or ſummary of intelligence, whether through the channel of friends, or vague reports ſpread by our enemies, that the French obſerved in thoſe preparations an exact conformity of conduct with regard to the art of deſign, by them called politeſſe; ſometimes in a hurry 6000 men employed, ſeveral hundreds daily impreſſed, ſo many ſhips maſted, ſo many on the ſtocks in different ports, Rochfort, Breſt, Toulon, &c. a great number of land forces, ſometimes 10,000, another 15,000, and another 20,000; theſe armaments, purpoſely deſtined for different deſcents, and in different parts of the world; then again varying their motions, affecting a remiſſneſs, a ſlackneſs in their armaments, and a diſtant inattention, but never loſing ſight of the main object, making, in the midſt of theſe diſtracting accounts, as much diſpatch with as much ſecreſy as the nature of the expedition, and the ſeaſon of the year, would admit of. Theſe meaſures, calculated to confound and puzzle, diſcovered great policy and vaſt œconomy, expending no more of the public money than was neceſſary till the time of action ſhould diſcover their real deſign.

Our whole ſtrength in the Mediterranean amounted to no more than one fourth rate, three ſixth rates, and one ſloop, in all carrying 750 men; could this be called doing all in our power to preſerve Minorca?

Every part of their or our intelligence being only confuſed conjectures, or artful reports propagated to amuſe our ſpies. Thus every particular, except the real and poſitive deſtination of the Toulon ſquadron, was known to us, while their manner of victualling the number of their troops, and variety of ſmall craft, polacres, ſettees, and tartans, which crowded moſt of the ports of Provence, informed all Europe beſide of their real intent. At length the myſtery was unfolded, and Conſul Byrtles wrote from Genoa, that, after many orders and counter-orders for equipping a fleet at Toulon, a poſitive command was received by the intendant to get all the ſhips fit for the ſea ready as ſoon as poſſible, that the Dukes Richlieu and Mirepoix were nominated to ſuperintend the expedition through all the parts of Provence, and that it was now no more whiſpered, the French intended to make a deſcent to ſurprize Minorca; and at the bottom of his letter he is forced to obſerve, that all the orders and counter-orders ſaid, from time to time, concerning the equipment and deſtination of the Toulon fleet, had been concerted with a view to obtain time to carry the plan into execution with the more ſecreſy. The Conſul in about ten days afterwards repeats his apprehenſions of the French ſcheme of ſurprizing the iſland; and further adds, that he had been told by ſome, who had the beſt intelligence from France, that ſixty battalions were ordered to march into Provence, to be commanded by the Duke de Richlieu, that between ſixty and ſeventy veſſels had been embargoed for tranſports, that they continued to ſend all ſailors as faſt as they arrived and others to Toulon, and that the five frigates then in the road, were victualled for two months only.

Advices then came flocking after one another, among which one confirmed the embarkation of 20,000 men, with with a train of artillery, deſigned againſt Minorca. This was received at the Court of Admiralty the 2d of March. The advices in Lord Holderneſs's office corroborated the premiſes, only exaggerating the number of men, importing that 30,000 men were ordered to embark on the coaſt of Provence, to make a deſcent on Minorca. Above 147 letters, from the above authorities, were actually received of the armaments of France, threeſcore of which tended to direct us to the right deſtination.

But now comes the poſitive intelligence from Mr. Willettes, our Conſul at Bern, Mr. Barks at Carthagena in Spain, Mr. Dick at Leghorn, Lord Briſtol at Turin; Mr. Byrtles at Genoa, Captain Harvey, of the Phœnix at Mahon, who not only wrote a poſitive aſſeveration of all the above circumſtances to the Lords of the Admiralty, but particularly one to the ſame purpoſe, acquainting General Fowke, Governor of Gibraltar, with the intended invaſion, received in February, expreſſing himſelf thus, "That we can do nothing without you ſend us ſpeedily ſome relief, for the garriſon is now in the greateſt diſtreſs.

General Blakeney himſelf, at length, convinced by theſe concurring teſtimonies, (a crowd of witneſſes!) wrote a letter to Mr. Fox, received the 15th of March, in which he ſays, "I cannot be too early in acquainting you, that by certain informations from France and Spain, there is all the apparent reaſon in the world to believe, that the French intend to make an attack upon this iſland. It has been proclaimed by ſound of trumpet in Paris, and moſt of the port towns of Provence, for all ſailors and others whom it may concern to go forthwith to Toulon; it is publicly talked of at Marſeilles and Barcelona, founded upon an order for 25,000 men to march immediately to the ſea-coaſt of Provence. Twelve ſail of the line are abſolutely ready to put to ſea this month, and five frigates victualled, and under ſailing orders; large boats are built at Toulon to hold ſixty men each, with one 24-pounder."

The reſt of the letter intimates the truth of the intelligence, and the neceſſity, from that corroborated truth, to put the iſland ſpeedily in the beſt ſtate of defence poſſible.

On the 6th of February, General Blakeney wrote, in conſequence of theſe advices to Conſul Dick at Leghorn, to furniſh him with 1000 barrels of beef with the greateſt diſpatch, as he was not able to obtain a ſupply from Lieutenant-General Fowke at Gibraltar; that gentleman excuſing himſelf, by ſaying in his anſwer, "As to our garriſon, proviſions are unluckily too ſhort to ſpare any." Thus this crowd of witneſſes all concur to affirm, that the French had reſumed the equipment of the Toulon ſquadron with a powerful army of at leaſt 20,000 men, a large train of artillery, and a large body of tranſports, boats, and all other implements which might be neceſſary for carrying on the ſiege of Minorca.

The French were ſurely in the right, to dreſs up a phantom in the ſhape of the invaſion, to engage the miniſters in a wild gooſe chaſe.

Thoſe who tranſmitted the intelligence, did not believe it, for ſays one in his letter, dated the firſt of February, to Lord Holderneſſe, "Their motion to the ſea coaſt of Normandy, is an affected parade of marches and countermarches." And another of the ſame month, ſays, "An army ſo contrived, as to ſcreen their own coaſts from a deſcent on our ſide, and to intimidate England."

On the 8th day of April, the French tranſports, eſcorted, by their fleet, ſailed from Toulon. At the iſlands of Hieres they were detained till the 12th, and then proceeded to Minorca, where they arrived on the 18th before Ciudadella, once the capital of the iſland, about twenty-five miles diſtant from Mahon. As ſoon as Governor Blakeney had notice of this, he ſent Major Cunningham with a party to demoliſh the bridges, and break up the road leading from Mahon to Ciudadella, which the Major did, as much as the ſhort time he had would give him leave, being an excellent engineer, and having ſerved in that capacity at Fort St. Philip, but now he was only a volunteer.

As the whole French ſquadron had ſailed along with their tranſports to Ciudadella, our men of war, under the command of Commodore Edgecumbe, remained in the harbour of Mahon until the 20th, when the Commodore ſailed away in the Cheſterfield, but left all the marines of the Princeſs Louiſa and Portland, together with a detachment he had received at Gibraltar, as a reinforcement to the garriſon of St. Philip's, and next day the Princeſs Louiſa, Portland, and Dolphin ſailed, but they likewiſe left the moſt part of the Dolphin's crew, and all the crew of the Proſerpine ſloop, as a further reinforcement to the garriſon, and Captain Scrope of the Dolphin, moſt readily and bravely agreed to leave his ſhip, and remain in the garriſon as commander of the marines and ſeamen thus left therein. So that nothing was omitted by the Governor or officers that was in their power to accompliſh or attempt, for enabling them to make a long and vigorous defence; not doubting in the leaſt of being relieved by the arrival of a ſuperior ſquadron from England; in ſhort, with every thing that was neceſſary for rendering the French mad project abortive, and for obliging every Frenchman that had landed upon the iſland to ſurrender himſelf a priſoner of war.

It has been ſaid, that the chief hopes the French had of making themſelves maſters of Minorca, depended upon their being able to reduce Fort St. Philip by a coup-de-main, before we could ſend a ſuperior ſquadron into the Mediterranean; and theſe hopes were chiefly founded upon the ſmall number of men and officers in garriſon there, and the many outworks they had to defend againſt a general aſſault.

If the French Admiral had impounded our ſhips in the harbour, and the officers had found it impoſſible to defend their ſhips, after the French had made themſelves maſters of both ſides of the harbour, which might perhaps have been the caſe, both officers and men would have retired within the fort, and would have added a conſiderable ſtrength to the fort againſt an aſſault; or if they had drawn up their ſhips in a line, under and along the works of the fort, they would have prevented any aſſaults upon that ſide of the place.

Thus

Thus a coup-de-main was impracticable, if our ſhips were impounded in the harbour. However, they ſailed out, leaving the Scorpion ſloop behind, which the Governor ordered to be ſunk in the entrance of the harbour oppoſite the fort, to prevent the enemy's forcing an entry. On the 25th, the French ſquadron appeared off the harbour, and ſeemed as if they intended ſuch an enterprize, but retired to Cape Mola. They appeared again on the 28th, but attempted nothing. On the 22d, Governor Blakeney ſent a drummer with a letter to the Duke de Richlieu, the French General, deſiring to know his reaſons for invading that iſland, and the next day the drummer was ſent back with an anſwer from the Duke, wherein he declared he was come with an intention to reduce that iſland under the dominion of his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, for the ſame reaſons that had induced his Britannic Majeſty to ſeize and detain the ſhips belonging to the ſubjects of France.

But though this General had advanced with his army as far as Aleyor by the 23d, and though the garriſon had afterwards fired many ſhot, both great and ſmall, upon parties of the French that advanced too near, or upon the works they were ſuppoſed to be carrying on at Cape Mola, yet there was not ſo much as one cannon or bomb fired by the beſiegers againſt the fort before the 8th day of May, and even then, the only batteries they had erected were on Cape Mola ſide, and conſequently on the other ſide of the harbour; for in the night between the 5th and 6th, two men had been ſent to St. Philip's town, who reconnoitred all the way up the line wall, and through the ſtreets from the tower, by Major Innis's houſe towards Stanhope's tower, but could neither ſee nor hear any works going on. But from this time the beſiegers were every day opening batteries, both for cannon and mortars, and an almoſt inceſſant fire was kept from theſe batteries againſt the fortreſs, and from the fortreſs againſt them; though the fire from the fortreſs was not ſo hot or general as it might otherwiſe have been, becauſe the maſon-work was ſo ſlight, that it was found to give way by the exploſion of their own guns; and ſome of their guns were ſo bad, and the embrazures ſo weak, that the Governor was obliged to give orders not to fire the ſame gun above once an hour. On the 9th, the enemy took poſſeſſion of St. Philip's town, and converted the houſes into batteries. Governor Blakeney acquired ſome cenſure in not pulling down thoſe houſes before the enemy approached.

Nothing material happened until the 18th, when a ſhell from the enemy forced its entrance into a room, under the gorge of the north-weſt ravelin, fired a quantity of powder, entirely ruined the gorge, filled that part of the main ditch with rubbiſh, ſo as almoſt to afford an eaſy deſcent into it, and ſet fire to the room.. By this accident a poor woman was ſmothered in the ruins, and two ſoldiers were killed, and ſome others wounded, whilſt they were extinguiſhing the flames: and the very next morning a more unlucky accident happened, by a ſhell which fell into the caſtle ſquare, and forced its way into a ſubterranean apartment, before ſuppoſed to be bomb proof, where ſome of Captain Scrope's ſeamen were lodged, by which five of them were killed and two wounded.

Theſe were diſcouraging accidents; but that day, about one in the afternoon, the ſpirits of the whole garriſon were revived, by the appearance of a ſquadron of ſeventeen large ſhips to the weſtward, which from many circumſtances, appeared ſo plainly to be a Britiſh ſquadron, that Mr. Boyd, about ſeven o'clock, reſolutely ventured to go out in a ſmall boat, with ſix oars only, which made its way out from St. Stephen's Cove, through a ſhower of both cannon and muſket-ſhot from the enemy, poſted behind Turk's Mount. His intention was to have got on board this welcome ſquadron; but as they were at two leagues diſtance, and ſtretching to the ſouthward, he ſoon ſaw that it would be impoſſible to get up with them; and beſides, he perceived that two of the enemy's ſmall veſſels were in chaſe of his boat; therefore, to prevent being taken priſoner, by purſuing farther an attempt which he found he could not accompliſh, he turned back, and between eleven and twelve at night, both he and his ſeamen returned ſafe to the garriſon.

Although Mr. Boyd thus failed in his brave attempt, yet by the ſignals which the French, at Cape Mola, had made upon ſeeing that ſquadron, the whole garriſon were convinced that it was a Britiſh ſquadron, and that it was in purſuit of the French, which, when laſt ſeen, had ſteered to the ſouthward. That whole night, therefore, and the greateſt part of the next day, they rejoiced in the hopes of ſeeing all the French ſhips remaining above water brought into Mahon harbour, in tow of the Britiſh ſquadron. All were contriving how they ſhould teſtify their joy upon the ſucceſs of the Britiſh arms; and all began to conſider their beſiegers as unfortunate men, reduced by mere famine to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. How greatly then, how grievouſly were they diſappointed, the evening of that day, when they beheld ſome of the French ſhips appear again in view, and quietly take up their ſtation near the entrance to the harbour of Mahon! What addition muſt it have made to their chagrin, to ſee the whole French ſquadron next day return triumphantly to their ſtation off that harbour, without any appearance of, or any diſturbance from the Britiſh ſquadron! In this perplexity, the firſt thought that occurred was, probably, that the French ſquadron had given the Britiſh the ſlip, and that the latter was cruiſing at a diſtance, in hopes of meeting with them, upon a ſuppoſition that they would not dare to return to their ſtation off Mahon; but this poor comfort they were before night deprived of, by deſerters from the French camp, who told them that there had been an engagement between the two ſquadrons, and that the Britiſh had the worſt of it, which account they with indignation heard confirmed on the 22d, by a general feu-de-joie through the whole French camp, on account of the victory obtained by their ſquadron over the Britiſh.

But though the beſiegers often received freſh ſupplies and reinforcements from France, yet by the 16th of June it appeared that they began to grow ſhort of ammunition; and the beſieged likewiſe began to grow ſhort of proviſions; therefore, on the 17th, the Governor was obliged to order, that the allowance of a pint of wine, and two drams of a ſort of brandy called aqua ardente, burning water, formerly given to each man of the garriſon per day, ſhould be reduced to half a pint of wine per day, and no dram, but only one per day to the gunners, when on duty upon the batteries.

By the 20th, the beſiegers had received a large ſupply of ammunition, and, we may ſuppoſe, of every thing elſe they ſtood in need of; but the beſieged ſaw no appearance of any ſupply, or of any relief, though it was now a full month ſince the ſea engagement, which the French called a victory, with much more reaſon than our Admiral had to claim that honour. From ſuch a ſurpriſing neglect, it was hardly poſſible for them not to conclude, that it had been reſolved to ſacrifice both them and the iſland of Minorca to ſome political view here at home. However, though their liquor was reduced, their courage was not in the leaſt abated. They continued to make an obſtinate defence, notwithſtanding the ruinous condition their fortreſs was reduced to, and the dangerous ſituation they were in; for many of their guns were by this time rendered uſeleſs, and ſome of their works, particularly the parapets and merlons, were ſo much demoliſhed, that their gunners could not ſtand with any ſafety at their batteries. With inceſſant labour they repaired wherever it was poſſible to repair, and removed their moſt uſeful guns to thoſe places from whence they could do the moſt effectual execution againſt the enemy; though they were, in almoſt every motion, expoſed not only to the enemy's numerous batteries, but to their muſket ſhot from the windows of the houſes in St. Philip's town; which houſes were in many reſpects of ſignal ſervice to the enemy, not only in erecting their batteries, but in furniſhing them with an opportunity to fire from the upper windows, upon any officer or ſoldier of the garriſon that by chance, or by the performance of his duty, expoſed himſelf to their view.

The 21ſt of May, the garriſon had information from deſerters, that the French army conſiſted of 18,000 men, being nine brigades of four battalions each, with 100 braſs cannon, beſides mortar pieces and howitzers. And on the 14th of June they had, by the ſame means, an account that two more regiments were arrived from France, and that the beſiegers then had about 2500 men killed and wounded ſince the beginning of the ſiege.

In theſe circumſtances, therefore, it would have been ridiculous for the garriſon to attempt a ſally, had it been much more numerous than it really was: and from the 20th of June, the beſiegers kept ſuch a conſtant and heavy fire from all their batteries, that the north-weſt curtain, and weſt baſtion of the caſtle, the weſt counterguard, the north-eaſt ravelin, and the Anſtruther, were very much battered; and in the left face of the Anſtruther, a breach was actually made on the 26th, which was apprehended to be practicable; yet ſtill the garriſon reſolved to hold out: but between ten and eleven o'clock at night on the 27th, the beſiegers, upon proper ſignals made, began a general aſſault. At one and the ſame time, they advanced with great intrepidity towards the Anſtruther and Argyle, the Queen's redoubt, Kane's lunette, the weſt lunette, the Carolina, and the Marlborough; and at the ſame time they attempted, with armed boats, and provided with ſcaling ladders, to enter both the harbour and St. Stephen's cove, in order to ſtorm Charles's fort and St. Stephen's guard, and to ſecond the attack of the Marlborough, by attempting it at the gorge. The garriſon now felt the deficiency of their numbers; yet ſo good a diſpoſition was made of the ſmall numbers they had, that the enemy were every where repulſed with great ſlaughter, except the Queen's redoubt and the Argyle, the works of which were ſo much ruined, and the defenders ſo few, that the enemy at length made a lodgement; and as ſoon as they had done ſo, and had found themſelves repulſed at all other attacks, they beat a parley for leave to bury their dead, and to carry off their wounded, which was compaſſionately and generouſly, but unadviſedly granted. For after the enemy had been every where repulſed, if the whole force of the garriſon had been preſently directed to theſe two, they might have been able to drive the enemy from the lodgements they had made in them: but from this ceſſation, the French à la mode François, treacherouſly took an opportunity to ſteal into theſe two places ſuch a number of men, that it was judged to be impracticable to diſlodge them.

During this general aſſault, ſeveral mines were ſprung under the glacis of the Anſtruther, the Queen's redoubt, and Kane's lunette, and likewiſe one under the gorge of the Argyle whilſt a conſiderable number of the enemy were in it, moſt of whom were blown up and deſtroyed; ſo that in the whole, they certainly loſt a very large number of men by this night's operation; but theſe they could eaſily ſpare; and their loſs was fully recompenſed by their having made themſelves maſters of theſe two outworks; for by that means, they got an entrance into the gallery of mines, which communicated with all the other outworks, and with the caſtle itſelf, already ſo much demoliſhed that a practicable breach might in a very few days have been made in it, by batteries erected upon the two out-works now in the poſſeſſion of the enemy. The garriſon, therefore, could not propoſe to hold out any time, without running the utmoſt riſk of the place being taken by ſtorm, and all of them put to the ſword; and as no method had been taken to give them any notice that preparations were making for their relief, they reſolved, on the 28th, to demand a capitulation.

One would almoſt be induced to believe this was done in conſequence of a menace ſent by the Duke de Richlieu, "That if the garriſon did not immediately ſurrender, and the place ſhould be afterwards taken, they might expect to be put to the ſword, for no quarter would be given." Perhaps, to prevent the evils which are ſometimes the conſequence of an obſtinate defence, the garriſon choſe to ſurrender, whilſt the beſiegers were in a pacific mood; for this purpoſe the white white flag was hung out, the chamade was beat, and a ceſſation of arms enſued. The garriſon obtained every thing they could reaſonably aſk.

General Blakeney requeſts by the ſecond article of capitulation, "That all the honours of war be granted the garriſon on their ſurrender; and that a covered waggon be permitted the Governor, and four others for the garriſon;" which the Duke de Richlieu anſwered in theſe words: "The noble and vigorous defence which the Engliſh have made, having deſerved all the marks of eſteem and veneration, that every military perſon ought to ſhew to ſuch actions: and Marechal Richlieu being deſirous alſo to ſhew General Blakeney the regard due to the brave defence he has made, grants to the garriſon all the honours of war that they can enjoy, under the circumſtances of going out for an embarkation, to wit, firelocks on their ſhoulders, drums beating, colours flying, twenty cartouches each man, and alſo lighted match. He conſents likewiſe, that Lieutenant-General Blakeney, and his garriſon, ſhall carry away all the effects that belong to them, and that can be put into trunks. It would be uſeleſs to them to have covered waggons; there are none on the iſland, therefore they are refuſed."

This article did General Blakeney ſo much honour, that it is thought by many to have been one of the principal ſteps towards his being created a peer.

As ſoon as the articles were ſigned, the French were put in poſſeſſion of one of the gates of the caſtle, as alſo of Charles' fort, and Marlborough redoubt; but the garriſon continued in the other works of the fortreſs until the day of their embarkation for Gibraltar, which was the 7th of July.

As ſoon as the garriſon of Fort St. Philip's propoſed to ſurrender, the Duke of Richlieu diſpatched the Duke de Fronſac expreſs to his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, with the joyful news; and as ſoon as the articles were ſigned, and one of the gates of the caſtle delivered into the poſſeſſion of the French, he diſpatched the Count of Egmont expreſs, with a confirmation of the news, and a copy of the articles of capitulation. Upon the arrival of the firſt expreſs, the news was immediately publiſhed, and ſpread with the greateſt induſtry by the court: but the people of France, had, from the beginning, thought it ſo improbable that this nation, conſidering our ſuperiority at ſea, would allow them to make themſelves maſters of that iſland, that they would not at firſt believe what they were told by the court. On the contrary notwithſtanding the defeat, or at leaſt the retreat of Mr. Byng's ſquadron, they ſtill continued to be terribly afraid of hearing of their ſquadron's being defeated by a freſh Britiſh ſquadron, and their troops blocked up in that little iſland; the certain conſequence of which would be, that of their troops being at laſt forced by famine to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war; and this conſequence they ſo much expected and dreaded, that they believed the news publiſhed by their court to be only a cover for the news of their ſquadron's having been defeated: but when the ſecond expreſs arrived, and the articles of capitulation were publiſhed, their exceſs of fear was, as uſual, turned to an exceſs of joy. The whole nation, naturally volatile, ran into an extreme of mirth, and the rejoicings were more general than had appeared for any of their victories in the preceding war.

On the other hand, when the news of the ſurrender arrived here, it only added to the execrations that had before been pretty plentifully poured forth, not only againſt the unfortunate Byng, but even againſt thoſe who were ſuppoſed to have been the cauſe of his being ſent out ſo ill provided. Nay, it was even ſurmiſed, that our loſs of Minorca was owing to ſomething worſe than neglect; and it muſt be confeſſed, that there were reaſons for ſuch a conjecture: for there were, perhaps, ſome amongſt us, though none ſurely in any high ſtation, that for peace ſake, would have been willing enough to have ſacrificed to the French ſome of our rights in America, if any excuſe could have been found out for ſo doing; and a reſtitution of Minorca might have been pleaded as an equivalent, and conſequently an excuſe for that ſacrifice, as the reſtitution of Madras had been pleaded as an equivalent and excuſe for our reſtitution of Cape Breton, by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. Whatever there was in this, it is certain, that our loſs of Minorca produced a very remarkable change in our adminiſtration here at home.

As ſoon as the capitulation was ſigned, and the French had got poſſeſſion of Fort St. Philip's, their ſquadron made all poſſible haſte to return to Toulon, but took care to carry along with them all the ſhips that had been made prizes of by Commodore Edgecumbe's ſquadron, and left in Mahon harbour for the reaſon before-mentioned. And it ſoon appeared that M. Galliſſoniere had acted wiſely in getting home as ſoon as he could; for in two or three days after the ſurrender of the fort, Admiral Hawke appeared off St. Philip's, with the ſquadron lately under the command of Mr. Byng, augmented with five ſhips of the line, which had been ſent from England, as ſoon as we heard that the French had actually landed in Minorca. But there were now no laurels left for him to reap: the enemy's ſquadron were got ſafe home, or at leaſt out of his reach; and he had the mortification to ſee the French flag flying triumphantly on the caſtle of St. Philip's, which he was no way provided for attacking: nay, he was not ſo much as provided with a proper number of frigates and ſloops for blockading the iſland, in order to prevent the French from ſending any reinforcements, or freſh ſupplies to their army in the iſland: ſo that had he arrived before the ſurrender of Fort St. Philip's, he might have cauſed it to coſt the French more time, and a great deal more blood, but he could not prevent its being taken at laſt, becauſe in a very few weeks more, the French, with their numerous artillery, might have laid all the works flat with the ground; ſo that the garriſon, though aſſiſted by all the ſeamen of his ſquadron, could not with any prudence have ſtood a general aſſault; and as he was not provided with what was proper, it is probable he was not provided with any inſtructions for blockading the iſland. With grief, therefore, he was obliged to ſail away, and leave the French in quiet poſſeſſion of the iſland.

In order to avoid breaking the narrative of the ſiege, we omitted giving an account of the engagement, but we ſhall do it now, and carry its conſequences to the Admiral's death. The beſt account of the engagement appears in Admiral Byng's own letter, which we ſhall preſent in the writer's own words, not as it was mangled in the London Gazette.

Ramillies, off Minorca, May 25, 1756.

SIR,

I have the pleaſure to deſire you will acquaint their lordſhips, that having ſailed from Gibraltar the 8th, I got off Mahon the 19th, having been joined by his Majeſty's ſhip Phœnix off Majorca, two days before, [here are inſerted in the Gazette theſe words, viz. when the enemy's fleet appeared to the ſouth-eaſt] by whom I had confirmed the intelligence I received at Gibraltar, of the ſtrength of the French fleet, and of their being off Mahon. His Majeſty's colours were ſtill flying at the caſtle of St. Philip's, and I could perceive ſeveral bomb batteries playing upon it from different parts. French colours we ſaw flying on the weſt part of St. Philip's. I diſpatched the Phœnix, Cheſterfield, and Dolphin a-head, to reconnoitre the harbour's mouth, and Captain Hervey to endeavour to land a letter for General Blakeney, to let him know the fleet were come here to his aſſiſtance; though every one was of opinion we could be of no uſe to him, as by all accounts, no place was ſecured for covering a landing, could we have ſpared any people. The Phœnix was alſo to make the private ſignal between Captain Hervey and Captain Scrope, as this latter would undoubtedly come off if it were practicable, having kept the Dolphin's barge with him: but the enemy's fleet appearing to the ſouth-eaſt, and the wind at the ſame time coming ſtrong off the land, obliged me to call thoſe ſhips in, before they could get quite ſo near the entrance of the harbour, as to make ſure what batteries or guns might be placed to prevent our having any communication with the caſtle. Falling little wind, it was five before I could form any line, or diſtinguiſh any of the enemy's motions, and not at all to judge of their force, more than by their numbers, which were ſeventeen, and thirteen appeared large. They at firſt ſtood towards us in a regular line, and tacked about ſeven, which I judged was to endeavour to gain the wind of us in the night; ſo that being late, I tacked, in order to keep the weather gage of them, as well as to make ſure of the land wind in the morning, being very hazy, and not above five leagues off Cape Mola. We tacked off towards the enemy at eleven, and at day-light had no ſight of them. But two tartanes, with the French private ſignal, being cloſe in with the rear of our fleet, I ſent the Princeſs Louiſa to chaſe one, and made the ſignal for the Rear-Admiral, who was neareſt the other, to ſend ſhips to chaſe her. The Princeſs Louiſa, Defiance, and Captain, became at a great diſtance; but the Defiance took her's, which had two captains, two lieutenants, and 102 private ſoldiers, who were ſent out the day before, with 600 men on board tartanes, to reinforce the French fleet, on our then appearing off the place. The Phœnix, on Captain Hervey's offer, prepared to ſerve as a fire-ſhip, but without damaging her as a frigate, till the ſignal was made to prime, when ſhe was then to ſcuttle her decks, every thing elſe being prepared as the time and place allowed of. The enemy now began to appear from the maſt-head. I called in the cruizers, and when they had joined me, I tacked towards the enemy, and formed the line a-head. I found the French were preparing theirs to leeward, having unſucceſsfully endeavoured to weather me. They were twelve large ſhips of the line and five frigates. As ſoon as I judged the rear of our fleet to be the length of their van, we tacked altogether, and immediately made the ſignal for the ſhips that led to lead large, and for the Deptford to quit the line, that ours might become equal in number with theirs. At two I made the ſignal to engage, as I found it was the ſureſt method of ordering every ſhip to cloſe down on the one that fell to their lot. And here I muſt expreſs my great ſatisfaction at the very gallant manner in which the Rear-Admiral ſet the van the example, by inſtantly bearing down on the ſhips he was to engage, with his ſecond, and who occaſioned one of the French ſhips to begin the engagement, which they did by raking ours as they went down. I bore down on the ſhip that lay oppoſite me, and began to engage him, after having received the fire for ſome time in going down. The Intrepid, unfortunately, in the very beginning had her fore-topmaſt ſhot away, and as that hung on his foreſail and backed it, he had no command of his ſhip, his fore-tack and all his braces being cut at the ſame time, ſo that he drove on the next ſhip to him, and obliged that, and the ſhips a-head of me, to throw all back: this obliged me to do ſo alſo for ſome minutes, to avoid their falling on board me, though not before we had drove our adverſary out of the line, who put before the wind, and had ſeveral ſhot fired at him from his own admiral. This not only cauſed the enemy's centre to be unattacked, but left the Rear-Admiral's diviſion rather uncovered for ſome little time. I ſent and called to the ſhips a-head of me to make ſail on, and go down on the enemy, and ordered the Cheſterfield to lay by the Intrepid, and the Deptford to ſupply the Intrepid's place. I found the enemy edged away conſtantly, and as they went three feet to our one, they would never permit our cloſing with them, but took the advantages of deſtroying our rigging; for though I cloſed the Rear-Admiral faſt, I found I could not again cloſe the enemy, whoſe van were fairly drove from their line; but their Admiral was joining them by bearing away. By this time it was paſt ſix, and the enemy's van and ours were at too great a diſtance to engage. I perceived ſome of their ſhips ſtretching to the northward, and I imagined they were going to form a new line. I made the ſignal for the headmoſt ſhips to tack, and thoſe that led before with larboard tacks, to lead with the ſtarboard, that I might, by the firſt, keep (if poſſible) the wind of the enemy, and by the ſecond, be between the

Rear-

Rear-Admiral's diviſion and the enemy, as his had ſuffered moſt; as alſo to cover the Intrepid, which I perceived to be in a very bad condition, and whoſe loſs would very greatly give the balance againſt us, if they had attacked us the next morning as I expected. I brought to about eight that night to the Intrepid, and to refit our ſhips as faſt as poſſible, and continued ſo all night. The next morning we ſaw nothing of the enemy, though we were ſtill lying to: Mahon was north-weſt about ten or eleven leagues. I ſent cruizers out to look for the Intrepid and Cheſterfield, who joined me the next day: and having, from a ſtate and condition of the ſquadron brought me in, found that the Captain, Intrepid, and Defiance, (which latter has loſt her captain), were much damaged in their maſts, ſo that they were endangered of not being able to ſecure their maſts properly at ſea, and alſo, that the ſquadron in general were very ſickly, many killed and wounded, and no where to put a third of their number, if I made an hoſpital even of the forty gun ſhip, which was not eaſy at ſea; I thought it proper, in this ſituation, to call a council of war before I went again to look for the enemy. I deſired the attendance of General Stuart, Lord Effingham, Lord Robert Bertie, and Colonel Cornwallis, that I might collect their opinions upon the preſent ſituation of Minorca and Gibraltar, and make ſure of protecting the latter, ſince it was found impracticable either to ſuccour or relieve the former with the force we had; for though we may juſtly claim the victory, yet we are much inferior to the weight of their ſhips, though the numbers are equal, and they have the advantage of ſending to Minorca the wounded, and getting reinforcements of ſeamen from their tranſports, and ſoldiers from their camp; all which, undoubtedly, has been done in this time that we have been laying to to refit, and often in ſight of Minorca; and their ſhips have more than once appeared in a line from our maſt-heads. I ſend their lordſhips the reſolution of the council of war, in which there was [In the Gazette, it is here put inſtead of in, and council inſtead of there was] not the leaſt contention or doubt aroſe. I hope indeed we ſhall find ſtores to refit us at Gibraltar, and if I have any reinforcement, will not loſe a moment's time to ſeek the enemy again, and once more give them battle, though they have a great advantage in being clean ſhips, that go three feet to our one. and therefore have the choice how they will engage us, or if they will at all, and will never let us cloſe them, as their ſole view is the diſabling our ſhips, in which they have but too well ſucceeded, though we obliged them to bear up. I do not ſend their lordſhips the particulars of our loſſes and damages by this, as it would take me much time, and that I am willing none ſhould be loſt in letting them know an event of ſo much conſequence. I cannot help urging their lordſhips for a reinforcement, if none has yet failed, on their knowledge of the enemy's ſtrength in theſe ſeas, and which, by very good intelligence, will in a few days be ſtrengthened by four more large ſhips from Toulon, almoſt ready to ſail, if not now failed to join theſe. I diſpatch this to Sir Benjamin Keene, by way of Barcelona, and am making the beſt of my way to cover Gibraltar, from which place I propoſe ſending their lordſhips a more particular account.

I am, Sir,
Your moſt humble ſervant,
JOHN BYNG.

To the Hon. John Cleveland, Eſq.

P. S. I muſt deſire you will acquaint their lordſhips, that I have appointed Captain Hervey to the command of the Defiance, in the room of Captain Andrews, ſlain in the action.

I have juſt ſent the defects of the ſhips, as I have got them made out whilſt I was cloſing my letter.

To this letter was added in our Gazette, the following liſt of the killed and wounded in both ſquadrons, without ſaying from whence it was taken.

State of the Engliſh and French fleets in the above action in the Mediterranean, on May the 19th, 1756, with the number of perſons killed and wounded in each ſhip.

According to this liſt of killed and wounded in the two adverſe ſquadrons, as publiſhed in our Gazette, it appears that there were in the Britiſh ſquadron forty-two killed, and 168 wounded; whereas in the French ſquadron, there were but twenty-one killed, and about 133 wounded: and on board Admiral Byng's own ſhip, there was not ſo much as one man either killed or wounded, which did his character a great deal of harm among the people here in England, and was, perhaps, a chief cauſe of the fate that afterwards attended him; for every one from hence concluded, that he had not attacked in ſo briſk and cloſe a manner as he ought to have done; and thoſe who conſidered only the number of ſhips in each ſquadron, heard with indignation, that a Britiſh ſquadron ſhould retreat from a French ſquadron of no ſuperior number of ſhips. This raiſed an immediate popular clamour againſt him, and this clamour was induſtriouſly propagated, and artfully continued to the very laſt, by thoſe whom he had irritated by his ſaid letter from Gibraltar, not only from a principle of revenge, but alſo from a regard for their own ſafety, two of the ſtrongeſt motives by which the human mind can be influenced, as we may judge from almoſt every circumſtance relating to this affair.

Though the Admiral's letter, perhaps, arrived before the 16th of June, yet it was not publiſhed until the 26th, ſo that his enemies had ſufficient time to prepoſſeſs the minds of the people with what accounts they pleaſed of the engagement; and we may believe thoſe accounts were not to his advantage. Even when it was publiſhed, it was mangled as before ſhewn, which was done, as the Admiral's friends afterwards inſiſted, with deſign to prevent the people's forming a right judgment of his conduct, or knowing the diſadvantages he laboured under in the engagement, or after it was over. Whether there was any deſign in this, we ſhall not pretend to determine; but certainly no man had a right to mangle his letter, as his life, and what was more, his character depended upon what he wrote upon that occaſion, eſpecially as the iſſue of the engagement ſeemed at firſt to militate ſo much againſt him: and the reaſon why we ſuppoſe that his letter might perhaps have arrived before the 16th, is becauſe on that day Sir Edward Hawke, and Admiral Saunders, ſailed from Portſmouth in the Antelope for Gibraltar, to take upon them the command of the ſquadron then under Byng and Weſt: for if the letter did not arrive till a few days before it was publiſhed, we muſt ſuppoſe that there were other reaſons for removing theſe two Admirals, than any authentic accounts we could then have of the engagement, or of the behaviour of any officer in the engagement.

As the two new Admirals choſe to have their own officers, they carried them along with them; and the captains, and ſome other officers, on board the ſhips of the Admirals Byng and Weſt, were recalled. In the ſame ſhip likewiſe, went the Lord Tyrawly, appointed Governor of Gibraltar in the room of General Fowke, who was recalled: and with them went a letter from the ſecretary of the Admiralty, by order of the lords commiſſioners, to Admiral Byng, acquainting him of his being recalled. To this letter the Admiral wrote a very ſpirited anſwer, and incloſed an exact ſtate of the two ſquadrons, as it ſtood when they engaged on the 20th of May, having had that of the French from an officer made priſoner in the tartan taken in the morning of the day of action; and from the ſtate it appears, that though the two ſquadrons were equal in number of ſhips, the French were greatly ſuperior in number of men, number of guns, and weight of metal, which gave them a conſiderable advantage either in a diſtant or cloſe engagement, as their weight of metal enabled them to begin firing ſooner, and to do more execution at a diſtance; for a fifty-two pound ball will certainly do execution at a greater diſtance than a thirty-two pound ball can, and the ſame of every leſſer weight; and at a cloſe engagement, 950 muſket ſhot will certainly do more execution than 780, if the men are equally expert at firing. Therefore, if our ſhips approached ſo near as that all their guns would do execution, that would give the advantage they are obſerved to have of firing three broadſides for the French two; and it may be made a queſtion, if prudence could direct them to endeavour to get nearer; for in a ſingle perſonal combat, it is certainly the buſineſs of a ſtrong man to cloſe in upon his adverſary if he can, and it is the buſineſs of the weak man to prevent it if poſſible: but in ſea engagements it has been generally obſerved, that our common men have a more ſteady reſolution than the French common men have; ſo that in a cloſe engagement, we uſually drive them both from their decks and their guns, and that therefore it is our buſineſs to get as near as poſſible, even though the enemy have a ſuperior number of men, provided we do not get ſo near as to endanger our being boarded.

In this letter the Admiral claims the victory, by ſaying, that he had not only attacked but beat the enemy: but we doubt if he had a juſt pretence to ſay ſo. It was the buſineſs of the French ſquadron to return to their ſtation off Fort St. Philip's before night, leſt our ſquadron ſhould find an opportunity in the night time, to throw a reinforcement and ſupply into that fort. For this purpoſe they edged away from our ſquadron in the evening, and not becauſe they were beat; for ſome of them returned that very night, and all of them returned next day to their ſtation, where it was their duty to remain; and therefore they had afterwards no buſineſs to go in ſearch of our ſquadron, whoſe buſineſs and duty it was to drive them from that ſtation, if they had thought themſelves able to attempt doing ſo.

The Admiral had therefore no reaſon to claim his victory victory as a reaſon for his not having been recalled; but from this letter, it is plain he did not in the leaſt ſuſpect that a much harder fate was hanging over his devoted head; conſequently, without any ſeeming reluctance, he prepared to embark on board the Antelope, which arrived on the 3d of July at Gibraltar, and was preſently to return to England. Whether Sir Edward Hawke had any private order to ſend Admiral Byng home a priſoner, is not known. Our Gazette indeed ſays, from the Admiralty-office, that Sir Edward Hawke went out with orders to ſend Admiral Byng home in one of his Majeſty's ſhips; that upon receipt of Byng's letter giving an account of the action, directions were ſent to Sir Edward to ſend him home under arreſt; and that leſt theſe directions ſhould not arrive in time, like directions were lodged at the ſeveral ports of this kingdom. But we do not underſtand that of ſending a man home, unleſs he be ſent as a priſoner in ſome way or other; and Admiral Byng never appeared as a priſoner whilſt he remained at Gibraltar, nor did it appear that he was obliged to come home in the Antelope. Therefore, if Sir Edward had any ſuch order, it was not put in execution, as the Admiral appeared deſirous of returning to Englaud with the utmoſt expedition, in order to vindicate his character, which he thought had been moſt unjuſtly aſperſed; and we cannot ſee what reaſon there was for publiſhing this our Gazette, unleſs it was to add to the popular clamour, which is but too ready to ariſe againſt an unfortunate commander, either by ſea or land; and conſequently ought never to be inflamed by miniſters, nor ever will, unleſs they have ſome other end to ſerve than merely that of removing an unfortunate, or puniſhing a guilty commander.

According to all appearance, therefore, Admiral Byng voluntarily embarked, together with Admiral Weſt, General Fowke, and the other recalled officers, on board the Antelope, which ſailed from Gibraltar the 9th of July, and arrived at Spithead the 26th. Admiral Weſt, General Fowke, and the other officers, preſently ſet out for London, and the former having, on the 29th, waited on his Majeſty, was moſt graciouſly received, as he had behaved very bravely in the engagement of the 20th of May, and without the leaſt objection to any part of his conduct; but Admiral Byng was immediately on his arrival put under arreſt.

General Blakeney, upon his landing at Portſmouth, had the ſatisfaction to find himſelf received by the general acclamations of the people, by ringing of bells, and other rejoicings; and this ſatisfaction could not fail of being complete, as he was conſcious of having deſerved it by his brave defence of the important fortreſs committed to his care. He met with the ſame ſatisfaction at every place he paſſed through in his way to London, where he arrived on the 23d day of November, and was of courſe moſt graciouſly received by his Majeſty, by whom he was next month promoted to the dignty of baron in the kingdom of Ireland, by the ſtyle and title of Baron Blakeney of Caſtle Blakeney in the county of Galway, after having been in the preceding month created a knight of the moſt honourable order of the Bath. All which honours were perhaps as much owing to our reſentment againſt Admiral Byng, as to the gratitude we owed to General Blakeney.

Admiral Byng was removed to Greenwich Hoſpital, where he was confined a cloſe priſoner, till ſeveral officers could come from the Mediterranean, to attend his trial, which began on the 27th day of December.

When his ſentence was, "The court-martial are of opinion, that Admiral Byng did not do his utmoſt to engage the enemy; and therefore are of opinion, that he is fallen under part of the twelfth article of war, and adjudge and ſentence him to be ſhot to death; but as it doth not appear to the court, that it was either cowardice or diſaffection, they do unanimouſly recommend him to mercy."

Notwithſtanding the recommendation of the court-martial to his Majeſty's mercy, an order was ſent down for the execution of the ſentence which was paſſed upon the Admiral, on Monday the 28th of February; but application having been made by a member of the court-martial, in behalf of himſelf and ſeveral other members praying earneſtly to be releaſed, by act of parliament, from the oath by which they are bound "not to reveal the vote or opinion of any particular member," alledging, that they had ſomething to diſcloſe relative to the ſaid ſentence, which greatly affected their conſciences, and which it was neceſſary to diſcloſe, in order to do juſtice to the ſaid Admiral Byng; the execution of the ſaid Admiral was reſpited a fortnight, in conſequence of an order from his Majeſty, who was pleaſed at the ſame time to declare, that the ſentence ſhould yet be carried into execution, if it did not appear to be unjuſt. In the mean time, a bill paſſed the Houſe of Commons, to releaſe the court-martial from their oath, but being carried into the Houſe of Lords, and there rejected, the Admiral was ſhot to death, in purſuance of his ſentence, on board the Monarque at Portſmouth, on Monday the 14th of March.

The Admiral juſt before his execution, delivered to William Brough, Eſq. Marſhal of the high court of Admiralty, a paper, of which the following is a copy, addreſſing himſelf to him in theſe words.

Sir,

Theſe are my thoughts on this occaſion, I give them to you, that you may authenticate them, and prevent any thing ſpurious from being publiſhed, that might tend to defame me. I have given a copy to one of my relations.

A few moments will now deliver me from the virulent perſecution, and fruſtrate the further malice of my enemies. Nor need I envy them a life ſubject to the ſenſations my injuries and the injuſtice done me muſt create. Perſuaded I am, juſtice will be done to my reputation hereafter. The manner and cauſe of raiſing and keeping up the popular clamour and prejudice againſt me will be ſeen through. I ſhall be conſidered (as I now perceive myſelf) a victim, deſtined to divert the indignation and reſentment of an injured and deluded people from the proper objects. My enemies themſelves themſelves muſt even now think me innocent. Happy for me, at this my laſt moment, that I know my own innocence, and am conſcious that no part of my country's misfortunes can be owing to me. I heartily wiſh the ſhedding of my blood may contribute to the happineſs and ſervice of my country, but cannot reſign my juſt claim to a faithful diſcharge of my duty, according to the beſt of my judgment, and the utmoſt exertion of my ability for his Majeſty's honour and my country's ſervice. I am ſorry that my endeavours were not attended with more ſucceſs, and that the armament under my command proved too weak to ſucceed in an expedition of ſo much moment.

Truth has prevailed over calumny and falſehood, and juſtice has wiped off the ignominious ſtain of my ſuppoſed want of perſonal courage, or diſaffection. My heart acquits me of theſe crimes. But who can be preſumptuouſly ſure of his own judgment? If my crime is an error of judgmeut, or differing in opinion from my judges, and if yet, the error of judgment ſhould be on their ſide, God forgive them, as I do; and may the diſtreſs of their minds, and uneaſineſs of their conſcience, which in juſtice to me they have repreſented, be relieved and ſubſide, as my reſentment has done. The ſupreme Judge ſees all hearts and motives, and to him I muſt ſubmit the juſtice of my cauſe.

MALACCA, East Indies. The ſettlement of Malacca is an object of great importance. It is thus briefly deſcribed by an intelligent writer: Aug. 1, 1795.

Malacca is a large peninſula in the Eaſt Indies, bounded by the kingdom of Siam on the N. by the ocean on the E. and by the Straits of Malacca, which ſeparates it from Sumatra, on the S. W. being about 600 miles in length, and 200 in breadth. It produces a variety of pleaſant and curious fruits, and poſſeſſes an abundance of pork, poultry, and fiſh. The Dutch have a factory in the town of Malacca, which they took from the Portugueſe in 1640.

The Peninſula of Malacca contains ſeveral kingdoms or provinces. The Dutch, however, were ſaid to be the real maſters and ſovereigns of the whole peninſula, being in poſſeſſion of the capital (Malacca.) The inhabitants differ but little from brutes in their manner of living; and yet the Malayan language is reckoned the pureſt of any ſpoken in all the Indies. We are told by the lateſt travellers, that its chief produce is tin, pepper, elephants teeth, canes, and gums. Some miſſionaries pretend that it is the Golden Cherſoneſus or Peninſula of the ancients, and that the inhabitants uſed to meaſure their riches by bars of gold. The truth is, that the excellent ſituation of this country admits of a trade with India; ſo that when it was firſt diſcovered by the Portugueſe, Malacca was the richeſt city in the eaſt, next Goa and Ormus, being the key of the China, the Japan, the Moluccas, and the Sunda trade. The country, however, at preſent, is chiefly valuable for its trade with the Chineſe. This degeneracy of the Malayan, who were formerly an induſtrious, ingenious people, is eaſily accounted for, by the tyranny of the Dutch, whoſe intereſt it has been that they ſhould never recover from their preſent ſtate of ignorance and ſlavery.

The Engliſh have for ſome time carried on a ſmuggling kind of trade in their country ſhips, from the coaſt of Coromandel and the bay of Bengal, to Malacca. This commerce was connived at by the Dutch Governor and Council among them, who little regarded the orders of their ſuperiors, provided they could enrich themſelves. Taken Aug. 1, 1795.

The ſecond conquered place is ſomewhat inferior, though by no means a trifling acquiſition. It is thus ſpoken of:

Cochin is a town in Aſia, on the Malabar coaſt, with a good harbour, 90 miles S. of Calicut, long. 74. 30. E. lat. 9. 0. N. and about 100 N. of Cape Comerla. The Dutch have in it a ſmall fort, which retains the name of Cranganore. The firſt Europeans that ſettled in it were the Portugueſe, who were driven away by the Dutch. Taken Oct. 29, 1795.

Jafferapatam, alſo taken, is a place, the third in point of importance in the iſland of Ceylon.

Copy of a Letter from Rear Admiral Rainier, dated Madras Road, the 15th of October, 1795.

Yeſterday, on the point of ſailing, I received the incloſed letter and papers from captain Newcome, giving an account of his proceedings, and particularly of the ſucceſs of the expedition under his own and Major Brown's orders, of the Hon. Company's Infantry, againſt Malacca, this place being now in the poſſeſſion of the Britiſh troops.

I feel a more than ordinary ſatisfaction in announcing this event for their Lordſhips information, as, on account of the original force deſtined for that ſervice being reduced, my expectations were leſs ſanguine; and alſo of its great importance, from the ſecurity thereby afforded to the trade of his Majeſty's ſubjects in the Straits of Malacca, and the Chineſe Seas.

Being doubtful of the propriety of my conduct, in not having correſponded with the right hon. Henry Dundas on the ſubject of the late expeditions, in which I co-operated in council and execution, in obedience to the King's orders by him tranſmitted, and as therein preſcribed, (not having then even received their Lordſhips directions ſo to do, and which are alſo ſilent on that head,) I have to requeſt you will pleaſe to intercede with their Lordſhips to uſe their influence to remove any culpability that may reflect upon my conduct for this omiſſion; in which, if I have erred, it has been through the defect of inſtructions, and my inexperience in the receipt of ſuch kind of orders.

On the ſucceſs of his Majeſty's arms at Trincomalé and Fort Ooſtenburg, and on receiving the account of the ſame from Malacca, I took upon me to order ſalutes to be fired by his Majeſty's ſhips then in port; and on the 13th inſtant, at the ſuggeſtion of my Lord Hobart, I directed Captain Lambert, of his Majeſty's ſhip Suffolk, to fire ſeventy-eight guns, funeral-wiſe, on the melancholy occaſion of the death of his Majeſty's faithful ally, his Highneſs the Nabob Wallajah, late Nabob bob of the Carnatic, (the fort of St. George, by his Lordſhip's orders, paying the ſame honours) that particular number of guns being appointed as correſponding to thoſe of the years of his late Highneſs's age; which I truſt their Lordſhips will approve, and notify to the board of ordnance, to be allowed in the ſeveral gunners monthly expences.

Pleaſe to acquaint their Lordſhips, that the Preſidency here have juſt received accounts of the ſurrender of Manar, in the gulph of the ſame name.

I have the honour to be, &c.

PETER RAINIER.

To Peter Rainer, Eſq. Commodore and Commander of his Majeſty's ſhips employed in the Eaſt Indies.

I arrived here on the 15th inſt. with his Majeſty's ſhips under my command, the Ewer and Carnatic tranſports, and a part of the convoy, having parted company with his Majeſty's ſhip Reſiſtance, in the night of the 13th, between the Sandheads. Captain Pakenham joined company again in Malacca Road on the 17th in the morning.

By the incloſed letters you will ſee that we were obliged to commence hoſtilities, which began by the Reſiſtance firing a few guns at the Conſtantia (a Dutch Indiaman run into the mud) which ſhe returned by firing two guns, and then ſtriking her colours. From the great aſſiſtance afforded me by the boats from the China fleet, &c. I was enabled to land all the troops, with two ſix-pounders at the ſame time. They left the ſhips at ſeven P. M. on the 17th, and reached the ſhore by nine P. M. At half-paſt nine P. M. an officer came on board the Orpheus from the Governor, to ſurrender the place on our terms; they then delivered over St. John's Poſt, a commanding work, well furniſhed with cannon, about 1300 yards from the fort, and 200 from the place of conference to a ſubaltern, with a party of our grenadiers, and we entered the fort with the remainder of the Britiſh detachment. The garriſon being thus completely in our power, and unconditionally, further than the ſecurity of property, the Dutch guards were permitted to remain armed at their poſts, until the Governor, whom we then accompanied to his houſe, gave, in his own hand-writing to Major Browne, a detail of the guards, which were then relieved by the Britiſh troops. From the anxious deſire of complying with his Majeſty's orders, we have agreed to the incloſed capitulation, and every thing appears now perfectly quiet, and all parties reconciled.

I have the honour to be, &c. &c. &c.

PRELIMINARY ARTICLES.

The meaſures adopted by the Dutch Government of Malacca ſubſequently to the amicable propoſals tendered by the naval and military commanders of the Britiſh forces, by the agency of Mr. Forbes Roſs M'Donald, appointed by commodore Peter Rainier, commanding the Britiſh ſquadron in India, and colonel John Braithwaite, commanding the land forces on the Coaſt of Coromandel, having rendered it neceſſary to debark the troops, towards which the poſſeſſion of the Conſtantia, a Dutch armed ſhip, which lay between the Engliſh ſquadron and the fort, becoming indiſpenſible, actual hoſtilities commenced by his Majeſty's ſhip the Reſiſtance firing upon, and, after exchange of ſome guns, taking poſſeſſion of her; and, having been followed up by the diſarming ſeveral guns from the Dutch battery upon the Britiſh troops after they had gained the ſhore, are circumſtances which, together with the invitation ſubſequently given to the Britiſh Commanders to take poſſeſſion of the fort, cannot be conſidered in other light than ultimately placing the Dutch garriſon in the predicament of having ſurrendered as priſoners of war, and which has ſince been acknowledged by the Dutch Government to have been their expectation. Agreed—A. Couperus.

Nevertheleſs, to the commands of his Britannic Majeſty, requiring us to cultivate the alliance, which has ſo long and ſo happily ſubſiſted between the two nations, we diſpenſe with the unparticipated control, which the forementioned circumſtances would warrant our taking upon ourſelves, and hereby accede and confirm to the Dutch Government its eſtabliſhment and authority in all civil matters, to the full extent as heretofore; reſerving however to ourſelves, and thoſe who have been in immediate connection with us upon the ſervice, a claim to the public property in Malacca, and the ſhipping in the roads, to the extent which his Britannic Majeſty may be graciouſly pleaſed to determine; and for this purpoſe the value of the public property aſhore and in the roads, to be eſtimated and placed in depoſit, promiſing on our part to give protection to public and private property under the above reſervation, and to defend the intereſt of the ancient Dutch Government againſt their enemy the French, to the utmoſt of our power, under the following condition. Agreed—A. Couperus.

The Commanding officer of the Britiſh troops to be acknowledged Commandant of the fort and garriſon of Malacca, and military poſts thereupon depending, with a ſeat as ſecond in council. Agreed—A. Couperus.

The keys of the fort to be lodged with him, and the military ſtores of every deſcription to be delivered over to him. Agreed—A. Couperus.

The parole to be given by him. Agreed—A. Couperus.

The diſpoſal of the Dutch garriſon to be wholly at his diſcretion. Agreed—A. Couperus.

A fund to be aſſured to him, in monthly payments, for the ſubſiſtence of the troops, and for the defence of the fort and its dependencies, and that proviſion for this fund be made in the firſt inſtance. Agreed—A. Couperus.

This article to be underſtood as agreed to, ſo far as the reſources of the Dutch Government of Malacca and its dependencies extend.

In conſideration of the extraordinary expence incurred by the Britiſh Government, in ſending their troops for the protection of their allies the Dutch at Malacca, the Governor and Council of that ſettlement will repreſent theſe circumſtances to the Governor General and Council of Batavia, and in forwarding an account of the monthly expence of the Britiſh troops, they will make application to the Governor General, that he may provide for it. Agreed—A. Couperus.

The Engliſh and Dutch flags to be diſplayed, when occaſion requires, upon the two flag-ſtaffs which are already erected. Agreed—A. Couperus.

The armed veſſels belonging to the Malacca Government ſhall be put under the orders of the Britiſh naval Commander. Agreed—A Couperus.

Orders ſhall be ſent by the Dutch Government to their officers commanding at Rio and Peru, to put themſelves and their garriſon under the orders of the officer commanding the Britiſh forces. Agreed—A. Couperus.

The above conditions being drawn up in general terms, as the baſis of connection with the Protecting Power, the illuſtration which any of them may require will be arranged and detailed in a ſubſequent paper, ſubject, however, in whole or in part, to the future reſignation of the Britiſh Government in India.

MALAGA, engagement off. A city and port town of Spain, in the province of Granada, in the Mediterranean, 66 miles from Gibraltar. After the reduction of Gibraltar in 1704, Sir George Rooke returned from thence to take in wood and water at Tetuan. On the 9th of Auguſt he ſaw a fleet, which he diſcovered to be the French, to which he gave chaſe, and on the 15th, which was Sunday, he came within three leagues of them, when they brought to with their heads to the ſouthward, the wind being eaſterly, and forming a line, lay in a poſture to receive him. They were fifty-two ſhips, and twenty-four galleys, very ſtrong in the centre, but very weak in the van and rear; to ſupply which, moſt of their galleys were placed in thoſe ſquadrons. In the centre was the Count de Thouloufe, High Admiral of France, with the white ſquadron; in the van, the white and blue flag: and in the rear the blue; each admiral having his vice and rear-admiral. Our fleet (or rather the confederate fleet, for there were eleven Dutch ſhips, under the command of Admiral Callemberg) conſiſted of fifty-three ſhips of the line, excluſive of frigates; but they were inferior to the French in number of guns and men, as well as in weight of metal, and altogether unprovided with galleys, from which the enemy reaped great advantage during the engagement. But Sir George Rooke, to remedy in ſome meaſure the inconvenience under which he laboured, ordered two fourth rate ſhips, with a fifth and a ſixth, and two fire ſhips, to lie to windward of him, that if the enemy's van ſhould puſh through our line with their galleys and fire-ſhips they might give them ſome diverſion. This diſpoſition, as Dr. Campbell very judiciouſly obſerves, plainly proved the Admiral's great capacity, and how dexterouſly he could ſupply, by good management, any accidental deficiencies he might labour under.

A little after ten in the morning, our fleet bore down in order of battle, and when they came within half gun-ſhot of the enemy, the French ſet all their ſails at once, as if they intended to ſtretch a-head and weather us; ſo that our Admiral, after firing a chaſe gun at the French Admiral to ſtay for him, of which he took no notice, put the ſignal out, and began the battle, which fell very heavy on the the Royal Katharine, the St. George, and the Shrewſbury. About two in the afternoon the enemy's van gave way to ours, nevertheleſs, the battle continued to rage with the ſame fury as before till night, when the enemy, by the help of their galleys, bore away to leeward. In the night the wind ſhifted to the northward, and in the morning to the weſtward, which gave the enemy the wind of us. We lay by all day, within three leagues of each other, and at night they filled and ſtood to the northward. Our fleet endeavoured the two next days to renew the fight, but the French avoided it, and at laſt bore away. This plainly diſcovers that we had the victory, notwithſtanding the many advantages of the French, which thoſe who underſtand maritime affairs will allow to be as great as ever any fleet had: for firſt their ſhips were larger; they had ſeventeen three decked ſhips, and we had but ſeven: ſecondly, they had a great advantage in their weight of metal, for they had 600 guns more than we: thirdly they were clean ſhips, juſt come out of port, whereas ours had been long at ſea, and had done hard ſervice, (been employed in the ſiege of Gibraltar): fourthly, they had the aſſiſtance of their galleys, and how great an advantage this was will appear from hence, that about the middle of the fight, the French Admiral ordered a ſeventy gun ſhip to board the Monk, a ſixty gun ſhip of ours, commanded by Captain Mighells, which he did, and was beat off three times, and after every repulſe had her wounded men taken off, and her complement reſtored by the galleys: fifthly, the French fleet was thoroughly provided with amunition which was ſo much wanted in ours, that ſeveral ſhips were towed out of the line becauſe they had not either powder or ball ſufficient for a ſingle broadſide: but the ſkill of the Admiral, and the bravery of the officers and ſeamen under his command, ſupplied all defects, and enabled them to give the French ſo clear a proof of their ſuperiority over them in all reſpects, that they not only declined renewing the fight for the preſent, but avoided us ever after, and durſt not venture a battle on that element during the war. It may therefore be juſtly ſaid, that the engagement off Malaga decided the empire of the ſea, and left to us and the Dutch an indiſputed claim to the title of maritime powers.

It is impoſſible to conceive why biſhop Burnet, and other writers, particularly Mr. Tindall, who always loves to be in the wrong where there is a faction, ſhould ſay ſo much to the prejudice of their country, purely to leſſen the reputation of the Admiral, becauſe he was thought a Tory. But it is ſtill more impoſſible to account for the falſehoods Burnet has thruſt into his relation. He ſays, that moſt of the ſhips had twenty-five rounds of powder when they began to fight, and that it had ſeldom happened that ſo much had been ſpent in an engagement at ſea. The Dutch Admiral, Callem-berg, in his letter, ſays, that ten rounds would not ſerve above an hour, and that many of the Engliſh ſhips had no more when the engagement was over. So that if the Biſhop intended to inſinuate, that the want of powder was only an excuſe, he is effectually refuted by his own authority: and we ſee at the ſame time, how able he was to make calculations. He commends Shovel's bravery juſtly; but then adds, that Rooke fought at a greater diſtance. Now we have ſome authority to prove that he is wrong in both; by which we mean, that though Sir Cloudeſly Shovel was a very brave man, yet here he had no great opportunity of ſhewing it; whereas Sir George had and did. For obſerve what Sir Cloudeſley ſays in his letter: "The ſhips that ſuffered moſt in my diviſion, were the Lenox, Warſpite, Tilbury, and Swiftſure; the reſt eſcaped pretty well, and I the beſt of all, though I never took greater pains in all my life to have been ſoundly beaten; for I ſet all my ſails and rowed with three boats ahead, to get along ſide with the Admiral of the white and blue; but he out-ſailing me, ſhunned fighting, and lay along-ſide of the little ſhips. Notwithſtanding the engagement was very ſharp, and I think the like between two fleets never has been in my time: there is hardly a ſhip but what muſt ſhift one maſt, and ſome muſt ſhift all: a great many have ſuffered much, but none more than ſir George Rooke, and Captain Jennings in the St. George."

The French King in order to raiſe the drooping ſpirits of his people, claimed the victory, and publiſhed an account of the action, which at this diſtance of time, plainly proves that he was reduced to the mean ſhift of impoſing on his ſubjects by falſe and partial repreſentations. Among other exaggerations in this detail, we find mention made of miſchief done to the French ſhips by Engliſh bombs; though nothing is more certain, than that there was not one bomb-veſſel in the combined fleet. The French academy, actuated by a ſervile ſpirit of adulation, cauſed a medal to be ſtruck on the occaſion, which, inſtead of perpetuating the glory of their prince, ſerves only to tranſmit their own ſhame to poſterity.

We ſhall now ſet down the force of the Britiſh fleet, with what loſs it ſuſtained in this engagement.

Beſides theſe, they had 9 frigates, as many fire-ſhips, 12 French, and 11 Spaniſh galleys, with 2 flutes; in all 92 ſail.

On their ſide were ſlain a rear-admiral, five captains, ſix lieutenants, and five ſea enſigns. The Count de Thouloufe himſelf was wounded in the forehead, ſhoulder, and thigh; the Count de Religues had his leg ſhot off. The Marquis de Herbault, intendant of the fleet, M. du Caſſe, commodore of a ſquadron, M. de Chateau Regnault, the Count de Cominges, M. de Valincourt, the Count de Thouloufe's ſecretary, 7 captains, 8 lieutenants, and about 150 other officers were wounded. As to the loſs of private men, it amounted in the whole to 3048.

After the battle Sir George Rooke ſailed to Gibraltar to refit, and leaving a ſquadron to Sir John Leake, he ſet ſail for England on the 24th day of Auguſt. He arrived in September, and was received by the miniſtry, and the people in general, with thoſe marks of eſteem and veneration, which were due to his long ſervices and ſignal ſucceſs: but he was ſtill purſued with a ſpirit of envy and detraction. There was a party that not only queſtioned his conduct and the late victory, but were willing to ſacrifice the glory of their country, and as far as in them lay, to propagate the idle ſtories invented by the French as undoubted truths, purely to gratify their own ſpleen: nay, ſome of our hiſtorians have endeavoured to perſuade us, that the engagement off Malaga was no more than a drawn battle; in which, however, they differ from the Dutch, who confeſs it was the beſt fought action recorded in hiſtory; and that the ſkill of Sir George Rooke convinced the French, that it was in vain to conteſt with the maritime powers the empire of the ſea.

MALO, (ST.) SURPRISED. A city and port town of France, in the province of Brittany, ſituated on a rock in the Engliſh Channel, ſurrounded by the ſea, but joined to the continent by a cauſeway, thirty-eight miles north-weſt from Rennes, and ten north from Dinant. During the wars between Henry IV. of France, and the partiſans of the League, the inhabitants of St. Malo, apprehending that their governor intended to declare for the King, and admit his troops into the town, found means to ſurpriſe the caſtle; and having murdered the governor, and divided among them his treaſures, which were very conſiderable, openly eſpouſed the intereſts of the League; and demoliſhed the caſtles of ſome of the Royaliſts in the neighbourhood: yet they would not receive a garriſon into the town; but, on the contrary, kept the caſtle in their own hands till the end of the war, which, notwithſtanding their induſtry and circumſpection, was very prejudicial to their trade. This revolution happened in the year 1590. In 1594, the King's arms being attended with great ſucceſs, and the far greater part of the kingdom having ſubmitted to him, the Maloins, ſeeing the affairs of the League in a deſperate ſituation, reſolved to abandon a ruined party, and be reconciled to the King. For this purpoſe they ſent deputies to wait on his Majeſty, who ſurrendered the town to him, on condition, "That they ſhould not be obliged to receive a garriſon: that there ſhould be no inquiry made concerning the murder of their late governor, the ſeizure of his treaſures, the ſurpriſe of the caſtle, or the injury done to the gentlemen in the neighbourhood, whoſe houſes they had demoliſhed: that they ſhould have the privilege of trading to the ſame extent as before the civil wars, and be allowed to caſt ſo many pieces of cannon, as they ſhould think neceſſary for the protection of their trade."

MALO, (ST.) BOMBARDED. In the war which broke out ſoon after the year 1688, the privateers of St. Malo, greatly diſtreſſed the trade of the Allies; and the court of Great Britain having determined to employ their fleet in alarming and ravaging the coaſt of France, reſolved, that among other maritime places of that kingdom, St. Malo ſhould not be neglected. Accordingly this place was twice bombarded during that war. On the 13th of November, 1693, King William ſent out a fleet of 12 men of war, from 70 to 80 guns each, 4 bomb-veſſels, 12 brigantines, and ſeveral ſmaller veſſels, under the command of Commodore Benbow, who was afterwards admiral. The contrivance of firing mortars from ſhips at ſea, was then a new invention, having been firſt uſed about twelve years before, by one Renaud, a young Frenchman, who had never ſeen an action. To increaſe the effect of the bomb-veſſels that were ſent with the fleet on this occaſion, a new galliot, of about 300 tons burthen, was ſo contrived as to be itſelf one great bomb, capable of being diſcharged wherever ſhe could float. In the hold of this galliot, next the keel, were ſtowed 100 barrels of powder, and as the effect of powder is always in proportion to the reſiſtance, this layer was covered with a flooring of thick timber, which was perforated in ſeveral places, to admit the train that was to communicate the fire. Upon the top of this floor was laid 300 carcaſſes, conſiſting of grenades, cannon bullets, chain ſhot, great bars of iron, and an incredible variety of other combuſtible matter, which produced a fire, that, according to the report of the French at that time, could not be quenched but by hot water. It is added, that beſides the carcaſſes and combuſtibles already mentioned, 340 mortars were alſo put on board, loaded with ſmall bombs and grenades: but it is ſcarce to be ſuppoſed that ſuch a number of mortars ſhould be put on board of a ſhip, which at one blaſt was to be deſtroyed by an exploſion, that of itſelf muſt give a very great effect to all the bombs and balls which were on board.

With this machine, which, from its office, was called the Infernal, (and of the ſame nature with thoſe dreadful machines which the Dutch made uſe of to deſtroy the bridge over the Scheldt, when the Prince of Parma beſieged Antwerp), the fleet ſet ſail from Guernſey, the public being utterly ignorant of its deſtination. At four o'clock in the afternoon of the 16th of November, they anchored before one of the entrances into the harbour of the city, called la Conchal, upon the front of which was an unfiniſhed fort, called Quince fort. About eleven at night, they came within cannon-ſhot of the town, and bombarded it till four in the morning of the 17th, when they were obliged to warp out, for fear of being aground. On the 17th and 18th, the veſſels went in again, and the bombardment was renewed; but ſtill they were obliged to return before the tide was out. On the 19th, ſome of the ſailors went aſhore on the iſland Sezemlere, and burnt a convent; and on the ſame day, preparations were made for ſtriking the great blow by playing off the Infernal. An engineer being put on board, carried her under full ſail to the foot of the wall where ſhe was to be fixed, notwithſtanding all the fire of the place againſt him; but it happened that the wind, ſuddenly veering, forced him off before the veſſel could be ſecured, and drove her upon a rock within piſtol-ſhot of the place where ſhe was to have been moored. All poſſible attempts were made to get clear of this rock, but without effect; and the engineer finding that the veſſel had received damage from the ſhock, and began to open, ſet fire to the train, and left her. The ſea water that broke in, prevented ſome of her carcaſſes from taking fire; but the veſſel ſoon after blew up, with an exploſion that ſhook the whole city like an earthquake, uncovered above 300 houſes, threw down the greateſt part of the wall towards the ſea, and broke all the glaſs, china, and earthern ware, for three leagues round. The conſternation of the people was ſo great, that a ſmall number of troops might have taken poſſeſſion of the place without reſiſtance. As it was, they demoliſhed Quince fort, carried off eighty priſoners, and frightened moſt of the people out of the town.

This expedition, which was well timed, and well executed, ſtruck a panic into the inhabitants of St. Malo, whence the moſt troubleſome of the French privateers were fitted out, and ſerved to awaken that whole nation from their golden dreams of the empire of the ſea, by ſhewing them what a very ſmall ſquadron of Engliſh ſhips could do, when commanded by men of reſolution and experience.

The combined fleet of England and Holland, was again ſent to viſit St. Malo in the year 1695. It ſailed on the 23d of June; and on the 4th of July, Lord Berkeley, who commanded it, came before the place, and immediately began to bombard Quince fort to the weſtward, and a battery raiſed by the French on point Danbour to the eaſtward, between which is the channel or entrance into the harbour. The firſt ſervice was performed formed by Colonel Richards, who had three Engliſh and two Dutch bomb-veſſels under his command; and the latter was entirely committed to the Dutch, who employed therein four bomb-ketches for many hours.

On the 5th every thing being ready for the attack of the town, Lord Berkeley gave the ſignal about four o'clock in the morning, and upon this, Captain Benbow hoiſted the flame-coloured flag on board the Charles galley. Immediately after, the Engliſh and Dutch frigates, appointed to guard the bomb-veſſels, entered the channel, and came to an anchor within a mile and a half of the town, having Colonel Richards and the bomb-veſſels in a line before them; and the bombardment began about ſix. All this time the enemy fired very warmly from the ſhore, from the batteries of the great and little bay, and of the iſland of Danbour, from fort Vauban, fort Royal, fort Quince, &c. their galleys and boats taking alſo the opportunities of the tides, and rowing ſometimes ſo near as to gall the line of bomb-veſſels. Yet, in ſpite of this interruption, about eight o'clock a great fire broke out in the eaſt part of the town, and vaſt clouds of ſmoke were ſeen aſcending in ſeveral places. Lord Berkeley and the other admirals, came in their boats to encourage the ſeamen, and expreſſed much ſatisfaction as to the manner in which the attack was diſpoſed. An Engliſh and Dutch fireſhip ſet on fire the wooden fort on Quince rock, which burnt for two hours; and about four in the afternoon, a great fire broke out in the weſt part of the town.

By ſeven in the evening, the bomb-veſſels had ſpent their cargo of 900 bombs and carcaſſes, and therefore the ſignal was made to put to ſea. The whole enterprize was executed by ſix Engliſh and four Dutch men of war, nine galliots, fourteen flat-bottomed boats, and two brigantines. The loſs ſuſtained on the ſide of the aſſailants, was ſixty men killed and wounded by the fire of the French; a bomb-veſſel, called the Terrible, ſo ſhattered, that it was neceſſary to ſet it on fire, two boats, and three or four barks ſunk. The bombardment laſted ſomewhat more than eleven hours, with all the ſucceſs that could poſſibly be expected, a great part of the place being burnt, and the French reduced to the neceſſity of blowing up ſeveral houſes, to prevent the deſtruction of the whole.

The French accounts of the bombardments of their towns during this war, contradict thoſe of the Dutch and Engliſh; but at the ſame time they neither raiſe the reputation of France, nor, with impartial judges, diſcredit what has been advanced by the latter. M. Quincy tells us, that the court appointed Marechal Choiſeuil to command on the coaſt of Bretagne. At la Hogue he had two battalions of marines, three of militia, a regiment of horſe, a regiment of dragoons, and beſides all theſe a numerous body in reſerve. M. d'Eſtrees commanded in the neighbourhood of Rochelle another body of forces. The care of Breſt and the adjacent country, was committed to M. Vauban, who had a ſpecial commiſſion to command the marines, of which there were twenty-two battalions on the coaſt. All this ſhews how apprehenſive the French were of theſe bombardments, into what confuſion they put them, and what expence they were at to provide againſt their effects. As to this particular affair of St. Malo, the author before-mentioned is pleaſed to ſay, that the Engliſh fleet conſiſted of 70 ſail, of which 25 or 30 were ſhips of the line. He owns the bombardment continued eleven hours; that 900 bombs were thrown, of which 500 fell into the town, whereby 10 or 12 houſes were burnt, 35 or 40 damaged, and 18 or 20 people killed or wounded. Father Daniel gives pretty near the ſame account; and both agree, that two infernal machines were ſpent at fort Quince, one to very little purpoſe, and the other to no purpoſe at all. Yet when it is remembered that St. Malo was an old town, its buildings moſtly of wood, the ſtreets very narrow, and the place crowded with ſoldiers, it is not eaſy to conceive how ſo many bombs could fall, and yet do ſo little hurt. This induced a Dutch journaliſt to ſay, that the Maloins had taught the dogs that guarded their city, to take up the bombs in their mouths, and run away with them out of the town. In ſhort, the vaſt difference between the French and Engliſh accounts is eaſily accounted for from this conſideration, that the French always kept in pay a journaliſt, inſtructed to heighten all their ſucceſſes, and extenuate all their loſſes, by feigned relations, which were ſoon after reckoned proper documents for hiſtory, though at the time of their firſt publication, their value was well known, and juſtly deſpiſed.

MALO, (ST.) EXPEDITION AGAINST, in 1758. The Engliſh miniſtry were ſo far from being diſpirited with the bad ſucceſs of the expedition againſt Rochefort in the year 1757, that the diſappointment ſeemed to animate them the more. Accordingly, as ſoon as the ſeaſon admitted, the army aſſembled in the Iſle of Wight. It conſiſted of 15 battalions, 400 artilliery men, and 540 light horſe, in all 13,000 fighting men. They were alſo provided with 60 pieces of cannon, 15 of which were 24 pounders, and 50 pieces of the mortar kind.

On the 23d of May, 1758, Charles, Duke of Marlborough, arrived in the camp as Commander in Chief, Lord George Sackville, and the Earl of Ancram, were the Lieutenant-Generals: the Major-Generals were Waldegrave, Moſtyn, Drury, Boſcawen, and Elliot. The baggage began to be embarked on the 25th, next day the firſt brigade were put on board their reſpective tranſports, and the whole embarkation was finiſhed on the 28th. The troops that were to make the firſt debarkment were to keep themſelves in readineſs, to take twenty days proviſions, and a tent for every eight men. The officers that were to command them, were to have only private ſoldiers' tents, till they could eſtabliſh themſelves on the ſhore.

Lord Anſon and Sir Edward Hawke had hoiſted their flags at Spithead; but Commodore Howe commanded the frigates, and was entruſted with the direction of every thing that related to the landing of the troops in the enemy's dominions. For this purpoſe, a conſiderable number of flat-bottomed boats, of a new invention, were provided; and nothing was wanting that could be deemed neceſſary to forward the execution of the enterprize. The weather, during the encampment on the Iſle of Wight, had been remarkably pleaſant: the men had had conſtant exerciſe morning and evening, were in good health and ſpirits, and longed for nothing ſo much as an opportunity to exert themſelves in the actual ſervice. The whole nation ſeemed to be animated with an uncommon degree of alacrity. Lord Downe, Sir James Lowther, Sir John Armitage, Mr. Berkeley, and Mr. Delaval, perſons of diſtinguiſhed rank and fortune, engaged as volunteers in the ſervice; and every lover of his country began to entertain agreeable hopes of the ſucceſs of the armament, though the deſtination of it was kept an inviolable ſecret. It was, however, eaſily perceived, that the intended voyage could not be of any conſiderable length, becauſe a great number of ſoldiers were crowded into one tranſport. This diſpoſition was attended with ſuch inconvenience, that the troops loudly complained they were in danger of being ſtifled for want of room and freſh air; the whole tonnage of the tranſports amounting to no more than 11,084.

To remedy this evil, 400 men of the guards were taken on board a ſhip of war, and by this expedient the reſt were conſiderably eaſed. The ſoldiers had another ſubject of complaint, which is but too common with all perſons employed by ſea for the ſervice of their country. They were put on ſhort allowance of proviſions; and even the beef they received, was old, hard, ſalt, and diſagreeable. At this period, the captain of a French ſloop, who had been detached for intelligence, boldly ran up among the fleet at Spithead, and ſaluted the Admiral, as if he had been a ſubject of England; but he was ſoon diſcovered and taken. The enemy's veſſels were very alert upon the coaſt of England; for notwithſtanding a great number of cruizers, the French privateers made prizes of ſome ſmall craft on the back of the Iſle of Wight.

The proper diſpoſition being made for landing, if it ſhould be thought proper, and every thing prepared for the voyage, the fleet was favoured with a fair wind on Thurſday the firſt of June. Lord Anſon immediately weighed and put to ſea with all the ſhips of war, except thoſe deſtined as convoy to the tranſports, under the immediate direction of Commodore Howe. By eleven in the forenoon all the tranſports were under ſail: by two o'clock the fleet cleared the Iſle of Wight, and ſtood over to the coaſt of France with a freſh gale, which blew all night. In the morning of Saturday, the 3d of June, a great part of the fleet was aſtern of the Commodore, who being to the weſtward of Alderney, brought to off Sark, and dropped anchor in very foul and dangerous ground, where many anchors were loſt. The Ward tranſport, having on board part of the firſt regiment of guards, drove upon a rock, and fired guns of diſtreſs; but when ſhe was on the point of foundering, all the men were ſaved in boats, and removed into other veſſels. Notwithſtanding the repeated ſignals to make ſail, the tranſports lagged behind, ſome of them at the diſtance of five or ſix leagues, otherwiſe the fleet might have anchored this evening in the bay of Concalle, near the place of its deſtination. At night, the Commodore weighed and ſtood off to ſea, and on Sunday morning made ſail for land. Next day the fleet made St. Malo, and about two in the afternoon ſtood into the bay of Concalle, where ſome batteries on the land beginning to fire on the cutters, the frigates ran in ſhore, and a few ſhot were exchanged.

About five in the evening, all the grenadiers in the army went on board the flat-bottomed boats for landing: the volunteers accompanied this detachment, and acted with them on all occaſions. About ſeven, Mr. Howe, in his own ſhip, the Eſſex, led the way, and with two others, ranging up along-ſide of a ſmall battery, poured in ſome broadſides, by which it was effectually ſilenced, and the whole army landed without any loſs, except that of three ſailors; nor did they meet with any oppoſition, but from the random ſhot of a few ſtraggling peaſants. The troops thus landed, marched forthwith in ſmall parties, to ſeize the poſts and villages which were ſituated on high grounds, and rendered very ſtrong by hollow ways, incloſures, gullies, and every natural defence, except water. The field pieces, being ten light ſix-pounders, were likewiſe landed, and by a miſtake of orders, drawn into a deep road, where they ſtuck in the mire, and with great difficulty were brought back to the beach. All night the troops lay on their arms. Next morning, a ſpot of ground was marked out for a camp, to be fortified with an intrenchment, to ſecure a retreat for the army; and in the evening 600 men were ſet to work upon it. The people in the country, except a few of the aged and infirm, abandoned their houſes in the utmoſt conſternation.

The army being quite diſembarked, the troops encamped on the ground choſen for the intrenchment, on the road from Concalle to St. Malo. On Wedneſday morning, the Duke of Marlborough and Lord George Sackville, with the firſt column of the army, began their march towards St. Malo. Lord Ancram, at the head of the ſecond column, advanced towards the ſame place, through the great road by the ſea ſide, to the right of the village of Dol. The brigade of the guards occupied an encampment three miles to the left, on a ſpot of ground which was the moſt acceſſible avenue by which the enemy could fall upon the army. This night and next day, a detachment of troops ſet on fire above 100 ſail of ſhipping, together with a great number of magazines filled with naval ſtores, at St. Servan, and Solidore, a kind of ſuburb to St. Malo, with a large and open harbour. They likewiſe took poſſeſſion of a fort near the point of Parame, which the enemy had abandoned. In the mean time, the brigade left at Concalle, were employed in making the intrenchment, as well as in building two ſquare redoubts, one horn-work, and two batteries, for the defence of 11,030 paces of ground. In the rear of the intrenchment were landing places, with high rocks, and difficult communications towards the ſhore. The front was covered by a hollow way, flanked with houſes, in which loop-holes were made; a little further advanced was a fall of large trees cut down for the purpoſe. The left was ſecured by a deep eſcarpment: the centre and the right defended by falls of trees, trees, and the village of Concalle, of very difficult acceſs. Never was a finer ſituation for a ſmall army to make a ſtand againſt any ſuperiority of number.

The three brigades, encamped with the Duke of Marlborough at Parame, had no opportunity of acting. The light-horſe and our parties ſcoured the country, and brought in numbers of priſoners; but there was little proſpect of being able to reduce St. Malo.

The place is ſtrong by its ſituation on a peninſula, almoſt ſurrounded by the ſea, and having no communication with the land, but by a narrow dike of about 600 or 700 yards in length; and it has alſo 250 pieces of cannon mounted on its ramparts. It is true it has no outworks, and its fortifications are ſuch as could not ſuſtain a regular ſiege for any length of time; but it is ſtrong by nature and art towards the ſea. Upon Friday, Commodore Howe, with the ſhips of war and artillery tranſports, ſailed from the bay of Concalle towards St. Malo, with an intention to land the battering cannon; but the deſign of a formal ſiege was then thought impracticable: it would have taken up more time than upon the preſent plan it would have been prudent to beſtow. The artillery could not be landed near the town; nor were there horſes ſufficient to draw it from any conſiderable diſtance; and before regular approaches could have been made, the enemy, in all probability, would have been able to aſſemble a force much ſuperior to the Engliſh army. On theſe conſiderations, the General reſigned all thoughts of attacking the town by land, and Commodore Howe ſailed back to the bay of Concalle. Some letters paſſed between the Duke of Marlborough and the Governor of the town; and an exact account was taken of the ſhips, veſſels, ſtore-houſes, and magazines, which had been deſtroyed at St. Servan, whereby it appears, that incredible damage was done to the French in this excurſion, however they may endeavour to conceal or extenuate the particulars of their loſs.

MALPLAQUET BATTLE. See BLAREGNIES.

MALTA. We have here to record the ſurrender of Malta, and the conſequent downfal of its government. On June 12, 1793, that celebrated iſland, which, in the 16th century, baffled all the efforts of Sultan Solyman, whoſe countleſs army ſuſtained a loſs of 20,000 men, and after having ever ſince not only withſtood the power, but been the terror of the Turks, after a pretended reſiſtance, fell a prey to the forces of that monſtrous hydra, the preſent government of France.

The following ſtatiſtical accounts relative to that iſland, are extracted from a letter of a literary man, who reſided there a long time. The chiefs of the order, principally at the inſtance of the knight and aſtronomer D'Augos, had undertaken a general numbering of the people. But the clergy, who were apprehenſive of being called to account for their negligence in keeping the regiſters of births, perſuaded the people that it was done with a view of eſtabliſhing a militia: and on account of the commotions which aroſe from this miſtaken notion, the execution of the plan was deferred. Vanity has greatly exaggerated the number of the inhabitants; in both iſlands they were reckoned to amount to 150,000, but I hardly believe they contain 80,000. There are only two cities, one of which, viz. the Old Town is far from being populous, on account of the inſalubrity of the air; and twenty-ſeven villages or cazals. The iſland of Goza contains a very ſmall town, and eight cazals. The greateſt length of Malta, from S. E. to S. W. is 14,000 toiſes. The breadth, from N. E. to S. W. is from ſix to eight thouſand toiſes. Goza extends in length 7000 toiſes from E. to W. its greateſt breadth from N. to S. is 4000 toiſes. The number of all the knights belonging to the order was not made public. Of the French and Italians only were liſts printed. In the year 1788 there were 1298 French knights, and 356 chaplains, that is, plebeians, who likewiſe had penſions and commanderies, which were peculiarly appropriated to them. The iſland is far from fruitful, and in many places rocky: the chief product is cotton. The Malteſe were always tried by their peers. The people are laborious, temperate, and frugal. A colony of them is eſtabliſhed in Sicily, where they form a ſtriking contraſt with the natives.

Liſbon, November 24, 1799.

The Coloſſus, of ſeventy-four guns, is arrived here, from Malta, which iſland, at the time of her departure, was blockaded by the united ſquadrons of England and Portugal. The French force is about 3000 ſoldiers and ſailors, and about 1500 Malteſe, of which, however, only about 100 men will take up arms for the French; the whole city, and all the poſts belonging thereto (except Corradino, which commands a part of the harbours) were in the power of the French; theſe have corn for eighteen months, and mills, plenty of oil, little cheeſe, and ſcarce any thing elſe. The aqueduct cut off, but the wells not likely to fail, except in ſummer. The Malteſe in arms are about 10,000, and could drive the French out of ſeveral poſts, if of uſe: but theſe latter could eaſily retire to St. Elmo; the Malteſe have twelve guns mounted, two on Corradino, four at Sanoraht and two or three at their camps; alſo thirty unmounted, of different calibres. The French had in the harbour two ſhips of the line and three frigates, viz. the Guillaume Tell, much damaged, but may put to ſea; the St. Joas, formerly a Malteſe ſixty-four, ready for ſea, but very old, in a bad ſtate, and badly manned: La Diane and Juſtice (frigates) in good order, and ready for ſea; the Santa Maria, formerly a Malteſe forty gun ſhip, badly manned, but ready for ſea; alſo one cutter, five ſmall Greek veſſels, two galleys, and four gun-boats. The Malteſe were principally in want of bombs and mortars, more powder and muſkets, as well as balls to fit their cannon.

Copy of a Letter from Lord Keith, K. B. Vice-Admiral of the Red, and Commander in Chief of his Majeſty's Ships and Veſſels in the Mediterranean, dated on board the Queen Charlotte, off Valette, 20th of February, 1800.

My letter of the 15th acquainted you, for the information of their lordſhips, that I had received intelligence gence of an reported approach of the enemy's ſquadron towards the iſland; and although I had conſiderable difficulty in perſuading myſelf that they would hazard the attempt in the face of ſo ſuperior a force, I nevertheleſs conſidered it incumbent upon me to take the neceſſary precautions of reconnoitring the quarter in which they were to be expected, and at the ſame time guarding moſt particularly the entrance of the harbour of Valette, as the only point in which they could ſecure themſelves, and debark their troops and ſtores. The wind being ſtrong from the S. E. and accompanied with rain, I could only communicate by ſignal; I accordingly denoted the bearing and reputed force of the enemy, and directed the Foudroyant, Audacious, and Northumberland to chaſe to windward, and the Lion to look out off the paſſage between Goza and Malta, while the Queen Charlotte was kept as cloſe in with the mouth of the harbour as the batteries would admit of; the Alexander at the ſame time was under weigh on the S. E. ſide of the iſland. On the 16th I was joined by the Phæton, from Palermo; and the wind having ſhifted to the N. W. which afforded a favourable opportunity for landing the Neapolitan troops at Marſa Sirocco, I accordingly embraced it, and in the afternoon returned off the harbour of Valette: ſignals were made from various parts of the iſland of an enemy's being in ſight, and with the Queen Charlotte, Phæton, Serena Neapolitan frigate, and Minorca ſloop, I anxiouſly continued to maintain a poſition near the ſhore, to prevent the enemy from paſſing within us, and to expoſe them to the attack of his Majeſty's ſhips that were in purſuit of them. On the morning of the 19th, El Corſo joined with a large French armed ſtoreſhip, which ſhe took poſſeſſion of at four clock in the afternoon of the 18th, by ſignal from Lord Nelſon, whoſe ſquadron was then engaged with the French. Captain Ricketts reported this ſhip to be the Ville de Marſeilles, loaded with ſalt meat, brandy, wine, cloathing, ſtores, &c. &c.; ſhe ſailed from Toulon on the 7th inſtant, in company with the Genereux, ſeventy-four, Admiral Perree, Badine twenty-four, and two corvettes, having near 4000 troops on board for the relief of Malta. At four P. M. the Foudroyant and Audacious joined me, and I was acquainted by Rear-Admiral Lord Nelſon that the Genereux had ſurrendered without any action, and that the three corvettes had eſcaped, from all the line of battle ſhips having anxiouſly preſſed after the French Admiral. I have the honour to incloſe a copy of Lord Nelſon's letter. His Lordſhip has on this occaſion, as on all others, conducted himſelf with ſkill and great addreſs in comprehending my ſignals, which the ſtate of the weather led me greatly to ſuſpect. Captain Peard has evinced excellent management from the moment he firſt diſcovered the enemy off the ſouth-weſt end of Sicily until the period of the capture; and Lieutenant William Harrington, commanding the Alexander in the abſence of Captain Ball, has ſhewn great merit in ſo ably conducting that ſhip in preſence of ſo ſuperior a force previouſly to the appearance of Lord Nelſon; I beg leave to recommend him to their lordſhips conſideration. I have detached ſhips in all directions to endeavour to pick up the ſtragglers.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Foudroyant at Sea, eight leagues weſt of Paſſero, February 18, 1800.

This morning at day-light, being in company with the ſhips Northumberland, Audacious, and El Corſo brig, I ſaw the Alexander in chaſe of a line of battle ſhip, three frigates, and a corvette. At about eight o'clock ſhe fired ſeveral ſhot at one of the enemy's frigates, which ſtruck her colours, and leaving her to be ſecured by the ſhips aſtern, continued the chace. I directed Captain Gould, of the Audacious, and the El Corſo brig to take charge of this prize. At half paſt one P. M. the frigates and corvette tacked to the weſtward, but the line of battle ſhip not being able to tack without coming to action with the Alexander, bore up. The Succeſs being to leeward, Captain Peard, with great judgment and gallantry lay acroſs his hawſe, and raked him with ſeveral broadſides: in paſſing the French ſhip's broadſide, ſeveral ſhot ſtruck the Succeſs, by which one man was killed, and the maſter and eight men wounded. At half paſt four, the Foudroyant and Northumberland coming up, the former fired two ſhot, when the French ſhip fired her broadſide and ſtruck her colours. She proved to be the Genereux, of ſeventy-four guns, bearing the flag of Rear-Admiral Perree, commander in chief of the French naval force in the Mediterranean, having a number of troops on board from Toulon, bound for the relief of Malta. I attribute our ſucceſs this day to be principally owing to the extreme good management of Lieutenant William Harrington, who commands the Alexander in the abſence of Captain Ball; and I am much pleaſed with the gallant behaviour of Captain Peard, of the Succeſs, as alſo with the alacrity and good conduct of Captain Martin and Sir Edward Berry. I have ſent Lieutenant Andrew, Thompſon, firſt lieutenant of the Foudroyant, to take charge of the Genereux, whom I beg leave to recommend to your Lordſhip for promotion; and have ſent her under care of the Northumberland and Alexander to Syracuſe, to wait your Lordſhip's orders.

I have the honour to be,
my Lord, &c.

Copy of a Letter from Vice-Admiral Lord Keith, off Genoa, the 7th of May, 1800.

You will be pleaſed to lay before their lordſhips the encloſed copy of a letter from Captain Dixon, of his Majeſty's ſhip Lion, to Sir Thomas Troubridge, bart. containing a narrative of the circumſtances attending the capture of the Guillaume Tell, and a liſt of the killed and wounded on board his Majeſty's ſhips on that occaſion.

The honourable teſtimony borne by Captain Dixon to the meritorious conduct of the officers engaged with him him in the purſuit and capture of this ſhip, cannot fail to attract their lordſhips' attention, and enſure the honour of their countenance and ſupport.

KEITH.

Lion at Sea, off Cape Paſſero, 31ſt of March, 1800.

I have the honour to inform you, that yeſterday morning, at nine o'clock, Cape Paſſero bearing N. ¼ E. diſtant ſeven leagues, the French ſhip of war Le Guillaume Tell, of eighty-ſix guns and 1000 men, bearing the flag of Contre Admiral Decres, ſurrendered, after a moſt gallant and obſtinate defence of three hours and a half, to his Majeſty's ſhips Foudroyant, Lion, and Penelope.

To detail the particulars of this very important capture, I have to inform you, that the ſignal rockets and cannonading from our batteries at Malta, the midnight preceding, with the favourable ſtrong ſoutherly gale, together with the darkneſs which ſucceeded the ſetting of the moon, convinced me that the enemy's ſhips of war were attempting to effect an eſcape, and which was immediately aſcertained by that judicious and truly valuable officer Captain Blackwood, of the Penelope, who had been ſtationed a few hours before between the Lion and Valette, for the purpoſe of obſerving cloſely the motions of the enemy; nearly at midnight an enemy's ſhip was deſcried by him, when the Minorca was ſent to inform me of it, giving chaſe himſelf, apprizing me by ſignal that the ſtrange ſhips ſent were hauled to the wind on the ſtarboard tack. I loſt not one moment in making the ſignal for the ſquadron to cut or ſlip, and directed Captain Miller, of the Minorca, to run down to the Foudroyant and Alexander with the intelligence, and to repeat the ſignal.

Under a preſs of canvas I gave chace until five A. M. ſolely guided by the cannonading of the Penelope; and, as a direction to the ſquadron, a rocket and blue light were ſhewn every half hour from the Lion. As the day broke, I found myſelf in gun-ſhot of the chace, and the Penelope within muſket-ſhot, raking her, the effects of whoſe well directed fire during the night, had ſhot away the main and mizen top-maſts and main yard; the enemy appeared in great confuſion, being reduced to his head-ſails, going with the wind on the quarter.

The Lion was run cloſe along-ſide; the yard-arms of both ſhips being juſt clear, when a deſtructive broadſide of three round ſhot in each gun was poured in, luffing up acroſs the bow, when the enemy's jib-boom paſſed between the main and mizen ſhrouds; after a ſhort interval, I had the pleaſure to ſee the boom carried away, and the ſhips diſentangled, maintaining a poſition acroſs the bow, firing to great advantage.

I was not the leaſt ſolicitous either to board or be boarded, as the enemy appeared of immenſe bulk and full of men, keeping up a prodigious fire of muſquetry, which, with the bow-chaſes, ſhe could for a long time only uſe, I found it abſolutely neceſſary, if poſſible, to keep from the broadſide of this ſhip: after being engaged about fifty minutes, the Foudroyant was ſeen under a preſs of canvaſs, and ſoon paſſed, hailing the enemy to ſtrike, which being declined, a very heavy fire from both ſhips, broadſide to broadſide, was moſt gallantly maintained, the Lion and Penelope frequently in ſituations to do great execution; in ſhort, Sir, after the hotteſt action that probably was ever maintained by an enemy's ſhip, oppoſed to thoſe of his Majeſty, and being totally diſmaſted, the French Admiral's flag and colours were ſtruck.

I have not language to expreſs the high ſenſe of obligation I feel myſelf under to Captain Blackwood for his prompt and able conduct in leading the line of battle ſhips to the enemy, for the gallantry and ſpirit ſo highly conſpicuous in him, and for his admirable management of the frigate; to your diſcriminate judgment it is unneceſſary to remark, of what real value and importance ſuch an officer muſt ever be conſidered to his Majeſty's ſervice: the termination of the battle muſt be attributed to the ſpirited fire of the Foudroyant, whoſe Captain, Sir Edward Berry, has juſtly added another laurel to the many he has gained during the war.

Captain Blackwood ſpeaks in very high terms of the active and gallant conduct of Captain Long of the Vincejo during the night; and I beg to mention the ſervices of Captains Broughton and Miller.

The crippled condition of the Lion and Foudroyant made it neceſſary for me to direct Captain Blackwood to take poſſeſſion of the enemy, take him in tow, and proceed to Syracuſe.

I received the greateſt poſſible aſſiſtance from Lieutenant Joſeph Patey, ſenior officer of the Lion, and from Mr. Spence the maſter, who, together with the other officers and ſhips' company, ſhewed the moſt determined gallantry.

Captains Sir Edward Berry and Blackwood have reported to me the ſame gallant and animated behaviour in the officers and crews of their reſpective ſhips.

I am ſorry to ſay that the three ſhips have ſuffered much in killed and wounded, and that the loſs of the enemy is prodigious, being upwards of 200.

I refer you to the incloſed reports for further particulars as to the ſtate of his Majeſty's ſhips, and have the honour to remain, Sir, &c.

Vice-Admiral Decres to the Miniſter of Marine and the Colonies.

1ſt Floreal, 8th Year.

CITIZEN MINISTER,

I have the misfortune to tranſmit to you an account of the capture of the ſhip William Tell, commanded by Captain Saunier, and on board of which I had recently hoiſted my flag.

It was on the 8th Germinal, at eleven at night, when the ſhip left the port; the moon had gone down about an hour. Scudding before the wind, ſhe had already doubled a part of the enemy's fleet, when ſhe was recogniſed by a frigate, which immediately purſued her, at the ſame time firing her guns, in order to point out the chaſe, and bring up the enemy's ſhips.

It was the Penelope, of thirty-ſix guns, which unfortunately gained ground of the William Tell. She gained ſo faſt upon her, that at one o'clock of the morning of the 9th, ſhe was near enough to fire right into her ſtern; the William Tell returned the fire from her ſtern-chaſes. Her ſhot ſeveral times ſtruck the Penelope, but did not prevent her repeating her fire during the whole of the night with all the advantage which ſhe derived from her ſuperior ſtyle of ſailing, and the choice of poſition, as well as from the neceſſity which compelled me to fly.

An hundred times I was tempted to manœuvre, in order to cripple her from fighting, as well as ſome cutters that followed her, and annoyed us with their fire; but as the wind blew freſh, and I obſerved, notwithſtanding the darkneſs of the night, ſeveral ſhips at the extremity of the horizon, in full ſail, to ſupport her, I was ſenſible that, by laying to, I ſhould be giving them time to come up, and that my eſcape would be impoſſible.

We were thus annoyed during the whole night by this frigate, whoſe fire deſtroyed our main top-maſt about five in the morning.

For three quarters of an hour, during which the Lion was on our quarter, a briſk fire was maintained on both ſides. At laſt her's ſlackened, and we were within piſtol-ſhot of each other, when I perceived that there was not a ſingle perſon on the quarter-deck.

I ordered Captain Saunier to ſeize the firſt opportunity of boarding.

The firſt attempt made by that gallant officer did not ſucceed, owing to the precautions of the enemy; but having tried a ſecond effort, the William Tell's bowſprit was entangled in the ſhrouds of the Lion, and we ſhould certainly have ſucceeded in boarding, if our bowſprit had not gone in two, and diſengaged the ſhips at the moment when one of our ſailors had reached a part of their rigging, and a troop of brave fellows were preparing to follow him.

This coup de main failing, the Lion, without a ſingle ſail, her rigging cut to pieces, and her maſt ready to go by the board, was compelled to fall back without firing a ſingle cannon.

The William Tell for ſome minutes purſued her, but was ſoon compelled to quit her, in order to receive the Foudroyant, who now took part in the engagement.

It was about ſix o'clock. The Foudroyant, of eighty-four guns, one of the fineſt veſſels in England, paſſed aſtern of the William Tell, calling out to her to ſtrike, and at the ſame time pouring in her whole broadſide.

In conſequence of their manœuvres the two ſhips were ſoon alongſide each other—the Foudroyant on the ſtarboard, and the Penelope on our quarter.

The fire at that moment on both ſides was terrible. We continued as cloſe to each other as it was poſſible, without being able to board.

In about thirty-ſix minutes the foremaſt of the William Tell gave way, and at three quarters paſt ſix her mainmaſt ſhared the ſame fate.

The ſails and rigging of the Foudroyant were cut to pieces, and ſhe was for ſome time ungovernable; and, as her ſtern was towards us, her mizen maſt was divided, and ſeveral of her yards were hanging in different directions.

In the mean time the Lion, which had retired from the engagement for more than an hour, had repaired her damage, and returned to attack us on our larboard.

In the ſtate in which the William Tell was, I confeſs I had but little hopes of the iſſue of ſo unequal a combat; but the determined reſolution of her crew was ſuch, that I was certain ſhe would be dearly purchaſed by the enemy; beſides, while the ſhip was manageable, we were capable of any bold attempt without dread of the conſequences. It was for that reaſon I ordered Captain Saunier to board the Foudroyant, whoſe fire I perceived had abated.

This commander ſeiſed the firſt opportunity that preſented itſelf, and ruſhing ſuddenly on her ſtarboard, he croſſed her bowſprit.

The enemy, judging of our intention, manœuvred in order to prevent our boarding. The two veſſels nearly touched each other, but could not abſolutely meet.

The reſult of this manœuvre was that the Foudroyant, which had already loſt her mizen-maſt, was terribly mauled both fore and aft; her foretop-maſt had fallen, and ſhe was fain to ſheer off with what maſts ſhe had ſtanding. During the reſt of the engagement ſhe kept at a diſtance, which did not admit of our boarding her.

It was then that Captain Saunier, who had directed the manœuvre with uncommon ability, was ſeverely wounded. He was immediately replaced by Lieutenant Donadieu, an officer of very great merit.

From ſeven o'clock the William Tell, having only her mizen and mizen-topmaſt left, had to engage two ſhips of the line and a frigate. She anſwered their fire by both her broadſides, and frequently by her guns aſtern.

The

The rigging had ſeveral times taken fire, and had been repeatedly extinguiſhed. Several exploſions which I had heard on board the enemy's ſhips aſſured me the ſame accident had happened to them.

Unfortunately the falling of the maſts obſtructed the working of ſeveral of our larboard guns, and we were obliged to be continually throwing water on that ſide where the ruins of the maſts and rigging, which we were unable to remove with ſufficient ſpeed, threatened every moment to ſet fire to the ſhip.

At eight o'clock (and I mention this moment, becauſe I cannot determine what was the ſtate of the guns at the end of the action), there were two deſtroyed by the enemy's ſhot, and nineteen diſmounted, without reckoning thoſe on the quarter-deck.

As the mainmaſt had been twice cut, one of the pieces, which was fourteen feet long, lay acroſs the quarter-deck, and ſo entirely obſtructed it, that it was impoſſible to move.

Notwithſtanding this accident, and the appearance of the blood which overflowed all the decks, the reſolution of the crew ſeemed to increaſe; and notwithſtanding the united fire of three ſhips of the line, the defence of the William Tell, at half paſt eight, was ſtill vigorous; at that moment her mizenmaſt fell on the larboard ſide.

The whole of that ſide, againſt which the fire of the Lion was directed, was obſtructed by the maſts.

The enemy taking advantage of our embarraſſed ſituation, were enabled to chuſe that which was moſt convenient for them, while it was impoſſible for us to avail ourſelves of the ſame advantage.

The Foudroyant, which had received the moſt of our fire, was unable to haul on our ſtarboard; but the Lion was on our larboard quarter, though her ſails, rigging, and yards were cut to pieces. At length the Penelope, which had received but little damage, headed us, and the William Tell received the fire of all three. Without a maſt ſtanding, the ſhip ungovernable, and reeling from the violent motion of the waves, which ſhe had no maſt or ſail to counteract, we were obliged to ſhut her lower ports in order to prevent her filling.

In this ſituation it was too evident, not only that it was impoſſible to ſave the ſhip, but that it was out of my power further to injure the enemy. I was ſenſible that the men I might loſe by a longer reſiſtance would be the uſeleſs victims of a vain obſtinacy. Upon this conviction, and perſuaded that the defence of the William Tell had been in every reſpect truly honourable, I thought it my duty to ſubmit to fortune, and about thirty-five minutes paſt nine, after the ſhip was a wreck, the flag was ſtruck.

The Penelope was the only ſhip able to take poſſeſſion of her, and board her with a ſufficient number of ſailors, to carry her to Syracuſe.

The enemy did not attempt to conceal the conſiderable loſs they ſuſtained; and from what I have ſeen, and what I was informed immediately after the affair, it is certain that, in this reſpect, the vanquiſhers have not been more fortunate than the vanquiſhed.

I deem it ſuperfluous to make any encomiums on the conduct of the crew of the William Tell. The fact alone of the engagement, and of the three attempts to board, which, notwithſtanding the ſuperiority of the enemy, promiſed ſucceſs, will ſufficiently inform you, Citizen Miniſter, what confidence I was juſtly inſpired with by the talents of the Captain, the devotion of the officers, and the bravery of the whole of the crew, I had the honour to command.

(Signed) DECRES.

The French account of the ſurrender of Malta.

Malta, September 2.—The generals, the ſuperior officers of the land and ſea forces, the commiſſaries of the army and the marine, the commandant of the forts, the officers of every rank commanding detachments of different corps, being convoked by the general of diviſion, Vaubois, commander in chief in the iſles of Malta and Goza, to hold a council of war, aſſembled in the weſtern part of the national palace of the city of Malta.

Having heard the report of General Vaubois, from which it appears, that the magazines of proviſions in the fortreſs have been exhauſted for more than a month; that the magazines of liquors are alſo empty; and that the bread, the only food that remains for the ſupport both of the garriſon and the population, cannot laſt beyond the 22d of this month (September 9). the Council, conſidering that the garriſon of Malta, while reduced for two years to one third of its allowance, has fulfilled with honour the taſk which was impoſed upon it, viz. that of preſerving, to the laſt extremity, this place for the republic; that after having with main force repulſed every attack, it has by its firmneſs and energy reduced the enemy to perſevere in a cloſe blockade, which allows no farther hope of receiving any aſſiſtance from without.

That the forces which the enemy employs in the blockade of Malta both by land and ſea preclude the brave garriſon of Malta from all means of procuring ſupplies, either by its courage or perſeverance, in a country barren in itſelf, and covered with fortifications which nature and art have multiplied to confine us within our ramparts; that, beſides, every enterpriſe of that kind would be unſucceſsful, in conſequence of the precaution which, according to the report of deſerters, the enemy has taken of keeping all his proviſions on board the veſſels.

That we cannot, without hazarding the exiſtence of the 12,000 perſons who compoſe the garriſon, and the population of this place, defer any longer the entering into a negociation with the enemy, in order to obtain an honourable capitulation, and one ſuch as is due to thoſe brave troops who have ſo long ſuffered for their country.

That the marine has ſhared with honour in the labours and the privations of the garriſon, and that it has endeavoured, by ſending off La Juſtice and La Diane frigates, to diminiſh the loſs which the republic was likely to ſuſtain in that department.

That the laws of war, as well as thoſe of humanity, ſufficiently authoriſe the Commander in Chief to commence a negociation with the enemy.

It is reſolved, that General Vaubois ſhall ſend, on the 17th of this month (September 4) a flag of truce to the Engliſh commander, to propoſe a capitulation, and that Rear-Admiral Villeneuf ſhall repair thither alſo, to ſtipulate in favour of the ſeamen, in order that they may enjoy the ſame advantages as thoſe granted to the garriſon.

(A correct copy) Dot, Commiſſaire des guerre.

Malta, September 6, 1800.

Conceiving that it may be of the utmoſt conſequence that his Majeſty's miniſters ſhould be acquainted, as ſoon as poſſible, with the ſurrender of the important fortreſs of La Valette, I have deſired Mr. Paget to diſpatch a meſſenger to England, with a copy of my letter to General Sir Ralph Abercromby on the ſubject, and the articles of capitulation, which are herewith ſent you.

We yeſterday took poſſeſſion of ſome of the works, and our ſhips entered the harbour, and I am in hopes the whole will be evacuated by the enemy to-morrow, except the iſland of Manuel, where, agreeable to the capitulation, ſuch are to remain as cannot be immediately ſent to France for want of ſhips to take them.

I have the honour to be, &c.

H. Pigot, Major-General.

Malta, September 5, 1800.

I have great ſatisfaction in acquainting you with the ſurrender of the fortreſs of La Valette, with all its dependencies, after ſuſtaining a blockade of two years. The capitulation has been ſigned this day.

I had every reaſon to ſuppoſe, that this moſt formidable fortreſs was likely ſoon to fall, from the circumſtance of the two French frigates, La Juſtice and La Diane, going out of the harbour a few nights ago; one of which, La Diane, by the vigilance of the blockading ſquadron, was ſoon captured, and there are ſtill ſome hopes that the other may have ſhared the ſame fate.

Judging of how much conſequence it may be, that you ſhould have the earlieſt intimation of this important capture, I have delayed, till another opportunity, ſending returns of the ſtores, &c. found in the place, which could not yet be made up.

During the ſhort time you were here, you muſt have been ſenſible of the great exertions which Brigadier General Graham muſt have made with the limited force he had, previous to my arrival with a reinforcement: he has ever ſince continued theſe exertions; and I conſider that the ſurrender of the place has been accelerated by the deciſion of his conduct, in preventing any more inhabitants from coming out of the fortreſs a ſhort time before I came here. He was ſent to negociate the terms of capitulation with General Vaubois, and I am much indebted to him for his aſſiſtance in that buſineſs.

I am happy to ſay, that I have experienced every ſupport from Brigadier-General Moncrieff, and the officers of the Britiſh and Allied troops, whoſe conduct in every reſpect has been moſt exemplary. The ſervice of the engineer department, under Captain Gordon, has been carried on with great zeal and perſeverance.

I think it right to mention to you, that Lieutenant Vivion of the Royal Artillery, the Aſſiſtant Quarter Maſter General, has been of conſiderable ſervice. He was landed here with his party from the Strombolo bomb at the commencement of the blockade; and for a long time did duty with theſe few men without any other Britiſh or regular troops of any deſcription.

I have great pleaſure in acknowledging the conſtant and ready aſſiſtance and co-operation I have received from Captain Ball, of his Majeſty's ſhip the Alexander, who has been employed on ſhore during the greater part of the blockade:—His name and ſervices are already well known to his Majeſty's miniſters; and I am ſure I need not ſay more than that thoſe he has performed here do credit to his former character.

I herewith tranſmit you the terms of the capitulation.

I have derived great aſſiſtance from my Aide-de-camp Captain Dalrymple, who has for ſome time been doing duty as Aſſiſtant Adjutant-General. I have the honour to be, &c.

H. Pigot, Major-General.

Articles of capitulation concluded between the General of Diviſion Vaubois, Commander in Chief of the iſles of Malta, Goza, and Rear-Admiral Villeneuf, Commander of the Marine at Malta, on the one part; and Major-General Pigot, Commander of the Troops of his Britannic Majeſty, and his Allies, and Captain Martin, commanding the veſſels of his Britannic Majeſty and his Allies before Malta, on the other part.

Art. I. The garriſon of Malta and of the forts which depend upon it ſhall, on the day and hour agreed upon, march out, to be embarked and conducted to Marſeilles, with all the honours of war; that is to ſay, drums beating, colours flying, matches lighted, having in front two four-pounders, with their caiſſon, the artillery neceſſary for ſerving them, and an infantry caiſſon. The civil and military officers of the marine, and every thing belonging to that department, ſhall, in like manner, be conducted to Toulon.

Anſ. The garriſon ſhall receive the honours of war demanded; but on account of the impoſſibility of embarking the whole immediately, the following arrangement ſhall be made.—As ſoon as the capitulation is ſigned, the forts Ricaſoli and Tigne ſhall be delivered up to the troops of his Britannic Majeſty, and his veſſels ſhall enter the port. The national gate ſhall be occupied by a guard of French and Engliſh, equal in number, until the veſſels ſhall be ready to receive the firſt embarkation; then all the garriſon ſhall defile to the marine arſenal, where they ſhall depoſit their arms. Thoſe who ſhall be unable to make part of the firſt embarkation ſhall occupy the iſle and fort Manuel, having an armed guard to prevent their ſpreading into the country. The garriſon ſhall be conſidered as priſoners of war, and ſhall not ſerve againſt his Britannic Majeſty till exchanged, of which the officers will give their their parole of honour. All the artillery, the ammunition and public magazines of all kinds ſhall be delivered to the officers appointed for that purpoſe, as well as the inventories and public papers.

II. General of Brigade Chanez, Commandant of the citadel and forts; General of Brigade, D'Hennexel, Commandant of artillery and engineers; the officers, non-commiſſioned officers, and ſoldiers; the officers and men in the ſervice of the marine; Citizen Pierre Alphonſo Guys, Commiſſary General of the Commercial Relations of the French Republic in Syria and Paleſtine, accidentally at Malta with his family; thoſe employed in the civil and military departments; the commiſſaries of war and the navy; the civil adminiſtrations; the members of the conſtituted authorities; ſhall carry off their arms, their perſonal effects and properties, of whatever kind they be.—Anſ. Agreed to, with the exception of the arms depoſited by the ſoldiers conformable to that provided by the firſt article. The non-commiſſioned officers ſhall be allowed to keep their ſabres.

III. All thoſe who have carried arms during the ſiege, in the ſervice of the French Republic, of whatever nation they may chance to be, ſhall be conſidered as part of the garriſon.—Anſ. Agreed.

IV. The diviſion ſhall be embarked at the expence of his Britannic Majeſty; each ſoldier or other perſon ſhall receive, during the voyage, the rations ſuch as are diſtributed to each rank according to the laws and regulations of France. The officers, members of civil adminiſtrations, who go to France, ſhall enjoy the ſame treatment, themſelves and their families, ſimilar to the military whoſe ranks correſpond with their functions.—Anſ. Agreed, conformably to the cuſtom of the Britiſh marine, which diſtributes the ſame ration to every individual, of whatever rank and condition he be.

V. A ſufficient number of carts and boats to tranſport and put on board the perſonal effects of the generals, their aid de-camps, the commanders of corps, the officers, Citizen Guys, the adminiſtrators, civil and military, by land and ſea, as well as the papers of the councils of adminiſtration of the corps, thoſe of the commiſſaries of war, paymaſters of diviſions, and others employed in civil and military adminiſtrations. Theſe effects and papers ſhall not be ſubjected to any ſearch or inſpection, under the guarantee given by the ſtipulating generals, that they do not contain any property public or private.—Agreed.

VI. The veſſels of whatever kind belonging to the Republic, capable of going to ſea, ſhall leave Malta at the ſame time with the diviſion, to return to the ports of France, after being furniſhed with the neceſſary proviſions.—Anſ. Refuſed.

VII. The ſick able to ſail ſhall be embarked with the diviſion, and provided with proviſions, medicines, ſurgeons inſtruments, effects, and officers of health neceſſary for their treatment, during the voyage. Thoſe unable to go ſhall be treated in the moſt proper manner; the General in Chief leaving in Malta a phyſician and a ſurgeon, in the ſervice of the Republic, to take care of them; they ſhall be furniſhed with lodgings, gratis, when they leave the hoſpital, and ſent to France when their health permits, in the ſame manner as the garriſon. The generals in chief, by land and ſea, in evacuating Malta, depend upon the faith and humanity of the Engliſh generals.—Anſ. Agreed.

VIII. All the individuals, of whatever nation they are, inhabitants of the iſle of Malta, or the others, ſhall not be troubled, diſturbed, nor moleſted for their political opinions, nor for any thing done during the time Malta has been in the power of the French government. This article to apply particularly to all thoſe who have borne arms, or who have filled civil or military employments. They ſhall not be called to an account in any reſpect.—Anſ. This article does not appear to belong to a military capitulation; but all the inhabitants who deſire to ſtay, or thoſe permitted to continue, may be aſſured they ſhall be treated with juſtice and humanity, and enjoy the full protection of the laws.

IX. The French who inhabit Malta, and all the Malteſe, of whatever rank they are, that would follow the French army and go to France with their properties, ſhall have that liberty.—Thoſe who have moveables or immoveables that cannot be ſuddenly ſold, and who have the intention of reſiding in France, ſhall be allowed ſix months from the date of the capitulation to diſpoſe of their properties. Their properties ſhall be reſpected: they may act by themſelves if they remain, or employ an agent if they go with the diviſion. When they have finiſhed their buſineſs in a proper time, they ſhall be furniſhed with paſſports to go into France, taking with them the moveables that ſhall remain, as well as their money or bills of exchange received for their goods.—Anſ. Granted by the anſwer of the preceding article.

X. As ſoon as the capitulation is ſigned, the Britiſh General ſhall leave entirely to the diſpoſal of the French general a felucca with the neceſſary crew, and an officer to carry the capitulation to the French government. He ſhall furniſh the ſafe-conduct neceſſary.—Anſ. Granted.

XI. When the articles of capitulation are ſigned, there ſhall be granted to the Britiſh General, the gate called Des Bombes, which ſhall be occupied by a guard of an equal number of French and Britiſh. Theſe guards ſhall not allow any of the beſieging troops to paſs into the town, nor any of the inhabitants of the iſland, until the French troops embark and are out of ſight of the port: and during the time of the embarkation, the Britiſh troops ſhall occupy the poſts that give admiſſion to the forts. The Britiſh muſt be ſenſible that theſe precautions are indiſpenſible to prevent any diſpute, and that the articles of capitulation be faithfully preſerved.—Anſ. Granted conformably to the anſwer of the firſt article, and all precautions ſhall be taken to prevent the armed Malteſe from approaching the poſts occupied by the French troops.

XII. All alienations or ſales of moveables or immoveables whatever by the French government during the time it poſſeſſed Malta, and all tranſactions between individuals, ſhall be inviolably maintained.—Anſ. Granted to ſuch as are juſt and legitimate.

XIII. The agents of the allied powers that are found in Valette at the reduction of the place ſhall not be be diſturbed, and their perſons and properties ſhall be guaranteed by the preſent capitulation.—Anſ. Granted.

XIV. All veſſels of war or commerce coming from France with the flag of the republic, and that offer to enter the port, ſhall not be conſidered as good prizes, nor the crew made priſoners, during the firſt twenty days that follow the date of the preſent capitulation, and they ſhall be ſent to France with a ſafe conduct. Anſ. Refuſed.

XV. The General in Chief and other generals ſhall embark with their aides-de-camp, the officers attached to them, as well as the commiſſioners and their ſuite, without being ſeparated.—Anſ. Granted.

XVI. The priſoners made during the ſiege, including the crews of the William Tell and the Diana, ſhall be conſidered and treated as the garriſon; the crew of La Juſtice taken in returning to one of the ports of the republic, ſhall be conſidered in the ſame light.—Anſ. The crew of the William Tell is already exchanged; that of the Diana ſhall be tranſported to Minorca to be exchanged immediately.

XVII. All that are in the ſervice of the republic ſhall not be ſubject to any act of repriſals of any nature, under my pretext whatever.—Anſ. Granted.

XVIII. If any difficulty occurs on the terms and conditions of the capitulation, they ſhall be interpreted in the ſenſe moſt favourable to the garriſon.—Anſ. Granted, according to juſtice.

Captain Martin, commander of the veſſels of his Britannic Majeſty, and his allies before Malta.

Copy of a Letter from Captain George Martin, of his Majeſty's Ship Northumberland, to Evan Nepean, Eſq. dated off St. Paul's, the 5th of September, 1800.

As my Lord Keith is now at Mahon, and it may be ſome time before he has an opportunity of communicating with their lordſhips, I have the honour to encloſe a copy of my letter to his Lordſhip, giving an account of the ſurrender of the French garriſon of La Valette, and one of the 29th of Auguſt, acquainting him of the capture of La Diane French frigate.

I am, Sir, &c.
George Martin.

Northumberland, off Malta,
5th of September, 1800.

I have the honour to acquaint you, that the French garriſon of La Valette ſurrendered yeſterday to the allied forces ſerving at Malta, and to encloſe a copy of the articles of capitulation.

I have not yet been able to obtain an account of the ordnance and ſtores in the garriſon; the moment it can be procured I will tranſmit it to your Lordſhip

I incloſe a liſt of the ſhips and veſſels found in the harbour.

I have the honour, &c.
George Martin.

The Right Honourable Lord Keith, K. B.
Commander in Chief, &c.

A liſt of veſſels found in the harbour of La Valette, when the place capitulated.

L'Atenian Malteſe ſhip of 64 guns, in good condition.
Le Dego Malteſe ſhip of 64 guns, not in a ſtate to proceed to ſea.
La Cartagenoiſe Malteſe ſhip of 64 guns, not in a ſtate to proceed to ſea.
Two merchant ſhips, wanting repair.
One brig, fit for ſea.
One zebeck and two other ſmall veſſels.
Five or ſix gun-boats, not fit for ſervice.

Northumberland, off St. Paul's,
29th Auguſt, 1800.

I have the honour to acquaint you, that the frigates La Juſtice and La Diane ſailed from the harbour of La Valette on the night of the 24th, and were immediately purſued by his Majeſty's ſhips off that port; and that the latter, after a chace of ſome hours, and a running fight with the Succeſs, ſtruck to that ſhip, the Genereux, and Northumberland. La Juſtice, I am ſorry to add, eſcaped under cover of the night, and has not ſince been heard of.

La Diane mounts 42 guns, eighteen and nine pounders, but had only 114 men on board, having left the remainder to aſſiſt in the defence of the garriſon.—I have the honour to be, &c.

George Martin.

Copy of a Letter from Vice-Admiral Lord Keith, Commander in Chief of his Majeſty's ſhips and veſſels in the Mediterranean, to Evan Nepean, Eſq. dated Foudroyant, Gibraltar Bay, September 15, 1800.

Sir,

My letter of the 11th inſtant will have acquainted their Lordſhips of my having formed the reſolution of attempting attempting an enterprize againſt two armed veſſels, reported to be receiving ſtores in the Roads of Barcelona for the relief of Malta. I have now the ſatisfaction of informing you, that this ſervice has been very judiciouſly arranged by Captain Louis of the Minotaur, and moſt gallantly and ſucceſsfully executed by Captain Hillyer of the Niger, and Lieutenant Schomberg of the Minotaur, in the boats of theſe ſhips, as will appear by the report made to me thereon by Captain Louis, a copy of which is herewith encloſed. I have no doubt that their Lordſhips will juſtly appreciate the merits of the officers by whom this gallant and enterpriſing ſervice has been performed.

I have the honour to be, &c.

KEITH.

Minotaur, Sept. 6, 1800.

MY LORD,

Knowing how anxious and deſirous your Lordſhip was, as well as the ſervice to my country, by cutting out or deſtroying the two corvettes, lying in Barcelona Road, mentioned in your Lordſhip's orders to Captain Oliver; and, in order to check the two ſhips ſailing upon this intended ſecret expedition, induced me to perſevere in the following attemp:

On the evening of the 3d inſtant, after having delivered Captain Hillyer of the Niger his orders to join your Lordſhip, a breeze ſprung up from the weſtward, with every appearance of a cloſe night. I again called him on board, with the ſignal at the ſame time to prepare boats. Captain Hillyer and Lieutenant Schomberg volunteered their ſervice, aſſiſted by Lieutenants Warrand, Lowry, Lientenant Healy of the Niger, Mr. Reid, Maſter and Lieutenant Jewell of the Marines. The boats left the Minotaur about eight o'clock in the evening. The firing began from all quarters near nine: about ten o'clock I had the pleaſing ſatisfaction to ſee two ſhips dropping out of the road under a heavy fire from the ſhips, four ſtrong batteries, ten gun boats, and two ſchooners, with two forty-two pounders each; the fort of Mount Joui the ſame time throwing ſhells. the Minotaur and Niger were well placed in good ſeaſon to cover the party. The ſervice was performed thoroughout with an enterpriſing ſpirit, good conduct, and in a gallant ſtyle. The loſs, which I ſhall inform your Lordſhip, of killed and wounded fell principally upon two boats, not great, when compared to the ſituation, the number of boats, and ſo many men were placed in for a conſiderable time. The ſhips about eleven o'clock were perfectly clear from the fire of the enemy's batteries and gun boats, the men of war checking the movements of the latter: the ſhips captured, named Conception alias Esmiralda, and La Paz, about four hundred tons, each mounting twenty-two braſs guns, twelve and nine-pounders, laden with proviſions and ſtores, &c. &c. ſuppoſed for Batavia, and on Dutch account: they were to have taken three hundred troops of the regiment of Batavian Swiſs on board from the iſland of Majorca. I found ſeveral Dutch officers on board the Esmiralda. The officers and ſeveral of the men of La Paz, during the action quitted her in boats. La Paz is a very fine ſhip, quite new, never at ſea before, ſails remarkably well, and I make no doubt your Lordſhip will find her in all reſpects calculated for his Majeſty's ſervice; the Eſmiralda is alſo a very fine ſhip. I beg leave ſtrongly to recommend to your Lordſhip's notice Captain Hillyer and Lieutenant Schomberg; their ſervices upon this occaſion deſerve the firſt attention and higheſt praiſe; at the ſame time I cannot paſs without notice the general good conduct of every officer and man ſerving under my command. I herewith ſend the liſt of killed and wounded.

I have the honour to be, &c. &c.

THOMAS LOUIS.

Vice-Admiral Keith, Commander in Chief, &c. &c.

Liſt of Killed and Wounded.

Extract of a Letter, dated Malta, Oct. 16. 1800.

On the 5th September the French ſurrendered this garriſon to us. The 6th and 7th was employed in embarking them on board ſhips for France. Both officers and privates could only be compared to ſo many convaleſcent men coming out of an hoſpital; and from their own account it would not have been ſurpriſing had they all died for want, as for two months before their only allowance was, to the officers four ounces of aſſes fleſh, the ſame of bread, and half a pint of wine per day, and the privates four ounces of bread, half a pint of oil and one pint of water per day each. The garriſon is by nature one of the ſtrongeſt in the world. The walls are ſolid rock, and the cannon holes are drilled through it. No ſhot could make the ſmalleſt impreſſion on it. There were 1000 cannon mounted, 700 of which are braſs, from 24 to 64 pounds. There are 16 planted at the two principal gates, 92 pounders. From the whole ſtate of the garriſon it would be impoſſible to take it without treachery or famine. It is ſcarcely poſſible for any ſhot to do injury to the fort or hurt a man in it, the whole being one entire rock and as level as a bowling green.

Since we have ſent off the French, we have almoſt nothing to do, but to eat, drink and ſleep. Each man's allowance per week, is 7lb. beef, 10½lbs. bread, 5 quarts and half a pint wine, and 2lbs. flour.

Our ſtock of proviſions at preſent is equal to maintain at the above rate, 7000 men, though we ſhould receive no ſupplies for three years: but there is ſcarcely a day paſſes but we are getting ſupplies from Sicilly, and we have always plenty of fiſh, fowl, butter, eggs, potatoes and flour, which are brought us by the natives; butter is 1s. per lb. Dutch weight, eggs 4d. per dozen, a cock 8d. a hen 6d. cod fiſh 2d. and ling 3d. per lb. flour 3d. and wine 5d. per Engliſh quart; potatoes are the deareſt article, being a halfpenny per lb.

they are the largeſt I have ſeen, weighing 3 lb. each, and indeed much ſtronger than ours in Ireland.

The natives are very happy at being under the government of his Britannic Majeſty, as he gives liberty of conſcience to all ſorts of people to follow whatever religion they are bred to, and ſo as they are of the church of Rome they are happy at getting leave to follow it, and 10,000 of them have taken the oath of allegiance, and offered to our General to go and fight the French wherever they are, and all are in arms to keep the iſland for his Brittanic Majeſty.

MAN, ISLE OF, ENGAGEMENT OFF. Situated in the Iriſh ſea, in 4 degrees and 30 minutes weſt longitude, and between 50 and 54 degrees and 25 minutes north latitude. The uninterrupted ſeries of ill fortune which, in the year 1758, attended on the French arms, made the court of France at length think ſeriouſly of making a deſcent on Britain. Several ſquadrons were equipped at Breſt (an account of the operations of which, to avoid repetition, we ſhall refer to in the article BELLEISLE) the next at Toulon (ſee LAGOS), and the third at Dunkirk, which we have given an account of under the article CARRICKFERGUS, where by miſtake, Lieutenant Benjamin Hall is called James Hall; and the number of non-commiſſioned officers left behind was eighty-three, and not three as there mentioned. The cup preſented Lieutenant Hall had the following inſcription:

"The Mayor and Corporation of Carrickfergus, preſent Lieutenant Benjamin Hall, of the ſixty-ſecond regiment of foot, with his Freedom and this Cup, in token of their gratitude and reſpect for his military ſkill, bravery, and attention to their ſecurity in the year 1760.

MANILLA, ISLAND OF, TAKEN IN 1762. The Philippine Iſles lie in the Chineſe Ocean, part of the Pacific Ocean, 3000 miles ſouth-eaſt from China, of which Manilla, or Luconia, the chief, is 400 miles long, and 200 broad. The inhabitants conſiſt of Chineſe, Ethiopians, Malays, Spaniards, Portugueſe, Pintadoes, or painted people, Meſtees, a mixture of all theſe. It is obſervable, that the features of the blacks of theſe iſlands are as agreeable as thoſe of the white people. Manilla, lying between the eaſtern and weſtern continents, was once eſteemed the beſt ſituation in the world for trade. Two veſſels ſailing yearly to Acapulco in Mexico, loaded with the riches of the eaſt, returned, as they do at this day, freighted with ſilver, and make 400 per cent. profit. Nor is there a ſoil in the world that produces greater plenty of all things neceſſary for life, as appears by the multitude of inhabitants found in the woods and mountains, and only ſubſiſted by the fruits of the earth, and the veniſon they take. Nor can any country in the world appear more beautiful; for there is a perpetual verdure; and buds, bloſſoms, and fruit, are found upon the trees all the year round, as well on the mountains, as in cultivated gardens. Vaſt quantities of gold are waſhed down from the hills by the rains, and found mixed with the ſand of their rivers. There are alſo mines of other metals, and plenty of cattle of all ſorts. Theſe iſlands being hot and moiſt produce a number of venomous creatures, as the ſoil does poiſonous herbs and flowers, which not only kill thoſe that touch or taſte them, but ſo infect the air, that many people die in the time of their bloſſoming. They are alſo ſubject to terrible earthquakes: by one that happened in 1643, a third part of the city of Manilla was overthrown, and no leſs than 3000 people periſhed in the ruins. All theſe iſlands, except Mindanao, are ſubject to the crown of Spain, ever ſince the reign of Philip II. in honour of whom they have their name. The Spaniſh viceroy reſides at Manilla, and lives in the ſtate of a ſovereign prince; and it is ſaid to be one of the moſt profitable governments in the gift of that King.

The following journal of the taking of this place, was ſent home by Brigadier-General Draper, commander in chief of the land forces.

The troops allotted for this enterprize were the 79th regiment, and a company of the royal artillery. The auxilliaries, furniſhed by the gentlemen at Madras, conſiſted of 30 of their artillery, 600 ſepoys, a company of Caffres, one of Topazes, and one of pioneers; to which they added the precarious aſſiſtance of two companies of Frenchmen, enliſted in their ſervice, with with ſome hundreds of unarmed Laſcars for the uſe of the engineers and park of artillery. As a compenſation for this feeble ſupply of men, they favoured us with ſome very good officers in every branch of the ſervice. Rear-Admiral Corniſh reinforced our little army with a fine battalion of 450 ſeamen and 270 good marines; ſo that the whole force for the land operations, amounted to 2300 men, who, with the neceſſary ſtores, were embarked on board of his Majeſty's ſquadron, and two India ſhips employed as tranſports, with an activity and diſpatch that did great honour to all concerned in thoſe arrangements. The preparations were begun, completed, and ſhipped, in three weeks, through a raging and perpetual ſurf, by which ſome lives were loſt.

As Major-General Lawrence was of opinion that the ſettlements would be in danger if more forces were drawn from the coaſt, the two battalions of the Company's troops, all the cavalry, 6000 ſepoys, with the part of Colonel Monſon's, and the Highlanders, then at Madras, were left for their ſecurity. The Medway, York, and Chatham, that were hourly expected, had orders left for them to remain for the protection of the trade. We ſailed with the Admiral's diviſion the 1ſt of Auguſt. The Seahorſe, Captain Grant, was previouſly diſpatched through the Straits of Malacca to the entrance of the China Sea, to ſtop all veſſels that might be bound to Manilla, or ſent from any of our neighbouring ſettlements to give the Spaniards notice of the deſign. Commodore Tiddyman, with the firſt diviſion of the fleet, and troops under Colonel Monſon, ſailed two days before us, that our watering might be more ſpeedily completed at Malacca, where we arrived the 19th of Auguſt. We there bought up a large quantity of rattans to make gabions, a good number of which was finiſhed on board the ſeveral ſhips. The 27th we ſailed for our ſecond rendezvous off the iſland of Timon. The neceſſary ſignals and inſtructions were then given for landing on the coaſt of Luconia.

On

The Gallant Action off the Isle of Man, where the brave Cap.t Elliott defeated Thurot, 28.th of Feb.y 1760.

On the 23d of September we anchored in Manilla bay, and ſoon found that our viſit was unexpected; the Spaniards unprepared. To increaſe as much as poſſible the viſible confuſion and conſternation of the enemy, we determined to loſe no time in the attack of the port of Cavite that was at firſt intended, but proceed directly to the grand object, judging that our conqueſt there would of courſe occaſion and draw after it the fall of Cavite. On the morning of the 24th, we ſent an ineffectual ſummons to the town, and, with the Admiral and other principal officers, examined the coaſt, in order to fix upon a proper ſpot for landing the troops, arillery, and ſtores. We found a moſt convenient place about two miles to the ſouth of Manilla. Accordingly, all the boats were immediately prepared by the proper ſignals; and three frigates, the Argo, Captain King; Seahorſe, Captain Grant; and Seaford, Captain Peighin; were ſent in very near the ſhore to cover the deſcent. The 79th regiment, the marines, a detachment of artillery, with three field pieces, and one howitzer, fixed in the long boats, aſſembled in three diviſions under their ſterns; the left commanded by Colonel Monſon, quartermaſter-general; the right by Major Moore, the eldeſt field officer. As we had determined to land near a church and village called Malata, that was oppoſite our left, the other two diviſions, which had been ſeparated only to amuſe and diſtract the attention of the enemy, were ordered to join that as ſoon as poſſible. About ſix in the evening we puſhed, with an even front, for the ſhore, under the prudent and ſkilful management of the Captains Parker of the Grafton, Kempenfelt, the Admiral's captain, and Brereton of the Falmouth, who had the direction of the boats. The frigates kept up a briſk fire to the right and left of us, to protect our flanks, and diſperſe the enemy, who were beginning to aſſemble in great numbers, both horſe and foot, to oppoſe our deſcent. This cannonade had the deſired effect. They retired, and left us a clear coaſt. But a violent ſurf aroſe, many boats were daſhed to pieces, our arms and ammunition much damaged; providentially no lives were loſt. We formed upon the beach, marched, and took poſſeſſion of the Malata, fixed our outpoſts, and paſſed the whole night under arms. The Spaniards were employed in burning part of their ſuburbs.

The 25th we ſeized a fort which the Spaniards had abandoned, named Polveriſta, that proved a moſt excellent place of arms for covering the landing of our ſtores, and ſecuring our communication with the ſquadron. Colonel Monſon, who was detached with 200 men to view the roads and approaches to Manilla, occupied the Hermita church, large and commodious, about 900 yards from the city. We made the prieſt's houſe the head quarters; ſent orders to Major Moore to march up with the 79th regiment to ſecure and maintain this poſt, which was of the utmoſt conſequence, both for its ſtrength, and the great cover it afforded us from the rains that had deluged the country, and made it impoſſible to encamp: for we too ſoon found that the monſoon had broke upon us. The ſurf continued dangerous; the rains increaſed; the landing our artillery and ſtores became very hazardous; our remaining troops were put on ſhore with much peril, and ſome loſs; Lieutenant Hardwick was drowned. But the courage and activity of the ſeamen ſurmounted all obſtacles. They got on ſhore part of the ſepoys, ſome proviſions, and ſuch ſtores as were firſt wanted, and by ſignals demanded from the ſquadron; the officers of which were indefagitable in giving us all poſſible aſſiſtance: and Captain Jocelyn, who was entruſted with the care of the diſembarkation, did every thing that could be wiſhed or expected from a diligent good officer. We left the marines at our poſt, the Malata, to be near the Polveriſta, to preſerve our communication, and guard our ſtores and park of artillery. The men, from the good conduct and example of their officers, behaved very well, and were of great uſe upon all occaſions. As the rains had forced us to ſeek the protection of the houſes that were under the fire of the baſtions, the Spaniards cannonaded our quarters, which were much nearer the walls than the uſual rules of war preſcribe. They attempted likewiſe to burn more of their ſuburbs, but were prevented by the great activity and good conduct of Captain Fletcher, major of brigade, and Captains Stevenſon and Cotsford, the engineers; who having advanced under the cover of the houſes to St. Jago's church, near the ſea, and within 300 yards of the town, reported its importance ſo ſenſibly, that we poſted a body of men there, notwithſtanding its contiguity to their baſtions. The enemy ſoon fired upon us, but not with perſeverance or effect enough to diſlodge us. We had ſome few men killed and wounded.

The 26th, the Admiral ſent on ſhore the battalion of ſeamen, under the command of Captains Collins of the Weymouth, Pitenford of the America, and George Ourry from the Panther. They were cantoned between the 70th regiment and the marines. The reſt of the Company's troops of all ſorts, were likewiſe landed and put under cover. The Spaniards advanced out of the garriſon, under the command of the Chevalier Fayett, with 400 men, and two field pieces; and from a church, about 200 yards to the right of that we yeſterday took poſſeſſion of near the ſea, began a cannonade upon the right flank of our poſt. Some ſepoys, under Enſign Carty, who behaved very well, were ſent to ſkirmiſh with them, ſupported by three piquets of the 79th regiment, and 100 ſeamen, all under the command of Colonel Monſon, who ſoon drove the enemy back into the town. In their precipitate flight, one of the field pieces was left upon the glacis.

The ſuperior ſkill and bravery of our people were ſo evident from this affair, that it occaſioned a ſecond ſummons to the Governor, but to no purpoſe: the anſwer was much more ſpirited than their conduct had been. Colonel Monſon had orders to keep poſſeſſion of this ſecond church (if he found it tenable); for as we had not men enough, or dry ground to make regular approaches, we were forced into theſe meaſures, raſh as they ſeem, and contrary to all rules of our profeſſion, by our critical ſituation. From the top of this poſt, which we called No. 2, we had a perfect view of the enemy's works. The front we were obliged to attack, was defended by the baſtions of St. Diego and St. Andrew, with orillons and retired flanks, a ravellin which covered the royal gate, a wet ditch, covered way, and glacis. The baſtions were in excellent order, lined with a great number of braſs cannon; but their ravelin was not armed, the covered way out of repair, the glacis by much two low, and the ditch was not continued round the capital of the baſtion of St. Diego, which determined us to attack it, and make our diſpoſition accordingly. The negligence and omiſſion of the enemy to poſt centries in the covered way, gave us an opportunity of founding the ditch, which perilous enterprize was effected by a ſmall party of the 79th regiment, under Captain Fletcher, who begged leave to undertake it. The Spaniards fired from their baſtion, and killed or wounded three of our people. The depth of the water was only five feet, the breadth about 30 yards.

As the great extent of this populous city made it utterly impoſſible to inveſt it with our handful of men, two ſides were conſtantly open to the Spaniards to introduce ſupplies of men and proviſions, and carry out their effects. They availed themſelves of our weakneſs. Their own garriſon of 800 men of the royal regiment, under the command of the Marquis of Villa Medina, brigadier-general, was augmented by a body of 10,000 Indians from the province of Pampanga, a fierce and barbarous people. Theſe diſadvantages were not to be remedied, as we could not take poſſeſſion of Minondono, Tondo, and La Vera Cruz, the poſts which commanded the river and communication with the country. The inundations had ſecured their Parian ſuburb: but no difficulties could check the ardour of the troops, who laboured inceſſantly in making faſcines and gabions, and preparing every thing for the conſtruction and opening of our batteries. One for ſmall ſhells was completed this night, and played upon the baſtion of St. Diego. Its poſition was behind the church neareſt the ſea, called No. 1. The officers of the artillery and engineers exerted themſelves in a manner, that nothing but their zeal for the public ſervice could have inſpired.

The 27th, the Governor ſent out a flag of truce, to apologize for ſome barbarities committed by the ſavages lately mentioned, who had murdered ſome ſtraggling ſeamen; and to requeſt that a nephew of his, taken in the bay, might be ſent on ſhore. This gentleman had been diſpatched from the Philippina galleon, juſt arrived on the coaſt from Acapulco, with the firſt advices of the war. Hoſtilities ceaſed till eleven at night, when we recommenced our fire from the mortars, increaſed them to four, and placed a ſix-pounder on our left flank, as a further ſecurity for our poſt at St. Jago's church. As the capture of the galleon and her treaſure, might be well eſteemed a national object, Mr. Corniſh propoſed ſending the Panther and Argo from the ſquadron to intercept her, which was conſented to; and the officers of the navy very generouſly agreed to our ſharing any prizes that might be taken in this cruize, as we had before conſented to their ſharing with us in any booty that might be taken on land; and the diſtribution to be made according to the rules his Majeſty fixed for the ſea ſervice. The Admiral likewiſe ſent on ſhore eight 24-pounders, ſhip guns, and two 18-pounders, for our battering train; as, to ſave time, we brought only the land carriages and platforms from Madras.

The 28th, the Governor's nephew was landed. My ſecretary, Lieutenant Fryar, was ordered to conduct him into the town with a flag of truce. In the meantime a large party of the garriſon, intermixed with Indians, ſallied out to attack our ſecond poſt, No. 2, by which Lieutenant Fryar was advancing to the ravelin gate. The barbarians, without reſpecting his character, inhumanly murdered him, mangling his body in a manner too ſhocking to mention. In their fury they mortally wounded the other gentleman who had endeavoured to ſave Mr. Fryar. Our party received their onſet with much firmneſs and bravery, and repulſed them with ſome loſs on their ſide. As it was evident that the Indians alone were guilty of this horrid piece of barbarity, our ſoldiers ſhewed them no mercy.

The 29th, the Admiral, at my requeſt, ordered the Elizabeth, Commodore Tiddyman, and the Falmouth, Captain Brereton, to place themſelves as near the town as the depth of water would permit, and ſecond our operations by enfilading the front we intended to attack; but the ſhallows kept them at too great a diſtance to anſwer the purpoſe effectually, though their ſhot cauſed much confuſion and terror to the inhabitants. We continued our bombardment day and night.

The 30th, the engineers traced out Admiral Corniſh's battery for eight 24-pounders, on the left of St. Jago's church; but the violence of the rains retarded our progreſs; and the abſence of two ſhips, that had on board a conſiderable quantity of faſcines, and many of our working and intrenching tools, put us to ſome inconveniences. The Admiral's goodneſs ſupplied theſe defects. All the ſmiths and carpenters in the fleets were employed in making thoſe inſtruments; and by their induſtry and diſpatch, we were enabled to proceed. The Elizabeth and Falmouth perſevered in their cannonade upon the town, which was returned from the enemy's ſea-line without any effect.

October 1ſt and 2d, the weather grew ſo very tempeſtuous, that the whole ſquadron was in danger, and all communication with it entirely cut off. The violence of the ſtorm forced the South-Sea Caſtle ſtore-ſhip (which was lately arrived) from her anchors, and drove her on ſhore. Even in this ſituation the ſhip was of great uſe. Captain Sherwood enfiladed the whole ſea beach to the ſouthward, and kept in awe a large body of Indians, who menaced the Polveriſta, and our magazines at the Malata. Notwithſtanding the deluge of rain which accompanied the wind, by the perſeverance of the troops and ſeamen, we completed the battery for the 24-pounders, raiſed a mortar battery for the heavy ſhells of ten and thirteen inches, made a good parallel and communication from the church to the gun battery, and eſtabliſhed a ſpacious place of arms on the left of it, near the ſea. The roaring of the waves prevented the enemy from hearing the noiſe of our workmen in the night. They gave us no interruption, but ſeemed to truſt entirely to the the elements. While the Governor (the Archbiſhop) gave out, that an Angel from the Lord was gone forth to deſtroy us like the hoſt of Sennacherib. On the afternoon of the 2d, the ſeamen, with wonderful activity, brought up and mounted all the guns in the battery, which we maſked.

The 3d, the weather became moderate. At daylight the battery was opened againſt the left face of the baſtion of St. Diego, towards the ſalient angle. One hundred ſeamen were appointed to aſſiſt the corps of artillery in this ſervice. Our cannon, by the moſt excellent ſkill and management of Major Baker, and the officers under him, were ſerved with ſuch juſtneſs, quickneſs, and dexterity, that the twelve pieces on that face of the baſtion were ſilenced in a few hours, and the Spaniards drove from them. We had but two men killed.

At night we began a battery for three guns on the left of our place of arms, to ſilence thoſe that were in barbet upon the orillon of the baſtion of St. Andrew, which annoyed our flank. We maintained a briſk fire of grape and muſketry all night, to prevent the enemy from repairing their embrazures, and remounting the cannon. The mortars (now augmented to ſeven) were kept conſtantly playing upon the gorge of the baſtion, and the contiguous defences.

The 4th, about three hours before day, 1000 Indians attacked the cantonment of the ſeamen. They were encouraged to this attempt by the inceſſant rains, in which they flattered themſelves our fire-arms would be uſeleſs. Their approach was favoured by a great number of thick buſhes that grew upon the ſide of a rivulet, which they paſſed in the night, and, by keeping cloſe, eluded the vigilance of our patroles. Upon the alarm, Colonel Monſon and Captain Fletcher, with the piquets, were diſpatched to the aſſiſtance of the ſeamen, who very ſenſibly kept firm in their poſts, and were contented to repulſe them till day-break, when a freſh piquet of the 79th regiment appearing upon the Indians right flank, they fled, were purſued and diſperſed with the loſs of 300 men. Had their ſkill or weapons been equal to their ſtrength and ferocity, it might have coſt us dear. Although armed chiefly with bows, arrows, and lances, they advanced up to the very muzzles of our pieces, repeated their aſſaults, and died like wild beaſts, gnawing the bayonets. This attack coſt us ſome few men; but we loſt a moſt excellent ſea officer, Captain Porter, Lieutenant of the Norfolk, ſincerely and juſtly lamented by us all. We had ſcarce finiſhed this affair, when another body of them, with part of the Spaniſh garriſon, again attacked the church, No. 2, forced the Sepoys from their poſt in it neareſt the town, took poſſeſſion of the top, from whence they killed and wounded ſeveral of our people, who were entirely expoſed to all their weapons. Notwithſtanding this diſadvantageous ſituation, the European ſoldiers maintained their poſt behind the church with great firmneſs and patience, and at laſt diſlodged the enemy with the aſſiſtance of ſome field pieces, and the good conduct of Major Fell, field-officer of the day, Captain Fletcher, and other brave officers ſent to their relief. The Spaniards left ſeventy dead behind them, in and about the church. On our ſide Captain Strahan, of the 79th regiment, a very good officer, was mortally wounded, and forty private men killed and wounded. This was the enemy's laſt effort. All their Indians, excepting 1800, diſcouraged by their loſſes, returned home. Our working parties, and the fire of our batteries, which had been a little interrupted by theſe attacks, recommenced with greater ſpirit than ever. We found likewiſe the good effects of giving the enemy no time to repair their embrazures or carriages in the night. They opened only an inconſiderable fire from three or four embrazures in the curtain, too oblique to have much effect. Before night thoſe defences were ruined.

The 5th, Major Barker's fire was ſo violent, that the breach appeared practicable. Our cannon from the three gun battery, ſilenced thoſe of the enemy on the orillon of St. Andrew. We were in hopes that the Spaniards would be ſenſible of their danger, and think of giving up the town, but they were obſtinate without bravery, or any generous reſolution of defending the breach. In the evening, the deſign of ſtorming the place was communicated to the principal officers of each department only, and the neceſſary preparations made.

The 6th, at four in the morning, we filed off from our quarters, in ſmall bodies, to give the leſs ſuſpicion, and by degrees aſſembled at St. Jago's church, obſerving the utmoſt ſilence, and concealing ourſelves in the place of arms, and the parallel between the church and the battery. Major Barker kept up a briſk fire upon the works, and thoſe places where the enemy might be lodged or intrenched. Our mortars were well applied for the ſame purpoſe. At day-break we diſcerned a large body of the Spaniards formed on the baſtion of St. Andrew, which gave us reaſon to imagine they had got ſome information of our deſign, and intended to annoy us with their muſketry and grape from the retired flank of that baſtion, where they had ſtill two cannon placed; but upon the exploſion of ſome ſhells that fell among them they went off. We took immediate advantage of this, and by the ſignal of a general diſcharge of our artillery and mortars, ruſhed on to the aſſault, under cover of a thick ſmoke that blew directly upon the town. Sixty volunteers of different corps under Lieutenant Ruſſel of the 79th, led the way, ſupported by the grenadiers of that regiment. The engineers, with the pioneers and other workmen, to clear and enlarge the breach, and make lodgements, in caſe the enemy ſhould have been too ſtrongly intrenched in the gorge of the baſtion, followed. Colonel Monſon and Major Moore, were at the head of two grand diviſions of the 79th; the battalion of ſeamen advanced next, ſuſtained by the other two diviſions of the 79th; the Company's troops cloſed the rear. They all mounted the breach with amazing ſpirit and rapidity. The few Spaniards upon the baſtion diſperſed ſo ſuddenly, that it was thought they depended upon their mines. Captain Stevenſon had orders to make a ſtrict ſearch to diſcover them; but our precautions were needleſs. We met with little reſiſtance, except at the royal gate, and from the galleries of the lofty houſes which ſurrounded the grand ſquare. In the guard-houſe over the royal gate, 100 of the Spaniards and Indians, who would not ſurrender, were put to the ſword. Three hundred more, according to the enemy's account, were drowned in attempting to eſcape over the river, which was very deep and rapid. The Governor and principal officers retired to the citadel, and were glad to ſurrender as priſoners at diſcretion, as that place was in no good poſture of defence. Captain Dupont of the 79th, with 100 men, took poſſeſſion of it. The Marquis of Villa Medina, with the reſt of the Spaniſh officers, were admitted as priſoners of war on their parole of honour: and to conciliate the affections of the natives, all the Indians who fell into our hands were diſmiſſed in ſafety. Our joy upon this fortunate event, was greatly clouded by the loſs of Major Moore, who was tranſfixed with an arrow near the royal gate, and died immediately, univerſally lamented for his good qualities. Captain Sleigh, of the grenadiers, and ſome other good officers were wounded. We had about thirty private men killed or wounded. In conſequence of the terms dictated to the Spaniards, the port of Cavite and citadel, with ſeveral large ſhips, and a vaſt quantity of warlike and naval ſtores, were ſurrendered to us. Captain Champion, with 100 marines, and as many Sepoys, embarked on board the Seahorſe to take poſſeſſion of it. The Spaniſh garriſon of 300 men, on the approach of our people, mutinied againſt their officers, plundered ſome houſes, and went off into the country with their arms.

As a ſmall acknowledgement of the great ſervices which the whole army had received from Captain Kempenfeldt, the Admiral's Captain, I begged he would act at Cavite with a commiſſion as Governor for his Majeſty, being well aſſured that no one could diſcharge that truſt with more conduct and abilities."

Admiralty-Office, April 19, 1763.

Copy of a Letter from Vice-Admiral Corniſh to Mr. Cleveland, dated in the Bay of Manilla, the 31ſt of October, 1762.

It is with the greateſt pleaſure I have the honour to acquaint their lordſhips with the ſucceſs of his Majeſty's arms in the reduction of the city of Manilla, which was taken by ſtorm on the morning of the 6th inſtant. In my letters of the 23d and 31ſt of July, I acquainted their lordſhips with my proceedings to that time; after which I uſed every poſſible means at Madras for diſpatch, the declines of the S. W. monſoon making it of the utmoſt importance. To promote this end, I completed the Elizabeth, Grafton, Lenox, Weymouth, and Argo, with ſuch of the troops and military ſtores, as they were to take on board, and on the 29th ſent them away under the command of Commodore Tiddyman, to proceed to Malacca, with a view that they might complete their water there, by the time I ſhould arrive with the remainder of the ſquadron.

Having accompliſhed the embarkation of every thing deſigned for the expedition, with a diſpatch much beyond my expectation, as we had from the whole time of my being there a violent ſurf to contend with, I ſailed the 1ſt of Auguſt with the ſhips undermentioned, viz. Norfolk, Panther, America, Seaford, South-Sea Caſtle ſtoreſhip, Admiral Stevens ſtoreſhip, Oſterly Company's ſhip, leaving the Falmouth, at the requeſt of the preſident and council, to convoy the Eſſex India ſhip, who was not ready to ſail, having the treaſure to take on board for the Chineſe cargoes, and to bring to Manilla ſuch of the Company's ſervants as were to be put in poſſeſſion of that government, if the expedition ſucceeded.

The 19th, I arrived at Malacca, and was diſappointed in not finding Mr. Tiddyman there, who did not join till the 21ſt, having met with long calms. The difficulty of watering the ſquadron at this place, made it the 27th before I could leave the road.

On the 2d of September, I arrived off Pulo Timean, and was joined by Captain Grant, in the Seahorſe, whom I detached, upon my firſt arrival at Madras, to cruize between this iſland and the Straits of Sincapore, to ſtop any veſſels he might ſuſpect going to Manilla.

On the 19th I made the coaſt of Luconia, but was drove off again by a ſtrong N. E. wind, which ſeparated ſome of the ſquadron. The 22d the gale broke up, and the wind ſhifted to the S. W. the 23d, we recovered the land again; the next day entered the bay of Manilla, and in the cloſe of the evening, anchored off the fort of Cavite with the whole ſquadron, except the South-Sea Caſtle and Admiral Stevens, the Falmouth and Eſſex having joined me off the coaſt. In the night I ſent the maſters to ſound about the fortifications of Cavite, and by their report, found that it might be attacked by ſhips.

The 25th in the morning, the wind not being favourable to attack the Cavite, I took two of the frigates, and with General Draper, and ſome other officers, reconnoitred the ſhore about Manilla, and obſerved ſome churches and other buildings, to ſtand near the works on the ſouth ſide of the town, particularly towards the S. W. baſtion. We had ſome deſign of attacking Cavite firſt, to have had the convenience of that port for the ſhipping; but conſidered, that though the attack ſhould be attended with all the ſucceſs we could hope, yet it would cauſe a delay at leaſt of two days before we could land at Manilla, which time would afford opportunity to the enemy to demoliſh theſe buildings near their works, and to prepare many obſtacles to our landing, and perhaps recover from that conſternation our unexpected arrival had thrown them in; and farther, Manilla being the capital, if that fell, Cavite would in conſequence.

From thoſe conſiderations, I joined in opinion with the General to take advantage of circumſtances ſo favourable for a deſcent, and land the troops with all diſpatch, and endeavour to get poſſeſſion of ſome poſts near their works, which, if effected, would greatly facilitate the reduction of the city.

In conſequence of theſe reſolutions, I immediately made the ſignal on board the Seahorſe for the ſquadron to join me, and for the troops to prepare to land.

About

About ſeven in the evening, the 79th regiment, with the marines in the boats, under the direction of the Captains Parker, Kempenfeldt, and Brereton, puſhed for the ſhore; and under the fire of the three frigates, effecting the landing at a church called the Malata, about a mile and a half from the walls. We had no oppoſition from the enemy, but ſome difficulty from the ſurf which ran high, and bilged all the long boats, but happily loſt no men.

The next morning the General took an advanced poſt about 200 yards from the glacis, and there, under cover of a blind, intended his battery againſt the face of the ſouth-weſt baſtion. The number of troops being ſmall, I landed a battalion of ſeamen, conſiſting of about 700 men, under the command of the Captains Collins, Pitchford, and George Ourry.

The 25th I diſpatched three armed boats after a galley coming up the bay to Manilla; they came up with her, reſolutely boarded her, and took her, notwithſtanding ſhe kept up a ſmart fire with patteraroes and muſkets: ſhe mounted two carriage and ſeventeen braſs ſwivel guns, and had eighty men. By letters found in her, we diſcovered ſhe was diſpatched from the galleon St. Philippina, from Acapulco, and whom ſhe had left the 10th of September at Cajaoagan, between the Embocadero and Cape Spiritu Santa. Upon this diſcovery, I came to a reſolution to ſend the Panther and Argo in queſt of her, but it was the 4th of October before the weather permitted their ſailing.

The 28th of September, the General acquainted me that he was beginning to work on the battery, and that if ſome ſhips could get near enough to throw ſhot on the works of the town oppoſed to it, it might take off ſome of the enemy's fire and attention, and thereby facilitate its conſtruction. In conſequence of this, I ordered Commodore Tiddyman, with the Elizabeth and Falmouth, towards the town, as near as the depth of water would permit, and to place the ſhips in ſuch a poſition, as would beſt anſwer the purpoſe intended; which was accordingly done the next day, and their fire had a very good effect.

On the 30th, the South Sea Caſtle arrived with ſtores, which were much wanted, particularly the intrenching tools, for want of which the army had been ſo greatly diſtreſſed, that I was obliged to employ all the forges in making ſpades, pickaxes, &c. for them. The 1ſt of October, it began to blow freſh, and in the night increaſed to a hard gale, which drove the South-Sea Caſtle aſhore near the Polveriſta, a little to the ſouthward of our camp. This accident, however, had ſome conſiderable advantages attending it, as the ſituation ſhe lay in made her cannon a protection for the rear of our camp. It was likewiſe the means that all her military ſtores were got on ſhore with ſafety and diſpatch, and the army ſupplied with the proviſions ſhe had on board, both of which were articles they ſtood in need of, and which could not have been ſupplied by boats, as it continued blowing weather for ſeveral days after, and the ſurf breaking very high on the beach.

This gale was from the W. S. W. directly on the ſhore, which gave me much concern for the ſafety of the ſquadron, particularly for the Elizabeth and Falmouth, who were only in four fathom water, and as I have ſince been informed, with the ſand of the ſea ſtruck; but the bottom being mud, and ſoft to a conſiderable depth, they received no damage. On the 4th in the morning, the General opened the battery, which was ſo well managed, and ſeconded by the ſhips before the town, that in four hours the defences were taken off, and the next day in the evening, the breach was made practicable.

On the 6th, at day-light in the morning, the General's regiment, with the ſea battalion, mounted the breach, made the attack, and ſoon got poſſeſſion of all the baſtions, which completed the conqueſt. I immediately went on ſhore, and with the Spaniſh Governor and ſome of his principal officers, when a capitulation was agreed on, that the town and port of Cavite, with the iſlands and forts dependant on Manilla, ſhould be given up to his Britannic Majeſty; and that they ſhould pay 4,000,000 of dollars for the preſervation of the town and their effects.

On the 10th, I ſent Captain Kempenfeldt in the Norfolk, with the Seaford and Seahorſe, to take poſſeſſion of Cavite, agreeable to the capitulation. By this acquiſition, we are in poſſeſſion of a very large quantity of naval ſtores; and beſides the advantage of almoſt every conveniency for refitting a ſquadron, the people are ſupplied with freſh meat and vegetables in great plenty.

The ſiege, though ſhort, was attended with many difficulties and great fatigue, in which both the officers and men exerted themſelves with the utmoſt cheerfulneſs. We had conſtantly freſh gales, a lee-ſhore, and conſequently a ſurf to contend with; which always made it difficult, frequently hazardous, and ſometimes impoſſible to land with boats. The rains fell very heavy, and our little army were ſurrounded and haraſſed by numerous bodies of Indians, who, though undiſciplined, and armed only with lances, bows, and arrows, yet, by a daring reſolution and contempt of death, they became not only troubleſome, but formidable. I have the ſatisfaction of acquainting their lordſhips, that, throughout the whole expedition, the moſt perfect harmony and unanimity has ſubſiſted between his Majeſty's land and ſea forces.

It is with concern I acquaint their lordſhips with the loſs of Commodore Tiddyman, who, in attempting to enter the river in his barge, the morning after the reduction of Manilla, was drowned with five of his people; by which unhappy accident his Majeſty has loſt a brave and experienced officer.

Captain Kempenfeldt, by whom I ſend this (and who will preſent to you, for their lordſhips, a plan of the town of Manilla and the port of Cavite) has been of the greateſt aſſiſtance to me, during the courſe of this enterprize. He is very capable of furniſhing their lordſhips with many particulars neceſſary for their information; and his great merit makes it my duty to recommend him as a very able good officer.

I am, &c.

Copy of a Letter from Vice-Admiral Cornish to Mr. Cleveland, dated in the Bay of Manilla, the 10th of November, 1762.

In my letter of the 31ſt of October, I acquainted you of my having ſent Captain Parker, with the Panther and Argo, in queſt of the galleon St. Philippina, from Acapulco, bound to Manilla.

The 7th inſtant, Captain King, in the Argo, returned with a letter from Captain Parker, acquainting me, that, in conſequence of my orders, having the 30th of October got the length of the iſland Capul, near the entrance into the Embocadero, in purſuit of the St. Philippina, where the Argo had come to an anchor (and which he intended to do for that night) juſt as the day cloſed, ſaw a ſail ſtanding to the northward; at eight in the evening he got ſight of the chaſe about two leagues to leeward; but unluckily by the rapidity of a counter-current to what the chaſe was in, was drove among the Narangos, in the utmoſt danger of being loſt, and obliged to anchor; the frigate, having eſcaped the danger, got up with the chaſe, and engaged her near two hours; but was ſo roughly handled, that Captain King was obliged to bring to, to repair his damages. By this time the current ſlackened, which enabled Captain Parker to get under ſail with the chaſe in ſight: about nine the next morning he came up with her, and, after battering her two hours within half muſket ſhot, ſhe ſtruck. The enemy made but little reſiſtance, truſting to the immenſe thickneſs of the ſides of their ſhip, which the Panther's ſhot was not able to penetrate, excepting her upper works. Captain Parker was no leſs diſappointed than ſurpriſed, when the General came on board, to find that, inſtead of the St. Philippina, he had engaged and taken the Santiſſima Trinidad, who departed from Manilla the firſt of Auguſt for Acapulco and had got 300 leagues to the eaſtward of the Embocadero; but meeting with a very hard gale of wind, was diſmaſted, and put back to refit. She had 800 men on board, and pierced for ſixty guns; but when Captain King engaged her had only ſix mounted, and but thirteen when taken. She draws thirty-three feet water, and is a much larger ſhip than the Panther. I cannot aſcertain the value of the cargo, but there is to the amount of one million and a half of dollars regiſtered, and ſhe is reputed to be worth three millions.

Captain King left the Panther with her prize at an anchor, about three leagues ſouth of the Corrigedow, at the mouth of this bay; and, as I have ſent a reinforcement of men with launches and warps, I hope very ſoon to have them in ſafety.

I am, &c.

MANGALORE, an ill built town ſituated in the Eaſt Indies. This place was taken by the Engliſh, on the 6th of March 1783. In which a great quantity of artillery fell into the hands of the Britiſh general; and the defeat was deemed of ſo deciſive a nature, as to remove all apprehenſions of any future diſturbance of any material importance under Tippoo Saib.

The ſucceſs on this occaſion was aſcribed, principally to the prudence of the Britiſh general in advancing o the enemy, and giving them battle at the very period when the death of Hyder Ally was publicly known, and the ſpirit of defection in conſequence of it univerſally diffuſed. See TELLICHERRY, EAST-INDIES, SERINGAPATAM, &c.

MANHEIM. The capital city of the Elector of Bavaria, was taken by the French in the beginning of September, 1795, under General Pichegru. Capitulation as follows:

Art. I. The city and fortreſs of Manheim ſhall be at the diſpoſition of the French, with all its ammunition, magazines, and artillery. Theſe ſhall be reſtored to the Elector Palatine in the ſame condition, when a peace is concluded.

II. The garriſon ſhall march out in twenty-four hours, with their arms and baggage.

III. The magiſtrates and miniſters of public worſhip ſhall not be diſturbed in their functions.

IV. The priſoners of war ſhall be mutually reſtored.

V. The Duke of Deux Ponts, and his miniſters, ſhall either remain in the city or depart at their pleaſure.

VI. The Palatine countries ſhall be conſidered as neutral, and of courſe not liable to any contributions or requiſitions.

This laſt article was agreed to by the repreſentatives, but on this condition, that the Palatine countries, into which the army of the Sambre and Meuſe had entered by force of arms, ſhould not be included in this exemption.

They found in Manheim 6000 quintals of corn, 400 ſacks of oats, &c. There were in the place 200 pieces of cannon, with ammunition in proportion.

The bombardment of Manheim, during the ſhort time it continued, was dreadful. The French, in ſixteen hours, threw 3000 bombs into the town, and about 5000 bombs, granades, &c. into the fort of the Rhine and the fleches. Of the Imperial and Palatine troops, however, only ten men were killed, and thirty-ſeven wounded; and of the town's people, four killed and nineteen wounded. Thirty-ſix houſes were almoſt demoliſhed, and the palace of Prince Maximilian, of Deux Ponts, has ſuffered conſiderably. The eldeſt ſon of this Prince was wounded, but not dangerouſly, by the ſplinter of a ſhell. In the fort of the Rhine and the fleches, were about 150 cannon, but moſt of theſe were brought away in time. The ſurrender of the fort, though a loſs to the German empire, was abſolutely neceſſary to the preſervation of the town of Manheim, which, by the fire of the French, had it continued a week, muſt have been reduced to a heap of aſhes, and the fort and out-works muſt at laſt have been ſurrendered.

From the camp before Manheim, Nov. 11.

Early yeſterday morning we again attacked the enemy on the road to Schwezingen, and drove them from the gardens; but their batteries opened ſo warm a fire upon us, that we were obliged to quit the moſt advanced houſes. Major Taſchner was killed in this affair; however, the reſult was our approaching nearer to the place, place, and our works go on with alacrity: we expect the battering cannon to-morrow, when the ſiege will commence.

This evening we diſcovered a French camp of 60,000 men, under General Pichegru, on the other ſide of the Rhine. The right of that army reſts againſt the Rhine-fort, which is ſtrongly garriſoned; the left wing reaches to Worms. Count Clairfayt is poſted with his army in the mountains at a little diſtance from Pichegru, to whom he is endeavouring to give battle. The French ſtill defend Manheim obſtinately, and that unfortunate city will probably ſhortly be only a heap of ruins. Part of our army will ſhortly join that under Clairfayt, jointly to attack Pichegru; for the fate of Manheim can only be decided by a battle.

Since the actions on the 10th and 11th, the field was bravely diſputed on both ſides, but in which the Auſtrians only gathered freſh laurels. Field Marſhal Clairfayt having ſucceſsfully directed his operations againſt that wing of General Pichegru's army, which was protected by Manheim, immediately diſpatched Major, now Colonel Williams, to the head-quarters of General Wurmſer, with orders to treat the beautiful city of Manheim with the utmoſt ſeverity. The Field Marſhal therefore began the moſt terrible bombardment upon that city, which commenced between five and ſix o'clock in the evening of the 10th, and laſted till four o'clock the next morning. It was repeated on the night of the 11th, and ſo terrible was its effect, that perſons who were at that time in Frankfort, ſay, that the flames illuminated the whole horizon, ſo that the conflagration could even be diſcovered in that city.

Diſpatch from the General of Diviſion, Baraguay D'Hilliers, Chief of the Staff.

At day break on the 18th September, 1795, the Auſtrian army, 30,000 ſtrong, commanded by Prince Charles in perſon, attacked the French troops, conſiſting of not more than 5000 infantry, and 300 cavalry. His attack commenced at the village of Neckereau, defended by General Vandermarck. Every thing that bravery and diſcipline could effect, was done by the gallant troops under his command for ſix hours. Three times was the city taken and retaken at the point of the bayonet; but the ſuperiority of the enemy in number having enabled him to turn the right of the republican troops, they were forced to retire into the works in the rear, between Neckerau and Manheim. The enemy, after attacking the right ſucceſſively, attacked the centre and the left with two ſtrong columns and a great quantity of artillery, and marched a third column along the right bank of the Rhine. In conſequence of theſe attacks, ſeveral intrenchments in an imperfect ſtate were carried though bravely defended by General Laſal. Notwithſtanding the arrival of the 16th battalion, we were obliged to evacuate Manheim, to which the enemy had penetrated from all ſides.

Nov. 23, 1795.—The Commandant of Manheim having, the night before laſt, ſent out an officer to General Wurmſer to propoſe terms for the ſurrender of the place, a capitulation was concluded, by which it was agreed that the garriſon ſhould march out with the uſual honours, lay down their arms on the glacis, and become priſoners of war.

As ſoon as the capitulation was ſigned, the Auſtrian troops occupied the out-works, and two of the gates of the town, viz. the Heidelberg and Rhine gates.

The garriſon marched out this morning, and the place was taken poſſeſſion of by General Wurmſer, in the name of his Imperial Majeſty, after a ſiege of only 12 days of open trenches.

The French troops, which by this event became priſoners of war, conſiſt of ten half brigades, or thirty battalions of infantry, a proportionate corps of artillery, ſappers, miners, &c. and a ſquadron of huſſars, making in the whole 4 generals, 389 officers, and 9949 non-commiſſioned officers and privates.

The incloſed liſt of the garriſon of Manheim is a corroborating proof of the truth of the information that is received from all quarters upon the ſubject of deſertion, as, of 10 half brigades or 30 battalions of infantry, which if complete ought to amount to 30,000 men, the actual ſtrength is only 8372. Their officers acknowledge that they have long ſince ceaſed to receive any recruits.

State of the French garriſon of Manheim, at the time of its ſurrender.

Capitulation propoſed by the General of Diviſion Montaign, commanding the French troops at Manheim, to General Count de Wurmſer, commanding the Auſtrian troops before that town.

Article I. General Montaign ſhall deliver up the fortreſs of Manheim to the Count de Wurmſer, on the of November, with the warlike ſtores and artillery therein, and in the ſtate in which they now are.—Anſ. The fortreſs ſhall be delivered up on the 23d of November.

II. The French troops ſhall march out of Manheim, with with their arms and baggage, as ſoon as the means ſhall be arranged for their paſſing to the left ſide of the Rhine; in all caſes they ſhall march on the of November, and take the route which ſhall be agreed upon between the two Commanding Generals.—Anſ. The French garriſon ſhall be priſoners of war: they ſhall march out of the place on the 23d of November, with the honours of war, and ſhall lay down their arms on the glacis at nine o'clock in the morning: they ſhall take the route which ſhall be directed by General Count de Wurmſer.

III. The troops of his Majeſty the Emperor, under the command of Count de Wurmſer, in two hours after the exchange of the capitulation, ſigned by the two Commanding Generals, ſhall take poſſeſſion of the fort at the head of the bridge of the Necker; of the outpoſts of the gate of Heidelberg, and of the redoubt of the Rhine, before the gate of l'Ecluſe; and they ſhall not enter into the town till the laſt diviſion of the French troops have marched out.—Anſ. After the ſigning of the capitulation, the Auſtrian troops ſhall take poſſeſſion of the outworks of the gate of Heidelberg and of the gate of the Rhine, to-morrow, the 22d of November, at eight o'clock in the morning.

IV. The carriages neceſſary for the tranſport of the effects belonging to the Republic, or to the corps and individuals compoſing the garriſon of Manheim, ſhall be furniſhed to them upon paying for the ſame by agreement, according to the orders of the Count De Wurmſer, on the roads by which the French troops ſhall paſs.—Anſ. The carriages neceſſary for the tranſport of the effects and property belonging to the French officers ſhall be furniſhed to the French troops at the rate uſual in the country. Whatever belongs to the nation ſhall be delivered up to the Auſtrian commiſſaries.

V. The Count de Wurmſer ſhall give orders for furniſhing the neceſſary forage in the places where the French troops ſhall paſs, and which the garriſon may not be able to provide at Manheim; as alſo four days proviſion for the French troops, to be computed from the day of their departure from thence.—Anſ. Care ſhall be taken to furniſh bread to the troops. The officers, who ſhall be deſirous of keeping their horſes, may purchaſe forage, which ſhall be delivered to them by the conductors, as the current price.

VI. The ſick remaining in the hoſpital of Manheim ſhall be taken care of by the officers of health of the French army, who ſhall remain in the place till its entire evacuation; for whom the neceſſary carriages ſhall be provided to the neareſt town in the poſſeſſion of the French troops. General Montaign relies upon the humanity of the Count de Wurmſer that they will be ſupplied with every aſſiſtance neceſſary for their recovery.—Anſ. The ſick ſhall be treated with humanity, which is never refuſed in ſuch caſes: but they ſhall be attended by Auſtrian ſurgeons. After their recovery they ſhall remain priſoners like the other troops.

VII. An officer of engineers of the French army ſhall deliver to an Auſtrian officer, the plans, maps, and other effects which the French engineers have received ſince their entry into Manheim.—Anſ. This article ſhall have effect as ſoon as the Auſtrian troops occupy the two above-mentioned gates; and it is to be underſtood that all military effects are to be delivered up, ſuch as artillery, magazines, plans, maps, &c. for which purpoſe Auſtrian officers of the engineers and artillery ſhall be ſent into the town on the 22d of November, at eight o'clock.

VIII. The Regency, magiſtrates and inhabitants of the town of Manheim ſhall not be proceeded againſt in any manner on account of the former ſurrender of that town to the French.—Anſ. This article depends entirely on the pleaſure of his Imperial Majeſty.

IX. When the day is fixed for the garriſon to march out of Manheim, a ſtaff officer of the Auſtrian army, accompanied by a ſtaff officer of the French army, ſhall precede the troops, in order to give the neceſſary orders for their march, and for providing quarters, until their arrival on the territory occupied by the troops of the republic.—Anſ. Anſwered by the ſecond article.

X. As ſoon as the capitulation is ſigned by the two Commanding officers, the Count de Wurmſer ſhall furniſh an officer of the French army with a paſſport to enable him to carry an account of the preſent capitulation to General Pichegru.—Anſ. The reports made by General Montaign ſhall be ſent to General Pichegru.

Manheim, Nov. 21, 1795.

(Signed) MONTAIGN.

Additional articles to the capitulation propoſed by General Montaign, commanding the French troops at Manheim, to General Count de Wurmſer, commanding the troops of his Imperial Majeſty.

Article I. The garriſon ſhall have no covered carriage, and reference ſhall be had to the fourth article, by which all military effects, without any exception whatever, ſuch as cheſts, ammunition, horſes, cloathing, proviſions, are to be ſpecified, and faithfully delivered up to the Auſtrian officers and commiſſaries appointed for that purpoſe.

II. Until the execution of the preſent capitulation, reciprocal hoſtages ſhall be given, viz. a field officer and a captain ſhall be exchanged to-morrow morning at ſeven o'clock.

III. To-morrow morning the French Commanding officer ſhall make known the number of carriages that are wanted, and before the garriſon ſhall march out he ſhall deliver a return of his troops.

The garriſon ſhall give up the Auſtrian deſerters.

Manheim, Nov. 21, 1795.

(Signed) MONTAIGN.

One third of that beautiful city has been deſtroyed, and one half much damaged. It is added, that 22,000 balls, and 1600 bombs were thrown into it.

The French garriſon, priſoners of war, marched out of Manheim on the 23d for Heidelberg and Ulm, on their way to Tyrol, among whom were four generals, and 389 officers. The privates were permitted to carry their knapſacks, &c. The magazine left in the place was very reſpectable. The French garriſon loſt 500 men during the ſiege, and upwards of 200 inhabitants were killed.

The French Commandant requeſted a paſs for a ſtaff officer officer to be ſent to General Pichegru, to inform him of the ſurrender of Manheim, which was refuſed, though an account in writing was to be ſent him by the Imperial General.

All the ammunition, artillery, the military cheſt, proviſions, charts, plans, &c. are given up to the Auſtrians.

In May, 1800, General Prince Hohenlohe having received diſpatches from General Szarray, on the 11th inſtant, in the morning, quitted this city with his ſtaff, and part of the Imperial troops. Major General Count Frenel alſo quitted us, with the remainder of the Imperial troops, and marched towards Ulm. The poſitions which they left were afterwards occupied by a diviſion of Szekler huſſars, and ſome troops of Mentz.

This morning at three o'clock the French croſſed the Rhine near Sandhofen, and directed a ſevere muſquetry fire againſt the German troops ſtationed on the oppoſite banks of the Neckar.

At two o'clock in the afternoon the following capitulation was concluded between the French General Thuring and the Imperial Commandant of the city, Captain Sztenkereſty:—

Article I. Hoſtilities ſhall ceaſe until ſix o'clock in the morning of the 15th.

II. The Auſtrian Commandant may withdraw at that hour, or ſooner if he chooſes, and the French will enter the city.

III. The property of the Elector and of private individuals, the ſafety and liberty of the inhabitants ſhall be reſpected.

IV. The civil adminiſtration in the city and the palatinate ſhall remain in force.

V. All religious ſects ſhall enjoy the full and free exerciſe of their rites.

VI. The city and country ſhall be exempted from all contributions and requiſitions.

To article 1. the French General anſwered:—"On account of the able defence made by the Imperial troops, they ſhall march out at the Heidelberg gate, without being priſoners of war."—To article 6. "Conſidering the diſaſters which the city of Manheim has ſuffered during the preſent war, it ſhall remain free from all contributions. The offer of ſupplying the army with 500 ſhirts, and as many pair of ſhoes, is accepted, and muſt be fulfilled this day. The magazines, ammunition, cannon, arms, and baggage, belonging to the Imperial army, become the property of the republic. The money belonging to the Elector ſhall be delivered into the treaſury of the army, againſt a receipt, to prevent fraud. If, after mature conſideration, any of the articles of the preſent capitulation ſhould be found inſufficiently expreſſed, it ſhall be decided in favour of the French republic.

MANS, SIEGE OF. A city of France, and capital of the territory of Le Maine, in the province of Orleanois, ſituated on the river Sarte. William Rufus, or II. of England, during his reſidence on the continent, in the year 1097, ineffectually endeavoured to recover the territory of Le Maine by force of arms, from Helie de la Fleche, who had ſeized that province, on pretence of ſome agreement with Robert Duke of Normandy, before he ſet out for Paleſtine, 1097.

The Manceaux declared for La Fleche, and guarded their paſſes in ſuch a manner, that William could not enter their country, ſo that a kind of piratical war was maintained, until William's general, Robert Beleſme, had the good fortune to take Helie in an ambuſcade. The King having ſecured this enterprizing officer at Rouen, raiſed a great army of Bretons, Flemings, Burgundians, Normans, and Engliſh, in hopes of reducing the province without further oppoſition; but he met with a formidable antagoniſt in the perſon of Fulk Rechen, Count of Anjou, of whom Helie held the county in vaſſalage, and was obliged to have recourſe to an expedient, which he had practiſed with ſucceſs on other occaſions. In a word, he purchaſed a treaty of peace, by which he was reſtored to the poſſeſſion of Le Maine, in conſideration of ſetting Helie at liberty, with all the priſoners he had taken. The town of Mans was immediately ſurrendered to William, and the nobility of Le Maine took the oath of allegiance. Helie offered his ſervice to the King, who was at firſt inclinable to engage ſuch an active warrior in his intereſt, but he was diſſuaded by Robert, Count of Meulan, his chief counſellor, who, perhaps, was jealous of Helie's talent, and this laſt ſeeing his offer rejected, told William, that ſince he had no occaſion for his ſervice, he could not blame him for attempting to recover the poſſeſſions he had loſt. The King replied, that he might act as he ſhould thing proper, and granted him a ſafe conduct to La Fleche, which he fortified without delay. Not that he committed any act of hoſtility while William tarried in Normandy, but when he returned to England, Helie ſeized the firſt opportunity to renew the war.

Having firſt ſecured the favour of the Manceaux, he appeared with ſome troops before Le Mans, and provoked the Norman garriſon to make a ſally, in which they were routed; then entering the city pell mell with the fugitives, he was received with loud acclamations by the inhabitants, though the caſtle ſtill held out. A courier diſpatched by Robert de Beleſme, with an account of this ſurpriſal, found William hunting in the New-foreſt, and he no ſooner received the intelligence, than calling aloud to his attendants, "You that love me follow me," rode directly to the ſea-ſide near Dartmouth, where he found a veſſel ready to ſail. His nobility adviſed him to ſtay till a ſquadron could be drawn together, but he abſolutely refuſed to make any delay, and going on board the veſſel, obliged the maſter to put to ſea in foul weather, for this wiſe reaſon, "That he never heard a king of England was drowned." Next morning he landed at Barfleur, whence he poſted with the troops he had in Normandy to Bonneville, and marched to the relief of his garriſon in the caſtle of Le Mans with ſuch expedition, that Helie was obliged to raiſe the ſiege and retire precipitately to Chateau de Loir.

William then inveſted Majol, in hopes of taking the place by aſſault, in which he received ſuch a blow from a ſtone, as had very nearly deprived him of his life. In conſequence of this accident, he deſiſted from the enterpriſe, and having ravaged the country, returned to England.

There are ſome writers, who commend his haſty departure to the relief of Mans, as an action worthy admiration and imitation; but there are others, with better judgment, that call it neither prudent nor honourable, as expreſſing rather an intemperate courage, than any ſober reſolution of maintaining his dignity, which would have been better provided for by keeping a navy in conſtant readineſs.

MANS SURPRISED. Henry II. King of England, very narrowly eſcaped being taken in this city, in the year 1188. He was quartered here with 700 knights, and a ſmall body of forces, when Philip II. King of France, unexpectedly wheeled about, and marched directly to Mans. The ſudden appearance of the enemy threw Henry's followers into ſuch confuſion, that Stephen de Tours, ſenechal of Anjou, ſetting the ſuburbs on fire, the flames were allowed to ſpread over the walls, and occaſion a conflagration in the city. Geoffrey de Bouillon, endeavouring to ſtop the progreſs of the enemy, by breaking down a ſtone bridge, built over the river, was attacked, wounded, and taken priſoner; and his men flying in diſorder, were purſued by the French to the city, which they entered along with them pell mell. Henry ſeeing it impracticable to rectify the diſorder occaſioned by the fire and the enemy, retired with his troops towards Frenelles, leaving thirty knights, and twice that number of ſoldiers, in the caſtle of Le Mans, which, after having been battered three days, was obliged to ſurrender.

MANTUA, was inveſted by the French in 1796. July, 14th the ſiege of Mantua has been carried on with uncommon vigour. The beſieging army was increaſed to 50,000 men; thirty mortars and ninety pieces of cannon played inceſſantly upon the town, in conſequence a great number of both public and private buildings have been deſtroyed; 100 bombs have taken effect in different parts. General Maſſena covers the ſiege on the ſide of the Tyroleſe frontier with a force of 28,000 men. Much confidence is notwitſtanding entertained by the garriſon that the enemy will yet be obliged to raiſe the ſiege, as ſuch is the excellency of the conſtruction of the caſemates that the troops are perfectly defended from the effect of the burſting ſhells, and the place is moreover extremely well ſupplied with every neceſſary.

Letter from General Bonaparte to the Executive Directory.

Head Quarters at Caſtiglione, 4th Thermidor, July 22.

Citizens Directors,

On the 28th (July 16), at two in the morning, 1500 men from the garriſon of Mantua made a ſally from the Gate of Cereſe, while 3000 more made a ſally from that of Pradella. All the advanced poſts fell back. The enemy advanced to within piſtol ſhot of our batteries, which they hoped to carry; but the brave 5th battalion was poſted there. Generals Fiorella and Dallemagne drew up their troops in order of battle; and watching a favourable opportunity, attacked the enemy, threw them into diſorder, and, after an action of two hours, drove them back to the palliſades of the town. The enemy loſt from 5 to 600 men.

On the following day, I intended to ſend 800 grenadiers in boats to take poſſeſſion of one of the gates of the town; but the water having fallen, in the ſpace of twenty-four hours, more than three feet, it was not poſſible for me to carry my plan into execution.

On the 18th, at eleven at night, General Serrurier ordered General Murat, and Adjutant-General Vignolle, with 2000 men, to attack the right of the enemy's intrenched camp; while General Dallemagne, at the head of a ſtrong column, attacked the left. Andreoſſy, Colonel of Artillery, an officer of great merit, with five gun boats, gave a falſe alarm to the enemy; and while the whole fire of the place was directed againſt him, General Dallemagne and Murat fulfilled their inſtructions and carried diſorder and terror into the enemy's ranks. Chapeloupe, Colonel of Engineers, during this time, directed the opening of the trenches within eighty toiſes of the town, and under a fire of grape-ſhot from the ramparts. At the ſame inſtant, the batteries of St. George, Pradella, and La Favourite, the two firſt mounting ſix pieces of heavy cannon, firing red-hot balls, and ſix large mortars; the laſt eight pieces of cannon, deſtined to break off all communication between the town and citadel, began to play againſt the fortreſs. Ten minutes after the town was on fire in every part. The cuſtom houſe, the palace of Colloredo, and ſeveral convents were reduced to aſhes. At the break of day, when the trenches were but imperfectly traced, the enemy, under cover of a dreadful fire from the ramparts, collected their forces, and attempted to make a ſally; but our intrepid ſoldiers, concealed in ravines, behind banks, and in every hole, which could afford them protection from the enemy's fire, waited for them with firmneſs, and in ſilence. This circumſtance alone diſconcerted the enemy, who returned to the town.

The following night the trenches were completed, and I hope our batteries will be mounted, and ready to fire.

I ſhall not ſpeak of the conduct of the intrepid General Surrurier, whoſe military reputation is eſtabliſhed, and to whom we are indebted, among other things, ſince the beginning of the campaign, for the victory of Mondovi. Brigadier Chapeloupe, of the engineers, Colonels Samſon, and Meuron exhibit daily proofs of ability, activity, and courage, which give them a title to the gratitude of the army, and of their country.

All the troops diſplay a degree of patience, conſtancy and courage, which embolden me to project the moſt deſperate undertakings.

Colonel Duput, who commands the 5th battalion of grenadiers, is the ſame man who firſt paſſed the bridge of Lodi. Annexed hereto, you will find the ſummons I ſent to the governor, with the governor's anſwer.

BONAPARTE.

Sum-

Summons to the Commandant of Mantua, from the General Staff.

Head Quarters, Caſtiglione, 4th Thermidor, July 22.

The General in Chief of the Staff, to the Lieutenant-General of the troops of the Emperor, command-in Mantua.

Marmizello, 30th Meſſidor (July 18.)

The General in Chief of the army of Italy charges me, Sir, to write to you, that, attacked on all ſides, you are not in a ſtate long to defend the city of Mantua; that an ill-timed obſtinacy would wholly ruin that unfortunate city; that the laws of war imperiouſly preſcribe the ſurrender of the city; and that if, contrary to his expectations, you ſhall make a long reſiſtance, you will be reſponſible for the blood which you will uſeleſsly ſhed, for the deſtruction and misfortunes of that noble city; which will force him to treat you with all the rigours of war.

(Signed) BERTHIER.

Reply to the Commander in Chief of the French forces in Italy.

The laws of honour and of duty compel me to defend, to the laſt extremity, the place entruſted to me.

I have the honour to be, with perfect eſteem and conſideration, Sir,

The General in Chief,

(Signed) BONAPARTE.

Diſpatches, of which the following are Copies, have been received from Colonel Graham.

Head Quarters of Field Marſhal Wurmſer's Army, Valeggio, Auguſt 1.

I have the honour to inform your Lordſhip, that the ſiege of Mantua is raiſed, the French having retreated laſt night with the utmoſt precipitation.

I can now ſend only a very haſty account of the operations of the Imperial army, which have been attended with ſuch ſignal ſucceſs. The great exertions the enemy were making againſt Mantua determined his excellency Field Marſhal Wurmſer to make diſpoſitions for attacking the enemy, without waiting for the arrival of further reinforcements. Accordingly, on the 28th ultimo, the different corps were aſſembled at their reſpective deſtinations, the army forming four diviſions, which were to advance, by the different paſſes, from the mountains of Tyrol. The firſt column, on the right of the Lago de Garda, under the orders of Lieutenant-General Quaſdanovich, was to march on Salo and Breſcia; the ſecond, commanded by Lieutenant-General Melas, between the Lake and the Adige, was to force all the enemy's ſtrong poſts on the Monte Baldo; the third was ordered to march, under the command of Lieutenant-General Davidovich, by the great road from Alla, and, being ſeparated only by the Adige from a part of the third diviſion, was to ſupport it, and join it as ſoon as a bridge could be placed between Dolci Rivoli; the fourth column under the command of Lieutenant-General Mezaros, was deſigned to turn the enemy's right flank, by marching from Baſſano on Legnago.

Early on the 29th the enemy was attacked on their whole line of poſts, and were every where driven. Lieutenant-General Quaſdanovich took 1000 priſoners at Salo, and marched on to Breſcia. General Melas attacked the poſt of Ferrara, on the ſummit of Monte Baldo, covered by an immenſe ravine; the troops croſſed it with the greateſt intrepidity, and drove the enemy from their intrenchments, batteries and redoubts; a part of his diviſion attacked with equal courage and ſucceſs; the narrow paſs of Brentano, between the mountain and the Adige. The artillery of the third diviſion ſupported this attack from the left bank of the river; and the ſame corps, which acted under the command of Lieutenant-General Sepotendorff, puſhed on along the right bank, and forced the important poſt of Rivoli, where the enemy's batteries commanded the paſſage of the river. In theſe attacks nine pieces of cannon and 1500 men were taken. The other diviſions advanced with little reſiſtance. On the 30th the two centre diviſions being united continued their march in different columns, on Caſtel Nuovo and Peſchiera; at the defiles of Campora and Cavaggione, the enemy were again driven, with loſs, from ſtrong poſitions, and in the night they retreated by Peſchiera.

Major-General Spiegel entered Verona, which the enemy abandoned. On the 31ſt Major-General Pittoni occupied Villa Franca, and the head quarters were fixed here without oppoſition; a corps of obſervation being left near Peſchiera, under the command of Major-General Bajolitz. Theſe well-concerted and rapid movements determined General Bonaparte to an immediate retreat acroſs the Po and the Mincio.

THOMAS GRAHAM.

Since I had the honour of writing to your Lordſhip yeſterday, the Field-Marſhal has received accounts from General Canto D'Irlas, commandant of Mantua, which ſtate, that the enemy, having maſked their retreat by continuing to fire as uſual on the place during the night, he could only ſend his cavalry in purſuit of them yeſterday morning, and that they had already brought in about 600 priſoners, among them a great number of artillerymen; that he was in poſſeſſion of all their mortars and cannon, amounting to about 140, with 190,000 ſhells and balls, and great quantitities of other ſtores of all kinds. The head quarters were removed here to-day; and the army will continue the purſuit of the enemy; but the exceſſive fatigue the troops have undergone, the difficulty of ſupplying them at firſt where no magazines could be previouſly formed, and the exceſſive heat of the weather, retard the progreſs of the army. No further report is yet received from Lieutenant-General Quaſdanovich.

THOMAS GRAHAM.

P. S. No reports having been as yet received from the different diviſions, I cannot mention the loſs of the Imperial army; but I am happy to be able to ſtate, from general information, that it is inconſiderable, in compariſon of what might have been expected from the difficulties that were ſurmounted.

Head Quarters, Guidizolo, Auguſt 4.

Field-Marſhal Wurmſer, with a view of aſſiſting the operations of Lieutenant-general Quaſdanovich, had ſent General Liptaye with an advanced guard, on the 2d, to Caſtiglione delle Steviere, from Goito to ſupport him.

General Liptaye had been forced to retire from Caſtiglione, and was nearly ſurrounded on the heights between it and Solforino. The cavalry diſengaged him, and the regiments forming as they came up, the affair became general, the Imperial troops maintaining their ground, notwithſtanding the great ſuperiority of numbers of the enemy, till night put an end to the combat. Too much praiſe cannot be given to thoſe regiments which were firſt engaged, and which ſuſtained, alone, the attack of three diviſions of the French army, nor to the cavalry, which repeatedly repulſed the French cavalry, conſiſting of 3000 horſe. The whole Auſtrian force engaged conſiſted of about 13,000 infantry and 1500 cavalry. All is quiet hitherto to-day, both armies remaining oppoſite to one another in the ſame poſition as yeſterday.

THOMAS GRAHAM.

Head Quarters, Valeggio, Auguſt 5.

The French army having yeſterday received very conſiderable reinforcements from the Milanois, and a ſtrong column from Bozolo and Marcadia, having advanced this morning by St. Martino towards Medoli, threatening the rear of the left wing of the Imperial army, which extended into the plain, the Field-Marſhal ordered that its front ſhould be changed, by being thrown back towards the high ground on which the right wing was poſted. During this movement the enemy attacked in great force on the high ground; and ſome of the battalions of the right wing having given way, fell in with thoſe of the left wing not yet poſted. This unfortunately created confuſion, and obliged the Field-Marſhal to retreat on this place. Lieutenant-General Mezaros, who was on his way from Borgoforte to join the army, arrived to-day at Goito. There are no accounts yet of Lieutenant-General Quaſdanovich, ſo that it is probable he is ſtill among the mountains, and the enemy being collected in ſuch force near the ſouth end of the Lago de Gardo, it will be very difficult for him now to form a junction that way.

(Signed) THOMAS GRAHAM.

Sept. 21. From the 11th to the 19th, the Auſtrians have been continually engaged with the French, and have repeatedly beat them. The French army, which was before Mantua, was repulſed as far as Peſchiera, with the loſs of 6000 men killed and wounded, beſides a number of priſoners, particularly horſe, of which eight ſquadrons were ſent into Mantua. General Angereau, accuſed and degraded by Bonaparte, is gone to Genoa. Generals Bertin, Serrurier, and Kilmaine, were killed; and General Maſſena wounded. General Bonaparte went to Milan to obtain ſuccours, and returned without being able to perſuade any one to follow him, except 1000 priſoners, whom he releaſed from the hands of juſtice.

Marſhal Wurmſer, after raiſing the blockade of Mantua, took poſt, with 15,000 men, at Borgo-forte, Borgo di St. Giorgio, and Mariana.

Sept. 22. The different letters, agree in ſaying that General Wurmſer, after the action of the 8th of September, at Baſſano, marched to Legnago, re-united himſelf to the garriſon of Mantua, and immediately after gave the French ſeveral battles, in which they beat and killed a great number of men. The firſt of theſe actions was on the 12th, near Ronco, and the laſt on the 14th, below Mantua. The latter was every where obſtinate and bloody; two French Generals were killed, General Maſſena was wounded, and retired with the reſt of his corps to Verona and Baſſano.

After the battle of Baſſano the Imperial army, in order to be more certain in effecting the project of a re-union with the fortreſs of Mantua, marched to Legnago. On the 11th of September, in the environs of that place, they had a very ſpirited action, when the French were beaten with the loſs of ſeven cannons and a great deal of baggage. General Wurmſer, after this ſucceſs, left a ſmall garriſon of 6 to 700 men at Legnago, and perſuaded the public that it was 6000 ſtrong. This garriſon had orders to amuſe the enemy, firſt by ſome reſiſtance, and afterwards in negociating a capitulation. They perfectly fulfilled this order, and obtained free permiſſion to go from thence to Trieſt, which exaſperated the enemy very much, who thought they were far more numerous.

However, General Wurmſer, after meeting with ſome reſiſtance on the road, arrived on the 12th of September at Mantua with his army, which cauſed great joy among the inhabitants. In the interval two battles were fought in the environs of that fortreſs; the firſt on the 14th, and the laſt on the 17th of September. The enemy were beat in them both: in that of the 14th our troops brought in ten cannon and fifteen priſoners to Mantua. On the 17th the enemy's General Maſſena, attempted to make an attack from the ſide of the bridge St. George, but was repulſed, and his corps wholly diſperſed, The number of French wounded at Verona only, were upwards of 4000: a great part were ſent to Breſcia.

January 5, 1797.

The following are the particulars of General Wurmſer's late fortunate ſortie, when he made a ſeizure of a vaſt quantity of proviſions. General Bonaparte had contracted with a Jew in this city for a great number of oxen, ſheep, hogs, &c. for the French army near Verona. The Jew, it ſeems, having communicated the knowledge of this bargain to a friend at Trieſte, this perſon gave information of the affair to the Auſtrian General Alvinzy, at Venice, who found means to apprize General Wurmſer of it, accompanied by ſuch intimations as enabled the Marſhal to make a ſortie on the day appointed, when he ſucceeded ſo far as to ſeize upon the whole of the convoy, together with the Jew, whom he conducted into the fortreſs.

Diſpatches were received from General Graham, who has been ſo long ſhut up with Field-Marſhal Wurmſer in Mantua. By accounts from Trent, we learn learn, that General Graham made his eſcape from Mantua in the ſortie which took place on the night of 29th of December, and arrived at Trent on the 4th of laſt month.

Notwithſtanding the numerous ſorties which Field-Marſhal Wurmſer had ſo gallantly and perſeveringly made, and which had been generally ſucceſsful, yet the garriſon was in conſiderable danger from a ſcarcity of proviſions.

Field-Marſhal Wurmſer, previous to his retreat into Tyrol, threw 15,000 freſh troops into Mantua, and withdrew from that fortreſs all thoſe battalions who ſerved in it during the ſiege. All the artillery and ammunition which the French had left before Mantua were removed into the fortreſs; the large park of artillery, however, of 100 pieces of cannoh, which the French had left at Borgo-forte on the Po, the Auſtrians could not get poſſeſſion of, as they had been thrown into the river.

General Provera, who was entruſted with the care of getting into Mantua a conſiderable quantity of proviſions, eſcorted by 10,000 men, attacked on the 9th of January at Beliaqua, General Angereau, and forced him to retreat. Another attempt the following day at St. Michel, near Verona proved leſs fortunate, and he was repulſed with loſs by the Republican General Maſſena. A freſh attack took place the 13th, on the ſame poſt. According to Berthier, the Auſtrians, after ſome ſlight advantages, were ſoon repulſed, but Bonaparte's account ſtates that the Republicans were compelled to fall back, while Provera threw a bridge over the Adige, oppoſite to Anguiari, and continued his march to Mantua, notwithſtanding the exertions of the various bodies that haraſſed his troops.

During theſe operations below Verona, General Alvinzy, at the head of the grand army compoſed of 25,000 men, attempted to penetrate on the ſide of Rivoli, between the Lake of Garda and the Adige. The firſt attack made on Corona the 10th failed, but on the 12th the French General Joubert was driven both from this poſt and that of St. Marco, and fell back behind Rivoli. Bonaparte, informed of this event, diſpatched all the troops he could collect to this quarter, and haſtened there himſelf from Verona. An obſtinate engagement enſued, the reſult of which was the poſſeſſion of the Heights of Marco once more by the Republicans, by which means the opening to the Auſtrian cavalry was cloſed up. Freſh actions were fought on the 14th and 16th, and Alvinzy ſucceeded in throwing into confuſion the left wing of the enemy; but while he proceeded with his victorious right to force the right wing of the French, Bonaparte, who had in the interim repaired to his left wing, retook the poſts from which it had been driven but a ſhort time before, and haſtening to his right again, made head againſt the Auſtrians at the very moment when they were preparing to ſurround his centre. A freſh engagement enſued, and victory declared in favour of the enemy.

General Alvinzy, confident of victory, had cauſed the heights below Rivoli, between the Adige and the Lake of Garda, to be occupied by 4000 men, for the purpoſe of cutting off the enemy's retreat. By this manœuvre all communication was at an end between the French army, Verona, and Peſchiera. The Auſtrians, in this poſition, made three ſucceſſive attacks on the intrenchments of Rivoli, and were as often repulſed. Bonaparte forced Alvinzy's right on the 15th, while Joubert and D'Hilliers re-took St. Marco. According to the enemy's ſtatement, 13,000 priſoners were taken in theſe actions; and if Bonaparte is to be credited, Alvinzy had no alternative but to ſave himſelf by flight, almoſt alone. If we are to rely on Berthier's account, the Auſtrians were retiring into the Tyroleſe in great confuſion.

In the mean time, General Provera, after loſing 2000 men in the actions at Anguiari, continued his march to Mantua, and arrived on the 15th before the ſuburbs of St. George. Miollis, who commanded at this poſt, being twice ſummoned to ſurrender, refuſed to give it up, and his reſiſtance furniſhed Bonaparte with an opportunity to haſten from Caſtelnuova, and to take poſſeſſion of all the points by which Provera could get the convoy into Mantua. Wurmſer made a ſortie on the ſide of La Favourite, to effect a junction with Provera, and a very hard-fought battle took place, which terminated in favour of the French. The Auſtrians, ſurrounded on all ſides, and completely worn out with their long march and the many actions in which they were previouſly forced to engage, ſurrendered priſoners of war, to the number of between 6 and 7000 men, with their convoy.

Men converſant in military affairs, allow that General Alvinzy's diſpoſitions were not only combined in a moſt judicious manner, but ſuch as ſhould have enſured him ſucceſs. It is ſuppoſed that ſome of his officers, with an infamous treachery which no language can ſufficiently ſtigmatiſe, communicated his plans to the enemy; and this is the more probable, as Bonaparte acknowledges that he was in poſſeſſion of them; though, to prevent ſuſpicion, he attributes this knowledge to his having intercepted ſome letters of the Auſtrian Generals.

The Paris papers repeat the preceding accounts, and contain the following capitulation, and the letter of General Berthier.

Capitulation entered into by the Imperial troops under the walls of St. Georgio, on the 16th of January.

Article I. The honours of war are granted, and the whole corps are to be priſoners of war.

II. The officers ſhall keep their ſwords, effects, and field-equipage; and the ſoldiers their knapſacks.

III. The general officers, as well as other officers, may go home, if the General in chief ſhould conſent to it. I give my word of honour to inform the General in chief that I have promiſed this article.

IV. Field-Marſhal Wurmſer ſhall be acquainted with the preſent capitulation.

V. The ſick and wounded ſhall be taken care of, with all thoſe ſentiments of humanity which are inſeparable from Republicans.

Head Quarters at Verona, 30th Nivoſe, (19th Jan.) 5th Year.

I do hereby certify, that in the different battles which which have taken place from the 8th to the 16th inſtant, the number of Auſtrian priſoners of war, who have paſſed in review, amounts already to upwards of 20,000 men 700 of whom are cavalry, and that ſtill more are hourly arriving; that the enemy have left in our hands forty-four pieces of cannon, together with their caiſſons, all the baggage belonging to the column of General Provera, and all the ſtands of colours of this corps, ſome of which have been broken by the enemy. I do further certify, that by command of the General in chief, I have ordered General Rey to conduct theſe 20,000 priſoners to Grenoble, in convoys of 3000 men each, marching at one day's diſtance from each other, and under an eſcort of the 38th half brigade, and a ſquadron of horſe.

(Signed) ALEX. BERTHIER.

Extract of a Letter from the Commander in Chief.

You will find annexed, Citizen Directors, the capitulation of Mantua. Our troops took poſſeſſion of the citadel on the 15 (Pluv.), and this day the town was completely evacuated by the Auſtrians. General Serrurier began the ſiege of Mantua: and General Kilmaine, who conducted the ſecond blockade, contributed not a little to the reduction of the fortreſs. It was this General that ordered St. George's to be fortified, and this meaſure facilitated the operations of the army. The garriſon of Mantua had conſumed 5000 horſes, which accounts for the very ſmall number that we found in it. The General concludes his letter with a high panegyric on Citizen Chaſſeloupe, chief of the engineers; L'Epinaſſe, general of artillery; and on Samſon and Maubert officers.

Capitulation between his Excellency Marſhal Count de Wurmſer, Commander in Chief of the army of his Majeſty the Emperor and King, and the General of Diviſion Serrurier, Commander of the French Republic before Mantua.

Article I. The Imperial garriſon of Mantua, and the citadel, ſhall evacuate Mantua by the great gate of the citadel, with the honours of war, drums beating, colours flying, matches lighted, and ſhall carry with them two ſix-pounders, two twelve-pounders, and two howitzers, with their carriages and harneſs, together with the neceſſary ammunition for each place, and the artillerymen belonging to them. The garriſon ſhall form upon the Chauſee leading from Marmico to Mantua, ſhall not lay down their arms, but ſhall be priſoners of war until exchanged, except thoſe mentioned in the 2d article, who ſhall not be priſoners of war.—Anſ. Granted, with this exception, that on the outſide of the barriers the arms ſhall be laid down upon the glacis, as well as the colours, ſtandards, and every other military article, the garriſon being all to remain priſoners of war. Granted alſo to every thing relating to the artillery and artilleriſts, who ſhall quit the garriſon with 700 men, who are not priſoners of war.

II. Marſhal Count de Wurmſer ſhall not be a priſoner of war, nor his ſuite, viz. the Adjutant-Generals Aver and Ban-Hoht, and Captain Aid-de-camp Count Degenfeld; all the Generals, each with his aid-de-camp; 200 cavalry, with their reſpective horſes and their officers; 500 men to be choſen by the Marſhal; the ſix pieces of cannon mentioned in the firſt article, with their gunners, ammunition, and furniture.—Anſ. Granted, as far as relates to Marſhal Wurmſer; to every thing that belongs to him perſonally, to 200 cavalry, compriſing their officers, and to 500 individuals to be choſen by the Marſhal, including the artilleriſts mentioned in the firſt article, the general officers, thoſe of the Etat-Major, and every other individual whom the Marſhal ſhall think proper to compriſe in it.

III. The officers ſhall keep their ſwords, their horſes, equipage, and all their property; the ſoldiers their knapſacks; as well as perſons not employed in a military capacity, the civil officers, and all perſons attached to the military ſervice.—Anſ. The officers ſhall keep their ſwords; the generals and other perſons hereafter mentioned ſhall keep the following number of horſes: the lieutenant-generals 16—major-generals 10—colonels 8—lieutenant-colonels and majors 7—captains of cavalry 3—captains of infantry 2—lieutenants of cavalry 2—lieutenants and enſigns of infantry 2. The commiſſaries of war ſhall be treated upon the footing of the military rank to which they are conſidered as equal. All perſons employed, to whom the law allows horſes, ſhall keep one each.

I demand their word of honour from the officers deſtined to execute this capitulation, that no individual of the army ſhall carry away more than what belongs to him. Each ſoldier ſhall keep his knapſack, and every cavalier his portmanteau.

IV. The Imperial garriſon ſhall be conducted by the ſhorteſt road to Gouſe, in the Frioul, and ſhall be exchanged by preference for French priſoners of war.—Anſ. The troops ſhall be conducted by Porto Legnago, Padua, and Treviſo; the exchanges ſhall be made as ſoon as poſſible, and the 700 men carried away by Marſhal Wurmſer, ſhall promiſe not to ſerve againſt the French army for three months from hence, dated from the day of this capitulation.

V. The march of the troops ſhall be regulated by French commiſſioners in two columns, and they ſhall not be made to march more than four French leagues a day, on account of the garriſon being weakened by ſickneſs. The French commiſſaries ſhall provide the neceſſary ſubſiſtence for the troops and horſes, and ſhall furniſh the waggons neceſſary to convey thoſe who may fall ill on the road.—Anſ. In order not to burthen the country too much, and to obtain ſubſiſtence with greater facility, ſeveral days ſhall be occupied in the departure of the columns; each ſhall conſiſt of 1000 men; and the firſt, which ſhall be particularly compoſed of all the armed troops, ſhall ſet out the day after to-morrow, 4th February. Care ſhall be taken to have ſeveral carriages at the head of the columns, to convey the ſick. Subſiſtence ſhall be provided for the men and horſes.

VI. The waggons carrying the chancery of the headquarters and of the troops, as well as the war cheſt, being twenty-ſeven in number, twenty-three of which are drawn by two horſes, and the remainder by four horſes, ſhall go out freely, and join the garriſon to proceed to Gouſe.—Anſ. Refuſed. A commiſſioner ſhall be charged to inſpect the regiſters or other papers belonging to the chancery; and if they are of no uſe to the army of the French republic, carriages ſhall be furniſhed for carrying them away.

VII. The ſick and wounded ſhall be treated humanely; they ſhall be left in the hoſpitals with the ſurgeons and attendants neceſſary, the number of whom ſhall be fixed; and after their cure, they ſhall have the benefit of the articles of capitulation, as well as thoſe whoſe affairs ſhall detain them at Mantua, to whom the neceſſary paſſports ſhall be delivered, as ſoon as their buſineſs ſhall be terminated.—Anſ. Granted; and they ſhall experience the ſame lot as the garriſon.

VIII. All the civil officers in the ſervice of his Majeſty the Emperor ſhall go out freely with their bureaux and chancery, and the neceſſary conveyances ſhall be furniſhed them.—Anſ. Theſe individuals may go away freely, but the bureaux and chancery ſhall be examined, and remain in the power of the French army, if neceſſary.

IX. The city ſhall be maintained in all its rights and privileges, property, and religion: no account ſhall be taken of the conduct of the citizens who have rendered ſervices to their lawful ſovereign.—Anſ. Granted.

X. Such of the citizens or inhabitants of the city as may wiſh to retire from Mantua, with their property, into the hereditary ſtates of his Imperial Majeſty, ſhall have one year to ſell at their will and freely, their poſſeſſions, both moveable and immoveable, and the neceſſary paſſports ſhall be granted them.—Anſ. Granted.

XI. The cannoneers of the city who have ſerved upon the ramparts againſt the French army, ſhall not be diſturbed for ſuch conduct, having only done their duty, founded upon the conſtitution of the duchy of Mantua, and they ſhall return to their own homes. — Anſ. Granted.

XII. If any doubtful article ſhall be found in the capitulation, which may give riſe to diſputes, it ſhall be explained in favour of the garriſon.—Anſ. It ſhall be diſcuſſed and interpreted according to juſtice.

XIII. Three hours after the ſignature of the capitulation, there ſhall be ſurrendered to the French troops, an advanced work of the citadel, as far as the firſt drawbridge; and only the French commiſſioners, and thoſe who may be ſent on buſineſs by the French Commandant of the blockade ſhall be admitted to enter the place or the citadel. The French army ſhall not enter the place or the citadel until it ſhall be evacuated by the Imperial garriſon.—Anſ. The citadel ſhall be wholly given up three hours after the ſignature of the capitulation; but if it ſhould be too late, it ſhall be given up the next morning at nine o'clock. All communication ſhall be prevented between the troops of the reſpective powers; and the French troops ſhall occupy the advanced poſts of the gates of the city. Only the French commiſſioners, charged by the General with the operations belonging to them, together with the officers of artillery, and the engineer officers for the plans, charts, &c. which muſt of neceſſity be in the city, ſhall enter the place.

XIV. An officer ſhall be permitted to proceed to his Majeſty the Emperor, as well as another officer to the General of the Imperial army in the Tyrol, with the capitulation.—Anſ. Granted. The commiſſary General ſhall have a paſſport to proceed beforehand to the territories of his Imperial Majeſty.

Statement of the principal Articles of Artillery in the Garriſon and Citadel of Mantua, on February 5.

Braſs Pieces.

Auſtrian pieces, from the calibre of 36 to and including thoſe of 16, 136 pieces of 15 under; 175 braſs mortars: 56 braſs patteraroes, 2 ſmall mortars and grenades; 40 bolts; 10 ſmall pieces for barks on the lake.

Iron Pieces.

Iron pieces of the calibre of 12 and 6, 21 iron patteraroes, 4 field-pieces for the defence of the place, and advanced work, 43 field howitzers, 16 muſkets for the infantry, artillery, pioneers, and cavalry, 5000 of which are fit for ſervice, 17,115; a conſiderable quantity of pieces of wood, and other articles for repairing the arms; piſtols, 2500 of which are fit for uſe, 4484; a great quantity of wood for the new iron in bars, 16,100lbs; old iron, cut, 20,000lbs.

Lead.

In balls 165,400lb.; pigs of lead 156,000lb.; powder 119,000.; cartridges for the infantry, 1,214,000lb.; cartridges for the cavalry, 160,228; charges for cannon, 14,746; for howitzers, 2093 balls of all calibres; 187,320 bombs of all calibres; 14,562 fireworks of all kinds; and grape-ſhot for cannon.

Field-Pieces of the Diviſion of General Wurmſer.

Cannon of 3 lb. 26, cannon of 6 lb. 6, of 12 lb. 2, ſeven-inch howitzers 4, Total 38. Charges of 3, 5736; ditto of 6, 1836; ditto of 12, 540; grape of 3, 1200; ditto of 6, 340; ditto of 12, 164; waggons and carriages, 184; equipage for bridges one in number.

The Imperial garriſon of this fortreſs conſiſted of 34,000 men. A company, which was complete not long ago, and conſiſted of 230 men, had no more than eighteen eighteen left able to do duty; twenty were in the hoſpital, and the reſt dead. The hoſpitals contained 8000 ſick ſoldiers; 6000 men marched out half-well, and 20,000 were buried within that fortreſs. During four months there was nothing but horſe-fleſh to live on. This day (February 3), not a morſel of meat of any kind was in the place, either for the ſoldiers or the inhabitants.

The unfortunate, but brave garriſon, was reduced to the laſt extremity by diſeaſe and famine, before the place ſurrendered. After an entire blockade of near five months, during which the magazines and proviſions were exhauſted or conſumed, the garriſon was reduced to one fourth part of the common allowance of bread, which was made of Indian wheat, during the whole month of January. This feeble reſource being at laſt gone, and every horſe in the place killed and eaten, the garriſon, amounting to 18,000 men, ſurrendered, with its brave chief, Wurmſer, by a capitulation perfectly correſponding with that publiſhed in the Paris Journals. It appears that the French found in Mantua between ſeven and eight hundred pieces of cannon, and ſuch a profuſion of treaſure as cannot be poſſibly aſcertained; moſt of the Italian noblemen and merchants having ſent their caſh and valuable effects to Mantua as a place of ſafety.

The French did not take poſſeſſion of the citadel of Mantua till the 5th of February, with about 400 men. The utmoſt wretchedneſs prevailed in the city, which was full of unburied bodies, ſo that a free paſſage was not permitted till it ſhould be thoroughly cleanſed; a number of bodies had been thrown into the Lake, but every method to prevent any infectious diſorder was put in practice by the French.

Extract of a Letter from Lord Henley to Lord Grenville, dated Auguſt 3, 1799.

It gives me the greateſt ſatisfaction to be enabled to cloſe my official correſpondence, with the important intelligence of the ſurrender of Mantua to the Imperial arms. A courier is arrived from General Kray with diſpatches of the 30th ult. ſtating, that on the 27th the horn-work was taken; on the 28th the town was ſummoned; on the 29th the capitulation ſigned; and on the 30th the place was occupied by the Imperial troops. The garriſon are priſoners of war; the privates have liberty to return to France, on condition of not ſerving againſt the Emperor or his Allies till they are exchanged againſt an equal number of Auſtrians. The exchange, it is ſtipulated, ſhall take place immediately; and the officers are to be kept three months in this country as hoſtages for the exact fulfilment of this ſtipulation. Permit me, my Lord, to convey to you my moſt ſincere congratulations on this moſt fortunate and important event, which will furniſh ſuch facilities to the further progreſs of the Allied arms; and to add my moſt cordial wiſhes, that the ſucceſſes of the Allies may be continued with the ſame brilliancy and rapidity which have diſtinguiſhed all the operations of this remarkable campaign.

Head-quarters, Boſco,

My Lord, July 30, 1799.

I have the ſatisfaction to incloſe the capitulation of Mantua. The trenches had been opened only fourteen days. The garriſon I am informed amounts to near thirteen thouſand men; the ſick, including the non-combattans, are about five hundred. The loſs of the Auſtrians does not exceed more than two hundred men.

I have the honour to be,

W. Bentinck.

Capitulation made between his Excellency Baron Kray, general of the artillery, and commander in chief of the troops of his Imperial Majeſty at the ſiege of Mantua, and the General of Diviſion Foiſſac la Tour, commandant of the town and citadel of Mantua.

Art. I. The garriſon of Mantua will march out the 30th of July 1799, at twelve o'clock, with the honours of war, ſix pieces of cannon in the front. The garriſon ſhall be priſoners of war; and, in order to prevent the diſgrace and miſery of confinement, the general commanding in chief, the other generals under his orders, the officers of the ſtaff, and all the officers of the garriſon conſent to remain priſoners in the neareſt part of the Hereditary States in Germany, in order to ſerve as hoſtages for the non-commiſſioned officers and ſoldiers, who ſhall be ſent back into France by the ſhorteſt road, and ſhall not ſerve againſt the troops of the Emperor or his Allies till after their exchange.—Anſ. Granted in its fulleſt extent; and in conſideration of the open, brave, and honourable conduct of the garriſon of Mantua, the commandant, the officers of the ſtaff, and the other military officers of the garriſon, after having remained three months in the Hereditary States, ſhall be at liberty to return to their reſpective countries upon their word of honour not to ſerve againſt his Imperial Majeſty or his Allies until they are reciprocally exchanged. The period of three months ſhall begin from the day on which the capitulation is ſigned.

The garriſon will lay down their arms on the glacis of the citadel. The officers will keep their ſwords, baggage, and the number of horſes allowed by their own military regulations. The non-combattans ſhall be ſent back to France. The generals ſhall keep their ſecretaries, and all the officers their ſervants. A pair of colours ſhall be granted to the General of Diviſion Foiſſac la Tour, in conſideration of the energy of his defence.

II. The Ciſalpine, Swiſs, Poles, and Piedmonteſe ſhall be conſidered and treated in every reſpect as troops of the French Republic.—Anſ. Granted.

III. Three covered waggons ſhall be allowed the commandant for the carriage of his papers, baggage, and perſonal property. Theſe waggons ſhall not be examined, and ſhall be ſubject to his orders only.—Anſ. Granted.

IV. The chief of the ſtaff, and the other chiefs of departments, departments, ſhall have the power of taking with them all papers relating to their own concerns, and ſhall have the ſole charge of the waggons deſtined for this purpoſe, and for the carriage of their own perſonal effects. The commiſſaries ſhall be reſponſible that nothing belonging to the place is taken away.—Anſ. Granted.

V. An appeal is made to the juſtice and generoſity of the Auſtrian government, in favour of thoſe citizens who have been incorporated in the Ciſalpine Republic, which was formally announced to the Emperor, at the treaty of peace lately concluded, as well as of all thoſe who have manifeſted their ſincere attachment to the Imperial commiſſaries, and the citizens who acted as artillery men, having been treated in the ſame manner, according to the terms of the noble capitulation made by Bonaparte with General Wurmſer. — Anſ. Granted.

VI. Engineer and artillery officers ſhall be appointed to receive all articles relative to their departments.—Anſ. Granted.

VII. Commiſſaries ſhall alſo be named to take charge of the magazines of proviſions.—Anſ. Granted.

VIII. The ſick and wounded who cannot be removed ſhall continue to receive the neceſſary care; for which purpoſe the French ſurgeons and phyſicians who now attend them ſhall remain. The general in chief ſhall name an officer who ſhall have the particular charge of the ſick; and as ſoon as they may be ſufficiently recovered to travel, they ſhall be furniſhed with the means of following the army if it is exchanged, or of going into France or Germany according to the ſame conditions with all the reſt, every one complying with what is decided for his rank.—Anſ. Granted.

IX. There ſhall be furniſhed by the Auſtrian troops eſcorts ſufficient to protect all individuals whatever compriſed in the preſent capitulation, againſt inſult or popular commotion, for which the commander of the eſcort ſhall be made particularly reſponſible. — Anſ. Granted.

X. All doubts that may ariſe out of the preſent capitulation ſhall be explained in favour of the garriſon, conſiſtently with the laws of equity.—Anſ. Granted.

XI. After the ſignature of the preſent capitulation, hoſtages ſhall be mutually exchanged: on the part of the French, a brigadier and a captain: on that of the Auſtrians, a colonel and a captain.—Anſ. Granted.

XII. During the management of the capitulation, there ſhall be a ceſſation of hoſtilities on both ſides.—Anſ. Granted.

XIII. Migliarello ſhall be occupied by a battalion of Auſtrians, from which fifty men ſhall be detached to occupy the outer part of the gate of Ceres. The two armies ſhall have no communication with each other, commanding officers, and thoſe who have leave from their reſpective generals, excepted.—Anſ. Granted.

XIV. The commiſſary of the executive power, and the inſpector-general of the police of the Ciſalpine Republic at Mantua, ſhall have leave to go wherever they pleaſe.—Anſ. Granted.

XV. A ſufficient number of carriages ſhall be allowed for the carriage of the effects, not only of the officers compoſing the garriſon, but of all ſuch as not being preſent may have left their baggage. — Anſ. Granted.

XVI. Two carriages ſhall be granted for the ſuite of the general, and for ſuch others as ſhall have been ordered by him to follow the lot of the garriſon.—Anſ. Granted.

XVII. The generals and other officers may ſend any part of their baggage to France with the troops: unleſs indeed General Kray, who always acts like a man of the higheſt honour and liberality, conſents that the officers ſhould ſhare the ſame fortune with the men, and be permitted to return to France priſoners on their parole.—Anſ. Regulated by article I.

ADDITIONAL ARTICLE.

All deſerters ſhall be given up to their reſpective battalions.—Anſ. General Kray promiſes them their life.

MARCIANO, BATTLE OF. See SIENNA.

MARDEN, BATTLE AT. Several battles having been fought between the Engliſh and Danes in 871, with different ſucceſs; their armies met in 872 at this place, in Wiltſhire, in which battle Ethelred received his death's wound.

MARDYCK TAKEN. A port town of French Flanders, ſituated four miles weſt from Dunkirk; which was effected by an Engliſh cruſade, in the year 1383, under the command of Spencer, biſhop of Norwich, on the following occaſion.

A ſchiſm had broke out in the church of Rome, in the year 1378, on account of the two anti-popes, Urban VI. and Clement VIII. as he ſtyled himſelf, which continued for more than thirty years. This ſchiſm divided Chriſtendom into two parties, every ſtate declaring itſelf for one or other of the two pretenders, though probably not ſo much upon ſpiritual as temporal and political motives. The French warmly eſpouſed the intereſts of Clement, becauſe a Frenchman, elected by the French cardinals, and reſiding at Avignon. The Engliſh were no leſs warm in their attachments to Urban, probably becauſe the French oppoſed him and declared for his rival. The two holy fathers fought long with ſpiritual arms, and ſatisfied themſelves with darting eccleſiaſtical thunders at one another, and their reſpective partiſans; but in the year 1383, Urban, who had the ſtrongeſt party, finding that anathemas and execrations did not anſwer his intentions, and wiſely judging that the arm of fleſh might be more ſenſibly felt, and carry greater conviction with it, reſolved to employ it. In conſequence of this reſolution, he publiſhed a cruſade againſt Clement and his adherents, and declared the Biſhop of Norwich general, granting to all who would engage in this enterprize, the ſame indulgences and encouragements as uſed to be given to thoſe who bore arms againſt the Infidels. This cruſade, when publiſhed in England, met with all the ſucceſs that Urban's heart could wiſh; the nobility, gentry, clergy, and people, joining in it with the ſame alacrity, as if they had been engaged to make war in defence of their country, againſt the moſt inveterate enemies of the Chriſtian name. Whilſt they waited for the approbation of the parliament, every one was buſy in preparing himſelf to gain the promiſed indulgences, by either ſerving perſonally in the war, or contributing money to defray the charges of it.

When the parliament met, it not only approved of the cruſade, but alſo granted a conſiderable ſubſidy to carry it on. Every thing thus ſucceeding in favour of the intended expedition, the Biſhop, who was general of the cruſade, embarked his army, conſiſting of 50,000 foot and 2000 horſe; and on his arrival at Calais, held a council of war, to conſider which way he ſhould turn his arms. Moſt were of opinion that they ought to attack France, as the cruſade was publiſhed againſt Clement and his adherents, of which the King of France was the chief. But the General, for reaſons of his own, which are not recorded in hiſtory, declared for invading Flanders, and by his influence this opinion at laſt prevailed. The only pretence for a meaſure ſo unaccountable was, that Flanders being a fief of France, they could not make war againſt it without hurting that kingdom. Thus, contrary to the intention of the court of England, which, without doubt, deſigned that the army ſhould march againſt France, and contrary to the views of Urban, who could have no reſentment againſt the Earl of Flanders, ſeeing he had actually acknowledged him as pope, and could not be reckoned one of Clement's adherents, the cruſade invaded Flanders, and took the towns of Mardyck, Dunkirk, Graveline, and Bourbourg. The Earl of Flanders ſurpriſed at this unforeſeen attack, aſſembled in haſte about 12,000 men, and venturing to give battle to the Biſhop's army, was completely routed.

Upon this diſaſter, ſeeing his country on the point of being entirely deſtroyed, he applied to the French court, repreſenting to the council of the young King, how much it was the intereſt of France to ſave Flanders, the rather that it did not appear the enemy would reſt ſatisfied with the ſingle conqueſt of this country. The French, rouſed by this alarming repreſentation, thought their intereſt and honour greatly concerned in the affair; and therefore Charles VI. haſtened to the relief of Flanders, at the head of a numerous army. The Engliſh upon his approach raiſed the ſiege of Ypres, and retired to Bourbourg, where they were inveſted by the French.

The General of the cruſade being pent up in this ſmall place, without proviſions, found himſelf involved in difficulties, out of which he could hardly have extricated himſelf, had not the Duke of Bretagne interpoſed in his behalf, and by a ſeaſonable mediation, obtained liberty for him to retire with his army, upon making reſtitution of the places he had ſeized in Flanders. In conſequence of this agreement, the Engliſh army returned home, where the Biſhop, their general, and ſome of his principal officers, were called to an account for diſobeying their inſtructions; and Mardyck, with the other towns they had taken, returned to the obedience of their former maſter.

When Dunkirk began to be very conſiderable, Mardyck became a kind of appendage to it, and almoſt always ſhared its fate. Thus both were taken by the Marſhal de Thermes in the year 1538, and a few days thereafter both recovered by the Spaniards. In the year 1646, the French again became maſters of both, Mardyck being taken in the beginning of the campaign by Gaſton, Duke of Orleans, and Dunkirk towards the end of it, by the famous Prince of Conde. After this, they were both recovered by Spain at the ſame time, and again wreſted from it in the year 1658; when the Marechal de Turenne, to make himſelf maſter of Dunkirk, firſt reduced Mardyck. They were both, as ſoon as the conqueſt of them was completed, delivered into the hands of the Engliſh; and in the year 1662, when Dunkirk was ſhamefully ſold to the French by King Charles II. Mardyck ſeems to have been thrown into the bargain.

MARENGO, BATTLE AT, June 9, 1800, having in a great meaſure decided the fate of Italy, and the diſorganization of the Auſtrian forces againſt the French, it may be acceptable to have the report by the Commander in Chief Alexander Berthier.

To gain poſſeſſion of Milan; to operate a junction with the diviſion of General Moncey; to cut off the rear of the enemy at Breſcia, Orſi-Novi, Marcana, Placenza; to ſeize their immenſe magazines; to cut off their communications; to carry their depots, their ſick, and their parks of artillery; ſuch were the objects with which different parties had been charged, while our army obſerved that of the enemy, haraſſed them on the Po, and effected the paſſage of that river near Stradella. The activity of our movements began theſe operations, and the genius of Bonaparte knew how to improve their advantages.

The enemy, beaten at Montebello, were about to be ſucceſſively reinforced by the troops under the command of F. M. Generals Elſnitz and Bellegarde. I had on the other hand been informed that M. de Melas had aſſembled all his forces at Aleſſandria. It was of importance to anticipate his future movements, and every thing was prepared for that purpoſe.

The enemy could either proceed to Genoa, and from thence penetrate into Tuſcany, or paſs the Po and the Teſino to reach Mantua, or make their way along the right bank of the Po, by giving battle to our army, or, laſtly, ſhut themſelves up in Turin.

The diviſion of Chabran and Lapoype received orders to guard the Po. The detachment left at Ivrea obſerved Oveo. The corps of General Moncey occupied Placenza, obſerved Bebbio, guarded the Teſino, the Seſia, and the Oglio, from the conflux of theſe rivers to the Po, and puſhed reconnoitring parties towards Peſchiera and Mantua. The Italian legion occupied cupied Breſcia. The reſt of the army, with Bonaparte at their head, marched to meet the enemy.

On the 24th Prairial (June 13), at day-break, the army directed its march towards Tortona and Caſtel Nuovo di Scrivia. The corps of General Victor, which formed the advanced guard, paſſed the Scrivia at Dora; that of General Lannes carried Caſtel Nuovo, where the enemy abandoned 1500 ſick, among which were 600 convaleſcents ready to join their army. The corps under the command of General Deſſaix took poſt in front of Ponte Curone. The ſame day the army marched towards San Juliano, which the advanced guard of the enemy had evacuated, in order to take poſt at Marengo. They were there attacked by the diviſion of Gardanne, ſupported by the 24th light, and were obliged to retreat as far as their bridge over the Bormida, after loſing two pieces of cannon, and 180 priſoners.

The enemy refuſed battle in the plain ſituated between San Juliano and Marengo, where they could greatly avail themſelves of their numerous cavalry. Every thing gave reaſon to preſume that they would not attack us after having allowed us to become acquainted with their ground and their poſition, and that they had the deſign either to paſs the Po and the Teſino, or to march towards Genoa and Bebbio. Meaſures were taken to oppoſe forces to their progreſs on the road from Aleſſandria to Genoa, and on the left bank of the Po, the paſſage of which they might attempt at Caſal or Valenza; a diviſion of the corps of General Deſſaix marched towards Rivalia, by turning Tortona. Flying bridges were eſtabliſhed near Caſtel Nuovo, in order to paſs the Po with rapidity, and by a flank movement join the corps of obſervation on the left bank of that river. But on the 25th, (June 14) at ſeven o'clock in the morning, the diviſion of Gardanne, which formed our advanced guard, was attacked. The enemy, by the development of their forces, diſcloſed their deſign. The troops under the command of General Victor were immediately drawn up in order of battle; the one part formed the centre, which occupied the village of Marengo; the other formed the left wing, which extended as far as the Bormida. The corps of General Lannes formed the right wing. The army formed in two lines, and had its wings ſupported by a ſtrong body of cavalry.

The enemy diſplayed themſelves ſucceſſively, and debouched in three columns: that of the right debouched by Figarolo, aſcending the Bormida; that of the centre, on Marengo, by the great road; laſtly, that of the left, on Caſtel Ceriolo. General Victor informed me, that he was attacked by all the enemies forces. I immediately ſent up to him the reſerve of cavalry and the corps of General Deſſaix, the diviſion of which that was marching towards Seravalla, I recalled.

The Chief Conſul proceeded rapidly to the field of battle; arriving there, we found the action begun on every point; both ſides fought with equal obſtinacy; General Gardanne, for two hours, ſuſtained the attack of the right and centre of the enemy, without loſing an inch of ground, notwithſtanding his inferiority in artillery. The brigade under the command of General Kellerman, conſiſting of the 2d and 10th regiments of cavalry and the 28th dragoons, ſupported the left of General Victor; the 44th and 10th of the line, maintained their reputation.

General Victor ſent orders to the brigade of cavalry under General Duvigneau, but the latter had quitted without authority the command of his brigade, which retarded the execution of the movement; 200 men of that corps were ordered to aſcend the Bormida, and obſerve the motions of the enemy's right. The reſt received orders to ſupport the left of the army, and conducted themſelves with valour. General Gardanne, obliged to quit his poſition in the advanced guard, retreated gradually, and took an oblique poſition. The right was at the village of Marengo; the left on the banks of the Bormida. In this new poſition he took the column marching on Marengo in flank, and kept up a terrible fire. The ranks of this corps were ſwept down; it heſitated for a moment; already ſeveral parts began to give way, but it received new reinforcements, and continued its march. General Victor ſtationed ſucceſſively the 24th light, the 43d and 96th of the line, to defend the village of Marengo.

While theſe movements were going on, the brigade of General Kellerman ſupported the left; the 8th dragoons charged and routed a column of the enemy's cavalry, but it was charged in its turn by ſuperior forces; it was ſupported by the 2d and 20th cavalry, who made more than 100 priſoners.

The left of the enemy advanced towards Caſtel Ceriolo. Their centre, always receiving new reinforcements, ſucceeded in carrying the village of Marengo, where they made 400 priſoners, who ſhut themſelves up in a houſe.

Some of our ſharp ſhooters having expended their cartridges, quitted the field of battle in diſorder; and the enemy, encouraged by this ſucceſs, charged with additional impetuoſity. General Lannes engaged them with ſucceſs. The line uncovered in the plain, reſiſted the artillery, and ſupported the charge of the enemy's cavalry; but they durſt not purſue the enemy, without being turned on the left. General Lannes ſent the 40th demi-brigade and the 22d, to reinforce the diviſion of Chambarlhac, which loſt ground. The enemy, frequently repulſed on the centre, always returned to the charge, and at length carried the village of Marengo. General Victor ordered the reſerve to make a retrograde movement.

General Lannes then found himſelf attacked by forces infinitely ſuperior; two lines of infantry marching againſt him with a formidable artillery. The diviſion of Watrin and the 28th, were immoveable. On the point of being turned by a conſiderable body, they were ſupported by the brigade of dragoons, under the command of General Champeaux. The change of poſition of General Victor obliged General Lannes to follow the ſame courſe.

The Chief Conſul, informed that the reſerve of General Deſſaix was not yet ready, repaired in perſon to the diviſion of Lannes, in order to ſlacken its retreat. Nevertheleſs the enemy advanced. He ordered the 72d demi-brigade to execute various movements; he even wiſhed to take the enemy in flank, and charge at the head of this demi-brigade. But a cry aroſe from the ranks—"We cannot allow the Chief Conſul to expoſe himſelf." An intereſting ſtruggle then aroſe among the ſoldiers, who forgetting their own danger, thought only of that of their Chief. Nevertheleſs ſome time was gained.

The retreat was ſoon effected, par echiquier, under a fire of eighty pieces of cannon, which preceded the march of the Auſtrian columns, and poured out among our ranks grape-ſhot and bomb-ſhells. Nothing could ſhake our battalions. They drew cloſe ranks, and manœuvred with the ſame preciſion as if they had been on the parade. The ranks ſwept away were immediately filled by other heroes. Never was ſeen a more regular and impoſing movement.

The enemy then thought themſelves ſure of victory. A numerous cavalry, ſupported by ſeveral ſquadrons of light artillery, attacked our right, and threatened to turn the army.

The grenadiers of the conſular guard marched to ſupport the right. They advanced and ſuſtained three ſucceſſive charges. At this moment arrived the diviſion of Monnier, which made part of the reſerve. I ſent two demi-brigades to the village of Caſtel Ceriolo, with orders to charge the battalions which ſupported the enemy's cavalry. Theſe corps croſſed the plain, and carried Caſtel Ceriolo, after repulſing a charge of cavalry; but our centre and our left continued their retrograde movement. They were ſoon obliged to evacuate this village, following the courſe of the army, and ſurrounded by the enemy's cavalry, which they kept in check.

The army arrived in the plain of San Juliano, where the reſerve, under the command of General Deſſaix, was formed in two lines, flanked on the right by twelve pieces of artillery, commanded by General Marmont, and ſupported on the left by the cavalry under the command of General Kellerman. The Chief Conſul, expoſed to the hotteſt fire, flew through the ranks to encourage the ſoldiers, and put a ſtop to the retrograde movement. It was now four in the afternoon.

General Deſſaix, at the head of the brave 9th light, threw himſelf with impetuoſity in the midſt of the enemy's battalions, and charged them with the bayonet. The reſt of the diviſion of Boudet followed this movement on the right; all the army in two lines advanced at the pas de charge. The enemy confounded, made their artillery retreat; their infantry began to give way. General Deſſaix was ſtruck by a ball mortally. The death of this diſtinguiſhed officer, whoſe loſs will long be wept by France, inflamed the brave men he commanded with new ardour. Burning to avenge him, they precipitated themſelves with fury on the firſt line of the enemy's infantry, which, after falling back on the ſecond, continued to reſiſt. Both ſides prepared to charge with the bayonet. Our battalions were ſtopped for a moment, but General Kellerman ordered a charge with 800 horſe, who routed the enemy and made 6000 priſoners; among whom were General Zach, chief of the ſtaff, General St. Julien, ſeveral other generals, and almoſt all the officers of the ſtaff.

The enemy had ſtill a third line of infantry, ſupported by the reſt of the artillery and all the cavalry.

General Lannes, with the foot grenadiers of the conſular guard and the diviſion of Boudet, marched againſt this line, and were ſupported in their charge by the artillery commanded by General Marmont. The cavalry, under the command of General Murat, the horſe grenadiers commanded by the chief of brigades Beſſieres, charged the enemy's cavalry, compelled them to fall back with precipitation, and put them to the route. Their rear-guard was cut in pieces.

The enemy in diſorder had arrived at their bridge over the Bormida. The battle was continued an hour after it was dark. Night alone ſaved the wrecks of the Auſtrian army.

This battle coſt the enemy twelve ſtandards, twenty-ſix pieces of cannon, and 15,000 men, of whom 3000 were killed, 5000 wounded, and 7000 taken priſoners. Seven of their generals and more than 400 of their officers were wounded.

We have to regret from 7 to 8000 killed, 2000 wounded, and 1100 made priſoners. Among the wounded are generals of brigade Rivaud, Champeaux, Maller, and Mainoni.

Never was a battle more obſtinate, never was victory diſputed with greater keenneſs. Auſtrians and French reſpectively admired the courage of their enemies. The two armies were engaged within muſquet-ſhot for fourteen hours.

The following is ſtated to be ſome of the particulars relative to this extraordinary battle.

Both armies are ſtated to have been nearly equal in numbers; but neither exceeded 25,000 men. The battle was moſt obſtinately conteſted. The Auſtrians were, as early as half paſt ſeven in the morning, conquerors along the whole line, and had penetrated that of the French, whom they were driving ſtill further and further towards the Scrivia, which was much ſwollen. General Melas was indebted for this ſucceſs to the force of his centre, where were the grenadiers, and the flower of his infantry. Until four in the evening, the advantage remained with the Imperialiſts, who had, by that time, taken 3000 priſoners, and twelve pieces of cannon. The French army was retreating, and the Auſtrians thought themſelves certain of victory. General Deſſaix, however, who had been recalled during the engagement, from his march to Seravalle, had formed his diviſion in the rear of the French army. The flying French troops rallied behind this diviſion. General Melas, who did not expect to have this new corps to engage, detached part of his centre to take it in flank. Deſſaix, ſeeing his enemy weakened, placed himſelf at the head of 250 horſemen, covered by twelve pieces of cannon, and charged the Auſtrians, who being in diſorder, and beſides overcome with fatigue, were routed. The centre being broken, the other parts of the army found themſelves ſeparated, and were obliged to think of a retreat; which was continued as far as beyond the Bormida. Six Auſtrian generals were wounded. General Melas received a contuſion, and had two horſes ſhot under him. The priſoners taken on both ſides were exchanged on the day after the battle. It is calculated that each party loſt 10,000 men. General Melas is wholly exculpated from any blame on that day. Nothing could exceed the valour of his troops, nor his own perſonal behaviour; nor is it alleged as any charge againſt him that he could make better terms that he did after the battle. But he is moſt extremely blamed for his military conduct in ſuffering the French irruption into Italy, without oppoſing to it the means within his reach.

MARIENBURGH, a part of Hainault, in the Netherlands. On the 4th of June, 1793, the French had an engagement with the Pruſſians, and defeated them, and afterwards plundered this town. They attacked the Pruſſians on the left wing, to divert the attention of the right. In the mean while they made themſelves maſters of the intrenchments before this place, and took ſome cannon, and killed and took twenty-eight priſoners.

They afterwards ſurrounded the village, and as they had the watch-word, ſurpriſed the centinel and went forward in great force into the Pruſſian camp, cutting all their tents to pieces that were left there.

A detachment of their cavalry then penetrated into the village, then proceeded to General Kalkreuth's quarters, who narrowly eſcaped being made priſoner, from whence they returned, after making havock of every thing in their way.

Another ſmall ſkirmiſh occurred, and two of a Pruſſian colonel's ſervants were killed, but ſoon after the whole Pruſſian army was alarmed, and the French thought it prudent to retire, but were followed cloſe to the walls of Mentz, from whence as their cannon kept up a dreadful fire to favour their retreat, a great number of the Pruſſian cavalry were killed and wounded.

MARIGNAN, OR MARIGNANO, BATTLE AT. A town of Italy in the duchy of Milan, about fifteen miles ſouth of Milan. When Francis I. aſcended the throne of France in the year 1515, he found himſelf embroiled with many dangerous enemies; he at firſt ſought peace and the good will of his neighbours, but Ferdinand, King of Navarre, the Pope, the Emperor, the Swiſs, and Sforza, Duke of Milan, entered into a confederacy to compel Francis to renounce Milan, and other places which he held in Italy. The pacific diſpoſition which he at firſt entertained was entirely changed, and he prepared to oppoſe his enemies, at the head of his own army. As the Confederates knew he was on his march, they diſperſed, all but the Swiſs, who not being able to ſtop his career, ſuffered him to advance as far as Marignan, and were on the point of coming to terms with him, by the mediation of the Duke of Savoy, when advice was brought that 15,000 Germans were in full march to their aſſiſtance, they broke off the treaty, and ſuddenly attacked Francis in his camp, on the 13th day of October, 1515. The Swiſs fought with aſtoniſhing fury, but in ſtrange confuſion; they burſt into the French camp like a torrent, and ſuch was their impetuoſity, that the whole French army, unable to ſuſtain the ſhock, fell into diſorder. The King, who at firſt knew nothing of what was doing, till he was acquainted by a gentleman, that the Swiſs had forced the camp, and were driving all before them, haſtened inſtantly with the nobility and the few ſoldiers about him to the place of action, and bravely continued the fight four hours, at the end of which time, victory was doubtful. It being quite dark, a truce was concluded till day-light, and both armies returned to their quarters, almoſt ſpent with fatigue. The King, with his armour on, reſted upon the carriage of a gun, and was glad to get a little water, though mixed with blood and dirt, to quench his thirſt. The French made excellent preparations during the night, the cavalry which had ſuffered leaſt, were drawn up in very good order, and the artillery was placed in the moſt advantageous manner.

In the morning, the Swiſs advanced to renew the fight, with their uſual impetuoſity and irregularity, but the French horſe gave them ſo warm a reception in front, which added to the great execution of their artillery in flank, ſoon obliged the enemy to retire, and their defeat in a ſhort time became total, not a little owing to their own confuſion.

The Swiſs loſt near 10,000 men killed, wounded, and priſoners, together with all their baggage. The French loſt near half that number. The conſequences of this victory were, the Swiſs departed from their allies and returned home, and the Pope, without ſtaying for the Emperor or any body elſe, made a peace with the conqueror on ſuch terms as he was pleaſed to grant, and the city of Milan directly ſurrendered.

MARSAGLIA, BATTLE AT. See TURIN.

MARSEILLES, SIEGE OF. A city and port town of France in Provence, ſituated on a fine bay of the Mediterranean, 360 miles ſouth-eaſt from Paris, and twenty-five north-weſt from Toulon. This ſiege was undertaken by the Duke of Bourbon in the year 1524. Two years before this tranſaction, the Duke of Bourbon was conſtable of France, in which office he did not acquit himſelf to the pleaſure of his ſovereign, Francis I. who being about to proſecute him, he threw himſelf into the arms of the Emperor Charles V. who, having entertained an inveterate hatred againſt Francis, immediately pitched upon the Duke to be commander of his army that ſhould invade France, and told him that if he conquered France, he ſhould have Provence erected into a kingdom for himſelf, and ſhould eſpouſe his ſiſter Eleonora. Emulated by theſe high offers, he anſwered, he would obey the Emperor's commands if it were poſſible.

The view which Charles had, in making Bourbon his general, was, his being a man extremely popular in France, and he thought as ſoon as it was known he was come among them, they would revolt to his ſide. Full of theſe hopes, Charles diſpatched him with only 15,000 foot and 500 horſe; with theſe he entered Provence, and reduced Aix and ſome other places, and then came before Marſeilles, which was his chief object; he directly inveſted the place, and began to beſiege it the 19th day of Auguſt. As ſoon as Francis had advice of this operation, he inſtantly flew to the relief of his town; but as he was too far diſtant to give it any immediate aſſiſtance, the ſiege was proſecuted with with vigour; however, there was a good garriſon, under the command of Lord Brion and Renſo de Cervi, well provided with every neceſſary to make a long defence, which they bravely performed ſix weeks, when Burbon hearing that Francis was very near to raiſe the ſiege, he did it voluntarily, and retreated in the moſt precipitate manner to Milan, and in the moſt aſtoniſhing too, for he only reſted one day during this march, which coſt him twenty-five; as he impoſed this taſk on himſelf, he buried all his cannon before he left Provence, that he might be the better able to perform it with diſpatch.

Charles, though piqued at his diſappointment, for the preſent ſtifled his diſpleaſure, and ſaid very little to the Duke concerning his retreat, but in 1536 he undertook the ſiege in perſon. Charles knew that Francis was tired of the war, and therefore in 1535, he ſet a negotiation on foot, inſinuating, that he would cede the duchy of Milan in favour of his third ſon, the Duke of Angouleme, on certain conditions, but as he wavered in his propoſals, Francis ordered his generals to ſuſpend all his hoſtilities in Piedmont, and ſent Cardinal of Lorraine as his ambaſſador, to demand a categorical anſwer of the Emperor, who had repaired to Rome. There in a public conſiſtory, he declaimed againſt the King of France, as the ſole author of all the wars which had afflicted Europe, ſince his acceſſion to the throne; and obſerved, inſtead of ſhedding ſo much innocent blood, he would have acted more like a Chriſtian prince, in deciding the quarrel with Charles by a ſword and poniard, in ſome boat or iſland. Next day the French ambaſſador deſired to know, if his intention was to challenge his maſter in ſingle combat, but he replied in the negative, ſaying, his meaning was, that the French King ought to have accepted the expedient, when it was firſt propoſed. The Cardinal ſoon perceived that Charles had no intention of beſtowing the duchy on a prince of the Houſe of France, and wrote to Francis, that he had nothing to expect but war from the Emperor. He had already projected the ſcheme of an invaſion againſt France, and began to aſſemble three armies, one to act in Piedmont under his own command, another in Picardy, and a third in Champaigne.

Francis being apprized of his deſign, recalled the greateſt part of his troops from Piedmont, which was no ſooner done, than Charles entered Provence at the head of a numerous army, and having taken Aix, laid ſiege to Marſeilles the 25th of Auguſt, 1536. It was defended by a gariſon of 7000 men, and thirteen galleys in the port; the King of France lay at Avignon, waiting for a reinforcement of 20,000 Swiſs and 6000 Germans. The greateſt misfortune Charles met with was the want of proviſions, which in a week's time grew ſo ſcarce in his camp the ſoldiers were ready to mutiny, the parties that he ſent to forage were always cut off by the peaſants; his convoys from Toulon fell into the hands of Francis; the proviſions that the country afforded proved poiſon to his troops, ſo that in leſs than a fortnight they were diminiſhed one-third. Add to theſe, his beſt General, Levi, died of chagrin. While theſe diſaſters were pouring on the Emperor, the King having received theſe reinforcements, put his army in motion as if he intended to raiſe the ſiege, which Charles being informed of, drew off on the 9th of September, and retreated with the utmoſt diſorder and precipitation, terribly haraſſed by the peaſants, a number of whom having got together at Frejus, entirely ſtopped his army, and put Charles in danger of his life. Francis too might have attacked him with advantage, but he was afraid; therefore Charles without further moleſtation got to Genoa on the 2d of October.

MARTIN (St.), ISLAND OF, TAKEN. See ST. EUSTATIA.

MARTINESTIC, A part Walachia, in Hungary, on the 22d of September 1789, near this place the Turkiſh army conſiſting of between 90,000 and 100,000 men, and the prince of Saxe Cobourg and General Suwarrow, commanders of the allied armies, had a very obſtinate engagement in which the former was totally defeated, with the loſs of 5000 killed on the ſpot, and 2000 in purſuit. Very few priſoners were taken, as the Turks refuſed to ſurrender, and would not accept of quarter. The combined army took poſſeſſion of the camp, which was abandoned in the utmoſt confuſion, the fugitives having paſſed the river Rimkin and taken the road to Brailow. The trophies which fell into the hands of the victors conſiſted of nearly 100 ſtandards, ſix mortars, ſeven pieces of heavy cannon, ſixty-four field-pieces, and a prodigious quantity of ammunition, ſtores, and baggage of all kinds. The loſs of the combined armies was between 4 and 500 men, killed and wounded, and about 100 horſes.

MARTINICO, ATTACKED IN 1692. One of the largeſt of the Caribees, or Windward iſlands, in the Weſt Indies.

The trade in the Weſt Indies ſuffering very much from the ſuperiority of the French in thoſe ſeas, the government in England reſolved in the year 1692, to put an end to the complaints that had been made from moſt of the colonies on that ſubject, by ſending a powerful fleet thither, under the command of Sir Francis Wheeler, as gallant and as judicious an officer as any in the navy; and he was empowered to take under his command ſuch ſhips of war as he ſhould find in that part of the world. He had under his convoy alſo a certain number of tranſports, with 1500 land-troops, and had aſſurance given him, that he ſhould find another body of very good troops ready aſſembled in Barbadoes: and in conjunction with them he had orders to attack ſome of the French ſettlements, which it was judged very practicable for him to reduce.

Sir Francis left the Engliſh coaſt in the beginning of January, and on the 26th of the ſame month touched at Madeira; and having taken in wine there for the uſe of the ſhips, he arrived in Carliſle-Bay at Barbadoes the 1ſt of March following, where ſeveral ſhips which had ſeparated from him in his paſſage, joined him again.

Here it was determined to make an attempt firſt upon Martinico, and the two regiments of Fowlkes and Godwin

Godwin were joined to about 800 land-men provided at Barbadoes, commanded by the Captains Salter and Butler.

The ſquadron arriving at Cul de Sac Marine in Martinico the 1ſt of April; a general council of war, of ſea and land officers, was called; and the queſtion being put, whether the ſoldiers ſhould land firſt, and deſtroy Fort St. Peter, and the plantations thereabouts, or begin with attacking Fort Royal, it was agreed to land at or near the Fort St. Peter, and that the fleet ſhould ſail the next morning to favour this attempt.

At Cul de Sac Marine, they burnt and ruined all the houſes and all the Plantations thereabouts, ſome of which were conſiderable, and then the troops were put on board again. Two days after, Sir Francis made another deſcent with 1500 men; and after he had burnt and deſtroyed ſeveral houſes and plantations, the troops came again to their ſhips. The next day Lieutenant-Colonel Lillingſton was ſent aſhore with a conſiderable party, to ruin the country on this ſide Diamond Bay, which he did and returned. The 9th and 10th, Colonel Codrington, with the forces of the Leeward-Iſlands, and Colonel Floyd's regiment joined the fleet, and then they weighed anchor, and came before Fort Royal, and St. Peter's fort. Soon after the troops were landed, ravaged the country, and ſome ſkirmiſhes happened between them and the enemy, with various ſucceſs, in the neighbourhood of St. Peter's.

The 20th of April, another council of war was called, and a debate ariſing, whether a cloſe ſiege ſhould be laid, and attacks made on the town and fort of St, Peter's, or whether the forces ſhould be taken on board, and that then it ſhould be conſidered what was fit to be done, it was moved by the preſident (Sir Francis Wheeler), that every man ſhould give his opinion in writing.

Purſuant to this motion, each officer, both by ſea and land, took the matter into conſideration, and having drawn up their reaſons and ſigned them, they were delivered in: but few there were among them, if any, except Sir Thomas Wheeler himſelf, and Lieutenant-Colonel Colt, who were for making an attempt; but rather to retire, and land the men in ſome other place, in order to deſpoil the enemy.

Moſt of the officers alleged that the French were ſuperior to our forces; and that ſince, at leaſt, one third of the men were Iriſh Papiſts, there could be but very little confidence put in them: and another objection was made, that the greater number of men they had to truſt to, had not bore arms before.

Other ſcruples were raiſed, ſuch as theſe: that the roads were almoſt impaſſable, and the hills inacceſſible: that the attempt would not only too much expoſe the men to the enemy, but the ſickneſs alſo, by reaſon of the fatigue, 100 of the 3000 (including the Iriſh) being either found killed, wounded, or ſick, within three days after landing.

Others, and particularly General Codrington, were of opinion, that ſhould our army be beaten, it would be almoſt impoſſible to retreat on board the ſhips: ſo that not only Barbadoes, but the Leeward Iſlands alſo would be in a very great meaſure expoſed to the enemy, moſt of the forces having been drawn from thoſe places for this ſervice.

All things conſidered, it was reſolved, at a council of war held the 22d of April, that the army ſhould re-imbark, and the ſquadron ſail to Dominica, that there they might take in water, and refreſh the men, who were, at this time, in but very indifferent circumſtances of health.

Father Daniel pretends, that the Engliſh, attempting to make themſelves maſters of Martinico with ſixty ſail of ſhips, ſeventeen whereof were men of war, ſix frigates, and three fire-ſhips, and 4200 men on board, made a deſcent in two places, and landed 2000 men in each; that they actually made an attempt with theſe forces; and that M. Gabaret, who commanded in the iſle, M. Augire, the king's lieutenant, and M. de Blenac, lieutenant-general of America, killed upon theſe two occaſions 300 of the Engliſhmen, wounded 400 more, and obliged them to re-imbark with the greateſt precipitation, without having done any damage to the iſle, farther than the burning of a few ſugar works.

De Larrey ſays, the Engliſh appeared off Martinico with 46 ſhips, the 2d of April, and having anchored in a place proper for a deſcent landed 1600 men, who began to burn the adjacent country. Two days after, they were re-inforced by 14 barks with militia, notwithſtanding which, the French obliged them to retire.

The 12th they appeared before Fort Royal, from whence being likewiſe repulſed the 17th, they landed 4000 or 5000 men about a league from Fort St. Peter, the chief of the iſland, and advanced with a deſign of attacking it. The Governor, M. Gabaret, went to meet them with 1000 men only; but was obliged to give way to the ſuperior force of the Engliſh; but having received a reinforcement under the command of the Count de Blenac, governor of all the French iſlands, (in ſix brigantines, one ſaick, one galliot, and ſeventy ſloops), he obliged the Engliſh to retire in their turn, leaving 200 dead on the ſpot, beſides wounded and priſoners. The 18th, they were again driven from a riſing ground, where they had lodged 600 men; and they were afterwards worſted in divers encounters. So that after having remained five days before Fort St. Peter, and twenty-one on the iſland, they re-imbarked, and ſet ſail, with the loſs of 500 men killed, 200 wounded, and 100 priſoners.

The French pretend, that on their ſide there were only ſix killed, and two wounded, in the laſt action, and in all but ten killed, thirty-eight wounded, and two taken priſoners. They likewiſe ſay, the Engliſh left behind them 100 barrels of powder and bullets, with good ſtore of arms and appurtenances to artillery.

MARTINICO, ENGAGEMENTS OFF IN 1756. The force under Vice-Admiral Davers being inſufficient for the protection of Jamaica and the Leeward Iſlands, the Britiſh government ordered Vice-Admiral Townſend to proceed with a ſquadron from the Mediterranean, and reinforce the ſquadron in the Weſt-Indies. Vice-Admiral Townſend ſet ſail from Gibraltar on the 2d of Auguſt, with the Lenox of ſeventy guns, the Dreadnought, Worceſter, and Kingſton, of ſixty; the Hampſhire, ſhire, Argyle, and Severn of fifty; the Gibraltar of twenty, and the Cornet bomb. The ſquadron, on the 3d of October, arrived off Martinico, where the Vice-Admiral was joined by the Pembroke of ſixty guns, and the Woolwich of fifty, when the whole ſquadron conſiſted of eleven ſhips. The iſland of Martinico had been long kept in the utmoſt neceſſity for proviſions and ſupplies; but the French had lately ſent Commodore Macnamara From Rochefort with ſeven men of war, and 200 ſail of ſhips, laden with merchandize and proviſions, under convoy. Vice-Admiral Townſend expected, and waited for the arrival of the French Commodore till the 31ſt of October, when, about ſeven o'clock in the morning, the Vice-Admiral diſcovered about forty ſail, being the French Commodore with four ſhips of his ſquadron, and part of his convoy, coming round the ſouth end of Martinico, cloſe under the ſhore, which the Britiſh ſquadron ſtemmed with, and ſoon drew nigh enough to make them, when five or ſix appeared to be pretty large ſhips, whereupon the Vice-Admiral formed the line of battle; but finding the French Commodore endeavour to avoid him, the Vice-Admiral hauled down the ſignal for the line, ordered a general chaſe, and purſued the French with all poſſible expedition, which ſucceeded ſo well, that ſeveral of the French ſhips were driven to leeward, and taken up by ſome of the Britiſh ſquadron. Vice-Admiral Townſend continued to purſue the men of war, and one of them, called the Ruby, of ſixty guns, carrying away her topmaſt, the Lenox got near enough to exchange ſome broadſides, and forced her on ſhore in a ſandy bay under a fortification on the ſouth ſide of the iſland. The Commodore, in the Magnanimous of eighty guns, with great difficulty got under the protection of Fort Royal, and a battery of forty guns on the oppoſite ſhore; but being in great hurry and confuſion, run aground, where he lay forty-eight hours, and received conſiderable damage. Vice-Admiral Townſend ſpent the remainder of this, and all the three following days, in cutting out, burning, and deſtroying the merchant ſhips, of which fifteen were taken, three burnt, and ſome bulged upon the rocks the firſt day of the purſuit; though the French had above thirty ſail either taken, ſunk, burnt, or deſtroyed; which was a ſevere ſtroke on their Weſt India trade, and in particular aggravated the diſtreſs of the inhabitants of Martinico, who were already in a deplorable condition.

Vice-Admiral Townſend afterwards put into Prince Rupert's bay in the iſland of Dominica, about nine leagues north of Martinico, and 47 N. W. of Barbadoes; from whence he repaired to Antigua, and continued on that ſtation till the 9th of November, when he proceeded to lie off St. Pierre's in Martinico; by which diſpoſition, the iſland was precluded from receiving any ſupplies: and a privateer of twenty guns, and 200 men, commanded by Captain Ballanki, who had done the greateſt miſchief of any privateer in America, fell into the hands of the Britiſh ſquadron. The Vice-Admiral alſo took five Dutch ſhips bound to Martinico, with proviſions from St. Euſtatia; and ſo cloſely inveſted the iſland, that the ſcarcity of proviſions occaſioned the deaths of ſeveral thouſands of Negroes and common people of Martinico.

In Auguſt 1761, his Majeſty's ſhips the Temple, Captain O'Bryen, and Griffin, Captain Taylor, being on a cruize in concert, off the Granades, received intelligence that his Majeſty's ſloop of war the Virgin, (which had been formerly taken by the enemy, her commander, Captain St. Loo, being killed in the engagement) was then lying, together with three privateers of twelve guns, and 165 men each, under protection of three forts, in a bay belonging to Martinico, and were preparing to ſail in company together on a cruize. Upon which Captain O'Bryen reſolved to go in queſt of them. Accordingly, both the ſaid commanders got cloſe with their ſhips in ſhore, and came up with the ſaid forts, one of eight twenty-four and thirty-two pounders, another of ſix eighteen and twenty-four pounders, and a third, flanking the entrance into the bay, of two batteries of two guns each, twelve and ſix pounders. The attack was carried on ſo briſkly from both ſhips, that notwithſtanding a vigorous defence of ſeveral hours, they ſilenced all the enemy's guns, demoliſhed and beat down into the ſea both forts and batteries, and cut out and carried off all the ſaid four prizes. That afterwards, they attacked another fort on the ſaid iſland, of ſix twenty-four pounders, and after beating down and demoliſhing the ſame, entered the harbour, where they lay four days, firing morning and evening guns all the time; and at their departure, cut out and carried off with them three more of the enemy's ſhips. That in their ſeveral attacks, though the enemy made a ſtout defence, the Temple had but one man killed and two wounded, beſides the firſt lieutenant, who loſt his thigh by a cannon ſhot. On board the Griffin, the cockſwain of the Temple was killed, and only five men wounded.

MARTINICO TAKEN IN 1762. The fleet and army ordered upon this expedition, conſiſted of eighteen ſhips of the line, beſides bombs, fireſhips, and frigates, and eighteen battalions, under General Monkton. They aſſembled, and were all arrived at Barbadoes by the 24th of December, and ſailed with ſuch diligence, that they arrived in the bay of St. Ann's on the 7th of January, and there caſt anchor, after the forts on the coaſt were ſilenced, by the ſhips ordered under Sir James Douglas for that ſervice; with the loſs of the Raiſonable, which was bulged on a little reef of rocks, as ſhe was leading in for one of the enemy's batteries. But the men ſtores and guns were ſaved. The General had deſigned to land on the weſtern ſide of this bay, and to have croſſed over to Fort-Royal bay; but was obliged to deſiſt from that intention, on account of the ſcarcity of freſh water in that part, and the difficulties that would attend his getting proviſions and ſtores. He then detached Brigadiers Haviland and Grant, with two brigades to reconnoitre the coaſt and ſhore of Ance Darlet, where they landed, and marched to the ground oppoſite to the iſland, but found the roads impaſſable for cannon. With the above command were the light infantry, under Lieutenant-Colonel Scott, who were advanced the night the command remained there, and were attacked in the night by three companies of grenadiers, ſome free-booters, Negroes, and Mulattoes, which which the enemy had paſſed over from Fort-Royal; but they were ſo warmly received, that they retreated precipitately, leaving ſome dead, and a ſerjeant and three of their grenadiers taken priſoners, without any loſs on our ſide. Being thus ſituated, it was reſolved to make an attempt between Point Negro and the Cas de Pilotte, where a landing was effected without the loſs of a man, near the Caiſe de Navire, on the 16th, under the favour of the ſquadron, which ſilenced the batteries on the ſhore above the landing place.

General Monckton formed the march of his army towards the ſeat of action, incumbered with difficulties and dangers, having many ravines or gullies, very deep and difficult of acceſs, and well covered and guarded with batteries, redoubts, and both the ſlaves and natives in arms. This obliged him to begin his operations with erecting batteries for his own ſecurity, in order to carry his approaches firſt to the heights of Mount Grenie and Mount Tortenſon, which the enemy had made as ſtrong as art could make them, and having driven them from thence, to proceed with the ſiege of Fort Royal. His diſpoſitions being made for the attack of thoſe heights, the troops, on the 24th of January, advanced at break of day, under a briſk fire of their own batteries. The grenadiers, under Brigadier Grant, firſt falling in with the enemy's advanced poſts, began the attack. Brigadier Rufane, on the right, with his brigade, and the marines, was to advance and attack the redoubts along the coaſt; 1000 ſeamen, in the flat-bottomed boats, rowed up as he advanced: Lord Rollo's brigade ſupported the grenadiers. Brigadier Walſh, with his brigade, (ſupporting the light infantry under Lieutenant-Colonel Scott), to attack the left of a plantation, and to endeavour to get round the enemy. The light infantry effected their attempt, and while the grenadiers were driving the enemy from poſt to poſt, they got upon their left, which helped to complete the event of the day. The enemy's works were now ſucceſſively attacked with the moſt irreſiſtible impetuoſity; ſo that at nine o'clock, our troops were in entire poſſeſſion of all their works, and the ſtrong ground of Morne Tortenſon, conſiſting of many redoubts mounted with cannon, and advantageouſly ſituated, to aſſiſt the natural great ſtrength of the country. The enemy retired in the greateſt confuſion to the town of Fort Royal, and to Morne Garnier, (a ſtill higher hill than the Morne Tortenſon, and ſeparated from it by a deep ravine, covered with a very thick bruſh, and a rivulet at the bottom), from whence they thought they were never to be diſlodged, both from its natural ſtrength, and the works and batteries they had on it. The ſpirit of the grenadiers in this attack was ſuch, that ſome of them even purſued the enemy to the bridge of the town, and brought off priſoners from thence.

While this was doing on this ſide, Brigadier Haviland, with his brigade, two battalions of Highlanders, and a corps of light infantry, formed from the ſeveral regiments, commanded by Major Leland, had orders (from the reported practicability of the paſſage) to croſs the ravine a good deal to the left, and attack a body of the enemy who were poſted on ſeveral heights oppoſite to him, and to try to get in on their left, and by that means to divide their force. Yet, although they began their march at two o'clock in the morning, ſuch was the difficulty of acceſs, after every means had been tried, that it was late before they effected it.

When General Monckton found that the enemy were giving way on all ſides, he ordered Lieutenant-Colonel Scott's light infantry, Brigadier Walſh's brigade, and a diviſion of the grenadiers, to a plantation more to the left, where Brigadier Haviland was to have come down; they drove off ſome of the enemy poſted there; and the light infantry poſſeſſed themſelves of a very advantageous poſt oppoſite to Morne Garnier: to ſupport them, the General ordered Brigadier Haviland's corps (which had now paſſed) to their right: the diviſion of grenadiers, under Brigadier Grant, and Walſh's brigade, kept poſſeſſion of this upper plantation, and communicated with Haviland's corps. The marines, taken from Brigadier Rufane, were poſted to cover the road between the two plantations.

On the 25th, they began to erect batteries on Morne Tortenſon, againſt the citadel of Fort Royal, but were much annoyed on that and the following day, by the enemy from Morne Garnier. Finding that it was abſolutely neceſſary to attack this place to the left, where the corps of light infantry, and Brigadier Haviland's brigade, were poſted, the General determined immediately to erect batteries againſt thoſe of the enemy which annoyed his troops, and which might alſo cover a paſſage of the ravine. On the 27th, about four o'clock in the evening, the enemy, under cover of their batteries, and with the greateſt part of their force, had the temerity to attack the two corps of light infantry and Brigadier Haviland's brigade in the poſts they occupied, but were received with ſuch ſteadineſs, that they were immediately repulſed; and ſuch was the ardour of the troops, that they paſſed the ravine with the enemy, ſeized their batteries, and took poſt there; being reinforced by Brigadier Walſh's brigade, and the diviſion of grenadiers under Brigadier Grant, who immediately, on the attack, had marched to ſupport them. Night was now come on; but Major Leland moving on to the left with his light infantry, and finding no oppoſition, continued his route towards the enemy's redoubt, which he ſoon came up to, and took poſſeſſion of, the enemy (except a few grenadiers who were made priſoners) having abandoned it. Their troops retired into the town and citadel, and the militia diſperſed in the country. Brigadiers Walſh, Grant, and Haviland, immediately moved up to ſupport the light infantry; ſo that at nine o'clock at night, his Majeſty's troops were in poſſeſſion of this very ſtrong poſt which entirely commanded the citadel. So precipitate was the enemy's flight, that they left a mortar loaded, and eight or nine guns unſpiked, with a quantity of ammunition and proviſions. The cannon and mortar were turned againſt the citadel in the morning.

Having gained this advantageous poſt, from which the enemy had ſo much annoyed us, and having completed two batteries on Morne Tortenſon, conſiſting of fourteen guns and three mortars, they were opened on the 30th; but finding that the diſtance was too great, and having now Morne Capuchin in his power (not more than 400 yards diſtant from the fort), as well as the poſſeſſion of the town, the General immediately reſolved to erect batteries at both theſe places, the ſooner to reduce the citadel; and for the eaſier conveyance of his cannon by water, he ordered Major Leland, with his light infantry, to take poſt on the river Monſieur.

The enemy perceiving their deſigns, on the evening of the 3d inſtant beat the chamade: in conſequence of which, the gate of the citadel was delivered up to his Majeſty's troops the evening of 4th, and at nine o'clock next morning, the garriſon marched out, on the terms of the capitulation. It conſiſted of about 800 men, grenadiers, marines, militia, and free-booters. About 150 of the garriſon were killed and wounded in the ſiege.

The total killed on our ſide were 96, including one captain, five lieutenants, one enſign, and three ſerjeants; and the total wounded were 389, including one lieutenant-colonel, two majors, eleven captains, fifteen lieutenants, three enſigns, twenty ſerjeants, and five drummers.

This conqueſt of Fort Royal ſo intimidated the iſlanders, that they immediately ſent deputations from moſt quarters, to deſire likewiſe to capitulate: and on the 7th, Pidgeon Iſland, one of the defences of Fort Royal harbour, ſurrendered by ſummons, on the ſame terms granted to the citadel, the cannon excepted. However, the quarter of St. Pierre, and parts adjacent, being under the influence of M. La Touche, the Governor-General, who retired with ſome grenadiers to St. Pierre, after placing a garriſon in Fort Royal, ſeemed determined to diſpute the remainder of the iſland with our forces. Therefore it was reſolved to proceed without delay to beſiege St. Pierre. But deſpairing of relief, and terrified by the preparations making againſt them, thoſe quarters alſo, with the conſent of M. La Touche, eaſed them of that trouble by their offer of terms, ſent by two deputies on their part to capitulate; in conſequence of which, St. Pierre, and therewith the whole iſland of Martinico, was delivered up to his Britannic Majeſty's forces on the 14th of February.

MARTINICO, ENGAGEMENTS OFF IN 1779. For the particulars of which ſee the following letters.

Extract of a Letter from Rear-Admiral Hyde Parker to Mr. Stephens, dated Princeſs Royal, Gros-Iſlet bay, St. Lucia, December 23, 1779.

"Captain Sutton not having yet left the ſquadron, gives me an opportunity to deſire you will inform their lordſhips, that on the 18th inſtant, between eight and nine o'clock in the morning, the Preſton being between Martinico and St. Lucia, to windward, made the ſignal for a fleet; which was no ſooner obſerved on board the Princeſs Royal, than a ſignal was thrown out for the ſhips under my command to ſlip their cables, and chaſe to windward. The captains were then aſſembled at a court-martial; and as the ſhips were in a courſe of fitting, ſome lay on the heel, others had their ſails unbent, and from all of them great numbers were employed on ſhore in wooding and watering. Under theſe circumſtances, the alertneſs and diſpatch with which the ſhips put to ſea was ſurpriſing even to me, who am no ſtranger to the activity and briſkneſs of the Engliſh officers and ſeamen. As the ſquadron ſtood over for Fort Royal, the enemy's ſhips were diſcovered to be a convoy. Before four in the afternoon, nine or ten of them run themſelves on ſhore on the iſland of Martinico, and were ſet on fire by our boats, either immediately or the next morning. About the ſame time I obſerved the Boreas engaged with a French frigate in Fort Royal bay: a French Rear-Admiral, with two other 74 gun ſhips, ſlipped their cables and bore down upon him, which obliged the Boreas to ſheer off. This dexterous manœuvre ſaved their frigate, and ſome of their merchant ſhips. The French Admiral hauled his wind in good time, and kept plying for the road. The ſhips ahead of the Princeſs Royal at this time, were the Conqueror, Albion, Elizabeth, Vigilant, and Centurion, but the Conqueror ahead, and to windward of the reſt. About five, this ſhip got within diſtance of the French Rear-Admiral, who began the cannonade. The ſteadineſs and coolneſs with which, on every tack, the Conqueror received the fire of theſe three ſhips, and returned his own, working his ſhip with as much exactneſs as if he had been turning into Spithead, and on every board gaining conſiderably on the enemy, gave me infinite pleaſure, The reſt of the ſhips ſhewed no leſs eagerneſs to get into action. Towards ſun-ſet, the Albion had got well up to ſecond the Conqueror, and the other ſhips were in action: but as they had worked, not only within the danger of the ſhoals of this bay, but within the reach of the batteries, from whence were fired both ſhells and ſhot, I called them off by the night ſignal at a quarter before ſeven. It was with inexpreſſible concern I then heard, that Captain Walter Griffith was killed by the laſt broadſide. The ſervice cannot loſe a better man or a better officer. The Conqueror had three men killed and 11 wounded. The damage done to the ſhip is not very conſiderable, nor I believe to any of the other ſhips, as I have had no report from them: they are cruizing under Commodore Collingwood off the Point of Salines. We have taken nine ſail of this convoy, which came from Marſeilles under the convoy of the Aurora about the middle of October. I judge that, including the frigate, they were twenty-ſix in number; four more had loſt company, and are yet expected, rather at St. Lucia than Martinico. All of the French ſhips, except thoſe who were engaged, were in the Carenage, I believe in ill condition, and many of their crews in the hoſpital.

On the 20th, ſtanding with ſeven ſhips over to St. Lucia, late in the evening, I received a letter from Sir Henry Calder, informing me three large ſhips were ſeen that afternoon from the Morne, ſteering to the northward, ſuppoſed to be part of M. la Mothe Piquet's ſquadron returning from Granada. As I judged this intelligence very probable, Rear-Admiral Rowley was immediately detached in the Suffolk, with the Vengeance, Magnificent, and Stirling Caſtle, in purſuit of them.

P. S. I am well aſſured the Sphynx is retaken by the Proſerpine after a ſmart action. But as I have had no letters ſince that time from Commodore Hotham, I cannot give your lordſhips the particulars."

SIR,

The delay of the merchant ſhip, in which Captain Sutton is embarked, furniſhes me with the opportunity, and Admiral Rowley's return with the occaſion of my writing you a third letter, that you may inform their lordſhips of the ſucceſs of the cruize, which I do by tranſmitting a copy of his letter to me.

I am, Sir,

Your moſt obedient humble ſervant,

Extract of a Letter from Rear-Admiral Rowley to Rear-Admiral Hyde Parker, dated Suffolk at Sea, off Mount Fortune, January, 1780.

SIR,

I beg leave to acquaint you, that in purſuance of your order of the 20th of December laſt, I proceeded with the ſhips Suffolk, Vengeance, Magnificent, and Stirling Caſtle, in purſuit of the three ſhips which you had intelligence of.

On Tueſday the 21ſt, at eight A. M. three ſtrange ſail being diſcovered from the Suffolk's maſt-head in the north-weſt, I ordered the ſignal to be made for a general chaſe, which being obeyed with the greateſt alacrity, I had the ſatisfaction by noon, to find we gained upon them very faſt.

On Wedneſday the 22d, at three P. M. they hoiſted French colours, but ſoon after hauled them down again. At five, having come well up with the chaſe, which I could now plainly perceive were French frigates, I fired a ſhot at them, which was returned. At half an hour paſt ſix, the Magnificent exchanged ſeveral ſhot with one of the frigates, which, after a chaſe of fourteen hours, I had the pleaſure to ſee ſtrike to her. She proved to be La Blanche frigate, of 36 guns and 212 men, commanded by M. Galliſſoniere.

At eleven, La Fortuné frigate, of 42 guns and 217 men, commanded by the Chevalier Marigny, ſtruck to the Suffolk after a chaſe of eighteen hours. The Vengeance, on my lee quarter, having come up with La Blanche, took charge of her, and exchanged the priſoners, &c. while the Stirling-Caſtle and Magnificent continued the chaſe to leeward after the third ſhip, which they came up with and took, after a chaſe of 36 hours, on Thurſday the 23d ult. at three P. M. She proved to be La Ellis, of 28 guns and 68 men, commanded by M. Fonteneaux.

Extract of a Letter from Sir George Brydges Rodney to Mr. Stephens, dated on board the Sandwich, off Fort Royal Bay, Martinique, April 26, 1780.

"Since acquainting their lordſhips of my arrival at Barbadoes and St. Lucia, and taking upon me the command of his Majeſty's ſhips on this ſtation, the enemy, who had paraded for ſeveral days before St. Lucia with twenty-five ſhips of the line, and eight frigates full of troops, and were in hopes of ſurpriſing the iſland, were diſappointed in their views by the good diſpoſition made of the troops by General Vaughan, and of the ſhips by Rear-Admiral Parker. They retired into Fort Royal bay a few hours before my arrival at Gros-Iſlet bay on the 27th of March.

As ſoon as the fleet could poſſibly be got ready, I determined to return their viſit, and offer them battle; and accordingly, on the 2d of April, proceeded with the whole fleet off Fort Royal bay, where, for two days, I offered the enemy battle; the fleet being near enough to count all their guns, and at times within random ſhot of ſome of their forts. Monſieur de Guichen, notwithſtanding his ſuperior number, choſe to remain in port. I thought it moſt proper for his Majeſty's ſervice, to leave a ſquadron of copper-bottomed ſhips to watch the motions of the enemy, and to give me timely notice ſhould they attempt to ſail. With the other I anchored in Gros-Iſlet bay, ready at a moment's warning to cut or ſlip, in order to purſue or engage the enemy, ſhould they leave Fort Royal bay.

In this ſituation both fleets remained till the 15th inſtant, when the enemy with their whole force put to ſea in the middle of the night; immediate notice of which being given me, I followed them, and having looked into Fort Royal bay, and the road of St. Pierre, on the 16th, we got ſight of them about eight leagues to leeward of the pearl rock. A general chaſe to the north-weſt followed; and at five in the evening, we plainly diſcovered that they conſiſted of twenty-three ſail of the line, one fifty gun ſhip, three frigates, a lugger, and a cutter. When night came on, I formed the fleet in a line of battle a-head, and ordered the Venus and Greyhound frigates to keep between his Majeſty's and the enemy's fleet, to watch their motions, which was admirably well attended to by that good and veteran officer, Captain Ferguſon.

The manœuvres the enemy made during the night, indicated a with to avoid a battle, which I was determined they ſhould not, and therefore counteracted all their motions.

At day-light in the morning of the 17th, we ſaw the enemy diſtinctly beginning to form the line ahead: I made the ſignal for the line ahead at two cables length diſtance. At 45 minutes after ſix, I gave notice by public ſignal, that my intention was to attack the enemy's rear with my whole force, which ſignal was anſwered by every ſhip in the fleet. At ſeven A. M. perceiving the fleet too much extended, I made the ſignal for the line of battle, at one cable's length aſunder only. At 30 minutes after eight, A. M. I made a ſignal for a line of battle abreaſt, each ſhip bearing from the other N. by W. and S. by E. and bore down upon the enemy. This ſignal was penetrated by them, who diſcovered my intention, wore, and formed a line of battle on the other tack. I immediately made the ſignal to haul the wind, and form the line of battle ahead. At nine A. M. made the ſignal for the line of battle ahead, at two cables length on the larboard tack.

The different movements of the enemy obliged me to be very attentive, and watch every opportunity that offered of attacking them to advantage.

The manœuvres made by his Majeſty's fleet will appear to their lordſhips by the minutes of the ſignals made before and during the action. At eleven A. M. I made the ſignal to prepare for battle, to convince the whole fleet I was determined to bring the enemy to an engagement. At fifty minutes after eleven, A. M. I made the ſignal for every ſhip to bear down and ſteer for her oppoſite in the enemy's line, agreeable to the 21ſt article of the additional fighting inſtructions. At fifty-five minutes after eleven, A. M. I made the ſignal for battle. A few minutes after, the ſignal that it was my intention to engage cloſe, and of courſe, the Admiral's ſhip to be the example. A few minutes before one, P. M. one of the headmoſt ſhips began the action. At one P. M. the Sandwich in the centre, after having received ſeveral fires from the enemy, began to engage. Perceiving ſeveral of our ſhips engaging at a diſtance, I repeated the ſignal for a cloſe action. The action in the centre continued till fifteen minutes after four P. M. when M. Guichen, in the Couronne, in which they had mounted ninety guns, the Triumphant and Fendant, after engaging the Sandwich for an hour and a half, bore away. The ſuperiority of the fire from the Sandwich, and the gallant behaviour of her officers and men, enabled her to ſuſtain ſo unequal a combat; though, before attacked by them, ſhe had beat three ſhips out of their line of battle, had entirely broke it, and was to leeward of the wake of the French Admiral.

At the concluſion of the battle the enemy might be ſaid to be completely beat: but ſuch was the diſtance of the van and the rear from the centre, and the crippled condition of ſeveral ſhips, particularly the Sandwich, who for twenty-four hours, was with difficulty kept above water, that it was impoſſible to purſue them that night, without the greateſt diſadvantage. However, every endeavour was uſed to put the fleet in order: and I have the pleaſure to acquaint their lordſhips, that on the 20th, we again got ſight of the enemy's fleet, and for three ſucceſſive days purſued them, but without effect, they uſing every endeavour poſſible to avoid a ſecond action, and endeavoured to puſh for Fort Royal, Martinique. We cut them off. To prevent the riſk of another action, they took ſhelter under Guadaloupe.

As I found it was in vain to follow them with his Majeſty's fleet in the condition they were in, and every motion of the enemy indicating their intention of getting to Fort Royal Bay, Martinique, where alone they could repair their ſhattered fleet, I thought the only chance we had of bringing them again to action, was to be off Fort Royal before them; where the fleet under my command now is, in daily expectation of their arrival. I have diſpatched frigates to windward and to leeward of every iſland, to give me notice of their approach.

Admiral Parker acquaints me, that ſeveral ſhips of the enemy's van were greatly diſabled, and forced to bear away; his own ſhip was damaged, and the main-maſt in great danger.

Extract of a Letter from Admiral Sir George Brydges Rodney, Bart. Commander in Chief of his Majeſty's Ships at the Leeward Iſlands, to Mr. Stephens, dated in Carliſle Bay, Barbadoes, May 31, 1780.

Since my letter of the 26th of April from Fort Royal bay, ſent expreſs by the Pegaſus, I muſt deſire you will pleaſe to acquaint their lordſhips, that after greatly alarming the iſland of Martinique, whoſe inhabitants had been made to believe his Majeſty's fleet had been defeated, but were ſoon convinced to the contrary, by its appearance before their port, where it continued till the condition of many of the ſhips under my command, and the lee currents, rendered it neceſſary for the fleet to anchor in Chocque Bay, St. Lucia, in order to put the wounded and ſick men on ſhore, and to water and refit the fleet; frigates have been detached both to windward and to leeward of every iſland, in order to gain intelligence of the motions of the enemy, and timely notice of their approach towards Martinique, the only place they could refit at in theſe ſeas.

Having

Having landed the wounded and ſick men, watered and refitted the fleet, on the 6th of May, upon having received intelligence of the enemy's approach to windward of Martinique, I put to ſea with nineteen ſail of the line, two fifty gun ſhips, and ſeveral frigates.

From the 6th to the 10th of May, the fleet continued turning to windward between Martinique and St. Lucia, when we got ſight of the French fleet, about three leagues to windward of us, Point Saline, on Martinique, then bearing N. N. E. five leagues; Captain Affleck, in the Triumph, joining me the ſame day.

The enemy's fleet conſiſted of twenty-three ſail of the line, ſeven frigates, two ſloops, a cutter, and a lugger. Nothing could induce them to riſk a general action, though it was in their power daily. They made, at different times, motions which indicated a deſire of engaging, but their reſolution failed them when they drew near; and as they ſailed far better than his Majeſty's fleet, they with eaſe could gain what diſtance they pleaſed to windward.

As they were ſenſible of their advantage in ſailing, it emboldened them to run greater riſks, and approach nearer to his Majeſty's ſhips than they would otherwiſe have done; and for ſeveral days, about the hour of two in the afternoon, they bore down in a line of battle abreaſt, and brought to the wind a little more than random ſhot diſtance.

As I watched every opportunity of gaining the wind, and forcing them to battle, the enemy, on my ordering the fleet to make a great deal of ſail on the 15th upon a wind, had the vanity to think we were retiring, and with a preſs of ſail approached us much nearer than uſual. I ſuffered them to enjoy the deception, and their van ſhip to approach abreaſt of my centre; when by a lucky change of wind, perceiving I could weather the enemy, I made the ſignal for the third in command, who then led the van, to tack with his ſquadron, and gain the wind of the enemy. The enemy's fleet inſtantly wore, and fled with a crowd of ſail.

His Majeſty's fleet, by this manœuvre, had gained the wind, and would have forced the enemy to battle, had it not at once changed ſix points when near the enemy, and enabled them to recover that advantage. However, it did not enable them to weather his Majeſty's fleet ſo much, but the van, led by that good and gallant officer Captain Bowyer, about ſeven in the evening, reached their centre, and was followed by Rear-Admiral Rowley's ſquadron (who then led the van), the centre and rear of his Majeſty's fleet following in order.

As the enemy were under a preſs of ſail, none but the van of his Majeſty's fleet could come in for any part of the action, without waſting his Majeſty's powder and ſhot; the enemy wantonly expending a deal of theirs at ſuch a diſtance as to have no effect.

The Albion, Captain Bowyer, and the Conqueror, Rear-Admiral Rowley, were the ſhips that ſuffered moſt in that rencounter. But I am ſure, from the ſlackneſs of their fire, in compariſon to that of the van of his Majeſty's fleet, the enemy's rear muſt have ſuffered very conſiderably.

The enemy kept an awful diſtance till the 19th inſt. when I was in hopes that I ſhould have weathered them, but had the mortification to be diſappointed in thoſe hopes. However, as they were convinced their rear could not eſcape action, they ſeemed to have taken a reſolution of riſking a general one; and when their van had weathered us, they bore away along our line to windward, and began a heavy cannonade, but at ſuch a diſtance, as to do little or no execution. However, their rear could not eſcape, being cloſely attacked by the ſhips of the van, then led by Commodore Hotham; and with pleaſure I can ſay, that the fire of his Majeſty's ſhips was far ſuperior to that of the enemy, who muſt have received great damage by the rencounter.

The Albion and Conqueror ſuffered much in this laſt action, and ſeveral other ſhips received conſiderable damage; a liſt of which, as likewiſe of the killed and wounded, I have the honour to incloſe.

The purſuit of the enemy had led us forty leagues directly to windward of Martinique; and as the enemy had ſtood to the northward with all the ſails they could poſſibly preſs, and were out of ſight the 21ſt inſt. the condition of his Majeſty's ſhips being ſuch as not to allow a longer purſuit, I ſent the Conqueror, Cornwall, and Boyne, to St. Lucia, and ſtood with the remainder of his Majeſty's ſhips towards Barbadoes, in order to put the ſick and wounded on ſhore, and repair the ſquadron.

For an account of another engagement near this iſland in 1781, ſee the following Extract of a Letter from Rear-Admiral Sir Samuel Hood, Bart. to Admiral Sir George Brydges Rodney, Bart. Knight of the Bath, Commander in Chief of his Majeſty's Ships at the Leeward Iſlands, dated Barfleur at Sea, May 4, 1781.

At ſeven A. M. on Saturday the 28th of laſt month, his Majeſty's ſhip Amazon being to windward of Point Salines, diſcovered a very large fleet, and at nine, her ſignal of it was repeated to me by the Ruſſel, which ſhip I had juſt ordered to St. Lucia, having 130 ſick on board, and ſhe came back again to me.

I immediately made the ſignal for a general chaſe to the S. E. in order to bring all the ſhips well up to windward, and at ten I formed the line a-head at two cable's length aſunder. On opening Rock Diamond, ſaw nothing of the fleet but from the maſt-head, which were then upon a wind to the ſouthward. Captain Finch, very properly, ſo ſoon as he ſaw his ſignal repeated, ſtood back to reconnoitre the fleet. At twelve he returned near enough for me to ſee his ſignal for an enemy of ſuperior force; and upon my deſiring to know how many ſhips of the line there were, he anſwered nineteen. A little before two Captain Finch came on board, and informed me, that he ſaw nineteen ſail of the line very diſtinctly, and two others of two decks, that he thought were armed en flute. The number of frigates he could not aſcertain, as three only were drawn out from the convoy: that the convoy was very numerous, and the whole ſtanding to the northward, which was the ſituation we ſaw part of them in at ſunſet from the maſt-head, moſt of them being to the northward of Point Salines.

I ſent Captain Finch immediately to tell Rear-Admiral Drake I deſired to ſee him: upon his coming on board, I told him I ſhould continue the line a-head, and get to windward as much as I could, by carrying all my plain ſail, and be cloſe in with Fort Royal at day-light, as it was uncertain which way the enemy would come, which he was pleaſed to ſay was the beſt I could do. I ordered Captain Finch to windward again, to endeavour to get ſight of the enemy, and upon diſtinctly ſeeing them, to make certain ſignals I gave him, that I might know whether they were upon the ſtarboard or larboard tack, or coming before the wind. Juſt after ſun-ſet I tacked the ſquadron all together, ſtood to the northward, and kept cloſe in with Fort Royal all night.

Saw nothing of the enemy, or Amazon, at day-light. A little before nine the Amazon joined me, the enemy then in ſight, coming down between Point Salines and the Diamond Rock: made the ſignal for a cloſe line, and to prepare for action. At nine the enemy appeared, forming the line of battle. Twenty minutes paſt nine the Prince William joined me from Gros Iſlet Bay, and as I ſent for her but the night before, Captain Douglas's exertion muſt have been great, and does him much credit, to be with me ſo ſoon, having the greateſt part of his crew to collect in the night. Twenty-ſeven minutes paſt nine hoiſted our colours, as did the French Admiral and his fleet. At fifteen minutes paſt ten, made the Shrewſbury's ſignal to alter her courſe to windward, ſhe being the leading ſhip; but ſoon perceived the wind had ſhifted, and that ſhe was as cloſe to the wind as ſhe could lay. At thirty-five minutes paſt ten, tacked the ſquadron all together, the van of the enemy being almoſt abreaſt of our centre, and at eleven began to fire, which I took no notice of. At this time the ſhips in Fort Royal Bay ſlipped their cables, and got under ſail. At twenty minutes paſt eleven, I tacked the ſqadron all together, and repeated the ſignal for a cloſe order of battle. At twenty-five minutes paſt eleven, finding the enemy's ſhot to go over us, hoiſted the ſignal for engaging; and in paſſing, our van and the enemy's rear exchanged ſome broadſides. At forty minutes paſt eleven, the enemy tacked. At forty-five minutes paſt eleven, made the ſignal for the rear to cloſe the centre. At fifty-five minutes paſt eleven, finding it impoſſible to get up to the enemy's fleet, I invited it to come to me, by bringing the ſquadron to under their topſails. At half paſt twelve, the French Admiral, in the Bretagne, began to fire at the Barfleur, which was immediately returned, and the action became general, but at too great a diſtance; and, I believe, never was more powder and ſhot thrown away in one day. But it was with Monſieur de Graſſe the option of diſtance lay. It was not poſſible for me to go nearer. At one, I made the ſignal for the van to fill, the French having filled, and drawing a-head. At ſeventeen minutes paſt one, made the Shrewſbury's ſignal (the leading ſhip) to make more ſail, and ſet the top gallant ſails. At thirty-four nutes paſt one, repeated the ſignal for a cloſe line of battle, and finding not one in ten of the enemy's ſhot reach us, I ceaſed firing. The enemy did the ſame ſoon after; but their van and ours being ſomewhat nearer, continued to engage: and though the French Admiral had ten ſail a-ſtern of him, and three others to windward, he did not make a nearer approach.

The merchant ſhips at this time, were hauling in cloſe under the land, attended by two ſhips of two decks, ſuppoſed to be armed en flute, and two frigates. At eighteen minutes paſt three, the firing ceaſed between our van and that of the enemy: made the Shrewſbury's ſignal to make more ſail, in order to get to windward of the enemy. At forty-five minutes paſt four, ſent Captain Finch to the Shrewſbury, to order Captain Robinſon to keep as near the wind, and carry all the ſail he could, ſo as to preſerve the line of battle, and to return back along the line to acquaint every captain of the ſame. At fifty-ſeven minutes paſt five, the packet going to Antigua, which had kept company with the ſquadron, came within hail, to acquaint me, by order of Rear-Admiral Drake, that the Ruſſel was in great diſtreſs, having received ſeveral ſhot between wind and water: that the water was over the platform of the magazine, and gaining upon the pumps, and that three of their guns were diſmounted. At eighteen minutes paſt ſix, made the Ruſſel's ſignal to come within hail, which was anſwered. The enemy's fleet, conſiſting of twenty-four ſail of the line, at this time about four miles to windward. At half paſt ſeven, Captain Sutherland, of the Ruſſel, came on board, whom I ordered, if he could poſſibly, by exertion, keep the ſhip above water, to proceed to St. Euſtatius, or any other port he could make, and acquaint Sir George Rodney of all that had paſſed. At forty-five minutes paſt nine the Lizard came within hail, to inform me, by the deſire of Captain Sutherland, that he had bore away.

On Monday, April the 30th, at day-light, found the van and centre of the ſquadron ſeparated at ſome diſtance from the Barfleur and rear, owing to the fluttering winds and calms in the night, which would not allow us to keep the Barfleur's head the right way, and ſhe went round and round two or three times, while the other ſhips had light airs; and finding the enemy's advanced ſhips ſteering for our van, made all poſſible ſail towards them, and threw out the ſignal for a cloſe line of battle; the enemy's line a good deal extended and ſcattered. At ſeven, the ſquadron under my command being pretty well formed, the enemy's advanced ſhips hauled off. At fifty-ſix minutes paſt ſeven, made the ſignal for the rear to cloſe the centre, as the enemy ſeemed to ſhew a diſpoſition to attack it. At thirty-five minutes paſt eight, having very light airs of wind, the ſquadron was thrown nearly into a line a-breaſt; made the ſignal for continuing in that form, leſt by endeavouring to regain the line a-head, it might become extended.

At eleven o'clock I made the ſignal for a line a-head, at two cables length aſunder: the wind backing to the eaſtward, favoured my forming in that order, the better to receive the enemy, then about three miles to windward. At fourteen minutes paſt eleven, made the the ſignal for the rear to cloſe the centre. At twelve, falling little wind again, and all the ſhips being thrown into a line a-breaſt, made a ſignal for a line-abreaſt, to keep the ſquadron as cloſe together as poſſible. At twenty-five minutes paſt twelve, the wind blowing ſteady at S. E. made the ſignal for a general chaſe to windward, with a deſign of weathering the enemy, which I ſhould certainly have ſucceeded in, had the breeze continued; but the wind dying away at four, I found it impracticable to weather the enemy, and therefore made the ſignal for a line ahead: and having been informed that the Intrepid made ſo much water they could ſcarce keep her free, and that the Centaur was in the ſame ſtate, owing to the number of ſhot between wind and water, and that her lower maſts were very badly wounded, I judged it improper to dare the enemy to battle any longer, and therefore thought it my indiſpenſable duty to bear up, and made the ſignal for it at eight o'clock. At ten brought to for the ſquadron to cloſe. At 40 minutes paſt ten made ſail. At five A. M. the 1ſt inſtant, ſaw the enemy's fleet aſtern, about eight or nine miles diſtant. At twenty-ſix minutes paſt five, brought to for the Torbay and Paccahunta to come up, which were within reach of the enemy's guns; and the former received a good deal of damage in her maſts and rigging. At 45 minutes paſt ſeven, the enemy ceaſed firing upon the Torbay. Sent the Amazon to tow the Paccahunta up. At eight made the ſignal for a cloſe line, bearing north and ſouth of each other. At 49 minutes paſt twelve made the ſignal, and brought to upon the larboard tack, and made the ſignal for the ſtate and condition of the ſquadron; the enemy bearing eaſt, ſtanding to the northward At 33 minutes paſt three, made the ſignal for a cloſe line, north and ſouth. At four, the enemy tacked to the ſouthward, and were ſtanding that way at ſun-ſet. In the evening, though it was almoſt calm, the main-topmaſt of the Intrepid fell to pieces over the ſide. At ſeven, made ſail to the northward, it being the opinion of the officers of the ſquadron acquainted with this country, that it was the only way of getting to windward, as the currents run very ſtrong to leeward to the ſouthward of St. Vincent's.

I am very much concerned to acquaint you, that Captain Nott, of his Majeſty's ſhip Centaur, and her firſt lieutenant, were killed in the action. I put Captain Smith, of the Paccahunta, to command the Centaur, Lieutenant John Davall Burr to command the Paccahunta, and Mr. George Bowen to be lieutenant of the Centaur.

During the action, there were thirty-ſix killed, and 161 wounded.

MARTINICO, February 5, 1794. The expedition under Sir John Jervis, and Sir Charles Grey, ſailed from Barbadoes on the 3d of February, with a fair wind, for Martinique. A ſloop diſpatched from St. Vincent's, on the 5th, returned on the 8th, with the following intelligence, communicated in a letter from an officer in the fleet, viz. that the whole chain of forts, from Miram Bay to Pigeon Iſland, had ſurrendered to the Britiſh arms: that Lieutenant-General Grey was at that time before Pigeon Iſland, which he meant to attack the next morning. The Admiral ſent a flag to ſummon St. Pierre the morning the ſloop ſailed. General Dundas had landed on the preceding Wedneſday at Trinity, and had not returned when theſe advices came away. The fort at Miram, during the attack, had put ſeveral thirty-two pound ſhot into the bow of the Boyne, the flag ſhip, and alſo into the Irreſiſtible, by which one ſeaman was killed.

A Letter, of which the following is a Copy, from General Sir Charles Grey, K. B. dated from Martinico the 16th of March, 1794.

Camp before Fort Bourbon, Iſland of Martinico.

SIR,

In my diſpatch of the 2d ultimo I had the honour to acquaint you, that the force deſtined for the expedition was then embarked, in Carliſle Bay at Barbadoes; and, having ſailed very early in the morning of the 3d, I have now the ſatisfaction to add, that we are in poſſeſſion of the whole iſland of Martinico, excepting forts Bourbon and Royal, which I hold completely and cloſely beſieged; the latter being, however, entirely in our power to deſtroy at pleaſure.

Having made diſpoſitions for three ſeparate landings, diſtant from each other, not only for the purpoſe of dividing the enemy's force and attention, but to alarm him in every quarter at the ſame time, I have the pleaſure to ſay they all ſucceeded, viz.—At La Trinite, by a diviſion under Major-General Dundas and Commodore Thompſon, on the 5th and 6th of February; at Caiſe de Navire, to leeward, by another, under Colonel Sir Charles Gordon, aſſiſted by Colonel Myers, and Captain Rogers of the navy, on the 8th following; and near Trois Rivieres, St. Luce, Cul de Sac Marin, where Lieutenant-General Preſcot and I were. All theſe ſervices were executed with great ſpirit and ability by the officers, who ſeverally commanded, and were well ſupported by the troops.

Major-General Dundas immediately advanced, with Colonel Campbell of the 9th foot, Lieutenant-Colonel Coote of the 70th, and the 1ſt battalion of light infantry, and carried Morne Le Brun, under a heavy fire of muſquetry, on the 6th; and inſtantly detaching Lieutenant-Colonel Craddock with the 2d battalion of grenadiers, and Major Evatt with three companies of light Infantry to attack Trinite Fort, the enemy fled, and our troops got poſſeſſion of it, with the cannon ſtores, &c. During the ſame night, Bellegarde, the popular leader of the Mulattos and Blacks, evacuated the fort bearing his name, and, leaving his artillery, &c. ſet fire to the town of Trinite; great part of which was, however, ſaved by the activity of Captain Saliſbury and the ſeamen, Proceeding to the Gros Morne, he gained that poſt by twelve o'clock at night on the 7th, Major Skerrett being left to command at Trinite Fort. Puſhing forward again, he ſeized Morne Bruneau at noon of the 9th, the enemy retreating at his approach; and detaching Lieutenant-Colonel Craddock, with three companies of grenadiers, he took poſſeſſion of Forte Matilde, which covered a good landing within in two miles of his left. The 10th following, he detached Colonel Campbell, with five companies of light infantry, who ſeized Colon during the night. Lieutenant-Colonel Craddock being reinforced the ſame evening at the Poſt of Matilde, with the 33d company of grenadiers, was, however, attacked, and ſuſtained ſome loſs during that night, (among whom was Captain Mackewen, of the 38th grenadiers, an officer of much merit) by Bellegarde and a conſiderable number of the enemy; but, on being charged with bayonets by the grenadiers of the 9th regiment, headed by Lieutenant-Colonel Craddock, they were totally repulſed. Colonel Campbell being reinforced at Colon on the 11th by Lieutenant-Colonel Coote and four companies of light infantry, he took poſſeſſion of the ſtrong poſt of Lemaitre, leaving the 65th regiment at Colon, which was three times attacked during the night, and repulſed the enemy with great ſpirit.

That part of the army which landed with me near Trois Rivieres the 6th of February, proceeded the ſame evening to Riviere Salee, getting the troops under cover in the village of that name at ſeven o'clock the ſame evening, having detached Brigadier-General Whyte, on this day's march, with the 2d battalion of light infantry, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Cloſe, and two Amuzettes, to force the batteries of Cape Solomon and Bourges, in order to get poſſeſſion of Pigeon Iſland, as our ſhipping could not go into Port Royal, which was even dangerous for boats in ſupplying the army at Salee with proviſions, till that might be accompliſhed. The following day, the 7th of Feb. he took two ſmall pieces of cannon, loaded, at a ſmall village in the bay d'Arlet, 150 mulattos having fled at his approach; and marching to the attack of the two batteries abovementioned, they ſurrendered at diſcretion, not having the means to eſcape. In the mean time I had received intelligence of the enemy's landing troops, and taking poſt on Morne Pied, to cut off the communication between Brigadier-General Whyte and head quarters at Salee, and ordered the 70th regiment, with two howitzers, to march the ſame night and diſlodge them, which was executed with great ſpirit, and the poſt taken poſſeſſion of early in the morning of the 9th, under the good conduct of the Adjutant-General Colonel Dundas, the 70th regiment being commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Johnſon, and the enemy completely defeated at the firſt charge.

Brigadier-General Whyte, being reinforced with a detachment of the royal artillery, ſome ordnance, mortars, &c. Colonel Symes, and two companies of the 15th regiment, 200 ſeamen armed with pikes and piſtols from the Admiral, aſcended the heights on the 9th, and, aided by the unequalled exertions of the ſeamen under Lieutenants Rogers and Rutherford, got poſſeſſion of Mount Mathurine, which commands Pigeon iſland, at the diſtance of about 400 yards, where he erected batteries, aſſiſted by the zeal and activity of Colonel Symes. The two five and a half inch howitzers, brought by the 70th regiment from head quarters, being now placed on the battery, ſo as to take the iſland in reverſe, under the direction of Captain de Rouſigne of the royal artillery, whoſe conduct was conſpicuouſly meritorious; and Colonel Durnford, chief engineer, having alſo joined with a company of artificers, the batteries were completed during the night of the 10th, and opened in the morning of the 11th, under the conduct of an excellent officer, Captain Manley, who kept up ſo inceſſant and well-directed a fire, as to force the garriſon to ſtrike their colours, and ſurrender at diſcretion in little more than two hours, fifteen being killed and twenty-five wounded, and having conſiſted of 203 when our batteries opened. The higheſt encomiums are due to all the officers, ſoldiers and ſeamen of this diviſion, particularly to Brigadier-General Whyte and Colonel Symes, whoſe good conduct and exertions could not be excelled.

The 15th regiment, led by Mayor Lyon, and commanded by Captain Paumier, ſurprized ſeveral hundred of the enemy, very ſtrongly poſted on the heights of Le Grand Bouclain, the 12th following, killing ſeveral, and taking all their arms ammunition, cattle, &c.

I have mentioned before that Colonel Sir Charles Gordon, aſſiſted by Colonel Myers and Captain Rogers of the Navy, had landed to Leeward, on the ſide of Caſe de Navire, on the 8th. The enemy being maſter of the Great Road and the heights above it, he made a movement towards the Mountains and turning them, unperceived, with part of his force, gained the moſt commanding point in that part of the country, by day-break of the 9th. Colonel Myers deſcending the heights, took poſſeſſion of La Chapelle, and a poſt eſtabliſhed by the enemy above it; proceeded through the moſt difficult ground to the heights of Berne, above Ance La Haye, the enemy abandoning the batteries of Cayman, and ſetting fire to the village, keeping a conſtant fire on him from the battery of St. Catharine's. He then took a poſition, which gave him an eaſy communication with the tranſports, when, on the 12th, he obſerved the battery and works at St. Catharine's, and the poſts which guarded the firſt ravines, were abandoned by the enemy, of which he took poſſeſſion, while Colonel Myers, with five companies of grenadiers, and the 43d regiment, croſſed four ravines higher up, ſeizing all the batteries that defended them; which movement was completely ſucceſsful, the enemy flying on every ſide, and our troops were ſoon in poſſeſſion of the five batteries between Caſe de Navire and Fort Royal. He then proceeded, and occupied the poſts of Gentilly, La Coſte and L'Archet. The good abilities and conduct of Colonel Sir Charles Gordon and Colonel Myers were eminently manifeſted throughout this difficult ſervice, and all the troops of that diviſion have performed their duty moſt meritoriouſly.

As the bay and harbour of port Royal had been completely opened to our ſhipping by the capture of Pigeon Iſland, I moved forward with the troops from Riviere Salee, to the poſt of Bruneau, and joined Lieutenant-General Preſcott the 14th; and having previouſly concerted the attack of the town of St. Pierre with Major General Dundas, he marched the ſame evening on that enterprize with the ſecond battalion of grenadiers, the 33d and 40th light companies, and the 65th regiment, to Gros Morne, from whence he detached Colonel Campbell, through the woods by Bois le Buc, with the

the two light companies and 65th regiment, to reach Montigne on the morning of the 16th, proceeding himſelf towards the heights of Capot and Calabaſſe; they were evacuated by the enemy; and, from the latter he ſaw Colonel Campbell at Poſt au Pin, half a mile ſhort of Montigne, attacked in great force, and, under a heavy fire, from five or ſix hundred of the enemy ſtrongly poſted: the Major-General puſhed forward his advanced guard, conſiſting of ſixty-three men, under command of the Hon. Captain Ramſay, of the Queen's, who, gaining the ſummit by extraordinary exertions, fired on the enemy who were engaged with Colonel Campbell, and ſilenced their fire; and when joined by the 2d battalion of grenadiers, the detachment of the Queen's took poſſeſſion of Montigne, were it was reinforced with two companies of grenadiers, taking poſt himſelf on Morne Rouge; and then viſiting Colonel Campbell's column, found it had been attacked at half paſt nine o'clock in the morning; the enemy being within twenty yards of the 40th light company, had charged them with bayonets at the head of it, when he was killed; and in him his Majeſty's ſervice loſt a moſt excellent officer and a valuable man, juſtly lamented by the whole army and navy. Major-General Dundas now obſerved large bodies of the enemy moving toward his front at Morne Rouge, and forming under a ſmall redoubt near that poſt; he therefore haſtened back, and was inſtantly attacked by five or ſix hundred men, which laſted about twenty minutes, when the fire ceaſed, and the enemy abandoned the redoubt in front during the night, leaving two field pieces, &c. At day-break, the 17th, theſe two columns advanced, the right to Le Jeune, the left to the Colonial Redoubt, and on the march he received a letter from the commandant of St. Pierre, to which he returned an anſwer by a flag, but the Commandant was not to be found: in the mean time, Colonel Symes had landed, and was already in the town, who, agreeable to the plan I had originally concerted for the co-operation with Major-General Dundas, had embarked with three light companies, and Major Maitland, with a detachment of the 58th regiment, to land north of the town; five companies of the 1ſt battalion of grenadiers, and five companies of the 3d battalion of light infantry, under Colonel Myers, having alſo marched from Camp la Coſte for the ſame purpoſe of co-operating with Major-General Dundas; which General's ability, good conduct, and activity, firſt in penetrating through ſo difficult a country from La Trinite to Bruneau, and afterwards to the capture of St. Pierre, do him the higheſt honour, and merit his Majeſty's notice in an eminent degree.

As Fort Bourbon, where Rochambeau commands, could not be cloſely inveſted, without the poſſeſſion of theſe heights of Sourriere, and this poſt was ſtill occupied by Bellegarde, with a conſiderable number of Mulattos and Blacks, I had fixed one o'clock in the morning of the 19th of February to force him with the bayonet from my camp at Bruneau; but at noon the preceding day, (February 18th) a moſt fortunate event anticipated my wiſhes and his ruin. Bellegarde, with part of his troops, deſcending the heights, attacked my left, towards the landing place, in a very daring and ſpirited manner; to which part Lieutenant-General Preſcott led a reinforcement, with great judgment, and in good time, checking and charging the enemy. Availing myſelf of this favourable moment, when Bellegarde's camp was weakened, I ordered from my right the 3d battalion of grenadiers, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Buckeridge, and ſupported by the 1ſt and 2d battalion of light infantry, under Lieutenant-Colonels Coote and Blundell, who attacked his camp upon the left in ſuch a ſuperior ſtyle of ſpirit and impetuoſity, as to prove irreſiſtible; and I got poſſeſſion of it, and his cannon, with inconſiderable loſs; which might have proved very different if my attack had not taken place till one o'clock the next morning, as was previouſly concerted, and if it had been properly defended by him, being there in ſuch force with cannon and numbers, and the ſituation ſo eminently ſtrong and difficult. My admiration of the gallantry of thoſe corps who performed this ſervice, and the officers who commanded them, is inexpreſſible, and their conduct is above praiſe; nor did I ever feel more highly ſatisfied with the ſucceſs of any enterprize in which I have been concerned.

Immediately after forcing Bellegarde, and getting poſſeſſion of this poſt of Sourriere, on the 18th of February, I held Fort Bourbon beſieged; but making a new road, getting up cannon, mortars, &c. and making batteries, took up the time till the 7th inſtant, when the batteries of my firſt parallel opened.

On the night of the 28th ult. Bellegarde, the great and popular leader of the mulattos and blacks, with his ſecond, Pelocque, and 300 of their followers, finding their ſituation too perilous outſide of their forts, and expoſed to our attacks, ſurrendered; the two former being ſent to Boſton, on condition of never carrying arms againſt his Majeſty's forces; and their followers, as priſoners of war, are ſent on board his Majeſty's ſhips.

Major-General Prince Edward joined this army the 4th inſtant, and commands at Camp La Coſte, with great ſpirit and activity.

I have erected the batteries of my ſecond parallel, at the diſtance of four and five hundred yards, which I expect will be completed and ready to open by the 20th inſtant, although the late rains retard our progreſs, and are unuſual at this time of the year.

It is juſt five weeks ſince the laſt diviſion of this army landed, under Colonel Sir Charles Gordon; and I hope it will appear to his Majeſty there is no reaſon to be diſatisfied with the progreſs we have made, in that ſhort ſpace of time, with inconſiderable loſs.

The ſpirit, unanimity, and perſeverance of the navy and army never were more conſpicuous, nor has more cordial co-operation ever been manifeſted between his Majeſty's naval and land forces. In a word, the General and all the field officers, as well as all the commanding officers of corps, have ſet ſuch an example of zeal, activity, and animation, on this ſervice, which has been ſo laudably imitated by all the officers and ſoldiers of this little army, that they merit the greateſt praiſe.

Admiral Sir John Jervis's profeſſional knowledge never never ſhone with more luſtre, or ever was exceeded; nor can I ſufficiently extol the promptneſs with which he has aided the land forces, on every occaſion, and his unremitting exertions to promote the honour of his Majeſty's arms and the intereſt of his country; in which he has been ſo eminently ſupported by the abilities and exertions of all the officers and ſeamen under his command; to whoſe ſervices I am indebted for having the ſiege in ſuch forwardneſs, having brought the cannon and mortars, &c. for ſeveral miles, to thoſe heights, although it appeared almoſt impoſſible.

The arrival of the Roebuck hoſpital ſhip, with medicines &c. for the ſick, is a ſeaſonable ſupply; a number of whom are comfortably accommodated at St. Pierre's, in an excellent hoſpital.

The Peggy tranſport being alſo arrived from Liſbon, with the light companies of the 44th and 55th regiments, without any ſick, and in the higheſt order, is a fortunate reinforcement, although a ſmall one, and the ſick left at Barbadoes are recovering.

The troops are in high ſpirits, and generally in good health.

Encloſed are returns of killed, wounded, and miſſing, from the time of landing in Martinico to this date. A return of ordnance and ſtores taken is alſo encloſed.

I have the honour to be, &c.
CHARLES GREY.

General return of ordnance and ſtores taken in the Iſland of Martinico, (viz. at Pigeon Iſland, Fort Belle Garde, Fort Trinite, Gros Morne, Heights of Brune, Heights of Sourriere, St. Pierre, and dependencies, and Caiſe de Navire and Dependencies;) between the 5th of February and 16th of March, 1794, on the expedition under the command of Sir Charles Grey, K. B. &c, &c.

27 Guns 36-pounders, 1901 round ſhot, 33 caſe or grape.—39 guns 24-pounders, 1073 round ſhot, 192 caſe or grape.—15 Guns 18-pounders, 359 round ſhot.—2 Guns 12-pounders, 10 round ſhot.—4 Guns 9-pounders.—9 Guns 6-pounders, 325 round ſhot, 65 caſe or grape.—24 Guns 4-pounders, 887 round ſhot, 71 caſe or grape.—7 Guns 3-pounders, 224 round ſhot.—6 Guns 1 pounder, 84 round ſhot.—1 7½ Inch howitzer, 3 5 ditto.—6 12 Inch mortars, 2 10 ditto, 1 5 ditto.—1148 12 Inch ſhells, 12 10 ditto, 37 7½ ditto, 130 5 ditto.—12 Swivels, 29 blunderbuſſes, 114 piſtols, 1968 muſquets or carbines, 319 ſwords or cutlaſſes.—622 Barrels powder, 200lb. each, 112 kegs, large, 174 ditto ſmall.

General remarks. The above is the moſt correct return that can be given at preſent. There are likewiſe many guns mounted and diſmounted, ſome ſpiked, and others unſerviceable, not included.

There are many ſhot and ſhells in different places, not included, being ſcattered about the country.

There are many guns and ſtores on the batteries, which were taken poſſeſſion of by the troops on the South Eaſt part of the iſland, which are not included; the rapid manner in which the troops advanced, not affording a ſufficient time to take an account of them. There is likewiſe a conſiderable quantity of powder and other ſtores in the magazine at St. Pierre's, which as yet have not been examined or reported to me.

T PATERSON,
Lieutenant-Colonel, commanding
Royal Artillery, Windward and Leeward Iſlands.

His Excellency Sir CHARLES GREY, K. B.
Commander in Chief, &c. &c. &c.

Major

Major Grey arrived at the office of the principal ſecretary of ſtate, with diſpatches from Sir Charles Grey, K. B. of which the following is a copy.

Fort Royal, Martinico,
March 25, 1794.

I have the happineſs to acquaint you of the complete conqueſt of this very valuable iſland, the laſt and moſt important fortreſs of Fort Bourbon having ſurrendered to his Majeſty's arms at four o'clock in the afternoon of the 23d inſt. at which time his Royal Highneſs Prince Edward, major-general of his Majeſty's forces, took poſſeſſion of both gates with the firſt and third battalions of grenadiers, and the firſt and third light infantry: and I have the honour to tranſmit to you the articles of capitulation, together with a liſt of the killed and wounded, and a return of the ordnance, &c. taken ſince my diſpatch of the 16th inſt. in which I communicated the tranſactions and progreſs of this army to that period. The return of ordnance taken in Fort Royal is ſigned by the commanding officer of Britiſh artillery; but that of Fort Bourbon is the French account of it, as there is not time to make an exact return at preſent, which ſhall be ſent by the next opportunity.

Having concerted meaſures with the Admiral for a combined attack by the naval and land forces, upon the fort and town of Fort Royal, and the batteries of my ſecond parallel being ready, thoſe on Morne Tortenſon and Carierre kept up an inceſſant fire upon Fort Royal, and all the other batteries on Fort Bourbon, during the day and night of the 19th inſt. and on the morning of the 20th following, till the ſhips deſtined for this ſervice had taken their ſtations. The Aſia of ſixty-four guns, Captain Browne, and the Zebra ſloop of ſixteen guns, Captain Faulknor, with Captain Rogers, and a body of ſeamen in flat boats, the whole under Commodore Thompſon, compoſed the naval force; and the land force conſiſted of the firſt battalion of grenadiers, under Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart, and the third light infantry under Lieutenant Colonel Cloſe, from Prince Edward's camp at La Coſte, with the third grenadiers, under Lieutenant-Colonel Buckeridge, and the firſt light infantry, under Lieutenant-Colonel Coote, from Lieutenant-General Preſcott's camp at Souriere.

The navy acquitted themſelves with their uſual gallantry, (particularly Captain Faulknor, whoſe conduct juſtly gained him the admiration of the whole army) carrying the fort by eſcalade about twelve o'clock of the 20th inſt. under the able conduct of Commodore Thompſon, whoſe judicious diſpoſition of the gun and flat boats, aſſiſted by that ſpirited and active officer Captain Rogers, contributed materially to our ſucceſs; at the ſame time that the land forces, commanded by that excellent officer Colonel Symes, critically advancing with equal ardour, forced and entered the town triumphantly, hoiſting the Britiſh colours, and changing the name to Fort Edward.

Immediately after this, General Rochambeau, who commanded in Fort Bourbon, ſent his aid-de-camp with a flag, offering to ſurrender on capitulation, and the terms were finally adjuſted and agreed to on the 22d inſt. by three commiſſioners on each ſide, the ratification thereof being ſigned by the commanders in chief, on the 23d following; and the garriſon, amounting to 900 men, marched out this morning priſoners of war, laying down their arms on the parade of Fort Royal, and were embarked for France immediately. His Majeſty's troops having marched in, ſtruck the French and hoiſted the Britiſh colours, and changed the name from Bourbon to that of Fort George.

I conſider myſelf under great obligations to Lieutenant-General Preſcott for the zeal and ability with which he has aſſiſted me throughout this arduous ſervice, now brought to ſo fortunate a concluſion, and to all the generals and other officers. Colonel Durnford, with the corps of engineers, and Lieutenant-Colonels Paterſon and Sowerby and Major Manley, with the royal artillery, have alſo a claim to my warmeſt approbation, for their exertions in placing and conſtructing of the batteries, and the well-directed fire of the artillery. The bravery, regularity, and good behaviour of the troops on every occaſion, has been moſt meritorious and exemplary.

Forts Bourbon and Royal have ſuffered greatly from our fire during the ſiege, and we are diligently employed to put them in a proper ſtate of defence, effectually to ſecure this important acquiſition of territory to the crown of Great Britain. I am reſtoring order as faſt as poſſible from the confuſion naturally occaſioned by a ſiege, and have the pleaſure to obſerve, that every thing in the forts is as tranquil and well regulated as could be expected in the time.

I ſhall not loſe a moment in embarking ordnance and ordnance ſtores, with troops, &c. to proſecute with vigour the execution of ſuch other objects and ſervices as his Majeſty has been pleaſed to entruſt to me; and hope to be enabled to proceed before much time can elapſe, after regulating the garriſons of theſe forts, and all ſuch other matters as require immediate attention. Major Grey, deputy quarter-maſter-general, will have the honour to deliver this diſpatch, and can communicate any other particulars or information you may wiſh to have.

I have the honour, &c.
CHARLES GREY.

P. S. At the commencement of the ſiege, the garriſon of Fort Bourbon conſiſted of about 1200.

I ſend five ſtand of colours, laid down by the garriſon, together with the two colours of Fort Bourbon, to be preſented to his Majeſty.

The gallant defence made by General Rochambeau and his garriſon, was ſtrongly manifeſted on entering Fort Bourbon, as there was ſcarce an inch of ground untouched by our ſhot and ſhells; and it is but juſtice to ſay that it does them the higheſt honour.

Articles of capitulation.—On the 21ſt of March, 1794, by order of their Excellencies Sir Charles Grey, K. B. general and commander in chief of his Britan-nic Majeſty's forces in the Weſt Indies, &c. and Vice-Admiral Sir John Jervis, K. B. commanding his Majeſty's fleet, &c. Commodore C. Thompſon, Colonel R. Symes, and Captain J. Conyngham, met at Dillon's houſe to receive propoſals of capitulation for Fort Bourbon, from Colonel d'Aucourt, Captain Dupriet and Gaſchet Dumaine, jun. nominated commiſſioners for that purpoſe by General Rochambeau. The following articles were propoſed, diſcuſſed, and modified, at a ſecond conference held at Fort Royal on the 22d of March, 1794.

Art. I. The garriſon, compoſed of the troops of the line, artillery, gunners of the marine, and national guard, ſhall march out with colours flying, thirty rounds a man, and two field-pieces with twelve rounds. —Anſ. The colony of Martinique, already reduced by the arms of his Britannic Majeſty, and the forts and towns of St. Pierre and Fort Royal taken with ſword in hand, General Rochambeau can only capitulate for Fort Bourbon, and what it contains. — Granted. But they are to lay down their arms at a place appointed, and not to ſerve againſt his Britannic Majeſty, or his Allies, during the preſent war.

II. Three months pay to be allowed to the troops of the line.—Anſ. No pay will be given. All their effects will be allowed them; and they will be provided with whatever may be neceſſary for their voyage to France.

III. The 37th regiment, formerly Marſhal Turenne's, ſhall keep their colours and arms.—Anſ. Refuſed, being contrary to all cuſtoms of war. The officers may keep their ſwords.

IV. They ſhall be furniſhed with ſhips to carry them to France.—Anſ. Granted.

V. The emigrants, who have returned to Martinique, ſhall not be preſent where the garriſon lay down their arms or embark.—Anſ. Granted.

VI. Such perſons of the national guard, who can give proofs of their property, ſhall be permitted to remain in the iſland, giving that property as ſecurity for their conduct.—Anſ. Thoſe of the national guard in Fort Bourbon, who have affairs to ſettle, and whoſe ſojourn may not be deemed dangerous to the colony, may remain according to the declaration of the general, dated January 1, 1794.

Such as wiſh to go to France ſhall be allowed, leaving their agents here.—Anſ. Granted.

VII. Perſons not included in the above article, who are compelled to return to France, ſhall be allowed a certain time to ſettle their affairs.—Anſ. A proper time will be allowed: fifteen day days at leaſt.

VIII. Perſons belonging to the garriſon of Fort Convention, poſſeſſing no landed property, but who exerciſed ſome profeſſion or trade previous to the preſent capitulation, ſhall be allowed to continue their trade or calling; nor ſent to France, provided their future conduct ſhould not make ſuch a meaſure neceſſary.—Anſ. They are regarded in the ſame predicament with thoſe in article VI.

IX. The legal regulations of the Conſtituted Authorities ſhall be confirmed.—Anſ. Refuſed.

X. The Code of Civil Judicature in force through the iſland ſhall be continued for the ſpace of two years. —Anſ. Granted, till his Britiſh Majeſty's pleaſure be known.

XI. The property of owners and Captains of ſhips ſhall be ſecured to them on board and on ſhore.—Anſ. Granted, as to their property in Fort Bourbon.

XII. The inhabitants of St. Pierre, embarked on Engliſh ſhips, ſhall be ſet at liberty, and their property, under ſeal, ſecured to them.—Anſ. This article cannot come within the preſent capitulation. The claimants may apply to the commanders of the fleet and army.

XIII. The Ordonnateur and officers of adminiſtration ſhall have permiſſion and time to regulate their accounts, and to take with them the papers relative to that end.—Anſ. Granted.

XIV. There ſhall be an intire and abſolute oblivion of the paſt, and an end to all animoſities.—Anſ. Granted, according to the proclamations.

XV. The rights of free citizens inrolled in the National Guard ſhall be preſerved.—Anſ. Refuſed.

XVI. The liberty of individuals compoſing the companies of l'Enclume, d'Octavius, de la Croir, and de Pontonur, ſhall be confirmed.—Anſ. Refuſed. The Slaves muſt be reſtored to their owners.

XVII. A period ſhall be fixed for the taking poſſeſſion of the fort, and the neceſſary time allowed for the garriſon to take out their effects.—Anſ. The two gates of Fort Bourbon to be delivered up to the troops of his Britannic Majeſty, immediately after the exchange of the preſent articles. The garriſon to march out at the great gate, and to be conducted to the place appointed for each corps by the commiſſioners who have managed the preſent capitulation, and will lay down their arms at the place of their embarkation. Three days will be allowed for the evacuation of the fort, and the commiſſaries of artillery and ſtores will remain in the fort, to take inventories of all the magazines.

XVIII. The greateſt attention ſhall be paid to the ſick and wounded; and they ſhall be furniſhed with ſhips to carry them to France as they recover.—Anſ. Granted; but at the expence of the French government, and to be attended by their own ſurgeons; if not ſufficient for the purpoſe, ſurgeons ſhall be furniſhed.

XIX. General Rochambeau, immediately upon the ſurrender of the fort, ſhall be at liberty to take his meaſures for his return to France. A frigate to be furniſhed him, his aid-de-camps, ſecretaries, and ſuite.—Anſ. A commodious veſſel ſhall be allowed to General Rochambeau, with the neceſſary paſſports for his ſafe return to France.

XX. The effects, trunks, cheſts, private papers, and all that General Rochambeau ſhall declare to belong to himſelf and his ſuite, ſhall be put under the protection of an Engliſh guard, when the troops of that nation ſhall have taken poſſeſſion of Fort Convention, and ſhall be embarked with him.—Anſ. Granted.

XXI. The Civil Ordonnateur, or Intendant of the colony, ſhall have liberty alſo, with the officers of adminiſtration, comptroller, and treaſurer, with thoſe employed in the public offices at St. Pierre and Fort Royal, to return to France.—Anſ. Granted.

XXII. The ſame demands made by General Rochambeau chambeau in Article XX. ſhall be granted to the Intendant and thoſe under him.—Anſ. Granted.

XXIII. All papers of accounts in the forts or town ſhall be carefully collected by the principals of each department to which they belong, and embarked in the ſame ſhip with the Ordonnateur.—Anſ. All papers, not eſſential to be left in the colony, ſhall be given, and free acceſs to take authentic copies of ſuch as it may be thought neceſſary to retain.

XXIV. Captains and officers of merchant ſhips, who have not ſettled their affairs, ſhall be allowed time to do ſo. The former the ſpace of four months, the latter of two months, under the protection of the Commander of his Britannic Majeſty's forces, that they may recover their debts: after which they will procure the readieſt paſſage to whatever place may be expedient for their affairs, with paſſports from the Engliſh Commanders. Anſ. Granted.

Additional Article. Fort Bourbon to be delivered up to his Britannic Majeſty in its preſent ſtate, with no deterioration of its batteries, mines, magazines of artillery or proviſions, and every thing it contains, which is not the private property of the garriſon.

ELIAS DURNFORD, Colonel and Chief Royal Engineer, Weſt Indies.

Captain Henry Powlet arrived with diſpatches, of which the following are extracts and copies.

Boyne, Fort Royal Bay, Martinique, March 25, 1794.

My letter to you of the 16th, by the Roebuck packet, a duplicate of which is encloſed, has made the Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty acquainted with the operations of the ſiege until that date; I have the pleaſure to communicate, for their Lordſhips further information, that the battery on Point Carriere, which forms the eaſt ſide of the entrance of Carenage, opened at day-light on the 17th, and with the gun-boats kept an inceſſant fire on Fort St. Louis, while the gun and mortar batteries on the heights played on Fort Bourbon; Lieutenant Bowen of the Boyne, who had commanded the night guard and gun boats for a conſiderable time, perceiving a favourable moment, puſhed into the Carenage with the rowing boats of the guard, boarded the Bien Venu French frigate, and brought off the captain, lieutenant, and about twenty men who were on board her, under a ſmart fire of grape ſhot and muſketry from the ramparts and parapet of the fort. The ſucceſs of this gallant action determined the General and me to attempt the fort and town of Fort Royal by aſſault; and I directed forty ſcaling ladders to be made of bamboo and ſmall ſtretched cordage, from twenty to thirty-ſix feet long, and ordered the Aſia and Zebra to be held in readineſs to enter the Carenage, in order to batter the fort, and to cover the flat boats, barges, and pinnaces, under the command of Commodore Thompſon, ſupported by Captains Nugent and Riou, while the grenadiers and light infantry from the camp at Souriere advanced with field-pieces along the ſide of the hill under Fort Bourbon, towards the bridge, over the canal, at the back of Fort Royal. This combination ſucceeded in every part, except the entrance of the Aſia, which failed for the want of preciſion in the ancient lieutenant of the port, Monſieur de Tourelles, who had undertaken to pilot the Aſia.

Captain Faulknor obſerving that ſhip baffled in her attempts, and the Zebra having been under a ſhower of grape ſhot for a great length of time, (which he, his officers, and ſloop's company ſtood with a firmneſs not to be deſcribed) he determined to undertake the ſervice alone, and he executed it with matchleſs intrepidity and conduct, running the Zebra cloſe to the wall of the fort, and leaping overboard, at the head of his ſloop's company, aſſailed and took this important poſt before the boats could get on ſhore, although they rowed with all the force and animation which characterizes Engliſh ſeamen in the face of an enemy. No language of mine can expreſs the merit of Captain Faulknor upon this occaſion; but as every officer and man in the army and ſquadron bears teſtimony to it, this incomparable action cannot fail of being recorded in the page of hiſtory. The grenadiers and light infantry made good uſe of their field-pieces and muſkets, and, ſoon after the ſurrender of the fort, took poſſeſſion of the town, by the bridge over the canal at the back of it, while a ſtrong detachment from the naval battalions at Point Negro, under the command of Captains Rogers, Scott, and Bayntun, in flat boats, barges, and pinnaces, approached the beach in front. Monſieur Rochambeau did not loſe a moment in requeſting that commiſſioners might be appointed to conſider of terms of ſurrender; and the General and I named Commodore Thompſon, Colonel Symes, and Captain Conyngham, to meet three perſons named by him at Dillon's plantation, at nine o'clock on the 21ſt, and on the 22d the terms were concluded. The rapid ſucceſs of his Majeſty's arms has been produced by the high courage and perſeverance of his officers, ſoldiers, and ſeamen, in the moſt difficult and toilſome labours, which nothing ſhort of the perfect unanimity and affection between them and their chiefs could have ſurmounted.

Commodore Thompſon conducted the enterprize on the ſide of La Trinite like an able and judicious officer. Captain Henry carried on the buſineſs at Ance d'Arlet with great energy, and has been indefatigable in forwarding all the operations he had a ſhare in. To Captains Brown, Nugent, Harvey, Markham, Faulknor, Sawyer, Carpenter, and Scott, I am greatly indebted for the manner in which they conducted the attack againſt St. Pierre. Captains Harvey, Kelly, Rogers, Saliſbury, Incledon, Riou, Lord Garlies, Carpenter, Scott, and Bayntun, have gained great reputation in the army, by the conduct of the naval battalions, and working parties under their command. Captain Berkely ſince the arrival of the Aſſurance has furniſhed a powerful reinforcement of men from that ſhip. Captain Pierrepoint has been very active in the ſervices allotted to the Seaflower. In Captain Grey I have found the experience of age, joined to the vigour of youth. The captains of the forty-four gun ſhips armed en flute, of the ſtoreſhip and hoſpital ſhip, have done well.

For other particulars I beg leave to refer their Lordſhips to Captain Powlet, who carries this diſpatch, and to Captain Markham of the Blonde, who conveys him. They ſerved with Commodore Thompſon at La Trinite, and arrived on the ſouth ſide of the iſland in time to have a ſhare in moſt of the tranſactions there.

I have the honour, &c.

J. JERVIS.

P. S. Incloſed alſo is a liſt of the killed and wounded belonging to the ſquadron under my command, alſo a letter I received from Commodore Thompſon.

Fort Royal, March 20, 1794.

I have the pleaſure to acquaint you, that the only loſs we have ſuſtained in the capture of Fort Royal is the pilot of the Zebra killed, and four ſeamen belonging to the ſame ſhip wounded. So ſoon as I perceived ſhe could fetch in, I gave orders to Captains Nugent and Riou, who commanded the flat boats, which with the men embarked in them, were lying upon their oars, to puſh in, and mount the walls; when every exertion was made, and the boats ſeemed to fly towards the fort. Captain Faulknor in the mean time, in a moſt ſpirited and gallant manner, entered the harbour through the fire of all their batteries, and laid his ſloop along-ſide the walls, there being deep water cloſe to; when the enemy, terrified at his audacity, the flat boats full of ſeamen pulling towards them, and the appearance of the troops from all quarters, ſtruck their colours to the Zebra. A well directed and ſteady fire from the gun-boats under Lieutenant Bowen, as alſo from our batteries, was of great ſervice. The alacrity and ſteadineſs of the officers and ſeamen in general under my command was ſuch, that I had not the leaſt doubt of ſucceſs againſt the whole force of the enemy, had they diſputed our entrance.

The fort is full of ammunition and ſtores of all ſorts, but the buildings are in a miſerable condition from the effects of our bombs, the gun boats and batteries.

I have the honour, &c.

C. THOMPSON.

The following is an Extract of a Diſpatch, dated April 4, 1794.

In my diſpatch of the 25th ult. I had the happineſs to acquaint you of the ſurrender of Fort Burbon

(now

(now Fort George) and the Iſland of Martinico; on that day; and that I would not loſe time to embark troops, ordnance, &c. to proſecute vigorouſly ſuch other objects and ſervices as his Majeſty had been pleaſed to entruſt me with the execution of.

I have now the honour to acquant you with the further ſucceſs of his Majeſty's arms, in the conqueſt of this fine iſland; the French garriſon, under the command of General Ricard, in the works on Morne Fortunée, having marched out and laid down their arms this morning by nine o'clock; at which time his Royal Highneis Prince Edward, with his brigade of grenadiers, and Major-General Dundas, with his brigade of light infantry, marched in and took poſſeſſion. On the 30th ultimo, the brigade of granadiers, commanded by his Royal Highneſs Prince Edward, the brigade of light infantry, by Major-General Dundas; and the 6th, 9th, and 43d regiments, by Colonel Sir C. Gordon, with engineers, &c. under Colonel Durnford, and a detachment of the royal artillery, with ſome light ordnance, under Lieutenant-Colonel Paterſon, embarked on board his Majeſty's ſhips in the bay of Fort Royal, having left the tranſports and heavy artillery at Martinico; and alſo left there the 15th, 39th, 56th, 58th, 64th, and 70th regiments, artillery, &c. as a garriſon, under Lieutenant-General Preſcot, Brigader-General Whyte, and Colonel Myers; but that day proving very rainy, hazy, and calm, we did not ſet ſail till the 31ſt. and reached St. Lucia the 1ſt inſtant. Every neceſſary matter being previouſly concerted and arranged with the Admiral, we proceeded, and effected three different landings with little reſiſtance and no loſs, viz. Major-General Dundas's diviſion, conſiſting of the 3d battalion light infantry, under Lieutenant-Colonel Cloſe, and conducted by Captain Kelley and Lord Garlies, of the navy, at Ance du Cap; and the light infantry, under Lieutenant-Colonel Blundell, conducted by Commodore Thompſon, at Ance du Choc, who were ordered to join taking the enemy's batteries in reverſe, and to occupy a near poſition for the purpoſe of inveſting the works of Morne Fortunée, on the ſide of the Carenage, which was executed with the uſual ſpirit and ability of that Major-General, and the flank battalions. His Royal Highneſs Prince Edward's diviſion, the 1ſt and 3d grenadiers, diſembarked at Marigal des Roſeaux, immediately under the Admiral's own direction, aſſiſted by Captain Harvey and immediately proceeded to co-operate with Major-General Dundas, to inveſt Morne Fortunée. Lieutenant-Colonel Coote, with the 1ſt battalion of light infantry, did not diſembark till ſeven o'clock the ſame evening from the Boyne, and landed at Ance de la Tocque, proceeded to and took the four gun battery of Cicero, inveſting Morne Fortunée on that ſide, at the ſame time covering Cul de Sac or Barrington Bay for our ſhipping, which anchored there the next morning, the 2d inſt. The 2d grenadiers, and Colonel Sir Charles Gordon's brigade (the 6th, 9th, and 43d regiments) were kept in reſerve on board ſhip. About ſeven o'clock in the evening of the 2d inſtant, Lieutenant-Colonel Coote, with four light companies, ſtormed a redoubt and two batteries, by my order, cloſe to the enemy's principal works on the Morne, killed two officers, and near thirty men, made one priſoner, and releaſed one Britiſh ſailor from captivity, ſpiking ſix pieces of cannon. The ability and meritorious conduct of that excellent officer Colonel Coote, on this enterprize, are ſuch as do him the higheſt honour, and cannot be ſurpaſſed, in which he was well ſupported by the whole detachment, particularly by Major Evatt, Captains Buchanan, Croſbie, Welch, J. Grey, Aid-du-camp to the commander in chief, and Stobin, and by Major of brigade Viſſcher, with Lieutenant Drozier, and the detachment of royal artillery, who ſpiked the guns.

The exemplary good conduct of the brigade of grenadiers under the command of his Royal Highneſs Prince Edward, and of the brigade of light infantry, under Major-General Dundas, and indeed of all the troops, afforded me the higheſt ſatisfaction.

When his Royal Highneſs Prince Edward had hoiſted the Britiſh colours on Morne Fortunée, the name of it was changed to Fort Charlotte; and the entire conqueſt of this iſland has been effected without the loſs of a man, although there has been a good deal of cannonading from the enemy's batteries and works.

I tranſmit the colours, to be preſented to his Majeſty. Captain Finch Maſon, one of my Aides de camp will have the honour of preſenting this diſpatch, being an officer well qualified to give any further information that you may deſire to receive.

I tranſmit herewith a general return of ordnance and ſtores found in the fort of Morne Fortunée, and alſo a general return of the batteries on the coaſt of St. Lucie.

General return of the ordnance and ſtores found in the Fort and detached works of Morne Fortunée.

Total of each nature. 6 Thirty-ſix-pounders, 10 twenty-four ditto, 18 eighteen-pounders, 20 twelve-pounders, 3 nine-pounders, 5 ſix-pounders, 4 four-pounders, 6 twelve-inch mortars, 6 howitzers or ſwivels.

General remarks. The above is taken from the French officer's return, who has omitted mentioning the nature of the ordnance on ſeveral of the batteries. There is a proportion of ſhot, ſhells, and ſmall ſtores of every kind on the different batteries, which are not included in the return.

J. Paterson, Lieutenant-Colonel Commanding Royal Artillery.

The value and advantages of this conqueſt are great indeed, becauſe this iſland is the key of that Archipelago, and the centre of command over all the Windward and Leward iſlands in the Caribbean Seas. This is the ſecond time that Martinique (and we truſt that it will ſoon be the caſe with all the other French Windward Iſlands), has had the Britiſh flag diſplayed over her. May the wiſdom and virtue of future peace-makers not ſacrifice again the Britiſh intereſt, by giving them up. Such a meaſure muſt ever drive out the Britiſh power from the Atlantic Seas; for of what avail are valour and judgment in conqueſt, if knowledge, public ſpirit, integrity, and true patriotiſm are found to be deficient in negociation?

May the wiſdom and virtue of future peace-makers not ſacrifice again the Britiſh intereſt, by giving them up. Such a meaſure muſt ever drive out the Britiſh power from the Atlantic Seas; for of what avail are valour and judgment in conqueſt, if knowledge, public ſpirit, integrity, and true patriotiſm are found to be deficient in negociation?

In 1790, Martinique had about 14,000 white people in the iſland, excluſive of troops—mulattos and free negroes about 3000, and near 90,000 ſlaves. The ſame year it loaded 230 ſhips for Europe, the ſhipped produce valued at near one million ſterling—it conſumed with its trade, merchandize equal to 600,000l. ſterling. The town of St. Pierre contains above 3000 houſes, Fort Royal 2000, Lamantine 800, La Trinité 1800, Robert 400. There are upwards of 300 ſugar eſtates, and near 200 water mills, beſides wind and cattle mills. There are alſo coffee, cotton, cocoa, ginger, and proviſion lands, and cattle eſtates or pens, in worn out lands, with excellent roads of late years made all round the iſland.

The Iſland of Martinique contains twenty-ſeven pariſhes, 243 ſugar plantations, 206 cotton, and 1460, cotton and coffee; the property captured is valued at 500,000l excluſive of public buildings, &c.

The number of veſſels captured at Martinico were 125; ſeventy-one of which were at St. Pierre, and fifty-four at Fort Royal. Moſt of them were loaded with the produce of the iſland, and of great value. Sir Charles Grey gave orders for the effects to be ſold on the 10th of April: 30l. per cent. to be paid in caſh, and the remainder in bills on London, to be approved of twenty days after the ſale, by the agent.

A computation was made by ſeveral mercantile people of eminence in the city, of the benefits likely to reſult from the capture of Martinico and St. Domingo; and they ſtated, that when the two iſlands had recovered a quite commercial diſpoſition, their produce would net to the cuſtoms, &c. of Great Britain, a ſum between three and four millions per year.

To give an idea of the immenſe quantity of military ſtores taken in the Iſland of Martinique, Fort Louis alone contained as much as would be neceſſary in the garriſon of Gibraltar for a long and vigorous ſiege, ſuch as it ſuſtained laſt war.

Fort Bourbon is ſtated by the officers of artillery ſerving with Sir Charles Grey, to be the ſtrongeſt fortreſs they ever ſaw, Gibraltar only excepted. This circumſtance conſidered, it is to be reckoned a moſt fortunate event that we have got poſſeſſion of it with ſo immaterial a loſs.

The duty in the trenches before Fort Bourbon and Fort Louis in Martinique was extremely ſevere. The officers of artillery knew not what it was to reſt in a bed from the 6th of February till the reduction of the place, a circumſtance that proves at once the ſpirit and utility of that excellent corps.

Fort Louis, which was taken by Captain Faulknor in ſo gallant a manner, was repreſented by the officers of the army to be as ſtrong as nature and art could make it. It runs out from Fort Royal like a kind of mole, reſembling the New Mole at Gibraltar.

Extract of a Letter from Vice Admiral Caldwell to Mr. Stephens, dated off Martinique, the 11th of January, 1795.

For the information of my Lords Commiſſioners of Admiralty, I encloſe two copies of letters received from Lieutenant Watkins of the Blanche, with minutes of Mr. Milne, her ſecond lieutenant, who came to me expreſs, giving an account of their taking the French frigate La Pique, of thirty-eight guns and 360 men, after an action of five hours, as brilliant and decided as ever happened; nor can too much praiſe and commendation be given to all the officers and ſhip's company. Their lordſhips will ſee by the minutes the judicious manner in which the Blanche laid the enemy on board, and twice laſhed her bowſprit to the Blanche's capſtan; and, when the former's main and mizen maſts fell, ſhe played off before the wind, and towed the enemy; when the ſtern ports not being large enough, they blew the upper tranſom beam away to admit the guns to run out, and fired into her bows for three hours. The marines under Lieutenant Richardſon, keeping ſo well directed and conſtant a fire, that not a man could appear upon her forecaſtle until ſhe ſtruck, when the ſecond lieutenant and ten men ſwam on board and took poſſeſſion of her.

Captain Faulknor was unfortunately killed after two hours action, by which his Majeſty has loſt an officer as truly meritorious as the navy of England ever had.

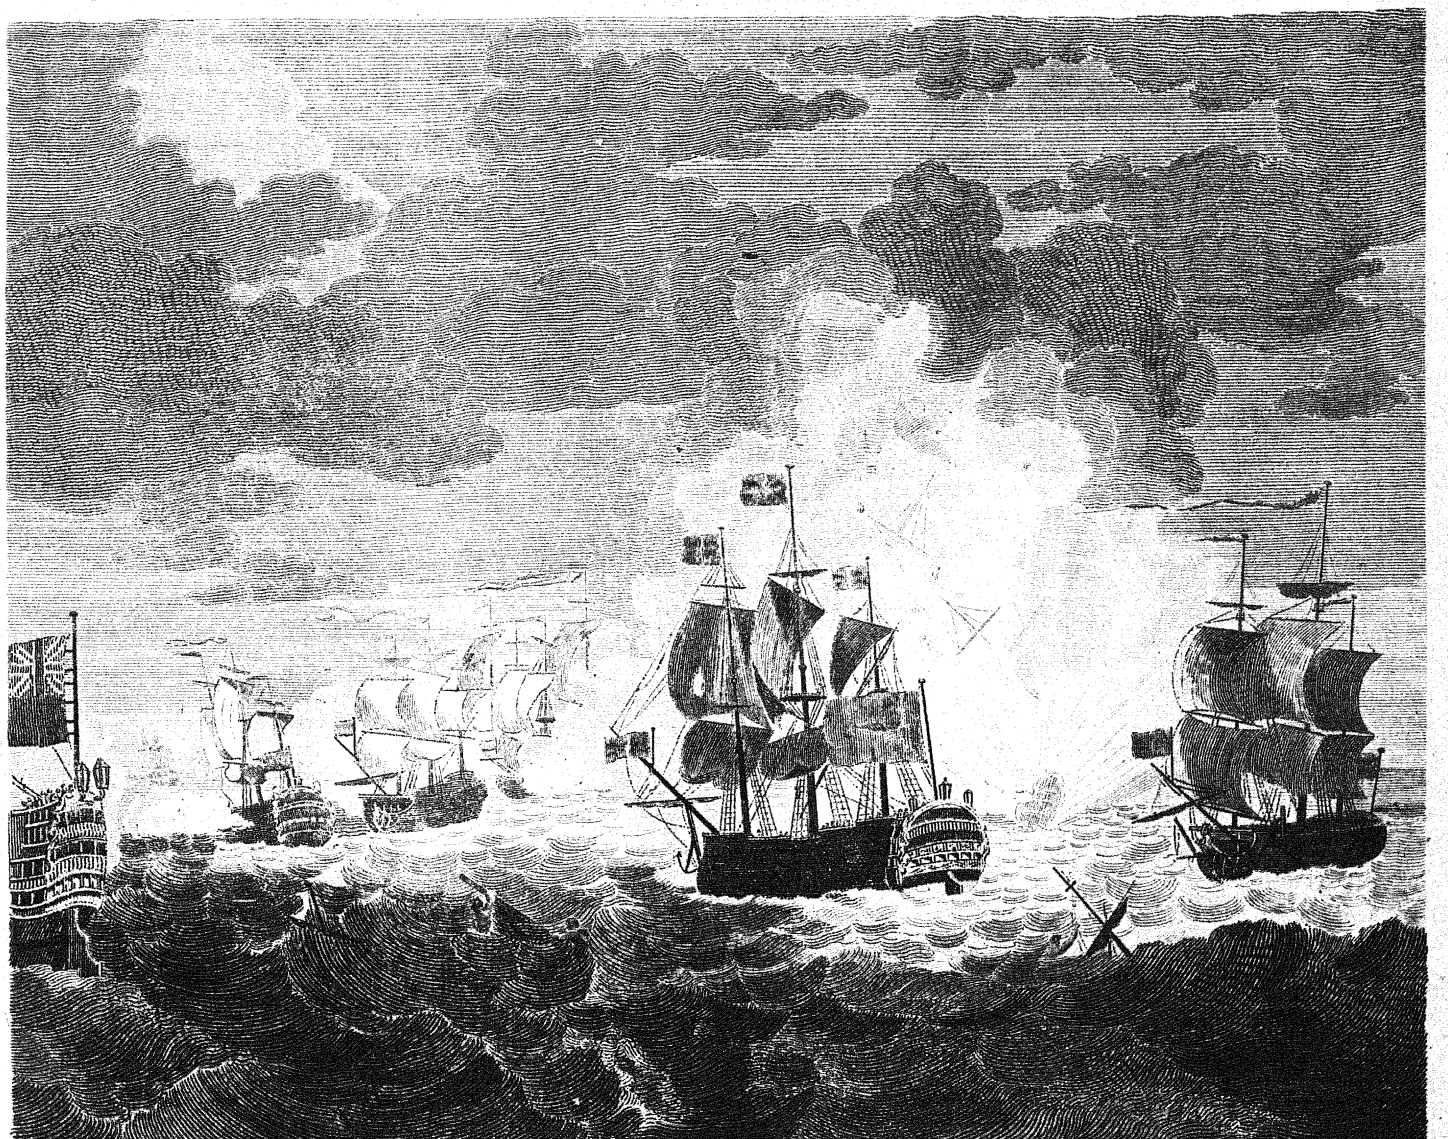
P. S. It appears, by a recent account, there were many more than 360 men on board La Pique; one hundred and ſeventy-four are brought in here, one hundred and ten wounded and landed at the Saints, ſeventy-ſix found dead on board when ſhe was taken poſſeſſion of: it is probable ſome were thrown over board during the action, and it is known numbers fell with her three maſts, and were drowned.

Martinique, September 7, 1796.

The ſchooner Thomas, Captain Boſworth, ſent to cruize off Surinam againſt the Dutch, was not many days off the coaſt before ſhe fell in with a Dutch fleet from Surinam, bound to Holland, with no convoy; he gave chace, and brought twelve of them to; however, he could man but five, which he has brought in here; they are amazing large ſhips, and five of the richeſt prizes taken this war. The remaining part of the fleet has been taken by two of our frigates the ſame day; out of ſeventy-two, ſixty-nine have been taken.

MARY, (ST.) ENGAGEMENT OFF, IN 1745. An iſland of the Azores, ſituated in the Atlantic ocean.

Some merchants of London had fitted out three privateers, intended for a joint cruize, under the command of Captain Talbot, who was to act as the commodore; with the Prince Frederic of 28 guns, and 240 men; the Duke, Captain Morecock, of 20 guns, and 150 men; and the Prince George of 20 guns, and 134 men. The ſquadron ſet ſail from Cowes in the iſle of Wight on the 2d of June; but on the 7th the Prince George unfortunately overſet and ſunk; and though the Commodore immediately went to her aſſiſtance, he could ſave no more than twenty men out of the 134. However, not diſcouraged with ſo unfavourable a beginning, the Prince Frederic and Duke continued their courſe off the coaſt of Portugal; but meeting with no remarkable ſucceſs; they ſteered for the Azores, or Weſtern Iſlands, ſituate between 25 and 33 degrees of weſt longitude, and between 36 and 40 degrees



The Defeat of the Spanish Fleet under the Command of Don. Langara, off Cape St. Mary, on the Coast of Spain, by Admiral Sir GEORGE RODNEY, Jan.y 16.th 1780.

40 degrees of north latitude; being nine in number, and ſubject to the crown of Portugal. The two privateers, on the 20th of June, made the iſle of St. Mary, the ſouthernmoſt of the Azores; when they ſtood away to the weſtward, to cruize between theſe iſlands and the great bank of Newfoundland Their cruize was unſucceſsful till the 10th of July, and then between five and ſix in the morning, they diſcovered three ſail bearing weſt; which happened to be the Marquis d'Antin of 450 tons, 24 guns, and 68 men, commanded by Captain Magon Serpere; the Lewis Eraſmus of 500 tons, 28 guns, and 66 men, commanded by Captain Pedro Lavigne Luenell; and the Notre Dame de Deliverance of 300 tons, 22 guns, and 60 men, commanded by Captain Pedro Litant; all three of them belonged to St. Maloes, and having been out four years in the South Seas, on the coaſts of Chili and Peru, and now on their return, immenſely rich, from Lima in Peru. The two privateers bore down on the French, who made little account of them, and kept their wind; but a quarter paſt ſeven, Captain Talbot fired a gun at them, when the French hoiſted their colours and formed a line; the Duke being ſomewhat too haſty, went to windward, and immediatly began to fire away; while Captain Talbot bore to leeward, and advanced within piſtol-ſhot of the neareſt ſhip to him, which was the Marquis d'Antin; where they entertained each other exceeding ſmartly for three hours before the French ſubmitted. During the time that the Prince Frederic was engaging the Marquis d'Antin, the Lewis Eraſmus got on his bow, and put Captain Talbot between two fires; who, as ſoon as the firſt ſhip had ſtruck, loſt no time, but went and returned the viſit to the Lewis Eraſmus; at the ſame time that the Notre Dame de Deliverance crowded away from the Duke, who had orders to chaſe her, while Captain Talbot attacked the Lewis Eraſmus, where he found ſuch warm work that it was three hours before ſhe would ſtrike. Though the captain of the Duke, ſeeing night coming on, and apprehending that Captain Talbot would be puzzled to take care of the diſabled ſhips, quitted the chaſe, and let the third make her eſcape. Captain Talbot all along conceived that his adverſaries were Martinico ſhips, but was agreeably ſurpriſed to underſtand they were richly laden with treaſures of Peru and Chili; a treaſure that might well repay him and his ſailors for their trouble; though the Prince Frederic had one lieutenant and five men killed, and twenty-five wounded; the Duke had ſeven men killed, and eight wounded. The Lewis Eraſmus had only the captain and one man killed, and four wounded; and the Marqus d'Antin had no more than the captain and ſix men killed, and eight wounded; but this was owing to the Engliſh captain firing more at their rigging than between the decks, for fear of ſinking them.

The prizes loſt all their maſts, and were obliged to be towed by the Prince Frederic and Duke to Kinſale in Ireland, where they happily arrived on the 30th of July; when Captain Talbot found that the prizes had a treaſure of 2,665,315 dollars in ſpecie; piſtoles and doubloons to the value of 300,693 dollars; gold bars to the value of 32,000 dollars; and wrought plate to the value of 11,000 dollars; amounting in all to 3,009,008 dollars, being 677,026l. beſides 800 tons of cocoa and other valuable effects; which were convoyed by three men of war to Briſtol, and conducted in forty-five waggons to the tower of London; the whole weight of treaſure, including the package, amounting to ſeventy-eight tons, thirteen hundred, one-quarter, and ſixteen pounds; the proprietors having 70,000l. to their ſhare, and every common ſeamen being intitled to 85l. for his dividend. The Notre Dame de Deliverance that eſcaped from the Duke privateer, made the beſt of her way to Cape Breton, imagining the French had ſtill poſſeſſion of the iſland; where ſhe was taken on the 20th of July by the Sutherland and Cheſter men of war, and carried into Louiſburg; when ſhe appeared as valuable a prize as either of her conſorts, her cargo conſiſting of eighteen-ſerons of gold, weighing 1170lb. averdupoiſe, 15,399 double doubloons, 162 gold ſnuff-boxes, weighing 952 ounces; 1,072,000 pieces of eight; 764 ounces of virgin ſilver, thirty-one pounds of ſilver ore; ſeveral diamond rings and ſolitaires; 876 ſerons of cocoa, 203 ſerons of Jeſuits bark, 191 tanned hides, 181 dozen of fans, and thirty-ſix bales of Carmenian wool; the whole amounting to upwards of 460,000l. which was ſafely conducted to Portſmouth, under convoy of four men of war.

MASSULIPATAM, TAKEN IN 1769. A ſtrong fort and factory on the coaſt of Coromandel in the Eaſt-Indies. Colonel Forde having reduced ſeveral ſmall forts near this place, inveſted it on the 7th of March, with the animating advice which he that day received of M. Lally's departure from before Madras. The approaches were carried on till the 6th of April. The town was bombarded, and a great many houſes were deſtroyed. Several breaches were made in the baſtions, but ſoon filled up by the numerous garriſon, till the commander of the artillery informed the Colonel that no more than two days ammunition remained, having expended above 400 barrels of powder, with ſhot and ſhells in proportion. He then remonſtrated that the batteries would not be able to do any more than to open the breaches again, as before in the courſe of that day's firing. This reduced the Colonel to the dilemma either to attempt to take the place by a coup-de-main or by ſtorm that ſame evening, or to raiſe the ſiege and march off. He choſe to ſtorm the town in breach. The diſpoſitions were fixed, the whole army was under arms at ten at night, and the Europeans were ordered for the effectual ſervice. But in order to divert the attention of the beſieged, two feint attacks were to be made: one by Captain Knox, who was ordered to march in the duſk of the evening with 700 of the firſt battalion of ſepoys, round the town to the weſtward; to draw as near the walls as poſſible, and to begin their fire exactly at twelve o'clock; the other by the Rajaof Viſnapore with 4000 of his own forces, whoſe directions were to attack by the gateway, and on the front of the detached ravelin; to follow Captain Knox's fire, and to alarm and perplex the garriſon as much as poſſible, by firing of cannon, ſmall arms, rockets, &c. All things being prepared, the real attack upon the baſtions where the breaches had been made, was committed to the bravery and conduct of the European battalion, conſiſting of 312 men, ſupported by a part of the artillery taken from the batteries, thirty gunners, as many ſeamen from the Hardwicke, and 700 of the ſecond battalion of ſepoys, with two field-pieces.

Captain Knox and the Rajah began to fire according to their inſtructions; and while the garriſon were diſtracted by thoſe attacks, the grand party croſſed the moraſs, which ſurrounds the whole town, and gained the ditch before they were diſcovered. The grenadiers and two battalions of ſepoys puſhed for one of the baſtions, where the breach had been made; the battalion of Europeans, ſeamen, and gunners, made to the others. Both parties paſſed through a ſhower of ſmall arms and grape-ſhot from the flanks of the baſtions, and returned the fire by the muſketry, that drove the enemy from the breaches, though they kept up a ſmart fire from the other works. It was not practicable to get the field-pieces over the ditch; but the officer and men belonging to the artillery, diſdaining a ſtate of inaction, when every hand was required, and their fellow ſoldiers were driving the enemy before them, left the cannon, entered the town with the reſt of the troops, and did great ſervice by turning the enemy's own guns againſt them.

A terrible carnage enſued, no quarter being given in ſuch caſes. The Marquis had no way left to ſtop the fury of the aſſailants but immediate ſubmiſſion, and therefore ſent an officer to aſk quarter for the garriſon. To which Colonel Forde replied by a captain, whom he ſent with the French meſſenger to the Marquis, "That he could not give quarter, while there was reſiſtance made in any part; and that unleſs the beſieged would immediately ceaſe firing and ſurrender themſelves, he ſhould be obliged for his own ſafety to put the whole garriſon to the ſword." This had its effect, the fire ceaſed in about half an hour; the French quitted their arms and repaired to the arſenal; and the main body of the Engliſh repaired to the eſplanade; and a guard of 100 Europeans, and two companies of ſepoys, with two pieces of cannon, was placed over the priſoners that night. But next day the Colonel gave the gentlemen liberty to walk about the town upon their parole, and granted them all their effects, except private trade, which was ſecured by the captors.

The loſs of the enemy on this occaſion has been always accounted very great, but it could never be aſcertained; though it appears by the muſter rolls, that there were upwards of 100 Europeans ſlain during the ſiege and ſtorm. There were taken above 150 pieces of cannon, one thirty-two, and five twenty-four-pounders, and a great quantity of ammunition.

How great a blow this gave to the French intereſt, and the importance in which this place was held by the French, cannot better appear than by the efforts they made to preſerve Maſſulipatam. For, though their forces already were almoſt double the number of Colonel Forde's, the governor of Pondicherry embarked 400 Europeans to reinforce M. Conflans. But they did not arrive in the road of that city till the 15th of April, a few days after it had ſurrendered to the Engliſh.

Thoſe troops were on board the Briſtol and the Harlem taken from the Dutch. But as ſoon as the Hardwicke Indiaman deſcried theſe ſhips making into the road with French colours, ſhe got under way, made ready and engaged them about an hour, under the command of Mr. Samſon, the firſt mate (his brother the captain being aſhore), till he could get to the windward, where he caſt anchor and took the captain on board, while the enemy were beating up after him. The captain bravely determined not to lie expoſed to an enemy, but to fight his way through them, and to make the beſt of his way to Bengal, with ſuch priſoners as he had already on board, having contracted for a large number, but had no more than forty embarked. The enemy's largeſt ſhip got under ſail at the ſame time as the Hardwicke, and both of them exchanged broadſides with Captain Sampſon, but gave over the chaſe when they found it was in vain to purſue; beſides, it was leading them from their commiſſion, which was to land the troops to reinforce the Marquis de Conflans, they not having as yet heard of the fate of the place. So that when they were come to anchor, M. Moracin, who commanded the troops, ſent a boat aſhore in the night to the Marquis, for inſtructions when to diſembark the men. Which returned with an account of the ſurrender of the place and garriſon to the Engliſh. M. Moracin ſailed immediately for Ganjam to wait the monſoon, till the beginning of November, for his return to Pondicherry.

The good effects of this conqueſt were preſently felt by the Engliſh. The policy of the eaſtern princes being to wait the iſſue of their neighbour's quarrels, and to take part with the ſtrongeſt ſide; Salabatzing, who had been always afraid of the French power, had looked on, and advanced with his army to about forty miles from Maſſulipatam ſome days before it was taken, with a ſort of neutral indifference, no ſooner heard of the diſgrace of the French at Madras and this place, but he earneſtly ſought for the friendſhip of the Engliſh; and on the 14th of May ſigned a treaty, whereby he gave as a free gift to the Engliſh Company, the circar of Maſſulipatam with eight diſtricts, the circar of Nizapatam, and the diſtricts of Codaver and Wacalmanner, and granted them ſaneds in the ſame manner as he had done to the French; that he would oblige the French troops then in his country (the Dekan) to croſs the Ganges, or ſend them to Pondicherry, or to ſome other place out of the Dekan country, on the other ſide of the river Kiſtna. That he would never ſuffer them to ſettle in his country on any account whatever, nor keep them in his ſervice, nor aſſiſt them, nor call them to his own aſſiſtance. He diſcharged the Rajah of Viſnapore from any demands, on account of the contributions he had raiſed in the circars belonging to the French, and from the revenues of his own country in the preſent year, allowing him to remain peaceably in it, upon the computation of the revenue paid by his grandfather and father. He concluded with a promiſe not to aſſiſt the enemies of the Engliſh, nor nor to give them protection, on condition the Engliſh ſhould not aſſiſt his enemies, nor give them protection.

MAUBEUGE, a ſtrong fortified town of Hainault, ſituated on the Sambre. On the 14th of Auguſt, 1793, the French came out of their camp at this place, in various columns, to attack the advanced poſts of the allied armies, with a particular view of carrying that important one at Hantes. A heavy firing then enſued, which laſted beſt part of the day.

The advantage was long doubtful on both ſides, but the allied army receiving various reinforcements, the French at length were obliged to retreat, which they performed in good order.

Extract of a Letter from Sir James Murray, Adjutant-General to the Forces under the command of his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York, was received, of which the following is a Copy.

Engel Fontaine, October 18, 1793.

His Roval Highneſs, at the earneſt requeſt of the Prince of Cobourg, marched, with a part of the troops under his command, for this place. They arrived here upon the 16th. The Prince, being acquainted with his Royal Highneſs's intention, had been enabled to draw from thence four battalions, to ſtrengthen his other poſts; a fifth battalion followed thoſe, upon his Royal Highneſs's arrival.

The enemy having collected in extraordinary numbers, attacked the corps under the command of General Clairfayt, which was poſted with its right near Tirlemont, and its left near the village of Wattignies, upon the 15th and 16th. Upon the former day the left wing of the enemy was entirely defeated: having advanced into the plain which lay upon that ſide between the two armies, they were charged by the Imperial cavalry, and driven back with great ſlaughter, and the loſs of twelve pieces of cannon. The attack which they made upon the left of the Auſtrians was more obſtinately ſupported; they were, however, finally repulſed.

Upon the 16th, the enemy having drawn the greateſt part of their force to the right, again attacked the left of General Clairfayt's corps, and the village of Wattignies.

They could upon this ſide approach within cannon ſhot of the Auſtrians, under cover of an immenſe wood, called the Haye D'Aveſne; which, when they were repulſed, ſecured their retreat. They brought a great quantity of heavy artillery to the edge of this wood, under the protection of which they attacked the village. The utmoſt firmneſs and bravery were diſplayed by the Auſtrian troops upon this occaſion. The enemy were ſeveral times repulſed with great loſs; they were repeatedly driven from the village after they had carried it; but being enabled by great ſuperiority of numbers, to bring continually freſh troops to the point of attack, they at laſt ſucceeded in maintaining the poſſeſſion of that poſt.

The communication between General Clairfayt's corps and that of General La Tour, which obſerved the intrenched camp near Maubeuge, being by this means cut off, it was judged neceſſary by the Prince of Cobourg to abandon the poſition which had been taken for the purpoſe of inveſting Maubeuge; the army repaſſed the Sambre in the night without the ſmalleſt loſs. Lieutenant-General Benzowſky, who commanded a detached corps upon the left of the army, defeated a corps which was oppoſed to him, killed a great number of the enemy, took 400 priſoners and 11 pieces of cannon. Count Haddick, who was detached by General la Tour, likewiſe gained a conſiderable advantage, penetrated to Sorke Chateaux, and took three pieces of cannon.

In the two engagements, the Auſtrians took twenty-four pieces of cannon and two howitzers, without the loſs of one on their part. They have had about 2000 men killed and wounded. There can be no doubt that the loſs of the enemy has been much more conſiderable. The Auſtrians now occupy the left bank of the Sambre. No certain accounts have been yet received of the further motions of the enemy.

I am, &c.

MAXEN, BATTLE AT. A ſmall village, ſituated in the road between Saxony and Bohemia, near Dippoldſwald. The King of Pruſſia after his defeat by the Ruſſians at Cunnerſdorff returned to Saxony, on which the army of the empire retired, and Marechal Daun, notwithſtanding his many boaſted advantages, fell back towards Dreſden, at the appearance of a defeated army. All the King of Pruſſia's poſts were left unmoleſted, and after all his loſſes, and all his neceſſary detachments, he ſtill ſaw himſelf at the head of a gallant army of 60,000 men, ready to execute the moſt deſperate orders in defiance of the extreme cold.

It is true, that M. Daun was ſuperior to him in numbers, and yet more ſo in ſituation; he could at any time take poſſeſſion of the famous camp at Pirna, where he could not be attacked with any proſpect of ſucceſs; but then the freezing of the Elbe, the ſnow on the mountains, which divide Bohemia from Saxony, and the continual moleſtations which might be expected from the Pruſſian parties, made this ſituation as dangerous in ſome reſpects, as it was deſirable in others.

It was the opinion of many, that theſe advantages on the ſide of the King of Pruſſia, well purſued, without aiming at more, would in a ſhort time infallibly have obliged M. Daun to relinquiſh his ſtrong poſt, and to retire into Bohemia, abandoning Dreſden, and with it all the fruits of his victorious campaign. But the King poſſeſſed by an idea of the ill ſituation of the Auſtrians, thought that advantages of greater moment and more deciſive, might be drawn from it. He knew that the paſſes into Bohemia were ſo difficult, that by ſome poſts properly choſen and ſtrongly guarded, the ſubſiſtence of the Auſtrians might be made impracticable, and that even their retreat rendered ſo difficult, that Mareſchal Daun would find himſelf compelled to fight at a diſadvantage, and to put to the hazard of the field all that his caution and prudence had been ſo long and painfully procuring.

Upon this plan, the King having obliged Mareſchal Daun

Daun to retreat as far as Plauen, advanced himſelf as far as Keſſeldorf, and ordered General Finck with a ſtrong corps to turn the Auſtrians, and ſeize the defiles of Maxen and Ottendorf, through which alone it ſeemed poſſible for the Auſtrians to communicate with Bohemia. This was ſo ſucceſsfully executed, that there appeared no doubt that the King had effectually ſecured one of his principal objects, and had placed Daun between two fires.

Whilſt the Pruſſians enjoyed this ſecurity, Mareſchal Daun, who was aware of their deſign, had ſo occupied all the eminences about this rough and dangerous place, and all the paſſes into it, that the Pruſſians were hardly attacked, when their fate ſeemed inevitable. It is probable that they had got too far into theſe defiles, and had not taken proper meaſures to ſecure a retreat, or any ſort of communication with the grand army. They became too late ſenſible of their ſituation, and they made, for a whole day, the moſt intrepid efforts to diſengage themſelves from it, but they were foiled in every attempt, with conſiderable loſs of men, and of the moſt part of their artillery.

Night put a ſtop to the engagement: the Auſtrians employed it effectually to entangle the Pruſſians, by guarding with double ſtrength and vigilance, every avenue through which it was poſſible for them to eſcape. So that when the morning appeared, (November the 26th, 1759), they ſaw the hills covered upon every ſide with great bodies of their enemies, and every defile preſented a wall of bayonets, through which it was impoſſible to penetrate. Thus galled with the loſſes of the preceding day, in which it is ſaid they had exhauſted almoſt all their ammunition, ſtripped of the greateſt part of their cannon, ſurrounded by the enemy on all quarters, no reſource, no proſpect of relief appearing, the army loſt all hope and all ſpirit. To make any efforts in this condition, General Finck thought, would only be to throw away unprofitably the lives of many brave men, which might be reſerved for a more hopeful occaſion. He, therefore, notwithſtanding the known rigour of his maſter, the apparent ſhame of the thing, and the thouſand circumſtances of embarraſſment that muſt have ariſen to a man of honour at ſuch a juncture, came to a reſolution of ſurrendering the whole army priſoners of war. Nineteen battalions and 35 ſquadrons, compoſing near 20,000 men by the Auſtrian account, above 12,000 by the Pruſſian confeſſion, 64 pieces of cannon, many ſtandards and colours, were taken on this occaſion.

It was unqueſtionably the greateſt blow which the Pruſſians had felt from the beginning of the war, conſidering the critical time, the numbers taken, and the loſs of reputation which aroſe from the manner in which they were taken. It is no wonder that ſuch an extraordinary advantage, thus cheaply obtained, ſhould greatly have elevated the friends of the Houſe of Auſtria. They had put the change upon the Pruſſians, they had caught their enemy in the very trap which they had laid, as they thought, with ſuch addreſs for them. They had now received a full indemnification for the capture of the Saxon army, which had ſurrendered in much the ſame manner, and very near this place, in the year 1756.

The King of Pruſſia had no time to recover from this ſtroke, under which he was yet ſtaggering, when he received another blow, and a ſevere one. General Durceke was poſted at the right of the Elbe, oppoſite to Miſſen, but on the approach of a large body of Auſtrians, (December the 24th, 1759), they prepared to retreat over the river into that place, into which they thought their retreat ſecure; but having been obliged by an hard froſt to withdraw their bridge of boats, a thaw ſupervening, when they attempted to lay a bridge of pontoons, ſo many great fragments of ice floated in the river that they found it impracticable: they were therefore under the neceſſity of paſſing their army over in boats. Whilſt they ſtruggled with theſe difficulties, their rear-guard was attacked by the Auſtrians with great fury, and all the men that compoſed it, together with the general, were killed or made priſoners. The loſs of the Pruſſians on this occaſion, is ſaid to have been 3000 killed and taken: and this ſecond ſurpriſe brought a new diſcredit, as well as a great detriment to the Pruſſian arms.

Mareſchal Daun was not ſo carried away with this flood of ſucceſs, as to depart in the leaſt degree from his uſual cautious management. Two advantages were now obtained, which, with a few efforts, might be improved to the intire deſtruction of the King of Pruſſia; at leaſt, many generals would have thought ſo. But Mareſchal Daun thought, that the ſame conduct, which, with no riſk, and with little loſs, had reduced the King ſo low, was the moſt likely, if purſued, to bring on his intire ruin. He reſolved to give that Monarch no ſort of chance to recover his fortune. Daun, after the two great victories of the Ruſſians his allies, after the two great victories he had himſelf newly obtained, retired behind Dreſden; and, as if he had been beaten as often as he was victorious, he took refuge in the impregnable camp at Pirna, having ſo diſpoſed matters, that the King of Pruſſia, now too weak to ſend out any great detachments, could not prevent his communication with Bohemia.

MEAUX, SIEGE OF. A city of France, in Champaigne, ſituated on the river Marne, twenty-four miles north-eaſt from Paris. Notwithſtanding Henry V. King of England, made a conqueſt of France by his victory at Agincourt, his eſpouſal of the Princeſs Catharine, and the treaty of Troye, there were ſeveral places which held out for the Dauphin, particularly Meaux and Melun.

The firſt of theſe places was inveſted by Henry, on the 6th of October, 1421, and the ſiege laſted all the winter; during which, he loſt a great number of men, by the inclemency of the weather and fatigue, as well as by the valour of the beſieged, who made incredible efforts in their own defence. The town was divided into two parts, called the city and the marché, the firſt of which was taken by ſtorm in the winter, but the other was defended with infinite obſtinacy. number of other gallant officers, in two ſucceſſive aſſaults, that miſcarried in ſpite of all Henry's conduct and intrepidity.

At length, the garriſon being reduced to the utmoſt extremity, demanded a capitulation on the 2d of May, 1422; but Henry, who was ſo exaſperated at their obſtinacy, inſiſted upon their ſurrendering at diſcretion: he even excluded from all hopes of mercy, the Engliſh, Scots, and Iriſh, who ſhould be found among the defendants. They were obliged to ſubmit to ſuch terms as he was pleaſed to impoſe. After he had taken poſſeſſion of the town, he commanded three officers to be inſtantly beheaded; and the baſtard of Vaurus (a man who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his activity and rancour againſt the Burgundians, who at this time were in alliance with Henry) to be hanged upon a tree, which was diſtinguiſhed by his name, becauſe he had uſed it as a gibbet for the execution of all the Burgundians that fell into his hands.

In the year 1438, it was wreſted out of the hands of the Engliſh by the Conſtable of Richemont, who, having aſſembled a conſiderable number of men, laid ſiege to it. It was defended by the baſtard of Han, an officer of diſtinguiſhed valour: but notwithſtanding all his vigilance and conduct, the town was, after a ſiege of three weeks, taken by aſſault, and the governor made priſoner in the action. The garriſon retired into the part called the market, which is on the other ſide of the river, and broke down the bridge of communication, ſo that the Conſtable was obliged to begin a new ſiege, more difficult than the former. In the mean time, he ordered the Governor to be beheaded, becauſe, though a native of France, he ſerved in the army of England. Then he ſurrounded his camp with lines of contravallation, ſtrengthened by redoubts, to prevent all ſuccour from being thrown into the place. Talbot, the Engliſh General, (for Henry V. was dead) notwithſtanding all theſe precautions, reſolved to ſuccour the beſieged. He marched at the head of a ſmall body of choſen men towards the French lines, and taking by ſtorm one of the redoubts that obſtructed his paſſage, entered the place with a convoy. Next day he retired in the ſame manner, before the enemy had recovered of their conſternation, determined to throw in another more ample ſupply; but before this could be prepared, the Conſtable, enraged at the affront he had ſuſtained from ſuch a handful of Engliſh, preſſed the garriſon with ſuch impetuoſity and perſeverance, as obliged them to capitulate.

MECHERO. Early in the morning of the 12th of January, 1794, General Melas attacked the enemy's advanced poſts. His detachment conſiſted of 200 of the frontier troops, and 250 of Wurmſer's huſſars. The enemy received them with a very briſk and well ſuſtained fire, which nevertheleſs could not reſiſt the bravery of the frontier troops: they entered the village, and charging the enemy with the bayonet, the latter abandoned the place in the utmoſt diſorder, and retired to Tremerſdorf. The huſſars of Wurmſer purſued them, and killed a captain and four officers, with eighty privates—a captain and 90 ſoldiers were made priſoners, among whom were 29 badly wounded. This occurred in the environs of St. Wendel. We had but one man killed, and two officers and three ſoldiers wounded. The General's horſe was killed under him in the beginning of the attack.

MEDITERRANEAN, ACTIONS IN. — A Diſpatch, of which the following is a Copy, was received from Vice-Admiral Hotham, Commander of his Majeſty's ſhips and veſſels in the Mediterranean.

Britannia, at Sea, March 16, 1795.

You will be pleaſed to inform their Lordſhips, that on the 8th inſt. being then in Leghorn road, I received an expreſs from Genoa, that the French fleet, conſiſting of fifteen ſail of the line and three frigates, were ſeen two days before off the Iſle of Marguerite, which intelligence correſponding with a ſignal made from the Moſelle, then in the Offing, for a fleet in the north-weſt quarter, I immediately cauſed the ſquadron to be unmoored, and at day-break the following morning, we put to ſea with a ſtrong breeze from the eaſt-north-eaſt.

The Moſelle previouſly returned to me, with the information, that the fleet ſhe had ſeen were ſteering to the ſouthward, and ſuppoſed to be the enemy; in conſequenee of which I ſhaped my courſe for Corſica, leſt their deſtination ſhould be againſt that iſland, and diſpatched the Tarleton brig to St. Florenzo, with orders for the Berwick to join me with all poſſible expedition off Cape Corſe; but, in the courſe of the night, ſhe returned to me with the unwelcome intelligence of that ſhip's having been captured two days before by the enemy's fleet.

To treſpaſs as little as poſſible upon their Lordſhips time, I ſhall not enter into a detail of our proceedings until the two ſquadrons got ſight of each other, and the proſpect opened of forcing the enemy to action, every movement which was made being directed to that object, and that alone.

Although the French ſhips were ſeen by our advanced frigates daily, yet the two ſquadrons did not get ſight of each other until the 12th, when that of the enemy was diſcovered to windward.

Obſerving them on the morning following ſtill in that direction, without any apparent intention of coming down, the ſignal was made for a general chaſe, in the courſe of which, the weather being ſqually, and blowing very freſh, we diſcovered one of their line of battle ſhips to be without her top-maſts, which afforded to Captain Freemantle, of the Inconſtant frigate, (who was then far advanced on the chaſe) an opportunity of ſhewing a good proof of Britiſh enterprize, by his attacking, raking, and haraſſing her until the coming up of the Agamemnon, when he was moſt ably ſeconded by Captain Nelſon, who did her ſo much damage as to diſable her from putting herſelf again to rights; but they were at this time ſo far detached from our own fleet, that they were obliged to quit her, as other ſhips of the enemy were coming up to her aſſiſtance, by one of which ſhe was ſoon after taken in tow.

Finding that our heavy ſhips did not gain on the enemy during the chaſe, I made the ſignal for the ſquadron to form upon the larboard line of bearing, in which order we continued for the night.

At

At day-light the next morning (the 14th) being about ſix or ſeven leagues to the ſouth-weſt of Genoa, we obſerved the enemy's diſabled ſhip, with the one that had her in tow, to be ſo far to leeward, and ſeparated from their own ſquadron, as to afford a probable chance of our cutting them off. The opportunity was not loſt; all ſail was made to effect that purpoſe, which reduced the enemy to the alternative of abandoning thoſe ſhips, or coming to battle.

Although the latter did not appear to be their choice, they yet came down (on the contrary tack to which we were) with the view of ſupporting them; but the Captain and Bedford, whoſe ſignals were made to attack the enemy's diſabled ſhip and her companion, were ſo advanced, and ſo cloſely ſupported by the other ſhips of our van, as to cut them off effectually from any aſſiſtance that could be given them; the conflict ended in the enemy's abandoning them, and firing upon our line as they paſſed with a light air of wind.

The two ſhips that fell proved to be the Ca-Ira, (formerly the Couronne), of eighty guns, and the Cenſeur of ſeventy-four guns.

Our van ſhips ſuffered ſo much by this attack, particularly the Illuſtrious and Courageux (having each loſt their main and mizen-maſts) that it became impoſſible for any thing further to be effected.

I have, however, good reaſon to hope, from the enemy's ſteering to the weſtward, after having paſſed our fleet, that, whatever might have been their deſign, their intentions are for the preſent fruſtrated.

The French fleet were loaded with troops; the Ca-Ira had 1300 men on board, and the Cenſeur 1000, of whom, by their obſtinate defence, they loſt in killed and wounded between three and four hundred men.

The efforts of our ſquadron to ſecond my wiſhes for an immediate and effectual attack upon the enemy, were ſo ſpirited and unanimous, that I feel peculiar ſatisfaction in offering to their Lordſhips my cordial recommendation of all ranks collectively. It is difficult to ſpecify particular deſert,, where emulation was common to all, and zeal for his Majeſty's ſervice the general deſcription of the fleet.

It is, however, an act of juſtice to expreſs the ſenſe I entertain of the ſervices of Captain Holloway, of the Britannia. During a long friendſhip with that officer I have had repeated proofs of his perſonal and profeſſional talents; and on this recent demand for experience and information, his zeal afforded me the moſt beneficial and ſatisfactory aſſiſtance.

Herewith I tranſmit a liſt of the killed and wounded on board the different ſhips of the ſquadron, and have to lament the loſs of Captain Littlejohn, of the Berwick (who, I underſtand, from ſome of her men that were retaken in the Ca-Ira) was unfortunately killed the morning of the ſhip's being captured; by which misfortune his Majeſty has loſt a moſt valuable and experienced officer, and I have only to add, that he has left a widow and four ſmall children.

I am, &c.

W. HOTHAM.

P. S. Encloſed are liſts of the ſhips that compoſed the two ſquadrons on the 14th inſt.

I am now on the way with the prizes to St. Florenzo, but doubt much whether it will be poſſible to get them in, as they are diſmaſted, greatly ſhattered, and very leaky, particularly the Ca-Ira.

Total return of officers and men killed and wounded on board the fleet: ſeventy-five killed, and 280 wounded.

Officer killed.—Mr. William Coleman, midſhipman of the Courageaux.

Officers wounded.—Mr. Robert Honeyman, third lieutenant of the St. George; Mr. Thomas Hawker, lieutenant of the Windſor Caſtle; Mr. Wilſon Rathbone, lieutenant, and Mr. William Hunter, maſter, of the Captain; Mr. Samuel Moore, midſhipman of the Illuſtrious; Mr. John Blackburn, maſter of the Courageux; Mr. Miles, firſt lieutenant of the Bedford; Mr. John Wilſon, maſter of the Agamemnon.

The Britiſh fleet, with her two prizes (though the gallant Admiral in his diſpatch expreſſes ſome doubt of being able to keep them above water (arrived ſafely in the Gulph of Spezzia on the 18th ult. On the ſame day the Courageux, which ſuffered ſo much in the action, arrived at Leghorn.

The French Account of the Action.

April 1, 1795.

The following are ſome details that have been received from our Toulon fleet ſince it ſailed on the 28th of February.

They firſt fell in with the Berwick of ſeventy-four guns, which was returning from St. Florenzo, in Corſica, where ſhe had been to repair ſome damages, and which took our fleet for the Engliſh. She fought three of our frigates for ſome time, but a line of battle ſhip approaching her, and ſoon after our fleet coming in ſight, ſhe ſtruck her colours. After this our fleet met with a gale of wind, which did ſome damage: two of our line of battle ſhips ran on board each other, and carried away their topmaſts, which threw them a good deal aſtern. The ſame gale of wind ſeparated the Sans Culotte, of 120 guns, on board which was the Repreſentative Le Tourneur, but he got out into a frigate. The Admiral ſent a frigate and a line of battle ſhip to look after theſe two ſhips aſtern, and to bring them into the body of the fleet; but either from diſaffection, or ſome other cauſe, this order was not executed.

It was in this ſtate, that, on the 21ſt, (11th of March), in the morning, the Engliſh fleet hove in ſight, conſiſting of ſixteen ſail of the line, of which two were Neapolitans The Engliſh manœuvred to cut off theſe two ſhips, and ſucceeded but too well. Our Admiral made a ſignal to the ſhips a-head to paſs between the Engliſh fleet and the two ſhips, but a calm, and ſtill more, the ignorance of the captains, prevented the execution of this order, and the van paſſed to windward.

During this time our two ſhips ſuſtained a bloody combat with the Engliſh fleet. Our ſquadron made ſome efforts to ſuccour them: ſome of our veſſels ahead were even engaged with a part of the Engliſh, but the reſult has been the abandoning of the two veſſels, which have been taken by the enemy.

Their names are Le Ca-Ira of eighty-four, and the Cenſeur of ſeventy-four guns.

At the departure of the courier, the remainder of the ſquadron, compoſed of ten ſail of the line, ſtill kept to ſea; but the Sans Culottes had not rejoined, and it was feared ſhe had fallen into the hands of the enemy.

A Diſpatch of which the following is a Copy, was received from Admiral Hotham.

Britannia, Myrtyllo Bay,
June 30, 1795.

It is with peculiar ſatisfaction, I tranſmit to you, for their Lordſhips information, the incloſed letter, which I received this evening by the Fox cutter, from Captain Towry, of his Majeſty's ſhip the Dido, giving an account of a moſt gallant and ſpirited action, which took place on the 24th inſt. between that frigate, in company with the Loweſtoffe, Captain Middleton, on their way to reconnoitre off the Hieres iſlands, and the two French frigates La Minerve and L'Artemiſe, the termination of which conteſt by the capture of the Minerve, when the great ſuperiority of the enemy's force is conſidered, reflects the higheſt honour on the captains, officers, and crews of the Dido and Loweſtoffe.

I am, &c.
W. HOTHAM.

Dido, Port Mahon,
June 27, 1795.

I this day diſpatch the Fox cutter to communicate to you, that in the execution of your inſtructions of the 22d inſt. with his Majeſty's ſhip Loweſtoffe under my orders, being, at day-light of the 24th, in lat. 41 deg. 8 min. and long. 5 deg. 30 min. eaſt, we diſcovered and chaſed two French frigates; after ſome manœuvres they ſtood towards us, and, at a quarter before nine, A. M. the Dido, leading down, commenced a cloſe action with the headmoſt of the enemy's ſhips, which falling twice on board, was at an early period much diſabled from the loſs of her bowſprit, foremaſt, and main-topmaſt; our mizen-maſt being all ſhot away, fore and main top-ſails perfectly uſeleſs, we no longer kept to, at which time the Loweſtoffe opened a well-directed fire; the enemy's ſecond frigate then paſſing, and exchanging the oppoſite broadſides, his Majeſty's ſhips were kept on the ſame tack till ſhe went about, when fearing ſhe might ſtand to the aſſiſtance of the diſabled ſhip, the Loweſtoffe was ſent in chaſe:

chaſe: the French frigate eſcaped by ſuperior ſailing, leaving her friend to be raked, in a very judicious manner, on the return of the Loweſtoffe, to whoſe fire ſhe ſurrendered about noon.

The Dido having cleared the wreck of the mizen-maſt, and bent new topſails, joined in ſecuring the prize, La Minerve, a new ſhip of forty-two guns, eighteen-pounders, on the main deck, and 330 men, a remarkable faſt ſailer. Her companion we learnt to be L'Artemiſe, of thirty-ſix guns.

Having given a detail of the action, it becomes as much my duty as it is my inclination to acknowledge the very able ſupport of his Majeſty's ſhip Loweſtoffe, and to teſtify, that by Captain Middleton's good conduct the buſineſs of the day was, in a great meaſure, brought to a fortunate iſſue. I muſt, at the ſame time, pay the juſt tribute of my warmeſt gratitude to the officers and ſhip's company I have the honour to command; and it is with deep regret I add, that Lieutenant Buckol, (firſt of the Dido), a moſt active officer, is among the wounded, I fear ſeverely, though he never quitted the deck; Mr. Douglas, the boatſwain, a deſerving young man, is killed. Captain Middleton's report of the conduct of the officers and people of the Loweſtoffe is alſo highly flattering.

I have the honour to encloſe a liſt of the killed and wounded. Having received information from the priſoners that the French fleet were actually at ſea, the ſtate of the ſhips obliged me to run for this port, where I propoſe fitting jury-maſts in the prize, and proceed to Ajaccio. Circumſtances are, I hope, ſufficiently ſtrong to plead my excuſe for not fully executing your former orders.

I remain with reſpect,
G. H. Towry.

P. S. We cannot exactly eſtimate the loſs in the French ſhip, but imagine it to be about twenty. L'Artemiſe was alſo much hulled.

Liſt of the killed and wounded on board his Majeſty's ſhips Dido and Loweſtoffe.

Dido, Mr. Cuthbert Douglas, boatſwain, and five ſeamen, killed; Mr. Richard Buckol, firſt lieutenant, Richard Willan, clerk, John Henley, quarter-maſter, James Gregory, boatſwain's mate, and eleven ſeamen, wounded.—Loweſtoffe, three ſeamen, wounded.

Extract of a Letter from Admiral Hotham, dated Britannia at Sea, July 14, 1795.

You will be pleaſed to inform their lordſhips, that I diſpatched on the 4th inſtant from St. Florenzo the ſhips Agamemnon, Meleager, Ariadne, Moſelle, and Mutine cutter, under the orders of Captain Nelſon, whom I directed to call off Genoa for the Inconſtant and Southampton frigates that were lying there, and to take them with him, if, from the intelligence he might there obtain, he ſhould find it neceſſary.

On the morning of the 7th I was much ſurpriſed to learn that the above ſquadron was ſeen in the Offing, returning into that port, purſued by the enemy's fleet, which, by General de Vins's letter, the lateſt account I had received) I had reaſon to ſuppoſe were certainly at Toulon.

Immediately on the enemy's appearance, I made every preparation to put to ſea after them; and notwithſtanding the unpleaſant predicament we were in, moſt of the ſhips being in the midſt of watering and refitting, I was yet enabled, by the zeal and extraordinary exertions of the officers and men, to get the whole of the fleet under weigh that night, as ſoon as the land wind permitted us to move; from which time we neither ſaw nor heard any thing of the enemy till the 12th, when being to the eaſtward, and within ſight of the Hieres iſlands, two veſſels were ſpoken with by Captain Hotham of the Cyclops, and Captain Boys of La Fleche, who acquainted them that they had ſeen the French fleet, not many hours before, to the ſouthward of thoſe iſlands: upon which information, I made the ſignal before night to prepare for battle, as an indication to our fleet, that the enemy was near.

Yeſterday, at day-break, we diſcovered them to leeward of us, on the larboard tack, conſiſting of twenty-three ſail, ſeventeen of which proved to be of the line: the wind at this time blew very hard from the W.N.W. attended with a heavy ſwell, and ſix of our ſhips had to bend main-top-ſails, in the room of thoſe that were ſplit by the gale, in the courſe of the night.

I cauſed the fleet, however, to be formed with all poſſible expedition, on the larboard line of bearing, carrying all ſail poſſible to preſerve that order, and to keep the wind of the enemy, in the hopes of cutting them off from the land, from which we were only five leagues diſtant.

At eight o'clock, finding they had no other view but that of endeavouring to get from us, I made the ſignal for a general chaſe, and for the ſhips to take ſuitable ſtations for their mutual ſupport, and to engage the enemy as arriving up with them in ſucceſſion; but the baffling winds and vexatious calms, which render every naval operation in this country doubtful, ſoon afterwards took place, and allowed a few only of our van ſhips to get up with the enemy's rear about noon, which they attacked ſo warmly, that, in the courſe of an hour after, we had the ſatisfaction to find one of their ſternmoſt ſhips, viz. L'Alcide, of ſeventy-four guns, had ſtruck; the reſt of their fleet, favoured by a ſhift of wind to the eaſtward, (that placed them now to windward of us) had got ſo far into Frejus Bay, whilſt the major part of our's was becalmed in the Offing, that it became impoſſible for any thing further to be effected; and thoſe of our ſhips which were engaged had approached ſo near to the ſhore, that I judged it proper to call them off by ſignal.

If the reſult of the day was not ſo completely ſatisfactory as the commencement promiſed, it is my duty to ſtate, that no exertions could be more unanimous than thoſe of the fleet under my command; and it would be injuſtice to the general merit of all, to ſelect individual inſtances of commendation, had not ſuperiority of ſailing placed ſome of the ſhips in an advanced ſituation, of which they availed themſelves in the moſt diſtinguiſhed and honourable manner; and among the number was the Victory, having Rear-Admiral Mann on on board, who had ſhifted his flag to that ſhip upon this occaſion.

I am ſorry to ſay that the Alcide, about half an hour after ſhe had ſtruck, by ſome accident caught fire in her fore-top before ſhe was taken poſſeſſion of, and the flames ſpread with ſuch rapidity, that the whole ſhip was ſoon in a blaze; ſeveral boats from the fleet were diſpatched as quickly as poſſible to reſcue as many of the people as they could ſave from the deſtruction that awaited them, and three hundred of them were in conſequence preſerved, when the ſhip blew up with the moſt awful and tremendous exploſion, and between three and four hundred people are ſuppoſed to have periſhed.

Encloſed herewith is a liſt of the killed and wounded on board the different ſhips that were engaged, by which their Lordſhips will perceive our loſs has not been great; and I have the pleaſure to add, that the damages ſuſtained by thoſe ſhips have been ſuch as can eaſily be remedied.

Had we fortunately fallen in with the enemy any diſtance from the land, I flatter myſelf we ſhould have given a deciſive blow to their naval force in theſe ſeas; and although the advantage of yeſterday may not appear to be of any great moment, I yet hope it will have ſerved as a check upon their preſent operations be they what they may.

Return of the officers and men killed and wounded, in action with the French fleet on the 13th of July.

Victory, 1 midſhipman, 3 marines, killed; 11 ſeamen wounded.—Captain, 1 ſeaman, killed.—Culloden, 2 ſeamen, killed; firſt Lieutenant T. Whitter, and 4 ſeamen, wounded.—Blenheim, 2 ſeamen, killed; 2 ditto wounded.—Defence, 1 ſeaman, killed; 6 ditto wounded.

In the ſitting of the Convention of July 24, at Paris, Defermont, in the name of the Committee of Public Safety, read the following letter from the Repreſentative Niou, on miſſion with the French fleet:

Citizens Colleagues,

The following are the details of the affair of yeſterday:

At half paſt two in the morning, being diſtant about three miles to the ſouthward from the Iſle of Levant (one of the Hieres Iſlands), we learned from the Jupiter, that the Engliſh fleet was to the windward of us. The high wind of the preceding night had forced our ſhips to keep at a conſiderable diſtance from each other. The line of battle was formed, notwithſtanding, as well as circumſtances permitted. The Admiral gave orders that each veſſel ſhould take her place in the line, not according to rank, but as ſuited the ſpeed and poſition of the ſhips. They appeared to do the ſame on their ſide, and their van was ſoon formed. The Engliſh fleet amounted to twenty-three ſail of the line, of which five were three-deckers, and eight frigates. I have already intimated to you, that we had but ſeventeen ſail of the line, and ſix frigates.

The inſtructions which you had ſent to the Admiral and to me, and in which you enjoined us not to commit the force confided to us, determined us to retreat to the gulf of Frejus, or to that of Juan; for being to leeward of the Hieres Iſlands, we deemed it impoſſible to gain them. The wind had much fallen, but there was ſtill a tolerable breeze: this, however, diminiſhed by degrees, and we were at length becalmed about three leagues from land. The enemy availed themſelves of the breeze, which had not yet forſaken them, and their van approached very near to our rear. The engagement at length commenced. The French were the firſt to fire, and ſeveral of the Engliſh ſhips, of which one was a three decker, experienced much damage in their maſts and rigging. The latter loſt her mainmaſt, in conſequence of which ſhe tacked about, but ſtill continued her fire. This movement permitted our rear to avail themſelves of a breeze, which, though light and momentary, enabled them to replace themſelves in order.

The Admiral then perceiving that the Alcide had ſuffered much in her rigging, and could with difficulty follow her diviſion, ordered the frigates, the Juſtice and the Alceſte, to take her in tow. He made, at the ſame time, the ſignal to the ſhips which were near her to afford her every ſuccour. He was about to give the ſame orders to the van diviſion, and to a part of that of the centre, which had been hitherto becalmed, but whom a light breeze now enabled to put themſelves in motion, to relieve the Alcide at the riſk of a general action, for the whole of the Engliſh fleet was now bearing down. But at the inſtant when this order was about to be given, we perceived the Alcide entirely in flames. The hull, the maſts and ſails, all ſeemed to take fire at the ſame moment. All the ſhips which were near her, whether friends or enemies, immediately removed to a diſtance, and we renounced the deſign of approaching to her ſuccour. In half an hour afterwards ſhe blew up with a violent exploſion.

There was, after this deplorable accident, a ſlight cannonade between the rear of the French fleet and the van of the Engliſh. But the enemy ſoon tacked about, and our fleet, continuing to make ſail, anchored in the Gulph of Frejus, where we are at preſent.

The reſult of this engagement, to which you will ſee we were compelled, has been the loſs of a ſhip, which was deſtroyed by accident. But it is to be obſerved, that ſeveral of the enemy's veſſels were ſo much damaged, that they were obliged to be taken in tow; and that a fleet of ſeventeen ſhips was able to make head againſt one of twenty-three, the latter having the advantage of the wind, without being able to ſtay the courſe of an adverſary ſo inferior.

If the wind had not left us all at once, the French fleet would have returned to port without any accident, for it was much better worked than that of the Engliſh!—Though ſome veſſels are damaged, the fleet will return as ſoon as it can be done, without any danger, to Toulon.

Herewith I have the pleaſure to incloſe to you, for their Lordſhip's information, a letter that I received this evening, by expreſs, from Captain Nelſon, of his Majeſty's ſhip Agamemnon, giving an account of his having proceeded, with the ſhips therein mentioned, to the Bays of Alaſſio and Languelia, places in the neighbourhood of Vado, in the poſſeſſion of the French armies, and of his having cut from thence the nine veſſels named in the encloſed liſt, beſides two that he deſtroyed.

His officer-like conduct upon this, and indeed, upon every occaſion where his ſervices are called forth, reflects upon him the higheſt credit.

Copy of a Letter from Captain H. Nelſon, Agamemnon, Vado Bay, dated Auguſt 17.

Having received information from General de Vins, that a convoy of proviſions and ammunition was arrived at Alaſſio, a place in the poſſeſſion of the French army, I yeſterday proceeded with the following ſhips, Inconſtant, Meleager, Southampton, Tartar, Ariadne, and Speedy, to that place, where, within an hour, we took the veſſels named in the encloſed liſt; there was but a very feeble oppoſition from ſome of the enemy's cavalry, who fired on our boats when boarding the veſſels near the ſhore, but I have the pleaſure to ſay, no man was killed or wounded. The enemy had 2000 horſe and foot ſoldiers in the town, which prevented my landing and deſtroying their magazines of proviſions and ammunition.

I ſent Captain Fremantle, of the Inconſtant, with the Tartar, to Languelia, a town on the weſt ſide of the Bay of Alaſſio, where he executed my orders in a moſt officer-like manner; and I am indebted to every captain and officer in the ſquadron for their activity, but more particularly ſo to Lieutenant George Andrews, firſt lieutenant of the Agamemnon, who, by his ſpirited and officer-like conduct, ſaved the French corvette from going on ſhore.

Extract of a Letter from Admiral Sir John Jervis dated May 11, 1796.

I deſire you will communicate to the Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty the encloſed letter from Commodore Nelſon, addreſſed to me; and the ſatisfaction I feel in having an officer of ſuch zeal and local knowledge in the important ſtation he occupies.

Agamemnon, off Loana, April 25, 1796.

This morning having received information that a convoy, laden with ſtores for the French army, had anchored at Loana, I loſt no time in proceeding off that place, with the ſhips Meleager, Diadem, and Peterell. I was ſorry to obſerve, on my approach, that, inſtead of a convoy, only four veſſels were laying under the batteries, which opened on our approach, and their fire was returned as the ſhips got up, under cover of which our boats boarded the four veſſels lying very near the ſhore; a heavy fire of muſquetry was kept near our boats, and it is with the greateſt grief I have to mention that Lieutenant James Noble, of the Agamemnon, a moſt worthy and gallant officer, is, I fear, mortally wounded. The fire from the ſhips keeping under the fire of the batteries, we ſuſtained no damage; the Agamemnon was, I believe, the only ſhip ſtruck by ſhot. The principal part of our ſervice fell on our boats, whoſe conduct and gallantry could not on any occaſion have been exceeded, and I wiſh fully to expreſs the ſenſe I entertain of the gallantry of every officer and man employed on this occaſion. Herewith I tranſmit a liſt of wounded, and of the veſſels taken, none of which had any colours hoiſted or men on board when taken.

Copy of a Letter from Admiral Sir John Jervis, dated Victory, off Toulon, June 8, 1796.

I herewith encloſe a letter I received laſt evening from Commodore Nelſon, in the Gulf of Genoa, with an account of the important articles taken from the enemy in the expedition under the Commodores immediate direction, the 31ſt ultimo; alſo a liſt of the killed and wounded.

Their Lordſhips are ſo thoroughly acquainted with the vigilance and enterpriſe of Commodore Nelſon, that I forbear to repeat his merits on this occaſion.

J. JERVIS.

Agamemnon, off Oneglia, June 1, 1796.

At two, P. M. yeſterday, ſeeing ſix ſail running along ſhore, which I believed to be French, and knowing the great conſequence of intercepting the cannon and ordnance ſtores, which I had information were expected from Toulon, to be landed at St. Pierre d'Acena, for the ſiege of Mantua, I made the ſignal for a general chaſe; when the veſſels, which now hoiſted French colours, anchored cloſe under a battery. I directed

Captain

Captain Cockburn, of the Meleager, to lead me in, which he did in an officer-like manner; and at three o'clock the Meleager and Agamemnon anchored in leſs than four fathoms water, as ſoon afterwards did the Peterell and Speedy; after a ſhort reſiſtance from the battery and veſſels we took poſſeſſion of them.

It is impoſſible I can do juſtice to the alacrity and gallantry ever conſpicuous in my little ſquadron. Our boats boarded the Nationel ketch, (the commodore of the convoy,) in the fire of three eighteen pounders, and one eighteen pounder in a gun-boat.

The Blanche and Diadem being to leeward, the former could not anchor till the veſſel had ſtruck; but the boats of all the ſhips were active in getting them off the ſhore, the enemy having cut their cables when they ſurrendered. A ſmart firing of muſquetry was kept up from the ſhore during the whole of this ſervice.

The Agamemnon's maſts, ſails, and rigging are a little cut, but of no material conſequence.

Much as I feel indebted to every officer in the ſquadron, yet I cannot omit to mention the great ſupport and aſſiſtance I have ever received from Captain Cockburn; he has been under my command near a year on this ſtation, and I ſhall feel myſelf guilty of neglect of duty, was I not to repreſent his zeal, ability, and courage, which is conſpicuous on every occaſion which offers.

Incloſed I tranſmit you a liſt of the killed and alſo of the veſſels taken.

Extract of a Letter from Sir John Jervis, June 10, 1796.

I acquaint you, for the information of the Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty, that laſt evening, having obſerved a French cruiſer working up to Hieres-Bay, within the iſlands, I called Captain Macnamara, of his Majeſty's ſhip Southampton, on board the Victory, pointed the ſhip out, and directed him to make a daſh at her, through the grand Paſs, which he performed with admirable ſpirit and alacrity: I beg leave to refer their Lordſhips to his ſtatement incloſed, for the detail of his gallant action.

Southampton, off Toulon, June 10, 1796.

In obedience to the orders I received from you on the Victory's quarter-deck, laſt evening, I puſhed through the grand Paſs, hauled up under the batteries on the North-Eaſt end of Porquerolle with an eaſy ſail, in hopes I ſhould be taken for a French or neutral frigate, which I have great reaſon to believe ſucceeded; for I got within piſtol-ſhot of the enemy's ſhip before I was diſcovered, and cautioned the captain, through a trumpet, not to make a fruitleſs reſiſtance; when he immediately ſnapped his piſtol at me, and fired his broadſide. At this period, being very near the heavy battery of Fort Breganſon, I laid him inſtantly on board, and Lieutenant Lydiard, at the head of the boarders, with an intrepidity, no words can deſcribe, entered and carried her in about ten minutes, although he met with a ſpirited reſiſtance from the captain (who fell) and 100 men under arms to receive him. In this ſhort conflict, the behaviour of all the officers and ſhip's company of the Southampton had my full approbation; and I do not mean to take from their merit by ſtating to you that the conduct of Lieutenant Lydiard was above all praiſe.

After laſhing the two ſhips together, I found ſome difficulty in getting from under their battery, which kept up a very heavy fire, and was not able to return through the grand Paſs before half after one o'clock this morning, with the L'Utilité corvette, of twenty-four guns, French ſix-pounders, commanded by Citizen François Veza, and 136 men, ſeveral of whom eſcaped on ſhore in the launch.

I am happy to inform you that I only loſt one man, William Oirton, marine, who was killed by a piſtol-ſhot near me on the quarter deck. From the beſt information I can obtain, the enemy had killed and wounded twenty-five.

J. MACNAMARA.

Copy of a Letter from Captain Bowen, of his Majeſty's Ship the Terpſichore, 23d of October 1796.

Judging it to be proper that my Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty ſhould be acquainted as ſoon as poſſible with the capture of a Spaniſh frigate by his Majeſty's ſhip under my command, I herewith incloſe you a copy of my letter to the Commander in Chief, giving an account of the action; and I requeſt you will be pleaſed to lay the ſame before their Lordſhips.

Extract of a Letter from Captain Bowen, to Admiral Sir John Jervis, 23d of October, 1796.

On the morning of the 13th inſtant, at day-light, we diſcovered a frigate to windward ſtanding towards us: about eight I could perceive her making every preparation for battle, and was then apparently in chaſe of us. Our ſituation altogether was ſuch as to prevent my being over deſirous of engaging her. Out of our ſmall ſmall complement of men, we had left thirty at the hoſpital, and we had more than that number ſtill on board in our ſick and convaleſcent liſts, all of whom were either dangerouſly ill or extremely weak. We were ſcarcely out of ſight of the ſpot where we knew the Spaniſh fleet to have been cruiſing only two days before; and, in fact, we had ſtood on to look for them, with a view of aſcertaining their movements. A ſmall Spaniſh veſſel, which we conjectured to be a ſort of tender, was paſſing us, ſteering towards Carthagena, ſo that I could hardly flatter myſelf with being able to bring the frigate off in the event of a victory, or of even eſcaping myſelf, if diſabled. On the other hand, it evidently appeared that nothing but a flight and ſuperior ſailing could enable me to avoid an action; and to do that from a frigate apparently not much ſuperior to us, except in point of bulk, would have been committing the character of one of his Majeſty's ſhips more than I could bring myſelf to reſolve on. I therefore continued ſtanding on without any alteration of courſe.

Having, with infinite ſatisfaction and comfort to myſelf, commanded the Terpſichore's crew for two years and a half, through a pretty conſiderable variety of ſervices, I well knew the veteran ſtuff which I had ſtill left in health to depend upon, for upholding the character of Britiſh ſeamen; and I felt my mind at eaſe as to the termination of any action with the frigate in ſight only.

At half paſt nine ſhe came within hail, and hauled her wind on our weather beam; and as I conceived ſhe only waited to place herſelf to advantage, and to point her guns with exactneſs, and being myſelf unwilling to loſe the poſition we were then in, I ordered one gun to be fired, as a trier of her intention. It was ſo inſtantaneouſly returned, and followed up by her whole broadſide, that I am confident they muſt have done it at the ſight of our flaſh. The action of courſe went on, and we ſoon diſcovered that her people would not, or could not, reſiſt our fire. At the end of about an hour and forty minutes, during which time we had twice wore, and employed about twenty of the laſt minutes in chaſe, ſhe ſurrendered. At this period ſhe appeared moſt entirely diſabled, and we had drawn up cloſe alongſide, with every gun well charged and well pointed. It was, nevertheleſs, with conſiderable difficulty that I prevailed on the Spaniſh commander to decline the receiving of ſuch a broadſide by ſubmitting; and from every thing which I have ſince learned, the perſonal courage, conduct, and zeal of that officer, whoſe name is Don Thomas Ayalde, was ſuch during the action, notwithſtanding the event of it, as reflects on him the greateſt honour, and irreſiſtibly impreſſes on my mind the higheſt admiration of his character. After (from the effect of our fire) all his booms had tumbled down, and rendered his waſte guns unſerviceable, all the ſtanding rigging of his lower maſts ſhot away, and I believe nearly every running rope cut through, and a great number of his people killed and wounded, he ſtill perſevered, though he could rally but few of his men, to defend his ſhip, almoſt longer than defence was juſtifiable. Had there been the ſmalleſt motion in the ſea, every maſt muſt inevitably have gone by the board.

Our loſs, which will appear by the incloſed liſt, has been leſs than could have been expected; but our maſts, ſails, and rigging were found to be pretty much cut up.

The ſpirited exertions of every officer, man, and boy belonging to the ſhip I command, as well in the action as in the ſecuring two diſabled ſhips, and briging them inſtantly off from a critical ſituation, by taking the prize in tow, and by their inceſſant labour ever ſince, will, I truſt, when their ſmall number is conſidered, place them in a light ſuperior to any praiſe which I could beſtow. I am even unwilling to ſpeak of the particular conduct of any of the officers, but the talents diſplayed by the firſt Lieutenant, Devonſhire, who was but juſt out of our ſick liſt, during the action, added to his uncommon fatigue in taking care of the prize, and the very able manner in which he conducted and prepared to defend her, entitles him to this diſtinction, and proves him highly deſerving of the recommendation you gave him, with his appointment in the Weſt Indies. And although I had rather any other perſon ſhould obſerve the conduct of a brother of mine in action, and ſpeak of it afterwards; yet I feel it to be my duty, as captain of the ſhip, to ſtate, that I thought Mr. Bowen's, the ſecond lieutenant, conduct was particularly animating to the ſhip's company, and uſeful, from the great number of guns which he ſaw well pointed in the courſe of the action; added to which, from the abſence of the firſt Lieutenant on board the prize, the labouring oar of this ſhip has fallen on him; and, in my mind, the taſk we have had ſince the action, has been infinitely more arduous than that of the action itſelf.

The name of the prize is the Mahoneſa, carrying on the main deck twenty-ſix Spaniſh twelves, weighing eighteen ounces more than ours, eight Spaniſh ſixes on the quarter-deck, and a number of braſs cohorns, ſwivels, &c. had on board 275 men, beſides ſix pilots, qualified for the Mediterranean as high as Leghorn, and to be put on board Admiral Langara's fleet, which ſhe had been ſent from Carthagena to look for. She was built in 1789 at Mahon, is of very large dimenſions, meaſuring 1114 tons and a half Spaniſh, was before the action in complete good condition, and is conſidered by the Spaniſh officers the faſteſt ſailer, and one of the beſt conſtructed, and, what they attach conſiderable importance to, the handſomeſt frigate in their navy.

Both the frigates have this moment anchored in ſafety.

R. Bowen.

An account of the killed and wounded in the action between his Majeſty's ſhip Terpſichore and the Spaniſh frigate Mahoneſa, on the 13th of October, 1796.

Terpſichore mounts thirty-two twelve and ſix-pounders; complement of men 215.

Killed.—None.

Wounded.—Mr. Richard Hobbs, acting boatſwain, ſlightly ſlightly in the foot; John Roberts, quarter-maſter, loſt his left thigh—and two ſeamen.

Mahoneſa, by the beſt accounts I have been able to collect, had about thirty killed or died of their wounds the day of the action, and about the ſame number wounded, ſeveral of whom are ſince dead.

Extract of a Letter from the Earl of St. Vincent, dated at Gibraltar, February 20, 1799.

I encloſe letters from Captain Bowen, of his Majeſty's ſhip Argo, and Captain Sanders, of his Majeſty's ſloop L'Eſpoir, giving an account of the capture of the Santa Tereſa Spaniſh frigate and Africa xebeque; alſo a letter from Captain Markham, of his Majeſty's ſhip Centaur, relating the events of his cruiſe on the coaſt of Catalonia.

Argo, off Port Mahon, Feb. 8. 1799.

I have great pleaſure in acquainting you, that in carrying your orders into execution, in company with the Leviathan, on the 6th inſtant at four P. M. drawing round the eaſt end of Majorca under ſtorm ſtayſails, with a violent gale weſterly, I diſcovered two large Spaniſh frigates at anchor, near a fortified town on the ſouth point of the Bahia de Alcude, who, immediately on ſeeing us, cut their cables, and made ſail to the N. N. E. We inſtantly gave chaſe with all the canvaſs the ſhips could bear; unfortunately the Leviathan's main-top ſail gave way, which cauſed her to drop a-ſtern, the enemy ſeeing this, took the advantage of it, and after the cloſe of day ſpoke each other and ſeparated; one hauling her wind to the northward, and the other ſet top-gallant ſails and kept away before it; which latter I followed. The darkneſs of the night precluded the Leviathan from ſeeing their manœuvre, as alſo my ſignal to her to alter her courſe to port; however the Leviathan kept ſight of the Argo, and was near up with us at midnight, when I got alongſide of the enemy, who ſtill perſevered in his endeavours to get off, (although his ſmall ſails were either ſhot or carried away in the chaſe), and did not ſurrender until he had received our whole broadſide, which wounded two men, and did much miſchief to his rigging. She proved to be the Santa Tereſa, commanded by Don Pablo Perez, mounting forty-two guns, beſides ſwivels and cohorns, and manned with 280 ſeamen and marines, beſides 250 ſoldiers; in all 530 perſons on board. My firſt lieutenant, Mr. Thomas Lyne, has much merit in keeping ſight and obſerving the different ſhifts of the enemy, by which great advantage was gained by the Argo during the chaſe; much commendation is due to his profeſſional ſkill and great exertions, after taking poſſeſſion of the prize, in ſaving her tottering maſt from tumbling overboard, which he could not have done, had not Captain Buchanan ſent him ſpeedy aſſiſtance of officers and men from the Leviathan, to whom I feel myſelf much indebted. Great praiſe is due to all my officers and ſeamen, for their vigilance and exertions in ſhortening and making ſail in ſqualls during the chaſe; and, had the enemy given them an opportunity of ſhewing further proofs of their zeal and loyalty, I am convinced they would have behaved as Britiſh ſeamen always do upon theſe occaſions.

I have the honour to be, &c.

JAMES BOWEN.

P. S. The Santa Tereſa is juſt out of dock, rebuilt, new coppered, and is in every reſpect almoſt as good as a new ſhip; ſhe was completely ſtored and victualled for four months, and is eſteemed one of the faſteſt ſailing frigates out of Spain, of large dimenſions, upwards of 950 tons, and fit for immediate ſervice. Her conſort, the Proſerpine, that made her eſcape, is of the ſame force, but not ſo large.

Extract of a Letter from Captain Cuthbert, of his Majeſty's ſhip Majeſtic, to the Earl St. Vincent, dated at Sea, February 23, 1799.

I have the honour of incloſing a letter to your Lordſhip, received from Captain Sanders, commander of his Majeſty's brig L'Eſpoir, giving an account of his having engaged and captured the Africa, a Spaniſh xebec, mounting fourteen guns, long 4-pounders, and four braſs four-pound ſwivels, in the ſervice of the King of Spain, and commanded by Joſepho Subjado.

Having been an eye-witneſs to the action, it is not in the power of my pen ſufficiently to extol the meritorious conduct of Captain Sanders and his ſhip's company on the occaſion.

L'Eſpoir, at Sea, February 22, 1799.

At a quarter paſt noon, town of Marbello bearing N. N. W. three leagues, a brig and two xebecs in the S. E. quarter appearing ſuſpicious, I hoiſted my colours to them, when the brig and one of the xebecs hoiſted Spaniſh, upon which a Mooriſh brig in tow was caſt off, and L'Eſpoir hauled to the wind in chaſe. It was ſoon perceived they were armed veſſels, but not being ſo fortunate as to weather them, we exchanged broadſides with both in paſſing. L'Eſpoir being tacked, ſoon brought the xebec to cloſe action, which continued an hour and a half, when a favourable opportunity of boarding her was embraced, and after a ſharp conteſt of about twenty minutes ſhe ſurrendered, and proved to be the Africa, commanded by Joſepho Subjado, in the ſervice of the King of Spain, mounting fourteen long four-pounders, and four braſs four-pound ſwivels, having on board ſeventy-five ſeamen and thirty-eight ſoldiers from Algoſamus, bound to Malaga. Lieutenant Richardſon, (in whom I have much confidence) all the officers and ſeamen of his Majeſty's ſloop I have the honour to command, behaved with the ſame courage they have done on former occaſions. During the action the brig (which I have ſince learned mounted eighteen guns) ſtood in ſhore and anchored.

JAMES SANDERS.

Copy of a Letter from Lord Keith, off Genoa, April 18, 1799.

I have the ſatisfaction of acquainting you, for the information of their lordſhips, that the Guillaume Tell having attempted to eſcape from Malta on the evening of the 29th ult. was intercepted and captured the following morning by his Majeſty's ſhip Lion, Foudroyant, and Penelope; but as I have not yet received Captain Dixon's account of the particulars of the action, or of the loſs which has been ſuſtained, I muſt take another opportunity of communicating them. I underſtand, however, that the enemy was completely diſmaſted before ſhe ſtruck, and that the Lion and Foudroyant have had killed and wounded about forty men each.

of

Extract of a Letter from Earl St. Vincent, dated at Port Mahon, June 22, 1799.

You will herewith receive, for the information of the Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty, a letter from Vice-Admiral Lord Keith, encloſing one from Captain Markham, of his Majeſty's ſhip Centaur, giving an account of the capture of a ſquadron of French frigates, which had made their eſcape from Alexandria.

Queen Charlotte, at Sea, June 19.

I have the honour to inform your Lordſhip of the capture of five French veſſels by the ſquadron under my command, and to encloſe your Lordſhip Captain Markham's letter, whoſe ſhip was moſt advanced, and whoſe conduct on this occaſion, as on all others, has been moſt exemplary.

KEITH.

Centaur, June 19.

I have the honour to inform you, that, purſuant to your ſignal of yeſterday for a general chaſe to the N. E. I came up with and captured three frigates on the evening of this day. The Bellona and Santa Tereſa frigate being neareſt when the two ſternmoſt ſtruck, I made their ſignals to take poſſeſſion of them, whilſt I purſued the third, which alſo ſtruck in an hour afterwards. The Emerald, in the mean time, took the Salamine brig, and the Captain, the Alerte. This ſquadron was commanded by Rear-Admiral Perré, thirty-three days from Jaffa, bound to Toulon; for their names and force I beg leave to refer you to the liſt.

J. MARKHAM.

Copy of a Letter from the Earl of St. Vincent.

I encloſe, for the information of the Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty, a letter I have received from Captain Brenton, of his Majeſty's ſloop Speedy, giving an account of the capture of three Spaniſh armed veſſels.

ST. VINCENT.

Speedy, Gibraltar, Auguſt 21, 1799.

I have the honour to inform your Lordſhip, that on the 9th inſtant, in company with the Defender Britiſh privateer, of Gibraltar, of fourteen guns, we captured the Spaniſh veſſels San Chriſto de Gracia, eight guns, ſix and nine-pounders, name unknown, ten guns, ſix and nine-pounders, name unknown, four guns, ſixes, after an action of two hours and a half. Upon ſeeing us they ran into a ſmall ſandy bay, five leagues to the eaſtward of Cape de Gatte, and moored in a cloſe line, within a boat's length of the beach: we engaged them an hour and three quarters under ſail before we could gain ſoundings, although not more than a cable's length diſtant from the rocks; but finding the enemy had much the advantage, from our conſtant change of poſition, I determined to puſh for an anchorage, and was fortunate enough to effect one within piſtol ſhot of the centre veſſel: after three quarters of an hour cloſe action the Spaniſh took to their boats, cutting the cables of two of the veſſels, which drove on ſhore; they were, however, all brought off by our boats, under a conſtant fire of muſketry from hills. The privateer having but twenty-two men, was obliged to ſtand out to procure aſſiſtance from a boat ſhe had in the Offing, and could not reach the anchorage till the concluſion of the action. The conduct of her Commander was highly meritorious throughout, and muſt have conſiderably accelerated the event. The officers and men under my command behaved in ſuch a manner as would have inſured our ſucceſs againſt a more formidable enemy. The Speedy had but two men wounded, the Defender one, neither dangerous. We found two men dead on board the Spaniards. The remainder of their crews eſcaped on ſhore.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Copy of a Letter from William Ricketts, Eſq. of his Majeſty's Sloop El Corſo, September 14, 1800.

I herewith encloſe you a copy of a letter to Lord Keith.

W. RICKETTS.

El Corſo, Ancona, 28th of Auguſt, 1800.

In compliance with your order to deſtroy the veſſels in the harbour, and make a proper example of the town of Ceſenatico, I proceeded with his Majeſty's cutter the Pigmy off that port; but finding it impoſſible to get within grapeſhot of the Mole, was under the neceſſity of deferring the attempt till the night of the 26th, when the boats of both veſſels under the order of Lieutenant Yeo, firſt of El Corſo, proceeded to Ceſenatico, and ſoon after day-light I perceived them in poſſeſſion of the town, ſucceſsfully maintaining a poſition againſt ſome French troops in the neighbourhood; but about eight obſerving a party of horſe in full ſpeed from Cervia, I judged it prudent to call them immediately on board, though not before we had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing that the gallantry of Lieutenant Yeo, aided by Mr. Douglas, maſter of the Pigmy, had been crowned with the fulleſt ſucceſs; the veſſels and harbour at that time forming but one flame; and that the intent of the enterpriſe might not be loſt on the coaſt, I ſhortly afterwards ſent in the attached note.

I have the honour likewiſe to incloſe the report of Lieutenant Yeo.

W. RICKETTS.

To the Inhabitants of Ceſenatico.

The treachery of your municipality, in cauſing to be arreſted arrested an officer with dispatches, has been long known to the British Admiral in these seas.

That municipality may now sadly know that the severity of judgment, long delayed, is always exemplary.

That the innocent suffer with the guilty, though much to be regretted, is the natural feature of war: and the more terrible the infliction on this occasion, the more striking the example should prove to surrounding municipalities.

W. Ricketts.

Report.

Of thirteen vessels of different descriptions laying within the Mole of Cesenatico, two were sunk and eleven burnt, one of them deeply laden with copper, money, and bale goods; the harbour choked by the wreck of four sunk in the mouth of it; and both piers entirely consumed.

MEER, battle at. A place near Meurs, situated on the Rhine, in Westphalia, about sixteen miles north from Dusseldorff. Although Prince Ferdinand gained some advantage over the French army at Crevelt, in the year 1758, yet it was more than counterbalanced by that which the Duke de Broglio gained at Sandershausen, over the Hessians, inasmuch as it opened to the French the possession of the Weser.

They might act in Westphalia as they pleased; and it was to be feared, that if they availed themselves of the advantages they had, they might be able to intercept the British troops. These troops having been landed at Embden, were now on their march under the command of the Duke of Marlborough, to reinforce the allied army. The Prince in this situation of affairs, had no option left but an engagement with the French army, or a retreat over the Rhine. The former was not easy to compass, as the French industriously declined a battle; and it became extremely dangerous to remain long in a position with the enemy's army on his left, and the strong fortress of Gueldre on his right. In this situation his subsistence became every day more difficult. To repass the Rhine had its difficulties too: the roads which led to that river, were rendered almost impassable by the heavy rains; the river itself was so swelled with them, that the bridge at Rees had been for some time useless.

These disagreeable circumstances of the allied army did not escape the penetration of M. de Chevert, one of the ablest commanders among the French. He formed a plan upon them, which, if it had succeeded, must have put the Allies into the greatest perplexity. This general had some time before passed the Rhine, with an intention of making himself master of Dusseldorp, and he had prepared all things with great ability for that enterprize. The rains, unusually heavy for that season, and some other cross accidents, had frustrated his intentions. But perceiving that the same accidents which defeated his designs, proved also unfavourable to the enemy, he resolved to turn his disappointment into an advantage, and from the ruins of his first project, to build another of yet greater importance. Baron Imhoff was posted to the right of the Rhine, in a strong situation near Meer. He was to cover the bridge at Rees, to secure a considerable magazine, and to keep open communication between the English reinforcements and the main army. The plan of M. Chevert was to dislodge Imhoff, to burn the bridge at Rees, to make himself master of the magazine, and to render the junction of the English troops with the Hanoverians impracticable. To execute this judicious scheme, he united several detachments from the garrison of Wesel, to a considerable corps, which he intended to have employed in the siege of Dusseldorp. The whole made near 12,000 men. The troops under Imhoff were but six battalions and four squadrons, hardly 3000 in all.

When that general was apprised of the designs and motions of the French, he saw it was in vain to expect succours from the army of Prince Ferdinand. The swell of the river had rendered all relief impossible. All his hopes were therefore in his own genius, and the bravery of his troops. He considered that though the post he occupied was sufficiently strong, the enemy might make themselves masters of Rees, by turning his camp, and thus execute one of the principal parts of their design; he considered the great difference between attacking and being attacked; he considered the effect of an attempt altogether unexpected by the enemy. He therefore took the resolution of abandoning his post, and going out to meet them. Perceiving that the French were marching into difficult ground, he did not lose a moment to begin the action. (August 25th, 1758). He ordered a small party, which he had posted in a little coppice, to fall upon the enemy's left, which he observed to be uncovered; and appointed the fire of this party as a signal for all the rest to advance, and make the onset with bayonets fixed. The French thus vigorously and unexpectedly attacked, fell into confusion; their courage ill seconded the wisdom of their general; they did not stand half an hour; they left the field of battle, eleven pieces of cannon, many prisoners, and much baggage, to the Hanoverians, who drove them under the cannon of Wesel.

This signal advantage over such a prodigious superiority, was not more gallantly obtained, than well pursued and improved. Imhoff saw that the rains had increased to such a decree, as to leave no hopes for the allied army to pass by the bridge at Rees. Having taken proper care of his magazines, he quitted his post at Meer, and being reinforced by some parties, who passed the river in boats, he marched with the utmost diligence towards the route of the English forces, and happily effected a junction, which had hitherto been attended with so many difficulties.

Prince Ferdinand in his retreat met with no obstructions, but just what was sufficient to display more fully the gallantry of his officers, and the spirit of his troops. A town called Wachtendonck was on his left, as he retreated: this place, though not fortified, is a post of much importance, and being an island surrounded rounded by the river Niers, is extremely difficult of acceſs. The French had thrown a body of troops into this place. The Hereditary Prince, the firſt in every active ſervice, was employed to force it. The bridge on his approach had been drawn up; the Prince ſeeing that if he attempted to get this bridge down, the enemy would gain time to recollect themſelves, threw himſelf into the river; his grenadiers, animated by ſo gallant an example, plunged in after him, and furiouſly attacking the enemy with their bayonets, in a few minutes drove them from that poſt. This advantage, joined to that gained by General Imhoff, and the uncommon reſolution which appeared in both theſe actions, awed the French. They found that their troops, raw, undiſciplined, and little fit for hard ſervice, were not to be relied upon; and they feared to bring on an action, which, by being deciſive againſt them, might draw on the moſt fatal conſequences. So that the Prince repaſſed the Rhine in a moſt excellent order, even with leſs trouble than he had at firſt paſſed it, and indeed with little moleſtation, but what he met with from the weather.

MELUN, SIEGE OF. A town of France, in the iſle of France, ſituated on the river Seine, twenty-five miles ſouth-eaſt from Paris. The motives of this ſiege, the reader will find under the article Meaux, to which we refer him, to avoid repetition. Immediately after the ſigning of the treaty of Troye, Henry undertook the ſiege of Melun, about the middle of July, 1420, which was ſtrongly fortified and ſecured by a numerous garriſon, commanded by De Barbazan, an officer of great courage and experience. Henry had juſt received a reinforcement of 2000 archers, and 800 men at arms, from England. All the troops that both chiefs could aſſemble were ſcarce ſufficient to achieve the enterprize they had undertaken.

The beſieged attacked them, and deſtroyed their works in repeated ſallies. The beſiegers were repulſed with great loſs in ſeveral ſucceſſive aſſaults: and when they proceeded by the method of ſapping, they found themſelves countermined by the indefatigable Barbazan, who encountered Henry in a mine, and fought with him hand to hand, until the King, admiring his valour, aſked his name, when he anſwered, Barbazan: "Well," ſaid Henry, "you have fought with the King of England." Even after conſiderable breaches were made in the walls, Henry would not venture to give the aſſault againſt ſuch deſperate defendants, and converted the ſiege into a blockade.

The Dauphin marched to the relief of the place, at the head of 16,000 men, but found all the avenues guarded in ſuch a manner, as prevented him from throwing in ſupplies, and he retreated without having made any attempt upon the quarters of the beſiegers.

At length, after a defence of fourteen weeks and four days, the garriſon, having conſumed all their proviſions, and ſubſiſted for ſome time on the fleſh of horſes, dogs, and other domeſtic animals, and ſeeing no proſpect of relief, Barbazan was obliged to ſurrender on capitulation, by which all the French troops in the garriſon were inſured their lives, except ſuch as ſhould be found to have been concerned in the Duke of Burgundy's ill treatment. Barbazan himſelf lay under this imputation, and would certainly have loſt his life, had he not pleaded that he was Henry's brother at arms, as having fought him in ſingle combat. This plea exempted him from an ignominious death; though he was detained priſoner above twenty years in the Chateau Galliard. Henry ordered twenty Scots who were found in the place to be hanged up as rebels, on pretence that they had carried arms againſt their own King, who being Henry's priſoner, ſerved as a volunteer on this occaſion. He is likewiſe taxed with having violated the capitulation in other reſpects, in confining the reſt of the garriſon within priſons and dungeons, where they periſhed by famine.

MENEHOULD was taken poſſeſſion of by the French troops under General Bournonville, after defeating the Pruſſians, October 1, 1792.

MENIN, SIEGE OF. A town of Flanders, ſituated on the river Lys, nine miles north from Liſle. The Duke of Marlborough, after his victory at Ramillies, ordered this town to be inveſted, and the trenches were opened on the 4th day of Auguſt, 1706, by General Saliſch. The garriſon, under the command of the Marquis de Bullie, were ſaid to amount to 6000 men. The fortifications, which had been the work of the famous Vauban, were in good condition. But with all theſe advantages they only held out eighteen days. It was taken by the French in 1744, after a ſiege of forty-ſeven days.

This frontier town of Weſt Flanders, was taken poſſeſſion of by the French on the 11th of September, 1793, when the oppoſition to the French intruſion occaſioned ſeveral engagements between the Dutch and the French troops, of which the Dutch gave the following account.

The retreat, which the troops of the Republic have, after long and bloody engagements, been at laſt compelled to make from the frontiers of Weſt Flanders, ought to be regarded as a natural conſequence of the checks experienced by the army of the Allies, under the command of the Duke of York, and of Marſhal de Freytag, on the ſixth, ſeventh, and eighth of the month. If beſides it be conſidered that after the departure of General de Knobleſdorf, who arrived on the 11th of September, within half a league of Luxemburg, with two regiments of Cuiraſſiers, five ſquadrons of huſſars, four regiments of infantry, two companies of chaſſeurs, and a conſiderable train of artillery and warlike ſtores, the ſmall army of the State was obliged to grant a great extent of country, to overawe the numerous garriſon of Liſle, as well as thoſe of the other places adjacent and the camp de la Magdelaine, it needs not be wondered at that the Dutch troops ſhould have been forced to retire before an enemy infinitely ſuperior in number: and after having loſt ſix battalions in the defence of Halluen and Menin alone. According to an impartial computation, our troops in all amounted only to 7000 fighting men, beſides a detachment of Auſtrian cavalry, while the French army was compoſed of 30,000 men, of the beſt troops of the line.

Meſſengers arrived with diſpatches from the Earl of Elgin,

Elgin, his Majeſty's envoy extraordinary to the court of Bruſſels, of which the following is an extract:

St. Amand, September 16, 1795.

I have the honour of enclosing to your Lordſhip the report of the recapture of Menin, as ſent in by General Beaulieu to Prince Cobourg.

September 15, 1793.

This morning the French, to the number of 12 or 14,000 men, advanced from Wevelghem to Biſſeghem, where they attacked the advanced poſt, on the left of General Beaulieu's army. The attack was briſk, and would have completely ſucceeded on the ſide of the French, if General Beaulieu had not ſent ſpeedy and ſucceſſive reinforcements to the poſt of Biſſeghem. The French had then recourſe to their numerous artillery, in order to diſlodge the Auſtrians from their poſition behind the Landerbeg; and they would have been ſucceſsful there, if they had not ſuddenly found their left turned by a body of Auſtrian infantry, headed by Captain Malkſham, of the regiment of Beaulieu, who attacked them with cannon on the left flank, and alſo in the rear. This movement of the Auſtrians on the left flank of the French had ſuch an effect upon the latter, that they began to give way. General Beaulieu then availing himſelf of this circumſtance, charged them in front, and put them totally to flight. They retreated towards Menin.

General Beaulieu having collected his cavalry, which had routed the French, waited for reports from his right, in order to be aſſured that he might purſue the enemy without interruption. The reports arrived about one o'clock P. M. In conſequence, General Beaulieu, without a moment's heſitation, marched towards Menin; the rather as he had learnt that General Ehrbach, with four battalions and eight ſquadrons was on the march from Rouaſler. In the purſuit General Beaulieu's advanced guard had ſeveral ſkirmiſhes, in which it had conſtantly the advantage, repulſing the enemy quite to the gates of Menin. At four in the afternoon General Beaulieu arrived with his whole corps under the walls of that town, and attacked the French with cannon; at the ſame time he aſſaulted the ramparts near the gate of Rouſlaer, when the French, without any further reſiſtance, totally abandoned the place, and paſſed the Lys with precipitation, leaving at the bridge only a weak rear guard, which was entirely killed or taken, by the Auſtrian troops, who entered at the gate of Courtray. In this interval General Ehrbach arrived with his corps, and immediately paſſed the Lys. Two Engliſh ſquadrons joined the Auſtrian huſſars in purſuit of the French, who retreated towards Roncq. In this action we loſt about 100 men killed or wounded. The loſs of the French is between 4 and 500 men. We are not able at preſent to compute the number of priſoners. At the departure of the meſſenger, who brought this agreeable intelligence, about 150 were arrived in the ſquare of Menin, together with two pieces of cannon, and eighteen ammunition waggons.

Whitehall, September 21.—The following diſpatch from Colonel Sir James Murray, adjutant-general to the forces under the command of his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York, was received at the office of the Right Honourable Henry Dundas, his Majeſty's principal ſecretary of ſtate for the home department.

Menin, September 17, 1793.

SIR,

I had the honour of informing you, that upon the retreat of the Dutch troops from Menin, his Royal Highneſs intended to march to Tournhout, in order to oppoſe the further progreſs of the enemy, and to act in conjunction with General Beaulieu, who commanded a corps of Auſtrians near Courtray.

This march was executed upon the 14th. Lieutenant-General Ehrbach, with two battalions of Auſtrians and two of Heſſian infantry, and four ſquadrons of Britiſh cavalry, under the command of Major-General Harcourt, was ordered to advance the ſame day to Rouſelaire. Upon the 15th the main body of the army advanced to Rouſelaire, and Lieutenant-General Ehrbach's corps to Ledeghem, it being his Royal Highneſs's intention to attack the enemy, and force them to paſs the Lys. Information was received at Rouſelaire of the Prince of Cobourg's being in march towards Liſle with a large body of troops, which his Serene Highneſs had put in motion, as ſoon as he had learnt that Menin was evacuated.

During the march of the army, the enemy had attacked General Beaulieu's advanced poſts; eight battalions were ſent to his ſupport; but the enemy had been repulſed before their arrival.

This appears to have been only intended to cover their retreat, as they had begun to evacuate Menin early in the morning. In the courſe of the day they entirely abandoned that important poſt, which was taken poſſeſſion of in the evening by Lieutenant-General Ehrbach. Yeſterday the army marched again: a camp was formed near Menin, and the advanced poſts puſhed on to Werwick, which the enemy had alſo abandoned, ſo that by theſe movements Auſtrian Flanders has been protected, and this part of it recovered.

JAMES MURRAY.

Extract of another Letter from Sir James Murray, Bart. dated Tournay, October 24, 1793.

I have the honour to inform you, that the enemy made, upon the 21ſt inſt. an attack upon the advanced poſts of the camp at Menin, particularly thoſe of Werwick and Hallouin: they were every where repulſed; but the day following they renewed the attack with great violence, and at laſt ſucceeded in gaining poſſeſſion of Werwick.

Menin being by this means expoſed, Lieutenant-General Ehrbach, who commanded there, found it neceſſary to evacuate the town, and to retire with his corps upon Courtray. This corps was compoſed of Auſtrian and Hanoverian troops. The particulars of their loſs are not yet come to my knowledge, but I underſtand that it amounts, in killed and wounded, to near 300 men.

The enemy likewiſe attacked the troops poſted at the camp of Ciſoing upon the 21ſt, 22d and 23d, but they were repulſed each day with loſs, having had upon the 22d near 400 men killed and taken. The Inniſkilling's and the 16th regiment of light dragoons behaved with great ſpirit on this occaſion. The attacks of the enemy were chiefly directed againſt the poſts of Nomain upon the left, and Willem upon the right, of both of which they at different times gained poſſeſſion, but were again driven from them by reinforcements ſent from the camp.

This day the enemy attacked the poſt of Major-General Kray, at Orchies. No further particulars are at preſent known, than that they have been repulſed with the loſs of five pieces of cannon.

MENTZ, SIEGE OF. Capital of the electorate of Mentz in Germany; ſituated at the confluence of the rivers Rhine and Maine, twenty miles weſt from Frankfort. This town ſuſtained a remarkable ſiege in 1552, againſt the Emperor Charles V. who was obliged to raiſe it.

This town in the year 1689, being in the poſſeſſion of the French, againſt whom the Emperor was at war, he determined to take it from them, and the Duke of Lorraine, his general, inveſted it on the 17th day of July, 1689. The garriſon, under the command of the Marquis d'Uxelles, conſiſted of between 10,000 and 11,000 men, reſolved to defend the place to the laſt extremity. Nothing material happened but what is common to every ſiege, till the 16th day of Auguſt, when the beſieged made a ſally upon the Saxons' quarter, and preſently overturned every thing before them; but the Imperialiſts coming to their relief, there happened a moſt terrible ſlaughter on both ſides, the French loſing a great many men, and the Confederates many more.

A few days after, they made three ſallies in two hours; in the two firſt they made great ſlaughter among the beſiegers, and cleared the trenches; the third was made with 3000 men, with drums beating and colours flying, the beſiegers did not expect this third effort, and were ſo ſurpriſed, that the French at firſt killed near 600 of them, nailed up ſeveral of their cannon, filled up the trenches, and poſted their main guard of horſe in a place where the beſiegers had begun to open new ones. The Imperialiſts, by their ſuperiority, rallied, and drove back the enemy with prodigious loſs, and in the purſuit they ſeized ſome of the outpoſts of the city, and ſecured them.

On the 6th of September, in the evening, the whole army of the beſiegers marched to give the general aſſault, but with all their impetuoſity, they could gain no more than the outworks, which, however, had ſuch an effect on the garriſon, that they deſired to capitulate on the 11th, and obtained honourable conditions.

The taking of this town was of ſignal ſervice to the Emperor, inaſmuch as he gained poſſeſſion of the whole electorate by it; but upon the moſt modeſt computation he loſt 6000 men before it, and the brave garriſon were reduced to near half their original number.

MENTZ an imperial city, governed by its elector and archbiſhop, ſituated on the Lower Rhine, and ſtrongly fortified, was beſieged by the French in 1792, when it ſurrendered on the 21ſt of October, the garriſon conſiſted of 10,000 with immenſe ſtores of ammunition.

In December following, General Cuſtine declared this city to be in a ſtate of ſiege, and retired to it with 40,000 men, determined to defend it to the laſt. The Pruſſians and Heſſians, with the king and the landgrave at the head of about 70,000 men, ſurrounding it cloſe, with a formidable train of artillery. The garriſon made a ſortie, in which the Pruſſians loſt fifteen men and two cannons.

In June 1793, the allied armies opened all their batteries to play upon this place, and ſet fire to the houſes in the neighbourhood of the cathedral and St. Stephen's church. In July the palace and cathedral were deſtroyed. The cannonading continued night and day, and a great part of the town was in ruins. A ſmall town adjoining to Mentz was ſtormed by the Auſtrians. About eleven o'clock they threw a vaſt number of grenades into the town, which killed many of the garriſon and inhabitants, and threw the former into ſuch confuſion, that they took to their heels and abandoned their poſt. The Auſtrian infantry purſued them to the French intrenchments, their light horſe being ordered to attack, which they did with great ſucceſs. The Auſtrians gave no quarter, and drove the French into Mentz.

About an hour after, the garriſon attempted a ſally on the Pruſſian ſide, in which however they were repulſed with great loſs. In theſe two affairs the French loſt about 400 men killed and wounded. The Auſtrians only ſix men killed and four wounded: the Pruſſians about thirty killed and ſix wounded. The Auſtrians had about fourteen horſes killed.

July 3.—The following are the particulars reſpecting the capture of the iſlands at the point of the Rhine: Colonel de Ruchel, who commanded at Guſtavuſbourg, having reſolved to attack theſe iſlands during the night, ordered Major de Keiſerling with eighty men to mount a floating battery prepared for that purpoſe, and to defend the Rhine. This battery, however, was carried away by the force of the current before it was provided with cannon. It caſt anchor near the iſland poſſeſſed by the enemy, but one of the cables broke, and the enemy cut the other, ſo that the battery was again carried away, but part of the ſailors ſaved themſelves by ſwimming. Major de Maſſau, Captain de Benningſen, with ſeveral other officers and eleven men, leaped on ſhore. Colonel Ruchel then reſolved to make an attack for the purpoſe of ſupporting the Pruſſians who were on the iſland. Lieutenant Hagen took poſſeſſion of the neareſt iſlands, and Lieutenant de Reitzenſtein ſupported him with forty men. Lieutenant de Walden proceeded in a boat with twelve cavaliers, and fell upon the enemy ſword in hand. The French immediately abandoned their moſt advantageous and beſt fortified poſt, and made their eſcape in eight boats, one of which loaded with artillery was ſunk. One of our officers was killed, and five wounded.

Major de Keiſerling, Lieutenant de Winterfeld, four ſubalterns, and ſeventy privates, who had been driven near Mentz with the floating battery, were taken by the enemy, but afterwards ſet at liberty. The enemy left in the iſlands a number of muſkets, ſeveral litters, and a large quantity of bread, wine, and intrenching tools.

During the whole of this day the Auſtrians kept up a heavy fire near Weiſſenau, as did the Pruſſians near Hocheim, and on the banks of the Mein. The firing was redoubled in the evening. From the commencement of the ſiege till the 30th ult. the number of houſes deſtroyed in Mentz amounted to 250.

July 5.—The cannonade continued very furiouſly all laſt night, and Mentz was on fire in the environs of the Dominican Convent. The flames, however, were extinguiſhed, but they broke out again this morning.

During the whole of this day the combined army kept up a heavy fire upon Fort Albanus and the redoubts on the Rhine towards Caſſel. A French deſerter ſtated, that for ſome days paſt the flames had conſumed in Mentz at leaſt 8000 maders of flour; that there are but few horſes in the place, the garriſon uſing them as food; and that the famine daily increaſes.

About four this morning, the combined forces began to cannonade from the batteries of Hockheim, thoſe of the Mein and the Rhine, the enemy's batteries of Coſtheim. The enemy anſwered at intervals.

July 6.—During the whole night a conſtant ſhower of bombs and red-hot balls has been thrown upon the city, and the houſes at the end of the ſtreet des Capuchins, near the new gate, and in the environs of the wooden gates appeared to be on fire, but the flames were ſoon extinguiſhed.

July 7,—A deſerter informs us, that there was yeſterday, a great ferment among the troops of the line, the national guards, and the clubbiſts, reſpecting the ſurrender of the town. Laſt night a great number of bombs and red-hot balls were thrown into Mentz, but they occaſioned no conflagration.

During the whole of this day we kept up a heavy fire on Fort Albanus, the citadel, and the batteries of Bouc and Caſſel. The enemy did not return the fire from Fort Albanus, but only from the citadel.

Laſt night the combined forces took poſſeſſion of the redoubts which the French occupied at Zahlbach, and drove them as far as Mentz but they returned ſoon after, to the number of 500 men, and retook this redoubt which was occupied by a Pruſſian battalion They were, however, again driven from it by the Pruſſians.

July 8.—Laſt night orders were given to the different battalions to hold themſelves in readineſs to cut off the French garriſon at Coſtheim. The attack was made at ten o'clock at night, with ſuch a terrible cannonade as has never yet been heard during the ſiege of Mentz: an immenſe ſhower of grenades and ſtone mortars fell all at once upon the chapel and batteries of Coſtheim; and amidſt this firing the allies ſurrounded the place, and cut the French advanced poſt in pieces.

The engagement laſted till two o'clock this morning, when the French were obliged to take flight; between 300 and 400 of them, many of whom hid themſelves in cellars, &c. were made priſoners. The ſtreets of Coſtheim are full of dead bodies.

The latter took alſo two ſconces and batteries ſituated cloſe to Coſtheim.

July 9.—The day before yeſterday, at ſix o'clock in the morning, the French advanced in great force to the redoubt of the clubbiſts, and immediately made preparations to take it by ſtorm. A heavy cannonade took place, and a moſt deſperate and ſanguinary conflict was the conſequence. The enemy was twice repulſed, and twice they renewed the attack with freſh troops and renovated vigour. They marched over dead bodies till the maſs became ſo accumulated, as to enable them to ſcale the redoubt. But no ſooner had they obtained poſſeſſion of it, than our troops attacked them with incredible fury, and drove them from it. The conflict was maintained with unparalleled intrepidity on both ſides during the whole day, under a heavy fire of cannon and muſquetry. The enemy obtained poſſeſſion of the redoubt a ſecond time, and was a ſecond time forced to abandon it. At two o'clock in the afternoon Eben's regiment of Pruſſian Huſſars croſſed the Rhine, to act in concert with ours. No ſooner had this regiment arrived, than the advanced guard came to cloſe quarters with the enemy, who retreated, and the Pruſſians recroſſed the river. Night alone put an end to the cannonade. The chain of advanced poſts and two centinels were happily recovered the next morning. The loſs on the part of the enemy amounts to ſeveral thouſand men, owing to the fury of their attack, while the loſs on our ſide does not exceed a few hundreds. We availed ourſelves of the darkneſs of the night to repair the parapet of the redoubt of Zahlbach, part of which the enemy had demoliſhed.

On examination, there had been found at Mentz, 220 French, and 180 German pieces of cannon and mortars, 200,000lbs, of good gunpowder, and corn and wine in abundance, and that it was ſuppoſed the diſcord among the garriſon had cauſed the ſurrender of Mentz.

In December 1794, the French having made an attack upon one of the out-works of Mayence, they were repulſed three different times, but on the fourth onſet carried the work. They kept poſſeſſion of it about an hour, when the garriſon, in a vigorous ſortie, drove the enemy from the work, and routed them with great ſlaughter. The French loſt 4000 men, the Allies not above four hundred. The Pruſſians and Auſtrians were both engaged, and General Mollendorf much diſtinguiſhed himſelf.

On February 5, 1795, The Auſtrians had erected a battery at ſome diſtance before Mentz, and the French judging that that battery would hinder them in the works which they propoſed to erect to approach the place, reſolved to deſtroy it, which they did after a long and briſk action.

On the 6th the French made an attack in the environs of Haupſtein, before Mentz, of which the official account ſays, that the French had began a work at 500 paces from the redoubt No. 1, at Hartenberg, when they

they were repulſed, and their works deſtroyed. The French, having received ſome re-inforcement, returned to the charge, reſumed their poſt, and formed in a line upon Hartenburgh; but they were again repulſed after a briſk action, The affair laſted from morning to noon. In the evening General Neu reconnoitred in the neighbourhood of Hartenburgh, where there was ſome firing; the French threw ſome ſhells from howitzers againſt the Germans, but without effect. On the 7th there was ſome ſkirmiſhing towards Haupſtein.

This morning a ſortie was reſolved on, to diſlodge the enemy from the important height of Hardenberg, and to cover it with freſh redoubts for our own ſecurity. The Auſtrians attacked the enemy's artillery on the Hartenberg at half paſt three this morning; after a ſhort reſiſtance, the enemy were driven from their intrenchments with the loſs of four pieces of cannon. The Auſtrians even penetrated as far as Mombach, which they took. The regiment of Waldeck, which was the moſt expoſed to the enemy's cannonade, ſuſtained ſome loſs. We had ſeven officers wounded, and one killed. The loſs of the French muſt have been conſiderable, and is eſtimated at 2000 men. Our troops had ſtrong redoubts to ſtorm; the conflict was obſtinate on both ſides, but the enemy, unable to reſiſt farther the gallantry of our troops, evacuated the place as far as the wood of Mombach, on which occaſion they were obliged to leave two pieces of cannon and two ammunition waggons behind them. At noon the French returned with reinforcements and ſtormed our new fleche, erected the day before yeſterday, but were ſo received by a well-directed caſe-ſhot fire, that what remained of them on the ſpot, were cut to pieces by our cavalry or taken priſoners. The cannonade and howitzer ſhells from the iſlet called Ingelheim Au, upon the intrenchments of Mombach, continued with unabated briſkneſs till night. On our part the Imperial regiment of Kleber, the companies of Mentzer grenadiers, and the Waraſdine Hungarians, ſuffered the moſt.

Diſpatches of which the following are Copies, were received from Lieutenant-Colonel Craufurd.

Head Quarters, Weilmunſter,
October 18, 1795.

I have the honour to inform your Lordſhip, that ſince the 13th inſtant the advanced guards of the Auſtrian army, under Generals Boros, Kray and Haddick, have been in conſtant purſuit of the enemy on all the roads leading acroſs the Lahn, between Weilburgh and Naſſau. General Warneck, with the reſerve marched towards Limbourg, as a central point, from which he could ſupport the advanced guards to his right or left, according to circumſtances, whilſt the main army advanced to the camp of Weilmunſter, between Uſingen Weilbourg, ready to croſs the Lahn at the latter place, and attack the enemy's left if they ſhould attempt to maintain a poſition on that river.

The Marſhal has taken every ſtep that he judged beſt calculated to diſtreſs their army, but their retreat has been ſo precipitate, and the country through which they march ſo interſected with woods and deep vallies that he has only been able to bring on ſome affairs with the beſt troops of the rear-guards of their different columns. In theſe the Auſtrians have taken ſeveral cannon, a great many ammunition waggons, and between one and two thouſand priſoners, beſides having killed and wounded conſiderable numbers.

It is expected that the enemy will raiſe the ſiege of Ehrenbreitſtein to day, and they ſeem determined to croſs the Rhine, with the principal part of their army at Neuwied, (where they have bridges) as expeditiouſly as poſſible. Their left column was directing its march towards Cologne.

The Auſtrian advanced guards, ſupported by the reſerve, are ſtill in purſuit.

The enemy has deſtroyed a great quantity of powder and other ſtores, which they had not time to ſend away.

I have the honour to inform your Lordſhip, that the ſiege of Ehrenbreitſtein is raiſed, and the enemy are croſſing the Rhine as expeditiouſly as poſſible at Neuwied.

Head Quartes of Marſhal Clairfayt's army, Limburg, October 16, 1795.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to inform your Lordſhip, that General Wurmſer has obtained a ſignal advantage over the French in the neighbourhood of Manheim, of which the following is a detail:

In the night from the 17th to the 18th inſtant, that part of the Auſtrian army which was ſtationed before Manheim, aſſembled in five columns, commanded by General Wurmſer in perſon, to attack the different poſts that the enemy occupied in front of that place. The diſpoſition was very maſterly, and the ſpirited manner in which it was executed anſwered fully to the wiſh and expectations of the General. After a ſevere action, all the works which the enemy had thrown up were carried; their tents and a great deal of baggage were taken, beſides ſome cannon and ſeveral ammunition waggons.

Owing to an impenetrable fog, which continued the whole night and great part of the morning the communication between the different columns was extremely difficult, the prompt execution of orders was impoſſible, and the Generals could not conduct their tracks with any degree of certainty This unfortunate circumſtance enabled the enemy to get off moſt of their artillery, and prevented the Auſtrians from following them into the place as General Wurmſer intended.

The Auſtrians had upon this occaſion about thirty officers and between 6 and 700 non-commiſſioned officers and privates killed and wounded. The French had one general officer, twenty-one officers, and between 5 and 600 non-commiſſioned officers and privates taken priſoners; their killed and wounded are ſuppoſed to amount amount to about 2000. In conſequence of this victory, Manheim is cloſely inveſted, and the bombardment will begin immediately.

C. CRAUFURD.

Head Quarters, Limbourg, Oct. 26.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to inform your Lordſhip, that General Jourdan's left column, which had directed its march towards Cologne, has paſſed the Rhine, as well as all thoſe troops who retired upon Neuwied.

From the reports of the different corps which are now collected, it appears that the Auſtrians have taken in all, during the enemy's retreat, about 4000 priſoners, thirty pieces of cannon, and 200 ammunition waggons. The enemy deſtroyed a great quantity of military ſtores, which they had not time to carry away. It is impoſſible to aſcertain with any preciſion their number of killed and wounded, but it muſt have been very conſiderable, more eſpecially as the peaſants roſe againſt them in many places. The whole country through which the French marched on this occaſion bear the moſt evident marks of their depredations. There is no village, and I may almoſt ſay, no houſe that has not ample reaſon to lament this invaſion; for, however ſhort its duration has been, the effects will be felt for many years to come.

The inhabitants have been plundered of their cattle, grain, and whatever could be found that was valuable. In many places what could not be carried off was deſtroyed. Even women and children have been murdered, in ſhort, the manifold acts of atrocity which are proved in the cleareſt manner, are ſuch as could only be perpetrated by men loſt to every ſenſe of humanity.

The Pruſſian troops that were on the line of demarcation, and the guards which they ſtationed at different places for the purpoſe of affording protection, were ill treated and drove away by the French, with expreſſions of reſentment and contempt.

Head-Quarters of Marſhal Clairfayt.
Mayence, Oct. 30, 1795.

I have the honour to inform your Lordſhip, that on the 28th inſtant the Auſtrian troops, under the command of General Wurmſer, ſtormed the Galyenberg, an intrenched height which formed an advanced poſt to the fortreſs of Manheim. The poſſeſſion of this important point facilitates extremely the approaches againſt the body of the place. To favour the aſſault of the Galyenberg, a falſe attack was intended to be made upon the Necker Fort; however, the impetuoſity of the troops was ſuch, that they ſtormed it without having order's to do ſo; but as it could not be maintained, being immediately under the fire of the town, they abandoned it, after ſpiking thirteen pieces of cannon.

C. CRAUFURD.

Head-Quarters of Marſhal Clairfayt,
Mayence, October 30.

I have the honour to inform your Lordſhip, that Marſhal Clairfayt attacked the enemy's intrenched camp before Mayence yeſterday, and gained a complete victory. The following is a detail of this very brilliant and important operation.

Your Lordſhips will recollect that in the month of November laſt the French took a poſition upon the heights in the front of Mayence, with their right to Laubenheim, and their left to Budenheim; both of which villages are on the Rhine, the former above, and the latter below the fortreſs. This poſition completely inveſted the place on that ſide; and from the time they firſt occupied it, almoſt to the day of the attack, they were conſtantly employed in conſtructing and perfecting the moſt formidable intrenchments. Theſe conſiſted of two lines. The firſt was compoſed of large detached works, cloſed in the rear, and covered and joined with each other by three diſtinct ranges of round pits of conſiderable depth; each range was compoſed of ſeverals rows of pits, placed irregularly, and quite cloſe together. The ſecond was a complete connected intrenchment, covered in the ſame manner. The ditches of both lines were of a depth and breadth far beyond what is uſual in field works. Every poſſible advantage had been taken of the ground, which is particularly favourable for the formation of a fortified camp: and the French Generals have been known to ſay frequently in private, that they conſidered this poſition as wholly impregnable.

Marſhal Clairfayt, after having forced General Jourdan to repaſs the Rhine, returned with a part of his army to the camp of Wickert, about five Engliſh miles from Mayence; and in conſequence of information received by him that the enemy intended to reinforce their army before that place very conſiderably, he, without waiting for thoſe troops that had advanced beyond the Lahn, determined to attack General Schaal, who occupied the intrenchments above deſcribed with fifty-two battalions of infantry and five regiments of cavalry.

The army that was deſtined for this attack conſiſting of thirty-two regular battalions, ſome light infantry, and twenty-eight ſquadrons of cavalry, taken partly from the garriſon of Mayence, was formed into four diviſions: one, of ten battalions and ſix ſquadrons, under General Neu; one, of ten battalions and ſix ſquadrons, under General Stader; one, of five battalions and ſix ſquadrons, under General Colloredo; and one, of ſeven battalions of grenadiers, under General Werneck. Generals Neu and Stader were to direct their march, the former towards the heights above Laubenheim, the latter towards Heiligy Creutz, (an old church in front of the enemy's right wing) forming their infantry into three lines, and attacking the right of the poſition in immediate connection with each other, whilſt the Waraſdine light infantry got round the village of Laubenheim; and about 1000 Sclavonians, who were embarked on the Rhine, landed under the protection of ſix gun boats behind the enemy's right, and kept up a heavy fire for the purpoſe of making a diverſion. General Colloredo was to march towards Bretzenheim, a village in front of the enemy's centre, from whence he was to detach a part of his troops, particularly cavalry, to co-operate with General Stader, and with a part of the remainder he was to make demonſtrations towards different points of the centre, whilſt two of his battalions and two ſquadrons, with a conſiderable proportion of heavy artillery, made falſe attacks upon Monback and Gonſenheim, two villages in front of the enemy's left. Some light troops were to land behind the left of the poſition, for the ſame purpoſe as thoſe who landed behind the right. General Werneck's diviſion was to remain on the glacis of Mayence as a reſerve.

It muſt be obſerved that Marſhal Clairfayt directed his real attack upon the moſt commanding and by far the ſtrongeſt part of the camp, becauſe the immediate retreat of the enemy's whole army was the inevitable conſequence of ſucceſs on that point.

The attack commenced in this order at half an hour paſt five in the morning. The diſpoſition was executed with the utmoſt accuracy, and in a very ſhort time the battle was decided in favour of the Auſtrians, who diſplayed exemplary diſcipline and bravery. The general officers finding that they could not advance on horſeback on account of the trous de loups, diſmounted, and entered the intrenchments on foot, at the head of the troops. The enemy did not in the leaſt expect to be attacked; and although they certainly had ſome time to prepare for their defence from the difficulties that the Auſtrians troops had to ſurmount in approaching the works, yet it is to the circumſtance of ſurprize, as well as to the uncommon intrepidity with which the attack was executed, that muſt be attributed their having abandoned, without more reſiſtance, one of the moſt formidable poſitions that ever was occupied.

One hundred and ſix pieces of cannon, 200 ammunition waggons, and about 2000 priſoners (amongſt theſe, two generals and ſixty other officers) are already brought into Mayence; whilſt great quantities of ſtores of various kinds, collected for the purpoſe of the ſiege, have likewiſe fallen into the hands of the Auſtrians.

The enemy's killed and wounded are ſuppoſed to amount to about 3000.

The Auſtrians had on this occaſion between ſixty and ſeventy officers and about 1500 non-commiſſioned officers and privates killed and wounded: amongſt the former were Lieutenant-General Schmertring and Major-General Wolckenheim.

General Nauendorf croſſed the Rhine in the afternoon, with part of his troops that had been ſtationed in the neighbourhood of Gerau, and took poſſeſſion of Oppenheim.

The Marſhal is now encamped in front of Mayence, and his light troops are purſuing in all directions.

October 30.—One cannot look back on what has been performed within theſe laſt twenty days, without a mixture of pleaſure and aſtoniſtment. Marſhal Clairfayt, on the 11th, croſſed the Mein, and, in ſeven days, drove from the plains between Mayence and Frankfort to the other ſide of the Rhine, an army of 70,000 men, that had ſtruck a panic into all Germany. Returning from this expedition, he attacked and defeated, on the 29th, an enemy ſuperior in numbers, and covered by the moſt formidable lines that had perhaps, ever been conſtructed. He thus ſaved the important fortreſſes of Mayence and Ehrenbreitſtein, which otherwiſe muſt have fallen; freed all this part of Germany from a powerful and lawleſs enemy; reſcued the Houſe of Auſtria from the danger of being attacked, even in its hereditary dominions in Germany, and recovered its declining influence in the empire.

State of the loſs in the attack of the 29th before Mentz: killed, 2 generals, 4 officers, 154 men, 64 horſes; wounded, 72 officers, 1108 men, 49 horſes; miſſing, 1 officer, 124 men. Total, 1465 men, 113 horſes.

The number of French priſoners taken, according to the return is, 2 generals (1 dead), 3 lieutenant-colonels, 44 captains, 103 lieutenant-colonels, 1486 men. Total, 1533 men.

November 8. The Imperial troops took poſſeſſion of Worms the day before yeſterday, and yeſterday they defeated the French near Frankenthal, when they made 900 priſoners.—The Imperialiſts alſo ſuffered conſiderably, as ſeveral veſſels with wounded have been ſent in here. There is a report that Merlin of Thionville is taken priſoner.

December 15, 1795. We this moment learn that the French are completely routed. It is ſaid that General Metzaros ſucceeded yeſterday in cutting off a column of the French army, commanded by General Hatry; that the cavalry got in among them, and made a great carnage.

The trophies of this happy affair conſiſt in 1200 priſoners, and a great many cannon which the French were unable to carry off. The number is ſaid to be forty; but there is nothing yet certain as to the number of killed, wounded, &c. The fact, however, is, that the French have been entirely defeated, and that their loſs is immenſe.

It is alſo certain that Jourdan, frightened at the boldneſs as well as activity of the Auſtrians, ſet fire to his camp on quitting it, to prevent its falling into our hands. His army is going back along the right bank of the Moſelle, and will take a poſition on the ſide of Treves.

It is ſaid that the Prince of Wirtemburg had paſſed the Rhine near Coblentz.

December 20.—Jourdan's army continues to retreat, and a part of it is going to ſeek its ſafety behind the Moſelle. In proportion as it retires, the army of General Clairfayt advances, and we have already troops at Trerbach, Berncaſtel, Neumagen, and even at Treves, if we believe report. It is ſaid here that our advanced poſts are at La Chartreuſe, near Coblentz; and that the French are employed in evacuating that city, the only one which they now retain on the right bank of the Moſelle.

September 9, 1796. After ſuſtaining a blockade for two months, our fortreſs was happily relieved yeſterday. The French, in the night, evacuated all the left ſhore of the Maine, deſtroying all the bridges as they paſſed: they are, in ſhort, in full retreat, and the Imperialiſts have entered Frankfort.

This morning our joy was increaſed by the news that the enemy had alſo abandoned all the country on the other ſide of the Rhine, and that our reſpectable governor was in purſuit of them with part of the garriſon.

During this long blockade, the French encamped around this place were tolerably quiet; and except the two ſorties which we mentioned on the 29th of July and 20th of Auguſt, there were only ſlight ſkirmiſhes, and ſome loſs on each ſide. The moſt afflicting occurrence which we experienced was an exploſion which happened in one of our laboratories on the 30th, occaſioned by the imprudence of one of the workmen; and by which a conſiderable number of ſhells and grenades blew up with an incredible exploſion: ſome edifices were damaged, 13 perſons loſt their lives, and 24 were wounded.

September 10.—Laſt night the enemy quitted our neighbourhood on this ſide of the Rhine. The French raiſed large contributions every where as they paſſed in their retreat, and at Wiſbaden their chaſſeurs pillaged ſome houſes. The Germans took ſeveral boats laden with effects, taken from the inhabitants by the Republicans. A park of artillery was found and taken at Florſheim, conſiſting of forty pieces of heavy cannon.

September 11.—The French have retired below the Seltz as far as Sprendlingin. The left wing of the Imperial army, which has been joined by part of our garriſon under our Governor Baron Neu, was this day poſted near Langenſchwalbach. The advanced poſts reach to Naſtelled. Yeſterday the French fired from towards Bingen upon Rudeſheim, and are ſaid to have ſet fire to ten or twelve houſes.

September 13.—This morning the enemy attacked our poſts near Engelheim, and repulſed them towards Finthen. Captain Berezi, at the head of thirty Barco huſſars, ſkirmiſhed with the enemy's troops, conſiſting of 200 horſe, who retired below the Seltz. Every thing remains quiet on the other ſide the Rhine beyond the Mountains. General Marceau is poſted at the Toll-Houſe, at a league on this ſide Limbourg. The French, before their retreat, blew up part of the fort of Konigſtein.

MESSINA, TAKEN IN 1719. A city and ſea port on the iſland of Sicily, in the Mediterranean.

George I. finding a rupture with Spain unavoidable, acted in ſuch cloſe conjunction with France, that the regent declared war againſt his couſin the King of Spain; and Mareſchal Berwick, who by the victory of Almanza fixed that prince upon his throne, accepted the command of the army, which was appointed to invade his territories, in order to force him to ſuch conditions as were thought requiſite for eſtabliſhing the general tranquillity of Europe. The Marquis de Cilly advanced in April as far as Port Paſſage, where he found ſix men of war juſt finiſhed upon the ſtocks, all which, puſhed thereto by Colonel Stanhope (the late Earl of Harrington), he burned, together with timber, maſts, and naval ſtores, to the value of half a million ſterling; which was a greater real loſs to the Spaniards, than that they ſuſtained by our beating their fleet off Port Paſſage. See PORT PASSAGE.

It was the 3d of February before Admiral Byng could diſembarraſs himſelf from the councils of the German and Sicilian generals, &c. who could not agree in their plan of operations for the next campaign. When he ſailed for Mahon to expedite the refitting of his peculiar charge, the fleet, that it might be ready to execute his further orders in the ſpring; he left his eldeſt ſon at Naples, to manage his correſpondence with the Viceroy, and to inform the court of England of what might paſs in thoſe parts; and left Captain Matthews with a ſquadron at Pontemelia, to obſerve the ſquadron under Rear-Admiral Cammock, and hinder his eſcaping out of Meſſina to the ſouthward.

This unhappy man was a native of Ireland, and being bred to ſea, had raiſed himſelf to the poſt of a captain, and ſerved in Queen Anne's war with no bad character. But aſſociating himſelf with thoſe who were enemies to the Houſe of Hanover, and becoming obnoxious to the government, on the acceſſion of that family to the crown he abandoned his country, and entered into the ſervice of Spain, where he was promoted to the rank of a rear-admiral, and ſerved in that poſt in the expedition againſt Sicily. He had never been obſerved to want courage, but in the action of Paſſaro he ran away among the firſt, and eſcaped to Malta, affording an inſtance, how much a conſciouſneſs of guilt, and dread of puniſhment depreſſes the heart more than the fear of a fair enemy. He was a vain boaſting man, with a roving unſettled head, filled with airy ſchemes and projects, without any judgment or diſcretion. He aſſured Signor Patintho, that he could put moſt of the Engliſh fleet into his hands, in recompenſe for that which he had loſt; and in that ſenſeleſs confidence wrote a letter to Admiral Byng to let him know, that he had the Pretender's commands to aſſure him, if he would bring over the greateſt part of his fleet to Meſſina, or to any port in Spain, he would create him Duke of Albemarle, with a royal bounty of 100,000 pounds to ſupport the honour and dignity of that rank; and that every captain ſhould have 10,000 pounds, and the ſeamen a gratuity of two months wages. That Signor Patintho would ſatisfy him of the King of Spain's ſecurity for the performance of this agreement, and that nobody elſe but the Dukes of Ormond and Mar were in the ſecret. Whether he wrote by direction or not, does not appear, but the letter met with the contempt it deſerved. He likewiſe ſent another letter to Captain Walton, with the promiſe of a reward of 10,000 pounds, a commiſſion of admiral of the blue, and to be made an Engliſh peer, if he would bring his ſhips into Meſſina, which the honeſt Captain brought to the Admiral, with vehement expreſſions of abhorrence and indignation.

The Captain had the good fortune to run on ſhore, a ſhip of ſixty-four guns, called the Santo Roſalia; another called the St. Pedro, of 60 guns, was caſt away in Tarento bay, and Cammock himſelf endeavouring to get away to Spain in a ſmall frigate of 22 guns, was chaſed the 6th of February by a ſhip of Captain Matthews's ſquadron, and eſcaped with much difficulty in his boat to Catania; but the frigate was taken, with all his effects and papers, amongſt which was a commiſſion from the Pretender, appointing him admiral of the white ſquadron.

Such expedition was uſed in refitting, that the Admiral ſailed from Mahon with four men of war on the 30th of March, and arrived at Naples on the 4th of April, leaving the reſt of his fleet to follow him. Here he found nothing ready to make head againſt the Spaniards in Sicily; and it was the 23d before the Count de Mercy arrived there from Vienna, to take upon him the command of the Auſtrian army.

All things being at length got ready, the army embarked, conſiſting of 10,000 foot, and 3500 horſe, all choice troops, and the flower of thoſe that had lately ſerved victoriouſly in Hungary. The Admiral ſet ſail from the bay of Bayæ the 22d of May, with eight men of war, and above 200 tranſports; and on the 27th in the evening arrived before Melazzo, from whence General Zumjungen came off, and adviſed Count de Mercy to land in the bay of Patti, about twenty miles weſtwards, the coaſt to the eaſtward being all guarded by the enemy. Upon this, ſo good a diſpoſition and order was made, that the next morning early, all the foot landed in leſs than two hours, and moſt of the cavalry by three in the afternoon, having only loſt two horſes in the voyage.

Upon the landing of the Imperialiſts, the Marquis de Lede decamped with precipitation, and marched without halting to Villa-Franca, a ſtrong poſt thirty-two miles diſtant, in a mountainous country, and from whence three roads led to Palermo, Meſſina, and Syracuſe. Count de Mercy arrived by eaſy marches at Melazzo, and found in the Spaniſh camp ſome cannon, with ammunition and utenſils of war, which the haſte of the Spaniards had left behind. The Admiral coaſting along with the army, anchored before Melazzo, and landed there the remainder of the horſe, with the tents and other neceſſaries of war.

The Spaniards fortified themſelves very ſtrongly at Villa-Franca. The rapid river Cantara, whoſe banks are of a ſteep quick rock, from ſix to eight feet perpendicularly deep, and runs through the valley of Villa-Franca, was in their front. Their left was on the riſing grounds about Villa-Franca (the town lying behind in their centre) and extended to a high mountain, where they had placed ſome armed peaſants, and a few foot. On the other ſide of the river, (but joined by a bridge to the town of Villa-Franca) was a ſteep rock, with a convent of capuchins upon it. Here they placed five battalions of their beſt troops, in as many rows of intrenchments cut into the rocks, one above the other; and at the point of the rock was a ſmall battery of two pieces of cannon of three-pounders. On their right they had carried on a fortification of large ſtones, like a wall, all along the river, as far as a high rocky hill, which had a convent on the top, as advantageouſly fortified as that of the capuchins; and cloſe behind the hill, the ſteep river Caſtiglione runs into the Cantara, by means of whoſe confluence, and the neighbouring mountains being guarded by armed peaſants, the Spaniards were ſecure from any danger in their rear. Notwithſtanding this, it being reſolved to attack them in their intrenchments before the ſiege of Meſſina, Count de Mercy made the beſt of his way through a barren mountainous country for that purpoſe. No general could make a better diſpoſition for the attack on his arrival at the ſpot, nor did ever ſoldiers ſhew more alacrity to engage, yet ſuch was the ſtrength of the Spaniſh intrenchments, and the want of proper intelligence of their diſpoſition and ſtrength, not one deſerter coming over to the Germans, that it was thought moſt expedient, after an obſtinate attack for a whole day (in which the Germans loſt 846 men killed, and had 2449 wounded, the General himſelf wounded in his reins), to extend themſelves to the left, and thereby cut off the enemy from Meſſina, and open a communication with the Engliſh convoy, which, according to agreement, was to rendezvous in Schiſo bay, near Taormina, a ſeaport town about three hours diſtant from Villa-Franca, with the tranſports laden with proviſions, ammunition, baggage, and other neceſſaries which the army ſtood in extreme need of.

When Count de Mercy parted from Admiral Byng at Melazzo, to go in queſt of the Spaniſh army, it was the Admiral's deſign to return to Naples, and put things there in motion for an intended expedition to Sardinia. But reflecting within himſelf, that the impetuous temper of the German General, and the contempt he ſaw he had of the enemy, might poſſibly bring about ſome occaſions that would want his aſſiſtance, he tarried a few days on the coaſt in uneaſy expectation of the news of the ſucceſs of their march from Melazzo. The armed peaſants had cut off all communication between Villa-Franca and Melazzo; ſo that the firſt doubt he entertained that things had not gone well, was from hearing the firing of the guns at Meſſina, and at the Fare, and ſeeing great illuminations made along the coaſt. Soon after he perceived the Neapolitan galleys rowing out of the Fare, and the general of them coming on board gave him an imperfect account of the action, but enough to ſatisfy him that it had not been fortunate; upon which he immediately embarked two battalions from the garriſon of Melazzo, and about 1000 recruits who were juſt arrived there, and ſent them the ſame day under a convoy through the Fare to Schiſo bay. In the evening he received letters from Count de Mercy informing him of the particulars of the whole action, with the great difficulties he laboured under, and uncertainty what to do, earneſtly preſſing him to come to the camp, that they might confer and conſult together. Upon this the Admiral ſent his firſt captain with his own ſhip, and two others to Naples, by whom he ſent a letter to the Viceroy, giving his opinion that all thoughts of an expedition to Sardinia ſhould be laid aſide for the preſent, and the troops which could be ſpared from his government ſent immediately into Sicily, till whoſe arrival all things there would be at a ſtand; and that he had ſent his officers and ſhips to aſſiſt in and expedite that ſervice. He then embarked on board the general of the galleys, laying aſide the ceremony of his flag and character; and in his way to Schiſo, Count de Ligneville came to him in a felucca, bringing freſh letters from Count de Mercy, which expreſſed his great impatience to ſee him. Being landed at Schiſo, General Wachtendonck renewed the ſame entreaties, which the Admiral's zeal did not want, who accepting that General's horſes, and forgetting for a while his own ſtation and element, ſet out under a ſtrong eſcort, attended by Captain Matthews and his eldeſt ſon; and paſſing through roads ſtrewed with dead bodies of men and horſes that had fallen in ſkirmiſhes the days before, between the ſea ſide and the camp, he alighted at Count de Mercy's tent in the evening, where a guard of grenadiers, being drawn out for his reception, one of them was ſhot through the head by a muſquet-ball from the enemy's camp, at the door of the tent, and fell down dead at his feet. He found the General very weak and faint with his wound, the ball ſtill remaining in his reins, but as he had a magnanimity of ſpirit ſuperior to his condition, it did not hinder him from entering into converſation on the melancholy ſituation of affairs.

The General caſt the blame upon General Zumjungen, who was next under him in command; accuſing him of ſlowneſs, and not coming up in time to ſupport him in the late action. On the contrary, when he viſited Zumjungen, who was of a ſedate deliberate temper, he complained of Count de Mercy's raſh impatience in not giving time to all the troops to come up; aſcribed their loſs to that impatience; bewailed the little regard he paid to the advice of his officers; and entreated him to interpoſe, that the Count might not be led away by a falſe courage to ſacrifice his men in ſuch another manner.

The Admiral complied; and in a council of war, and with ſtrong arguments evinced the hazard of a ſecond attack, and prevailed with them to reſolve upon the ſiege of Meſſina; concluding his ſpeech thus: "That as to what regarded the fleet, the experience of the laſt winter in keeping two ſquadrons, one within, the other without the Fare, to block up the ſhips in Meſſina, and ſecure the paſſage of the proviſions which the army at Melazzo drew from Calabria and Apuleia, had determined him never to hazard again the deſtruction of his maſter's ſhips on a ſervice of ſuch evident danger, in that tempeſtuous ſeaſon, without having a port to ſhelter or befriend him. That the reduction of Meſſina was their mutual intereſt, as his ſhips would then clean there, and be more at hand to aſſiſt them; and the cauſe of the blockade being removed, he ſhould be able to ſend a detachment to cruize on the coaſts of Spain, which would ſtraiten the enemy, and obſtruct their ſending ſuccours into Sicily.

But as this alteration in the operations for this year could not be confirmed without the concurrence of the ſeveral allies, the Admiral embarked, and ſailed to Naples with two ſhips only, to repreſent the neceſſity of complying therewith. In the mean time that couriers were diſpatched to the reſpective courts on this errand from their miniſters at Naples, the army aſſiſted by the tranſport veſſels coaſting along with proviſions, artillery, and heavy baggage, arrived and ſat down before Meſſina on the 20th of July, where alſo the Admiral arrived on the 28th off the Point of the Fare, and ſtaid there on board till he had the pleaſure of ſeeing the city of Meſſina open her gates to the Emperor's troops; the Spaniards under General Spinola being retired into the citadel, the Admiral landed ſome Engliſh grenadiers, who took the tower of the Fare, which opening a free paſſage for his ſhips, he came to an anchor in Paradiſe Road; which the officers of the Spaniſh men of war in the mole perceiving, and deſpairing now of getting out to ſea, they unbent their ſails and unrigged their ſhips, expecting their fate with that of the citadel. This gave the Admiral great eaſe, and enabled him to employ ſhips on other ſervices, which had long attended the blocking up of that port.

It came now to be matter of debate, what was to be done with thoſe ſhips when the citadel ſhould be taken and they fell into their hands. Signor Scarampi, general of the King of Sardinia's galleys, firſt ſtarted the queſtion, and claimed the two beſt of ſixty and ſixty-four guns, new ſhips, which had belonged to his maſter, and were ſeized by the Spaniards in the Port of Palermo. He grounded his right on a convention made at Vienna the 29th of December, 1718, in which it was ſaid, "that as to the ſhips belonging to the King of Sardinia, if they be taken in port, they ſhall be reſtored to him; but that this ſhall be referred to Admiral Byng to anſwer." To this the Admiral replied, "that this convention having been only a ground-work for another to be made at Naples, he could be directed by none but that which had been made in conſequence thereof in April 1719, between the Viceroy of Naples, the Marquis de Breille, miniſter of Sardinia, and himſelf, in which no mention is made of thoſe ſhips; and as to the reference to his opinion, he did freely declare, he could not think the King of Sardinia had any ſhadow of title to them; that they had been taken by the enemy, were now fitted out and armed at their expence, and under their colours, that they would put out to ſea if he did not hinder them, and attack all Engliſh ſhips they met with, and if ſtronger take them; ſo that he could not conſider them in any light, than what they were, the ſhips of the enemy."

Count de Mercy next put in his claim for the Emperor, alleging, "that as thoſe ſhips would be found within the port of a town taken by his maſter's arms, according to the right of nations they belonged to him."

The Admiral replied, "that it was owing to his keeping two ſquadrons on purpoſe, and at a great hazard, to watch and obſerve thoſe ſhips, that they were now confined within the port, which if he was to withdraw, they would ſtill be able to go to ſea, and he ſhould have a chance of meeting with and taking them." But reflecting afterwards with himſelf, that poſſibly the garriſon might capitulate for the ſafe return of thoſe ſhips into Spain, which he was determined never to ſuffer; that, on the other hand, the right of poſſeſſion might breed an inconvenient diſpute among the princes concerned; and if it ſhould prove that they did not belong to England, it were better they belonged to nobody, he propoſed to Count de Mercy to ſet up a battery, and deſtroy them as they lay in the baſon; who urging that he had no orders concerning thoſe ſhips, and muſt write to Vienna for inſtructions about it; the Admiral replied with ſome warmth, that he could not want a power to deſtroy every thing that belonged to the enemy, and inſiſted on it with ſuch firmneſs, that the General being concerned in intereſt not to carry matters to a diſagreement, cauſed a battery to be erected, notwithſtanding the proteſt of Scarampi; which ſoon deſtroyed them, and ruined the naval power of Spain.

While the ſiege of the citadel was continued, arrived the Emperor's approbation and conſent for proſecuting the reduction of Sicily, and for employing the men deſigned for Sardinia, according to the Admiral's plan. But as the Germans were remarkable for delays, and the army under Count Mercy in great want of cannon and proviſions, Sir George undertook to ſolicit expedition and a ſupply of thoſe neceſſaries in perſon at Naples. Accordingly he arrived in that city on the 23d of Auguſt, where to his great ſurpriſe he found, after a ſtrict enquiry into the ſtate of the ordnance, that the whole country was not able to furniſh the cannon and ammunition which Count de Mercy wanted. This was ſuch a declaration of weakneſs, as was not to be expected in ſo fine a kingdom. The Admiral now plainly perceiving that the army had no reſource but what lay in himſelf, generouſly ſent them twenty-four pieces of cannon of eighteen-pounders, belonging to the Spaniſh prizes, and a proportionable quantity of powder and ſhot, contenting himſelf with the ſingle credit of the General for repayment to the captors, and at the ſame time wrote to Genoa and Leghorn to purchaſe 1000 barrels more of powder, engaging his own ſecurity to the Britiſh conſuls for their repayment.

From hence the Admiral proceeded with tranſports to take in the troops at Vado, ordered by the Emperor from the Milanſe, but none were yet arrived; and Count de Bonneval, who was to command them, declared he would not ſtir till he was ſatisfied in ſome particulars, which did not fall within the knowledge of our Admiral, and were charged upon the governor of Milan. After much pains he got two veſſels ſent away under convoy of a man of war, with ſome cannon and ammunition for the army at Meſſina; but as to the main point, he met with great perplexity and vexation. He had been twelve days ſoliciting their putting proviſions and neceſſaries on board the tranſports, that they might be ready againſt the arrival of the forces, without any the leaſt thing being done in it; upon complaining of which to Count de Bonneval, he contented himſelf with laying the blame on the commiſſaries, who, he ſaid, would do what they pleaſed in ſpite of all that he could ſay to them; and being appointed by the aulic council of war at Vienna, had no regard to his authority or orders. With difficulty the Admiral got them to come to a conference at the General's houſe, where laying before them a ſtate of the ſeveral particulars ſtill wanting for the intended embarkation, they proteſted they could not get together ſo much proviſions under fifteen days time: but entering into a diſcuſſion of each particular, he plainly ſhewed them that it might eaſily be compaſſed in ſeven. He then told them, "that as the governor of Milan had aſſured him, that the laſt column of troops would be at Vado the 23d, if any thing hindred their embarking the next day, he would be trifled with no longer but go away to Meſſina where his preſence was wanted and, leave a convoy to follow with the troops; and adviſed them to conſider ſeriouſly of the blame they would incur from their negligence." This brought them to promiſe, that all the proviſions, ammunition, and other neceſſaries, ſhould be got ready and ſhipped off by the time appointed for the arrival of the troops. They being accordingly arrived on the 23d, and the Admiral having made a diſpoſition to embark them, the commanding officer ſent him word, that very little of the proviſions were ſhipped on board the tranſports; that moſt part of the biſcuit and wine was wanting; that there was no ſalt, oil, brandy, or tobacco, nor any hay or oats; nor could he get any clear anſwer from the chief commiſſary, by what time thoſe things could be provided. The Admiral ſending his firſt captain to find out that officer, he concealed himſelf from his ſight; and indeed the whole conduct of thoſe officers looked as if they deſignedly delayed, inſtead of forwarding this ſervice. As to Count de Bonneval, who had been appointed to command thoſe forces on the intended expedition to Sardinia, he was ſo diſguſted at his diſappointment, and the diverting them to a different ſervice, and to find himſelf going to act under the command of another, that he gave himſelf no trouble to forward the ſervice, but ſpent his whole time in pleaſure at Genoa.

After incredible pains and labour, and at laſt ſuch menaces as the commiſſaries, and even Bonneval himſelf began to be afraid of, the Admiral ſhipped off the the troops to the number of about 6000, on the 27th of September, with ſuch proviſions as could be got, and leaving a man of war to convoy the remainder when ready, ſailed the 28th from Vado, but it blowing very freſh the 29th in the night, the ſettees and tartans, with about 600 men on board, and ſome horſes and baggage, parted from the fleet, and ſtood in with the ſhore for ſhelter. The Admiral receiving letters in his paſſage from Count de Mercy, requeſting that the troops might not be landed at Melazzo, but go to Meſſina, he ſtood away for the Fare, and arrived before Meſſina the 8th of October; which ſo elevated the ſpirits of the army, that upon the firſt ſight of the fleet, Lieutenant-General Wallis with 5000 men made a vigorous attack upon the half-moon, which was neareſt to their approaches, and carried it but with the loſs of 103 killed, and 830 wounded. The Admiral repairing aſhore to the General's quarters, was embraced by him and all the general officers with the moſt tender marks of affection and gratulation, the whole army being overjoyed to ſee a man who always brought them relief and ſucceſs, and every good that attended them.

On the 17th, at ten in the morning, the Imperialiſts aſſaulted the counter-guard, and mounted to the top of the breach with great gallantry, but after two hours very warm work, were repulſed with the loſs of 120 men killed, and 617 wounded. The Governor having acquitted himſelf with great honour in this repulſe, as well as the general defence of the place, and finding himſelf unable to hold it longer, beat a parley the next day, and ſurrendered upon articles. On the 19th, 600 Imperial grenadiers marched in and took poſſeſſion of a gate of the citadel. On the 21ſt the Spaniſh garriſon marched out through the breach, and were tranſported by ſea to Auguſta. Thus ended a ſiege of 91 days, which coſt the Germans above 5000 men killed or wounded.

MEUSE. April 15, 1794. The following account of the retreat of the Britiſh over the Meuſe and of the motives which induced his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York to make that movement, is given by a gentleman who was upon the ſpot at the time referred to.

The poſition his Royal Highneſs the Duke of York had occupied at Heſwick ſome days before, was excellent, ſuppoſing that the Auſtrians, as they promiſed, had ſtrengthened the communication between our left and their poſts at Waert, towards Helmont, and had guarded that part between the moraſs of Peel and the Meuſe.

The Britiſh army was encamped at Heſwick, on an eminence, covered with redoubts. In front was the river Aa; on the right the river Dommel, inundated from Gheſtel to Fort Iſabelle, and Bois-le-Duc; and on the left was the moraſs of Peel; the advanced poſts, which were rather too far advanced, were at Boxtel, on the right, where General During, (an excellent officer) of the Heſſe Darmſtadt troops commanded, with two battalions of Heſſe Darmſtadt troops, two companies of Yagers, two pieces of cannon, two ſquadrons of Britiſh light dragoons, under Colonel Churchill; Lieutenant-Colonel Irwine, with four ſquadrons of his regiment of huſſars, and two ſquadrons of Baron Hompeſch's, and one of Choiſeul's huſſars. At Ollaud, in front, General Liſingen commanded, with the Heſſe Caſſel infantry and cavalry; and on his left was General Hammerſtein, with the remainder of the Britiſh light cavalry, Hanoverian cavalry and infantry.

The enemy a few days before having aſſembled a corps at Oſterwick, formed the deſign of cutting us off from the Meuſe, or from the Grave; the army they had aſſembled, from every account, amounted to 80,000 men. Their plan was, that their column from Oſterwick was to have attacked Boxtel, and in front, near Schindal, whilſt their principal column from Endhoven was to have forced our left, and penetrated to Grave, cutting off by that means not only our communication with that place, but alſo with the Auſtrians.

On the 14th, they began their attack, about three o'clock in the afternoon on Boxtel, forcing back the piquets, which were at the other ſide the Dommel. They then advanced againſt the village with cannon and howitzers; the Darmſtadt infantry having broken down the bridge, defended the poſt as long as poſſible, and killed a number of the enemy with grape ſhot, as they were endeavouring to throw a bridge over; but a body of cavalry having paſſed at a ford higher up, took them in the rear, and cut moſt of his two battalions to pieces; and at the ſame time the enemy, with cannon and howitzers, drove back the cavalry, who could not form in its narrow roads, and was obliged to retire to Middleros-bridge, behind an Engliſh battalion there. The loſs there was of Heſſians, 1 colonel, 2 captains, and about 300 men; of Britiſh cavalry, 3 men taken; of Irwin's Huſſars, 2 officers, and 50 men; of Baron Hompeſch's, about the ſame number, and two pieces of Heſſian cannon.

The enemy attacked his left at the ſame time, but were repulſed. Salm's huſſars in the Britiſh ſervice, and Britiſh light dragoons, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by a ſucceſsful charge. General Hammerſtein, however, hearing of the misfortune at Boxtel, thought it prudent to retreat towards Erpe, leſt he ſhould be taken on his flanks.

His Royal Highneſs the Commander in Chief knowing the importance of Gheſtil, as an advanced poſt, diſpatched General Abercromby in the night with his guards, and two other battalions, and cavalry, to occupy it, but found it already in the hands of the enemy, who were ſo ſtrongly poſted, that from the nature of the ground and their numbers, he could not penetrate; and after a cannonade and ſome ſkirmiſhing, in which about fifteen men were killed, and Captain Briſtow of the guards, and another officer of the line, taken priſoner, General Abercromby ordered a retreat, which was conducted with that prudence that might be expected from his abilities; Colonel Burrard of the guards, forming his rear guard, and the whole arrived in the greateſt order at Middleray.

From every intelligence, the Duke of York found that the enemy, with their whole force, were marching to the left, and that hazarding an affair againſt ſo ſuperior a number, even if ſucceſsful, could anſwer no end, and that the enemy, by forcing back the Auſtrians, might paſs the Maeſe between Venlo and Grave, then unprotected; his Royal Highneſs ordered a retreat by Grave, which was conducted in the greateſt order, not a man, nor article of baggage being loſt: General Abercromby, with the reſerve and light cavalry, forming the rear-guard.

His Royal Highneſs having thrown a regiment into Grave, eſtabliſhed his head quarters at Whykem, and afterwards at Craſwigh, his right extending towards Battenburg, and joining the Dutch, and his left along the river by Gennep, towards Venlo, and communicating with the Auſtrians on the Roer.

On the Auſtrians abandoning that river, and falling back on the Rhine, the left wing of the Britiſh was unprotected, and the French having it in their power to croſs the Meuſe between Venlo and Grave, his Royal Highneſs changed his head quarters to Nimeguen, being obliged to detach ſome regiments to the aſſiſtance of the Dutch towards Alfen and Battenburg, where the enemy ſeemed to paſs the Meuſe.

In the Duke of York's preſent poſition, ſhould the enemy advance towards Nimeguen, his Royal Highneſs can ſtill defend the Waal, and the Rhine. The left wing of the army is at Mock; the reſt is ſtationed along the river to Battenburg and Tiel.

The coolneſs and intrepidity which his Royal Highneſs has ſhewn in the many trying ſituations he has been thrown into by our allies, particularly that at Renny and Comtink, is not to be conceived at his age; and at the end of the campaign, it will be found that any failure that has happened, has been neither owing to his fault, nor want of their accuſtomed courage in the troops, who have the honour of being commanded by him.

MIDDLETON, NOW MILTON, TAKEN. In 893, the Danes who were repulſed from the Continent by the valour of the French and Germans, divided their fleet, one part of which, conſiſting of eighty ſail, entered the Thames and took Milton, where they built a Caſtle, a caſtle, part of which is now exiſting under the name of Caſtle Ruff, on Kempſley Downs; oppoſite which on the other ſide of the water, are yet remaining the fortifications of Alfred, now called Bavord Caſtle.

MILAN the capital of the duchy of the ſame name. It is ſaid to be ten miles in circumference including its gardens. It was ſeized by the French in 1796, when the garriſon conſiſted of 4000 men, 1500 Auſtrians, and 2500 Neapolitans. They had a numerous artillery, and ſupplied with proviſions for four months. The citadel is at ſome diſtance from the city of Milan, which ſurrounds it in the ſhape of a half moon; the country near it is a kind of moraſs. The city of Milan, with reſpect to its wealth, and the number of its inhabitants, is conſidered as the fourth city in Italy; contains ſixty-one pariſh churches, beſides a number of other churches and chapels. The cathedral is the largeſt church in Italy, excepting St. Peter's at Rome. It is all marble. The eccleſiaſtical treaſure is eſtimated among the richeſt in Italy; conſiſting of a great number of golden and ſilver utenſils, ſeveral ſtatues of St. Ambroſe and other ſaints, all of maſſive ſilver, as large as life; and various other valuables.

The Auſtrians opened the campaign here by ſeveral actions, in which they were victorious. The following are official accounts, dated from Novi, on the 9th of April, 1796.

On the 6th, the French advanced againſt Marone with 800 men, when Colonel Vuckaſſowich advanced againſt them with a few more than 100 men, and obliged the enemy, ſeven times ſtronger than himſelf, to retreat, wounding many of them. Our ſoldiers took a number of muſkets.

On the 8th the enemy advanced againſt the neighbouring heights, from Voltri, threatening the abovementioned Colonel's left wing; but as he attacked the enemy with four companies, he obliged them to leave the heights and throw themſelves into their intrenchments at Aqua Santa. Our troops not contented with this happy conſequence, ſtormed theſe intrenchments, and drove the enemy from the ground. The Croats followed them almoſt to Voltri. The enemy left forty dead on the place, and three officers; they carried off a number of wounded with them, and twenty-eight were made priſoners of war. Our loſs is one killed and eleven wounded. Our head quarters are now removed from Aleſſandria to Novi. Baron Latour is returned from Vienna, bringing inſtructions for the conduct of the preſent campaign.

Our troops have again defeated the French near Voltri, by which they loſt 500 men in killed, wounded, and priſoners.

The following is a ſuccinct account of the military events which have taken place from the 10th to the 16th of this month.

The 11th the column under the orders of Lieutenant-General d'Argenteau, and conducted by the General Boccavina, attacked the poſitions of the French under Montinotte. He ſucceeded in repulſing them from beyond the poſt of Montinotte as far as Monte-Regino; but the enemy, profiting by the night and a thick fog, returned the following day to attack, in their turn, the poſts they had been driven from. For this purpoſe, a column, arriving from Savona, advanced againſt the front of the Auſtrians; another corps, arrived from Vado, took them in flank at the ſame time; and a third corps, having advanced from Mont St. Jaques along the mountains of Madona del Monte, marched by Carcara, and took our troops in the rear. In this manner the enemy ſucceeded in keeping in awe the four diviſions of the regiments of Tezzi and Stein, which formed the rear-guard.

At break of day the French began a cannonade, as alſo the fire of muſketry, from Monte Regino; the Auſtrians, attacked on three ſides at once by an enemy much ſuperior in number, were obliged to retreat; after having experienced a pretty conſiderable loſs in killed and wounded, as alſo in priſoners, eſpecially in the battalion of Stein, of which the Lieutenant-Colonel Neſling has not been found; and in thoſe of Tezzi and Pelligrini, the colonel of the firſt, M. Starler, is wounded and taken; the Lieutenant-Colonel of Pelligrini is wounded; the General Boccavini himſelf has received a ſlight contuſion. The regiment of the Archduke Antony, having ſuſtained the fire of one of the enemy's batteries, has ſuffered much.

At the concluſion of this affair, General d'Argenteau judged it proper to retire with his troops to Dego. He was attacked there again the 14th, by a French column arrived from Caire, and alſo by another arrived from Coſſeria, which took him in flank. This laſt column had attacked, the evening before, the body of troops which was poſted at Coſſeria under the orders of Lieutenant-General Prevora, compoſed of a free corps of Auſtrians and a corps of Piedmonteſe grenadiers, and had already obliged them to ſurrender. This corps found themſelves ſurrounded on all ſides; notwithſtanding which, they defended themſelves with much courage for many hours, and the French loſt a number of men, and among others a general. The capitulation was, that the ſoldiers ſhould be tranſported to France until they ſhould be exchanged at Baſle, and that the officers ſhould be releaſed on their parole.

The ſame column of the enemy, after having likewiſe made priſoners, on the morning of the 14th, the corps abovementioned at Coſſeria, went the ſame day to form the attack at Dego; and obliged General d'Argenteau, with the remainder of his troops, compoſed of Auſtrian and four Piedmonteſe battalions, to retire to Acqui, after having loſt ſome cannon and different waggons, which the badneſs of the roads hindered the tranſporting of. The Colonel de Vuckaſſowich, having gone away from Saſſelo with five battalions to ſupport the poſt of Dego, arrived there on the 15th; but finding that poſt already abandoned by the Auſtrians, he reſolved to follow the French, who had advanced towards Spigno, and to attack them.

This bold reſolution had a happy ſucceſs. The colonel, with his battalions of Croats, and two others, completely defeated the enemy's column, and not only obliged them to retreat, but retook even the cannon which they had poſſeſſed themſelves of the day before, with a part of the ammunition and proviſions belonging ing to the French. He made beſides 500 priſoners of the enemy, and purſued them in their flight to the other ſide of Dego, notwithſtanding his having met in thoſe places other French corps who advanced from Montenotte; but was obliged, for want of ammunition, to return and abandon the prizes he had made. It is not known yet, exactly, what has been the loſs of the Auſtrians in theſe different actions; but it is reckoned at about 4000 men killed and wounded, diſperſed, or made priſoners.

Milan, May 31, 1796.

General Count Hohenzollern, who was entruſted with the ſiege of the citadel of Milan, has ſent Captain Ottol, of the engineers, with a report, that, in conſequence of the orders he had received on the night of the 14th to blockade the citadel of Milan, and to ſupport Colonel Prince Rohan, againſt whom the enemy was advancing with very ſuperior numbers, he, on the 15th, left General Lattermann at Milan, with five battalions and one ſquadron, and haſtened with the remaining five battalions to join the Prince, whoſe advanced poſts were oppoſite to thoſe of the enemy at Ponte Ceresa in Anio. Notwithſtanding the great diſtance General Count Hohenzollern on the 17th had advanced beyond Ponte Ceresa, and formed a junction with the Prince. The enemy's poſition was immediately reconnoitred, and the attack to be made upon them, in three columns near Caverna, was fixed for the 18th. It was accordingly made, and with ſuch vivacity, that the enemy was driven back for the ſpace of five leagues, and forced over the rivulet Ancre. From the extent of the poſition to be occupied by Colonel Prince Rohan, Count Hohenzollern reinforced him with one battalion, and left his corps poſted near Luciono, Ponte Ceresa, and Lugano, with his advanced poſts in Caverna. His march back to Milan with the remaining four battalions was ſo expeditious that he reached it early on the morning of the 20th. In the night between the 20th and 21ſt the trenches were opened before the citadel of Milan. On the 23d, notwithſtanding the very heavy fire from the beſieged, the batteries were in a ſufficient ſtate of forwardneſs to begin playing upon the works. Upon a ſecond ſummons being ſent, the enemy agreed to capitulate; and the garriſon, conſiſting in the whole of 2220 men, of which nine chiefs of battalions, 158 officers, are not to ſerve againſt their Imperial Majeſties for the ſpace of twelve months. One hundred and ten pieces of cannon, and a quantity of ammunition and military ſtores of every deſcription were found in the citadel. The total number of killed on our ſide does not exceed forty-ſix men.

Copy of General Deſpinoy's Letter to Citizens Salicetti and Garreau, &c.

Head-quarters at Milan, June 29,

Citizens Commiſſaries,

I have to inform you, that after the trenches had been opened for twelve days, the citadel of Milan ſurrendered to the Republic at five this morning. We have taken 2800 priſoners, 150 pieces of cannon, 200,000lb. of powder.

Annexed are the terms of capitulation which I propoſed, and which the Commandant of the fortreſs accepted, without any reſtrictions.

Greeting and reſpect,

Deſpinoy.

Head-quarters at Milan, June 29, at three in the morning.

Capitulation granted by General Deſpinoy, Governor of Lombardy, for the French Republic, to M. Lancy, the Auſtrian Commandant of the citadel of Milan.

The citadel of Milan ſhall be given up to the troops of the French Republic, with its artillery, ammunition, proviſions, magazines of all kinds, military cheſts, and other effects, preciſely at five in the morning.

Immediately after the ſigning of the preſent capitulation, four companies of French grenadiers ſhall take poſſeſſion of the gate of Milan, and the baſtions of Velaſco, Dorn-Pietro, and Danigna.

French guards ſhall be placed at all the magazines, which ſhall be verified by commiſſaries to be appointed by either party.

The garriſon of the citadel ſhall inſtantly march out at the gate of Milan, and defile along the glacis of Verulines, before the French troops, with the honours of war, arms, and baggage only. As ſoon as they ſhall arrive at the bridge of the Naviglio, they ſhall lay down their arms, and become priſoners of war.

The emigrants and deſerters ſhall be given up to the French general.

The ſick and wounded ſhall be treated with all poſſible care, and in that generous manner by which the French nation has been ever diſtinguiſhed.

The garriſon ſhall be furniſhed with the neceſſary means of tranſporting themſelves and baggage to the place of deſtination that ſhall be pointed out to them.

If any diſpute ſhould ariſe about the conſtruction of the above articles, they ſhall be conſtrued to the advantage of the French troops.

Deſpinoy and Lancy.

June 29.—The garriſon of the citadel of Milan, conſiſting of 3000 men, were ſent priſoners, by the way of Lodi, to France: 150 pieces of cannon, 12,000 muſkets, and an immenſe quantity of powder and ball, 100 oxen, and large ſtores of grain, have fallen into the hands of the victors. The citadel was well provided with proviſions and ammunition, but it had only nineteen artillery men, who, at the time of its ſurrender, were reduced to thirteen.

Conſiderable magazines of cloathing, arms, and proviſions were found. A general with 500 men were alſo taken priſoners here. The loſs of the enemy, as far as could be aſcertained when the meſſenger left the army, amounted to four generals and upwards of 5000 men taken priſoners, and 6000 killed. Eighty pieces of cannon cannon were taken, of which forty-ſix are heavy beſieging artillery; ſeveral ſtandards were alſo taken.

May 28, 1799.

Marſhal Suwarrow having forced the paſſage of the Adda on the 27th paſt, completely beat the enemy, and eſtabliſhed his head-quarters on the 30th at Milan. By this victory all the Milaneſe, except the caſtle of Milan, is wreſted from the French, and it muſt alſo ſoon fall, as the garriſon does not exceed 1200 men, of which only 400 are French. The diſorder of the enemy in their flight was extreme; and it is ſuppoſed that they went towards the Po. Another body of the enemy, it is ſaid, are throwing up works at Reggio and Parma, in order to cover Mantua.

MILAN was taken poſſeſſion of by General Bonaparte, June 21, 1800, after the battle of Marengo. See MONTENOTTE.

MINCIO, a river in Italy, battle near. On the day upon which the armiſtice was ſigned at Steyer for the armies in Germany, a very bloody engagement took place in Italy between the Auſtrians and the French, and continued two days. The French attacked on the 25th of December 1800, paſſed the Mincio, and were three times repulſed. On the following day, they collected their force and made a freſh attack from the ſide of Monzanbano; in conſequence of which, General Bellegarde ordered the army to retreat, and take a poſition behind the Adige.

Vienna Gazette of January 3, 1801, contains the following account of that battle.

According to letters from the general of cavalry, Count Bellegarde, dated from head-quarters at St. Michell near Verona, 27th of December the enemy on the 25th, at day-break, with four diviſions and a large train of artillery, which they had poſted on the heights near the Molino di Pozzolo, to command the paſſage of the Mincio, laid ſiege to the Piazza di Pozzolo, and in the mean time threw their bridges over the river.

General Bellegarde gave orders to both Field-Marſhal Lieutenants Kaim and Vogelſang, to attack the enemy who had croſſed the river, in front and in flank; and theſe officers ſucceeded in driving them back as far as the river, with a great loſs on the part of the French, but were prevented by the enemy having brought their artillery from the other ſide of the river, from deſtroying their bridge of boats.

As ſoon as the enemy had brought up their troops of reſerve, and as General Bellegarde had reinforced the two before-mentioned officers, the battle was again begun, and the enemy were again a ſecond time driven back to the bridge, with a ſtill more conſiderable loſs. They were forced to abandon their artillery which they had brought to Pozzolo, and to retreat under the ſhelter of their own batteries. It was late at night when the enemy attacked for the third time, and were for the third time repulſed.

General Count Bellegarde expected, on the following day, a new attack from the enemy, and made his arrangements accordingly; but the enemy, whoſe hopes in that quarter were weakened by their loſſes, led back their troops over the bridge, and directed themſelves againſt the tete du pont, near Borghetto. This circumſtance induced General Bellegarde to order the corps de reſerve to Vallegio; but when the corps arrived there, intelligence was brought to the General, that the enemy had aſſembled all their forces at Monzanbano, had thrown over a bridge, and during a thick fog, had brought over more troops, and taken and driven in our advanced poſt.

General Bellegarde ordered a choſen body of troops to follow the corps de reſerve, which turned back and occupied the heights of Salionza, and the road which leads from Caſtel Nuovo to Vallegio. The enemy began to beſiege a ſtrong point, where we commanded the heights: owing to this circumſtance, they were unable to ſtorm Salionza. General Bellegarde cauſed them to be attacked by the corps de reſerve, in three diviſions: they were worſted in ſeveral points, particularly their left wing, and weakened; but a freſh column of them advancing from Monzanbano, along the left bank of the Mincio, occupied the heights by Vallegio, and by this advantage, compelled Count Hohenzollern, who had come up, to take a ſtation for his left wing, on the road from Vallegio to Villa Franca, and to retreat to the Fucone, with the troops which he had, in good order.

As the night prevented any attack being made on the the place of Vallegio, General Count Bellegarde ordered the army to retreat, and led the way to behind the Etſch, whither he was followed by the whole army in the beſt manner. The army was ſtationed near St. Marino, with its advanced poſts at Villa Franca.

The loſs in killed and wounded on both ſides is dreadful. General Bellegarde promiſes to ſend further details, with the names of the officers who have diſtinguiſhed themſelves. Among the wounded is General Kaim.

The French papers give the following gaſconading account of this battle.

The General of Diviſion, Chief of the Staff of the Army of Italy.

Monzanbano, 5 Nivoſe, 9th Year of the Republic.

In conſequence of the operations of the army, the General in Chief made diſpoſition, and gave orders for effecting the paſſage of the Mincio, yeſterday morning at day-break, on two bridges, which were to be thrown over it before Monzanbano. The right wing, commanded by Lieutenant-General Dupont, had orders to remount the Mincio, leave a corps of obſervation before Goito, and to make feint of marching to Volta.

Orders were at the ſame time given to the other diviſions. Accordingly General Dupont, perceiving no great body of troops before him, threw over his bridge, and happily effected a paſſage.

The Auſtrians then collected in force on this point, and a very ſmart action enſued. Our troops ſuſtained the ſhock with their uſual intrepidity; the enemy was repulſed and warmly purſued.

General Dupont, after giving an account of his movements to the General in Chief, to ſupport himſelf, without coming to an engagement or retiring under the protection of his artillery, placed himſelf on the right bank of the river. During this time the ardour of our troops hurried them along; and the enemy directing all their attention to this point, carried thither the greater part of their forces. The poſition of Lieutenant-General Dupont became critical. Lieutenant-General Suchet, who found himſelf diſengaged, did not heſitate to detach from his corps the troops of diviſion Gazan, and to march at their head, to ſupport the efforts of the right wing.

The obſtinate reſiſtance of the Auſtrians was extreme: they were infinitely ſuperior in numbers—four times in ſucceſſion they attempted in vain to overcome the intrepidity of our troops. The village of Rozollo, after being ſeveral times taken and loſt, finally remained in our hands, and we remained maſters of the field of battle, after a conteſt the moſt bloody, the moſt obſtinate, and the moſt unequal. The battle continued even at ten o'clock at night.

A vigorous charge of a detachment of the 6th dragoons contributed much to decide the fate of the day, which left us in poſſeſſion of 2000 priſoners, and a number of ſtands of colours.

The loſs of the enemy in killed and wounded was very conſiderable.

At the moment I have the honour to write to you, the army has effected a paſſage before Monzanbano.

(Signed) OUDENOT.

Head-quarters at Villa Franca, Dec. 30.

I had the honour of addreſſing to you, Citizen Miniſter, ſome details reſpecting the affairs of the 26th and 27th. In the night between the 25th and 26th, Lieutenant-General Delmas, commanding the advanced guard of the army, had received orders to paſs the Mincio at break of day, on the 26th, by two bridges, which were to be conſtructed before Monzanbano. At five in the morning, forty pieces of cannon were placed on the batteries on the right bank, by the care of General Marmont, commanding the artillery, in order to cover the conſtruction of the bridges. This general officer, to whom we are indebted for the organization of the ſuperb artillery of the army, has been of the greateſt ſervice. At ſeven ſix companies of carabiniers, commanded by C. Devillers, chief of the 25th light battalion, paſſed the Mincio in boats, and covered the conſtruction of the bridges. At nine one of the bridges was completed, and the advanced guard effected its paſſage. A general charge of infantry and cavalry was immediately executed by the orders of Lieutenant-General Delmas: it was effected without firing a ſingle cannon, while expoſed to a briſk fire of muſketry and grape-ſhot from the enemy againſt the front of all the columns; at the ſame time that they were ſtrongly cannonaded in flank from redoubts conſtructed on the heights of Salionza. The enemy ſoon gave way to an attack ſo impetuous, and fled with precipitation; all thoſe who remained were either killed or made priſoners. The brigades of Generals Caſſagne and Biſſon purſued them more than three miles, as far as the heights of Vallegio. The brigade of General Lapiſe, and that of the dragoons commanded by General Beaumont, advanced to the left to keep in check the forces which the enemy had under the redoubts. The brigade of dragoons, compoſed of the 1ſt and 9th, made a ſucceſsful charge. Four pieces of light artillery were placed on a battery, near enough for grape-ſhot to counteract the fire of the redoubts, which very much galled the brigades of Lapiſſe and Beaumont; the horſe artillery and ſoldiers of the train performed prodigies of valour; they manœuvred during more than hour againſt the grape-ſhot of the enemy, which diſabled many of the men as well as the horſes; the chief of battalion Aubry conſtantly directed this battery.

The enemy were at length driven from their poſitions by the brigade of Lapiſſe, who carried them by the bayonet, received with firmneſs the different charges of cavalry, waited for them within piſtol-ſhot, and compelled the enemy to make a precipitate retreat. In the mean time, Generals Caſſagne and Biſſon had taken a poſition on the heights towards Vallegio, where they were ſoon attacked by the reſerve of the enemy, compoſed of the Hungarian grenadiers, to the number of 12,000. Nothing but the bravery of our troops could have ſupported, for more than two hours, the repeated attacks of forces ſo ſuperior. The iſſue of this unequal conteſt might have proved unfavourable to our troops; but the diviſion on the right of Lieutenant-General Moncey, near which he himſelf was in perſon, commanded by General Boudet, came up; the charge being beat along the whole line, hurried on our troops. The route became complete; we took from them four pieces of cannon, one caiſſon, and about 2000 priſoners. This movement carried a part of the advanced guard towards Vallegio, where it had ſtill to encounter a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance; three times was the village taken and retaken. The grenadiers joined to the diviſion of Boudet, and led on by the Adjutants Dalton and Devaux, came up very opportunely to ſecond the efforts of the 52d demi-brigade, and at laſt occupied Vallegio, after taking two pieces of cannon. Adjutant Dalton was ſeverely wounded by a ball at the head of the grenadiers. On the firſt cannon ſhot fired againſt Vallegio, General of Brigade Leſuire, forming part of the central corps, at the head of the brave 72d, marched along with its chief, Freatier, againſt the palliſaded redoubts of Borghetto. The courage of theſe brave men was at firſt not able to triumph over the obſtacles they experienced. Several of them fell below the intrenchments, but ſoon rallying, they hurried to a new attack, when the Auſtrian commandant, unwilling to incur further danger, beat a retreat, and offered to capitulate: 200 priſoners, twenty-nine of whom were officers, five pieces of cannon, two howitzers, 900 muſkets, and eighty horſes, were the reſult of this capitulation.

In conſequence of theſe memorable actions the centre of the army, under the command of General Suchet, the reſerve under General Michaud, and the cavalry commanded by the General of Diviſion, Davouſt, effected their paſſage, and took their poſitions; the reſerve of artillery followed.

In the night the enemy, who had remained maſters of the Caſtle of Valleggio, evacuated the place. The day of the 20th was ſtill more glorious for all the troops who had occaſion to be engaged—the route of the enemy was complete. They loſt fourteen pieces of cannon, and about 3500 priſoners. The general officers of the ſtaff who diſtinguiſhed themſelves deſerve the greateſt praiſe. They all fought with diſtinction.

The activity of C. Alix, director-general of the parks of artillery, who was charged with the conſtruction of the bridges, deſerves to be recommended to notice; he was perfectly well ſeconded by C. Ponge and Dardeunne, chief of battalion of the pontoneers.

The brave General of Brigade, Mermet, was ſeverely wounded fighting at the head of his troops in the road to Vallegio.

Among the ſuperior officers wounded are the Chiefs of Brigade, Gaſpard, commanding the firſt of the proviſional line; Godinot, commandant of the 25th light; Devilliers, chief of brigade of the 25th light; and Debeſgues of the 52d.

General Beaumont, charging at the head of the 1ſt and 3d regiment of dragoons, had a horſe wounded; General Lapiſſe, a horſe killed; the Chief of Brigade, Baltazer, of the 20th light, a horſe wounded; C. Beyermann, of the 20th light, a horſe killed and another wounded; C. Martin, a horſe wounded. We muſt not paſs over in ſilence the bravery diſplayed on that day on the front of the line of the advanced guard by C. Andrieu and Hervo, commanding adjutants; Soubeyran, Thierry, chef d'Eſcadron; Farine, chief of battalion; Lamotte, Bauſch, Delmas, captain of the ſtaff; Demenger, chef d'Eſcadron; and Guſtavus Knorring, captain aid-de-camp of General Oudinot, chief of the ſtaff. All theſe officers, accompanied by only four chaſſeurs of the 14th and 21ſt regiments, in concert with the brigades of Caſſagne and Biſſon, contributed not a little by that impetuous ardour, inſpired by honour, to repulſe the enemy, who were marching in a body with very ſuperior forces againſt theſe two brigades.

Conducted by a general out of the line, to that point where the greateſt reſiſtance was made, they drove back every thing that oppoſed them, took one piece of cannon, and by this movement gave time to the diviſion of Baudet to reach the heights.

In this charge the General at their head had his horſe wounded; the Chef D'Eſcadron, Thierry, was knocked down, being ſtruck with the buts of the enemy's muſkets; Adjutant Andrieu had his horſe killed under him—ſome hours before his horſe had been wounded. C. Chapelle, aid-de-camp of General Vignolle, was killed by the ſide of his General, who was preſent in this affair.

Next day, the 27th, Lieutenant-General Delmas, having entirely ſurrounded the redoubts of Salionza, was preparing for an aſſault, when the enemy offered to capitulate, but they were not admitted but at diſcretion; fourteen pieces of cannon, 1000 priſoners, and two pair of colours fell into our hands. Twenty-eight pieces of cannon, two howitzers, with their ammunition, about 8500 priſoners, among whom are ſixty officers, and two pair of colours, are the fruits of theſe two days.

I have the honour to ſalute you with reſpect,

(Signed) OUDINOT, Gen. of Diviſion.

MINDEN, BATTLE AT. A city in Germany in the circle of Weſtphalia, ſituated on the river Weſer, about forty miles weſt from Hanover. We are now come to an article, the moſt diſagreeable in the whole work; for in an age like the preſent, where every thing is carried away by prejudice and partiality, to be impartial in the opinion of the world is an impoſſibilty. If we ſpeak our real ſentiments, and gather our relation from the beſt Engliſh, Hanoverian, and French accounts, we are afraid, nay, we are certain, we cannot pleaſe the admirers of Duke Ferdinand, and the friends of Lord George Sackville; and not to pleaſe, is the ſame thing as to be in an error. If we adhere to one party, no matter which, our account is imperfect, becauſe only the good qualities of one ſide, and only the bad of the other, are ſet down, while the contraſt is omitted in both. Thus either way it appears, we cannot pleaſe every body, for our own ſakes therefore, we would have omitted the article, could we have hoped for that indulgence from the public.

As no ſuch favour would be granted, we muſt proceed

ceed to give an account of the battle, which we ſhall do in the beſt manner we are able, and beg to obſerve previouſly, that we are not particularly attached to either party, that we ſhall ſpeak according to the beſt of our judgment and without reſerve.

The reader by peruſing the article Bergen, will find, that by that unfortunate ſtroke, the whole plan of operations for the year 1759, was fruſtrated. In conſequence of which, Duke Ferdinand retreated, and the Duke de Broglio, afterwards a mareſchal of France, joined his victorious troops to the grand army, commanded by M. de Contades. The French army after this junction, amounted to at leaſt 68,000 men, ſome accounts ſaid 75,000. The Allies were not inferior, but were ſoon after conſiderably weakened by making detachments for garriſons. Contades purſued, and as he thought, with great caution; he was fortunate in taking ſuch ſteps, as did not expoſe him to the enemy, but it was rather the effect of chance than judgment, for often times he was obliged to encamp in thoſe places, where he was happily ſecure, when he intended to have gone further. This good luck continued with him all June and moſt part of July. On the 31ſt of this month, 1759, the two armies encamped about the diſtance of ſeven miles from each other. The Allies extended from Thornhauſen, almoſt to Hille, making a line of little leſs than nine miles, while the French were more compact, they did not take up the ſpace of three miles. They were a little higher than Minden, having that city and Torffmoor in their front. About evening they ſtruck their tents, and advanced to the moor or marſh, and in the dead of the night proceeded to Minden heath. Mareſchal Contades drew up his army in a very imprudent manner, if we may credit the report of his own officers, or the diſlike they expreſſed of it. He placed his infantry on the wings, and his cavalry in the centre. He expected to find the Allies in that diſpoſition; but ſurely no general would place his infantry on the wings, where there was a probability of being flanked, and as the French army was by much the ſuperior, it could conſequently form a larger front; therefore Contades ſeems ſtrangely erroneous in his judgment, to think that Duke Ferdinand ſhould draw up in ſuch a diſadvantageous manner on a plain. He alſo entertained a notion, that the left wing of the Duke's army, commanded by Lieutenant-General Wangenheim, which extended to the banks of the Weſer, was extremely weak, that it conſiſted rather of a detachment, than a wing of the army, becauſe it was ſeparated, and that his main force was at Hille. Certain it is, his main force was near Hille, and Wangenheim's corps was encamped at ſome diſtance from it; but ſtill there was a communication between them.

On the 30th and 31ſt days of July, Mareſchal Contades, having called in all his detachments, by it alarmed the commander of the allied army, who gueſſed at the Mareſchal's deſign, and therefore on the 31ſt, at five o'clock in the afternoon, he ordered the army to hold themſelves in readineſs to march at one in the morning, and gave all his advanced poſts a ſtrict charge to be very attentive to the motions of the enemy during the night, to prevent a ſurpriſe.

As ſoon as the French army entered the heath of Minden, M. Contades detached the Duke de Broglio to attack Wangenheim's corps. But before this could be executed, two deſerters came to the tent of Prince Ferdinand, and acquainted him with the deſign of the enemy. They had, indeed, left their regiments four hours before, but ſtill they came time enough to confirm thoſe ſuſpicions which reaſon and experience had ſuggeſted. The Prince ſent advice of it to Wangenheim at three o'clock, and at the ſame time ſent all the aid-de-camps about him to every part of the army, with orders to move without the leaſt delay. Broglio's corps appeared before Thornhauſen, between three and four o'clock, but did not fire till the cannon of the left wing ſhould play on the village of Hille, which was not till four, then he attacked the advanced guard; but how great was his ſurprize, when, inſtead of finding Wangenheim's troops aſleep in their tents, as he expected, they were drawn up in order of battle, and had even an intrenched poſt at Thornhauſen: he, however, began the attack by a diſcharge of cannon, which was at firſt but faintly returned, but after ſome more ſalutes of this ſort, they quickly gained the aſcendant, and Broglio thought proper to retreat a little.

At four o'clock, the village of Hille was cannonaded from a battery which the enemy had erected at Eikhorſt. The Engliſh officers were alarmed at this, for they had never been made acquainted that the enemy intended to give battle, though the reſt of the army had. The Marquis of Granby as ſoon as he heard the firing, immediately ordered his horſe, and ſent to Lord George Sackville's quarters to know if there were any orders, and what the firing was; every thing was quiet there, and the meſſenger returned without having been able to learn any thing. The Marquis then repaired to the Duke's quarters, and preſently found that here it was the enemy had been firing.

About this time the army was put in motion, except that part of it under the command of General Wangenheim, which kept its old poſition at Thornhauſen. By ſome miſtake in the hurry of making ready, the artillery never received orders to advance till very late; the commanding officer enquired after them, and received them from Lord George Sackville between ſix and ſeven o'clock. As ſoon as the army had marched through the great wood, and being got on Minden heath, the infantry were formed in ſight of the enemy; a body of German cavalry was on their left, which preſerved the communication with Wangenheim, and that was all the ſervice they were of, for they were never in the action: another body of cavalry, commanded by Lord George Sackville, was on their right, but the wood which ran obliquely and between them, hindered them from ſeeing each other.

What followed muſt aſtoniſh every military and common capacity; ſix regiments of Britiſh infantry, aſſiſted by two of Hanoverian guards, were detached from the right of the line of infantry, to charge the enemy's centre, which conſiſted of ſixty ſquadrons of cavalry; they obeyed this order, and to their eternal honour, by half an hour paſt eight drove the enemy before them, without any other aſſiſtance than from the artillery of their own country. In vain did the French cavalry attempt to rally, they could not look this little corps of infantry in the face. In vain was it taken in front and flank by their artillery, its reſolution was not to be daunted; the ground where they marched was ſtrewed with ſlaughter and blood, and carnage now paved the path to glory. Juſt before this brave body of infantry advanced to attack, Duke Ferdinand ſent Captain Winſchingrode, his Heſſian aid de camp, with an order to Lord George Sackville to march with the right wing of cavalry, and form a line behind the infantry, which he might do by marching through the wood, that hindered him from ſeeing the infantry; Lord George did not underſtand how this march was to be made, and heſitated concerning the order, which, as the aid-de-camp thought he delivered in a very clear manner, and fully perſuaded that Lord George underſtood it, he immediately left him; but as Lord George obſerved: "It is very natural for a perſon to ſuppoſe, that what he means to expreſs, he has expreſſed plainly, though the perſon to whom he ſpeaks finds great difficulty in underſtanding it." No ſooner was Winſchingrode gone, than Colonel Ligonier came to Lord George Sackville, with an order from the Duke, for his Lordſhip to march with the cavalry under his command, and profit of the diſorder which appeared in the enemy's cavalry; upon which his Lordſhip began to advance when Colonel Fitzroy arrived with another order from the Duke, for him to advance with the Britiſh cavalry only. Lord George told them their orders diſagreed, "In numbers, my Lord, ſaid Fitzroy, "but their deſtination is the ſame, to the left." Neither of theſe gentlemen could tell which came laſt, as they both ſet out at different times, and both were poſitive in their injunctions. Lord George thereupon went to the Duke himſelf, and having received the order from his own mouth, proceeded to obey it. But now it was too late to do any ſervice, the little body of infantry had obliged the enemy to retreat, but they did it in extreme good order, by the ſpecial care and vigilance of the Duke de Broglio, who having made no impreſſion on Wangenheim, drew off to ſuccour the centre; and here it is amazing that the French cavalry did not double up and incloſe thoſe few combatants, for they were at a diſtance from all their friends.

There is evidently great room to charge all the commanders with miſconduct, Lord George Sackville for not immediately obeying the order brought by Captain Winſchingrode; Duke Ferdinand for never putting the allied army in a line, and ſuffering the eight regiments of infantry to be unſuſtained and uncovered in their flanks, though the reſt of the infantry was behind them, and the cavalry of the left wing nearer to them than the cavalry on their right. It may be thought temerity in us to ſay, that ſince the commander on the right did not obey, it was but reaſonable to aſſiſt them with ſome commander that would.

The Marechal de Contades was inexcuſable for his diſpoſitions, which had often loſt his country great advantages, and by which he loſt his command; and Broglio, after he had joined the centre, for not ſurrounding the detached body of infantry, which would have given them the victory.

The French not having been moleſted by the cavalry of either wing in their retreat, had an opportunity of regaining their former advantageous camp. They had indeed loſt the honour of the day, and miſſed the ſtroke which they had meditated. They had likewiſe loſt a great number of men. But all their loſſes and diſgraces might be repaired, and there ſeemed nothing deciſive in the day of Minden. It had certainly happened, as it then appeared, that the Duke, who forſeeing this, had not formed the plan and detached the Hereditary Prince of Brunſwick, at five in the morning of that day.

This young hero attacked a large body of the French under the Duke de Briſac; this body, though poſted in a moſt advantageous manner, he entirely defeated, and obliged them to take refuge in Minden. The news of this blow came with an ill omen to M. de Contades, in the inſtant when the Engliſh infantry began to engage his centre. The enemy himſelf could not help admiring the dexterity of the ſtroke under which he ſunk; and full of aſtoniſhment at a conduct at once ſo daring and judicious, paid the juſt applauſe to a general who could detach with ſecurity ſo large a body from his army, when he was going to attack an enemy already much ſuperior to him in numbers.

This happy ſtroke decided the affair; all the paſſes through which the French could draw ſuccour or proviſion were ſeized. They relinquiſhed their ſtrong poſt; they fled through Minden, and paſſing the Weſer, retreated to the eaſtward of that river; thus loſing all the advantages which they had made in the campaign, and forced to retreat through a country different from that through which they had advanced, and in which they had taken no meaſures to procure ſubſiſtence.

The loſs of the French in this action amounted to about 7000 men killed, wounded, and priſoners, among whom were many officers of conſiderable rank. The loſs of the allies was not more than 2000. The Engliſh as they gained the greateſt glory, ſo they were the greateſt ſufferers; 1200 of the killed and wounded were of that nation. The Prince, on the day after the battle, paid the due honours to theſe illuſtrious corps, as well as to the ſeveral corps of the Hanoverians who had behaved in the ſame gallant manner. He did juſtice to the merit of the officers, he diſtinguiſhed their names, and even particularized ſo low as captains. To ſome in the moſt obliging manner he ſent conſiderable preſents; and he omitted nothing to ſhew that he knew what it is to be well ſerved, and how to encourage the troops and officers to do their duty with ſpirit and cheerfulneſs.

Although the Engliſh had the greateſt ſhare in the honour of this ſignal day, and that the French acknowledged their merit in the ſtrongeſt terms, yet a cloud was caſt over the triumph. There were ſome expreſſions in the orders for rejoicing which was ſuppoſed to convey convey a very ſevere reflection on Lord George Sackville, commander in chief of the Engliſh forces. The Duke required with an emphaſis, which ſeemed particularly pointed, that his orders by his aid de camps for the future ſhould be more particularly obeyed. In a manner ſtill leſs to be miſunderſtood, he expreſſed his concern that the Marquis of Granby had not the command of the Britiſh cavalry. Had he commanded, his Highneſs made no doubt the ſucceſs of the day had been much more complete and brilliant. The ſevere inſinuation concerning the diſobedience to orders, and the invidious complement to a ſubordinate officer were clear declarations.

The news of a victory ſo glorious to our troops, and of a cenſure ſo diſgraceful to their commander came at once to England. In proportion to the joy that filled all hearts, in proportion to their opinion of the great general to whom they owed ſo ſeaſonable an advantage, was their indignation againſt the unfortunate commander, to whom it was attributed that this advantage was not greater. The public, as uſual, judged definitively upon the firſt charge. They never pardon a general whoſe error it is to fall ſhort.

A few days after the battle his Lordſhip reſigned his command, and returned to London. He was but a few days in London when he was deprived of all his military employments. The Marquis of Granby, whom the opinion of Duke Ferdinand, and the deſires of the whole had pointed out, ſucceeded him in his command.

Whilſt theſe changes were making, Duke Ferdinand loſt no time to improve his victory, by the purſuit of the French. The allies were not indeed able to overtake the main body of their army, but they haraſſed them extremely, and the French were obliged to ſacrifice a great part of their army by piece-meal, to preſerve the reſt entire.

The neceſſity of providing ſubſiſtence drove them towards Caſſel. The Prince purſued them, obliged them to evacuate that place, and once more freed that poor diſtreſſed country from French tyranny. The caſtle of Zeigenhayn after an hour's defence, gave the Allies about 400 priſoners. After this the Hereditary Prince of Brunſwick, equally conſpicuous in the greater and the leſſer operations of war, made a private march at night (Auguſt 27th) in order to ſurpriſe a corps of French irregulars, commanded by the famous partiſan Fiſcher, which were poſted at Wetter, where it was convenient for the Allies to encamp; this corps he entirely routed, killing a great number, and taking 400. The French threw a garriſon into Marpurg, in hopes of putting ſome ſtop to the rapid career of the Allies. In effect, this did prove an obſtacle for ſome days, but at length the caſtle ſurrendered, and the garriſon, conſiſting of between 800 and 900 men, became priſoners of war.

Here a bound was ſet to the progreſs of the allied arms; not that they were ſtopped by any conſiderable obſtruction from the main body of the French in that quarter, but from ſome effects in another quarter of the unſucceſsful beginning of the campaign, from which the battle of Minden had not yet perfectly diſengaged them. Munſter was ſtill behind them, and ſtill in the hands of the enemy, who had a powerful garriſon in that city. M. de Contades, who, even after his defeat, exceeded the Allies in numbers, and had now no further view of an offenſive campaign, ſent a ſtrong body under d'Armentieres, which was reinforced by ſome troops from the Lower Rhine, to near 15,000 men to cover that place. Duke Ferdinand had before detached General Imhoff from Caſſel, in order to reduce it. On the approach of d'Armentieres, Imhoff was obliged to raiſe the ſiege. But being ſoon after reinforced, the French commander retired in his turn towards Weſel, the poſſeſſion of which place had all along proved of infinite importance to the French in all their operations. The ſiege of Munſter was again reſumed, but the buſineſs threatened to be difficult and tedious. This, however, was the only rub which the Allies encountered. In all other reſpects they were perfectly fortunate. They had driven their enemy 200 miles before them, and at the end of the campaign, after all their efforts, and all their ſanguine hopes of conqueſt, ſat them down juſt where they had began it.

The event of the battle of Minden, and the ſubſequent misfortunes of the French arms, threw Verſailles into the utmoſt confuſion. The news of that defeat arrived juſt as the King was taking horſe to hunt. He retired ſilent and dejected into the apartment of Madame de Pompadour, and for ſome time ſaw none of his miniſters. The Duke de Broglio and M. de Contades mutually accuſed each other for the ill conduct of that day. The public acquitted Broglio. Belleiſle, and his General Contades, loſt all reputation; but the Duke ſtill preſerved his employment, and a conſiderable part of his influence at court.

As ſoon as the firſt confuſion and ſurpriſe of ſo unexpected an event was a little abated, it was reſolved to ſend reinforcements to their army in Germany, and at the ſame time to ſend thither ſome officer of experience and authority, who might judge and compoſe, if poſſible, the differences which ſubſiſted between the commanders; as well as to aſſiſt in the deliberations for retrieving their affairs.

Public misfortunes call great men from their obſcurity. M. de Etrees was choſen on this occaſion, and inveſted with an authority which he unwillingly accepted. When he arrived at the French camp, (September 25th) he could not avoid a ſigh on viewing the ruins of that army, which had triumphed under his command at Haſtenbeck. However, his behaviour to M. de Contades was polite and generous. The old Mareſchal told him, that he was not come to take his command, but to ſerve under him, and whilſt he aſſiſted him with his advice, he would receive his orders.

As ſoon as the officers could leave their poſts, Lord George Sackville, at his own requeſt, was admitted to a trial by a court-martial. The charge was diſobedience of orders, which was proved, but the court incurred the laſh of partiality, and the odium of being under the neceſſity of proving the charge, in order, as it was ſaid, to juſtify the taking away his commiſſions. Part of the trial was afterwards laid before the King, who was pleaſed to confirm the ſentence, that he (Lord G. S.) was unfit for any military employment; but this did not deprive him of ſerving his future ſovereign in another department of government, wherein his conduct was more ſucceſsful to his country, and honourable to himſelf.

Partiality and malice never appeared in more ſtriking colours, than in the courſe of this proceeding; the witneſſes for the priſoners were diſmiſſed from their employments; how the evidence for the crown fared needs no explanation, take Colonel S——r for an inſtance; and admitting Lord George to be guilty, obſerve with what indignity he treated his ſuperior officer, as if it were to ſhew his own courageous ſpirit. Thoſe who have read the whole trial, cannot but have noticed the malicious obſervations of this invidious witneſs; and however blameable Lord George might appear, whoſe conduct we do not pretend to juſtify, can the attempts made to ſupport ſuch a witneſs be called impartiality? Good manners was the leaſt favour that could be offered the priſoner; if they were by obligation forced to be partial, they were not conſtrained by obligation to be uncivil: good manners compoſe a duty we owe to all mankind, and where this duty is thrown aſide, the void is commonly filled with ſcurrility and abuſe. Even in caſes of murder, we have ſeen all noble priſoners treated with all imaginary reſpect; in that caſe life and death were only depending, but in this reputation and all were at ſtake.

The orders of his Serene Highneſs Prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, relative to the behaviour of the troops under him at the battle near Minden, on the 1ſt of Auguſt, 1759, were

His Serene Highneſs orders his greateſt thanks to be given the whole army, for their bravery and good behaviour yeſterday, particularly to the Engliſh infantry, and the two battalions of Hanoverian guards; to all the cavalry of the left wing, and to General Wangenheim's corps, particularly the regiment of Holſtein, the Heſſian cavalry, the Hanoverian regiment Du Corps, and Hamerſtein's; the ſame to all the brigades of heavy artillery. His Serene Highneſs declares publicly, that next to God, he attributes the glory of the day to the intrepidity and extraordinary good behaviour of theſe troops, which he aſſures them, he ſhall retain the ſtrongeſt ſenſe of as long as he lives; and if ever, upon any occaſion, he ſhall be able to ſerve theſe brave troops, or any of them in particular, it will give him the utmoſt pleaſure. His Serene Highneſs orders his particular thanks to be likewiſe given to General Sporcken, the Duke of Holſtein, Lieutenant-Generals Imhoff and Urff. His Serene Highneſs is extremely obliged to the Count de Buckeburg, for his extraordinary care and trouble in the management of the artillery, which was ſerved with great effect; likewiſe to the commanding officers of the ſeveral brigades of artillery, viz. Colonel Browne, Lieutenant-Colonel Hutte, Major Haſſe, and the three Engliſh captains, Philips, Drummond, and Foy. His Serene Highneſs thinks himſelf infinitely obliged to Major-Generals Waldegrave and Kingſley, for the great courage and good order in which they conducted their brigades. His Serene Highneſs further orders it to be declared to Lieutenant-General the Marquis of Granby, that he is purſuaded, that if he had had the good fortune to have had him at the head of the cavalry of the right wing, his preſence would greatly have contributed to make the deciſion of that day more complete and more brilliant. In ſhort, his Serene Highneſs orders, that thoſe of his ſuite whoſe behaviour he moſt admired, be named, as the Duke of Richmond, Colonel Fitzroy, Captain Ligonier, Colonel Watſon, Captain Wilſon, aid-de-camp to Major-Generals Waldegrave; Adjutant-Generals Erſtoff, Bulow, Durendolle, the Counts Tobe and Malerti; his Serene Highneſs having much reaſon to be ſatisfied with their conduct. And his Serene Highneſs deſires and orders the generals of the army, that upon all occaſions, when orders are brought to them by his aid-de-camps, that they be obeyed punctually and without delay.

And his Serene Highneſs on diſcovering a miſtake in the preceding order of thanks to the officers of the Britiſh artillery, by which Captain Macbean was omitted to be mentioned, his Serene Highneſs was pleaſed to write a letter with his own hand to Captain Macbean, which was delivered by his Excellency Count La Lippe Buckeburg, grand maſter of the artillery in the Allied army, and of which the following is a tranſlation:

SIR,

It is from a ſenſe of your merit, and a regard for juſtice, that I do in this manner declare, I have reaſon to be infinitely ſatisfied with your behaviour, activity, and zeal, which in ſo conſpicuous a manner you made appear at the battle of Thornhauſen on the 1ſt of Auguſt. The talents which you poſſeſs in your profeſſion did not a little contribute to render our fire ſuperior to that of the enemy; and it is to you and your brigade, that I am indebted for having ſilenced the fire of a battery of the enemy, which extremely galled the troops, and particularly the Britiſh infantry.

Accept then, Sir, from me, the juſt tribute of my moſt perfect acknowledgments, accompanied with my ſincere thanks. I ſhall be happy in every opportunity of obliging you, deſiring only occaſions of proving it, being with the moſt diſtinguiſhed eſteem,

Your devoted, and entirely affectionate ſervant,
FERDINAND,
Duke of Brunſwick and Lunenburg.

To Captain Macbean, of the Royal Britiſh Artillery.

Again his Serene Highneſs, on the 3d, iſſued the following order:

In the compliment his Serene Highneſs made to the troops yeſterday, he forgot four regiments that particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves, viz. Hardenburgh's 3rd battalion of Heſſian guards, Prince William's, and Gillſe's. It is not that his Serene Highneſs has reaſon to complain of any others, but as they had particular opportunies of diſtinguiſhing themſelves, it is for that reaſon his Serene Highneſs mentions the attention he himſelf gives to their good conduct.

Head-quarters at Bielefeld.
Auguſt 7, 1759.

His

His Serene Highneſs Duke Ferdinand, ſent orders to Monſieur Hedeman, his treaſurer, to pay the following officers of the Britiſh artillery, the undermentioned gratuities, as a teſtimony of his great ſatisfaction of their gallant behaviour in the action of the 1ſt of this month.

To Captain Philips — —	1000 crowns.
To Captain Macbean —	500
To Captain Drummond —	500
To Captain Williams —	500
To Captain Foy — —	500

I hope the ſaid gentlemen will accept of this preſent from his Highneſs, as a mark of his particular eſteem for them.

Among the papers which were taken at Detmold, on the 5th of Auguſt, by his Majeſty's light troops, an original letter was found, from the Mareſchal Duc de Belleiſle to Mareſchal Contades, dated Verſailles, July 23, 1759, in which there is the following paſſage:

I am ſtill afraid that Fiſcher ſets out too late. It is, however, very important, and very eſſential, that we ſhould raiſe large contributions. I ſee no other reſource for our moſt urgent expences, and for refitting the troops, but in the money we may draw from the enemy's country; from whence we muſt likewiſe procure ſubſiſtence of all kinds, (independently of the money), that is to ſay, hay, ſtraw, oats, for the winter; bread, corn, cattle, horſes, even men, to recruit our foreign troops. The war muſt not be prolonged; and perhaps it may be neceſſary, according to the events which may happen, between this time and the end of September, to make a downright deſert before the line of the quarters, which it may be proper to keep during the winter, in order that the enemy may be under a real impoſſibility of approaching us: at the ſame time reſerving for ourſelves a bare ſubſiſtence on the route which may be the moſt convenient for us to take, in the middle of the winter, to beat up, or ſeize upon the enemy's quarters. That this object may be fulfilled, I cauſe the greateſt aſſiduity to be uſed, in preparing what is neceſſary for having all your troops, without exception, well clothed, well armed, well equiped, and well refitted, in every reſpect, before the end of November, with new tents, in order that, if it ſhould be adviſable for the King's political and military affairs, you may be well able to aſſemble the whole, or part of your army, to act offenſively, and with vigour, from the beginning of January; and that you may have the ſatisfaction to ſhew your enemies, and all Europe, that the French know how to act, and carry on war in all ſeaſons, when they have ſuch a general as you are, and a miniſter of the department of war, that can foreſee, and concert matters with the general.

You muſt be ſenſible, Sir, that what I ſay to you may become not only uſeful and honourable, but perhaps even neceſſary, with reſpect to what you know, and of which I ſhall ſay more in my private letter.

M. Duc de Belleisle.

MINORCA taken in 1708. An iſland in the Mediterranean Sea, formerly ſubject to Spain, but now to the Engliſh. Sir John Leake, with the aſſiſtance of Lieutenant-General Stanhope, was ſucceſsful in the reduction of the iſland of Minorca. He arrived before Port Mahon the 25th of Auguſt, from whence he ſent two third-rates to Majorca, to haſten the embarkation of the troops which were to be furniſhed from that iſland. They returned the 1ſt of September, with a ſmall number of ſettees, laden with materials of war for the army; and on the 3d, the Milford, and three Dutch men of war, with the Lieutenant-General, arrived, being followed by five third-rates, and fifteen tranſports, with the land forces. That and the following day, the troops were all landed; upon which the inhabitants declared for King Charles. But the enemy had yet three ſtrong holds in their hands.

It being ſoon after reſolved in a council of war, that Sir John Leake, with part of the fleet, after they had landed what was neceſſary for the ſiege, ſhould return to England, he ſet ſail the 6th, leaving Sir Edward Whitaker with his ſquadron before Port Mahon. Being informed off Gibraltar, that ſome French men of war from Cadiz had taken ſome of our merchantmen near Cape Spartel, and carried them into that port, he left a ſquadron to cruize in that ſtation, and purſuing his voyage, arrived at St. Helen's the 19th of October.

Sir John Leake being departed, Sir Edward Whitaker made preparation for attacking the caſtles of Port Mahon; but while the artillery, and all things neceſſary, were putting on ſhore, he ordered Captain Butler, in the Dunkirk, and Captain Fairborne, in the Centurion, to go and batter fort Fornelle, that the tranſports might ſafely ride into the harbour of that name. They anchored before it the 9th, and after ſome reſiſtance, obliged the garriſon, of about fifty men, to ſurrender priſoners of war. The 11th, at the ſight of a detachment of our troops, and two of our men of war, the garriſon of Ciudadella, conſiſting of 100 Frenchmen, and 100 Spaniards, ſurrendered likewiſe. The 17th, they began to play from their batteries on the two middlemoſt towers, and the line they ſupported; and having beat down the former, and made ſome breaches in the latter, they attacked and took the lines by ſtorm, notwithſtanding the enemy's fire from the three forts, with the loſs only of Captain Stanhope of the Milford galley, the General's brother, and about forty men killed and wounded. The enemy beat a parley the next morning, and the capitulation being agreed to, the General took poſſeſſion of this important place on the 19th.

In the caſtles and forts they found about 100 pieces of cannon, 3000 barrels of powder, and all things neceſſary for a good defence. The garriſon, conſiſting of about 1000 men, half French half Spaniards, were to be tranſported to their reſpective countries: but the former were detained by way of repriſal, for the garriſon of Xativa, treated by the French in the ſame manner. Thus we became poſſeſſed of Port Mahon, the advantage of which to our fleets, when in the Mediterranean, we have ſufficiently experienced. See more under Mahon.

MINORCA was taken by the French in June 1756, and reſtored to the Engliſh by the peace of 1763. See MAHON.

MINORCA was beſieged by the Spaniards in Feb. 1782, when it ſurrendered as follows:

Copy of a Letter from the Honourable General Murray, Governor of Minorca, to the Earl of Hillſborough, one of his Majeſty's Principal Secretaries of State.

Minorca, February 16, 1782.

MY LORD,

I have the honour to acquaint your Lordſhip, that Fort St. Philip's was ſurrendered to his Catholic Majeſty the 5th inſt. The capitulation accompanies this. I flatter myſelf all Europe will agree the brave garriſon ſhewed uncommon heroiſm, and that thirſt for glory which has ever diſtinguiſhed the troops of my royal maſter. Our neceſſary guards required 415 men the night before the capitulation; the whole number able to carry arms amounted to 660 only, of courſe there were none for piquet, and a defect of 170 to relieve the guards, as is evident by the returns. The moſt inveterate ſcurvy, which I believe ever has infected mortals, reduced us to this ſituation. The reports of the faculty fully explain the dreadful havock it made, and that three days further obſtinacy on my part muſt have inevitably deſtroyed the brave remains of this garriſon, as they declare there was no remedy for the men in the hoſpitals, but vegetables; and that of the 660 able to do duty, 560 were actually tainted with the ſcurvy, and, in all likelihood, would be in the hoſpitals in four days time. Such was the uncommon ſpirit of the King's ſoldiers, that they concealed their diſorders and inability, rather than go into the hoſpitals; ſeveral men died on guard, after having ſtood centry; their fate was not diſcovered till called upon for the relief, when it came to their turn to mount again. Perhaps a more noble, nor a more tragical ſcene was never exhibited than that of the march of the garriſon of St. Philip's through the Spaniſh and French armies. It conſiſted of no more than 600 old decrepid ſoldiers, 200 ſeamen, 120 of the royal artillery, twenty Corſicans, and twenty-five Greeks, Turks, Moors, Jews, &c. The two armies were drawn up in two lines, the battalions fronting each other, forming a hay for us to march through: they conſiſted of 14,000 men, and reached from the glacis to George-Town, where our battalions laid down their arms, declaring they ſurrendered them to God alone, having the conſolation to know, the victors could not plume themſelves in taking an hoſpital. Such was the diſtreſſing figures of our men, that many of the Spaniſh and French troops are ſaid to have ſhed tears as they paſſed them; the Duke de Crillon and the Baron de Falkenhayn declare it is true: I cannot aver this, but think it was very natural: for my own part, I felt no uneaſineſs on this occaſion but that which proceeded from the miſerable diſorder which threatened us with deſtruction. Thanks to the Almighty, my apprehenſions are now abated; the humanity of the Duke de Crillon (whoſe heart was moſt ſenſibly touched by the misfortunes of ſuch brave men) has gone even beyond my wiſhes in providing every thing which can contribute to our recovery. The Spaniſh as well as the French ſurgeons attend our hoſpitals. We are greatly indebted to the Baron de Falkenhayn, who commands the French troops. We owe infinite obligations to the Count de Crillon; they can never be forgot by any of us. I hope this young man never will command an army againſt my ſovereign, for his military talents are as conſpicuous as the goodneſs of his heart.

Liſts of the killed and wounded, with the number of our guns which were deſtroyed by the enemy's battering artillery, which conſiſted of 109 pieces of cannon, and thirty-ſix mortars, are incloſed. I ſhall wait here until I ſee the laſt man of my noble garriſon ſafely and commodiouſly embarked. If my accompanying them in a tranſport to England, could be of the ſmalleſt ſervice to any of them, I would cheerfully go with them by ſea; but as I can be of no further uſe to them after they are on board ſhip, I truſt his Majeſty will approve of my going to Leghorn to bring home with me my wife and my children, who fled to Italy the evening of the day the Spaniſh army landed on the iſland.

My aid-de-camp, Captain Don, will have the honour to preſent this letter to your Lordſhip; he is well acquainted with the moſt minute circumſtance relative to the ſiege, is an intelligent diſtinguiſhed officer, and is furniſhed with copies of all the papers I have, which he will lay before your Lordſhip, if requiſite.

The Captains Savage, Boothby, and Don, of the 51ſt regiment, Lieutenant Mercier, of ditto, Lieutenant Botticher, of Goldacker's regiment, and Lieutenant Douglas, the engineer, are exchanged for the officers we made priſoners at Cape Mola.

Colonel Pringle and his nephew Lieutenant Pringle are to be left hoſtages until the tranſports return agreeable to the capitulation.

I have the honour to be, with great truth and regard, my Lord, your Lordſhip's moſt obedient and moſt humble ſervant,

JAMES MURRAY.

Articles of capitulation propoſed by his Excellency the Honourable James Murray, lieutenant-general of his Britannic Majeſty's forces, colonel of the 31ſt regiment of foot, captain-general and commander in chief of Fort St. Philip's, to his Excellency Louis Berton des Balls, Duc de Crillon, lieutenant-general of the French and Spaniſh forces, and commander in chief of the combined army.

Art. I. That all acts of hoſtility ſhall ceaſe till the articles of capitulation are agreed upon and ſigned.

II. That the garriſon, upon their ſurrender, ſhall be allowed all the honours of war, viz. to march out with ſhouldered arms, drums beating, colours flying, twenty-four rounds per man, matches lighted, four pieces of cannon, two mortars with twenty-four rounds of ammunition for each piece. Four covered boats not to be ſearched upon any account.

III. That the whole garriſon, comprehending all his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, civil as well as military, and the Corſican corps and Greeks, &c. ſhall have have all their baggage and effects ſecured to them, with leave to move or diſpoſe of it as they ſhall think proper; and that his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects ſerving in the garriſon, who poſſeſſed houſes and grounds in Mahon and George-Town, ſhall have leave to diſpoſe of them to any of his Catholic Majeſty's ſubjects.

IV. That the garriſon, including officers, artificers, ſoldiers, and other Britiſh ſubjects, and their families, ſhall be provided with convenient tranſports at the rate of one ton and a half per man, and to be carried to the firſt port in Great Britain, and landed there as ſoon as they arrive, at the expence of the crown of Spain; and that proviſions ſhall be allowed to them, out of ſuch as remain in the magazines of the garriſon at its ſurrender, for the time they remain in the iſland, and for their voyage by ſea for ten weeks, in the ſame proportion as they now receive it; and the officers with their families, who have the Governor's permiſſion, ſhall have paſſports granted to them to go to England or Germany by land; that the Corſicans, Greeks, &c. now ſerving in the garriſon, who do not exceed ſeventy men, ſhall be tranſported to Leghorn, and landed there likewiſe at the expence of the crown of Spain, but their proviſions for the paſſage to be taken from the magazines of the garriſon. That the tranſports are to be provided, for the accommodation of the troops during the voyage, with the bedding of the garriſon. That a proper hoſpital for the ſick and wounded, during the time that the tranſports are getting ready (which time ſhall not exceed one month from the ſigning of this) ſhall be provided; and ſuch as may not then be in a condition to embark, ſhall be allowed to ſtay behind, and be properly taken care of, till they ſhall be able to be ſent to Great Britain by another conveyance.

V. That while the garriſon continues in the iſland, permiſſion ſhall be granted to purchaſe vegetables and freſh meat in the markets, for the ſick in the hoſpitals.

VI. Until the garriſon quits the place, it ſhall not be permitted to corrupt the ſoldiers, and try to make them deſert from their regiments, and the officers ſhall have acceſs to them at all times; for which purpoſe no communication betwixt the ſoldiers of his Catholic Majeſty and the troops of the garriſon ſhall be admitted of.

VII. That exact diſcipline ſhall be kept up on both ſides.

VIII. That the four inhabitants of the iſland, viz. Paul Guiard, Marc Reure, Michael Amengual, and Lewis Roca, who have joined in the defence of the garriſon, ſhall be permitted to remain and enjoy their properties in the iſland unmoleſted.

IX. That all priſoners of war, made ſince the landing of the Spaniſh army, ſhall be delivered up on both ſides.

X. Hoſtages being delivered on both ſides for the faithful execution of the preceding conditions, his Excellency the Honourable Lieutenant-General Murray conſents to deliver up the place, with all the military ſtores and ammunition, cannon and mortars, except what is reſerved in the ſecond article, to his Catholic Majeſty; likewiſe to direct that all mines and underground works ſhall be ſhewn to his Catholic Majeſty's engineers: plans of the galleries, mines, and other ſubterraneous works, ſhall be likewiſe delivered up.

(Signed) JAMES MURRAY.

Duc de Crillon's Anſwer to General Murray's firſt Propoſal to Capitulate.

The order which I have from my court forbidding me to liſten to any capitulation, except under the expreſs condition, that the garriſon of Fort St. Philip's ſhall be priſoners of war, I am under the obligation to return his Excellency General Murray the articles which he propoſes to me; but I am very ſorry I have not an opportunity to make known to him my deſire for the preſervation of his men, and particularly the eſteem with which his perſon and his brave garriſon have inſpired me.

B. B. DUKE DE CRILLON.

Mahon, February 4, eleven o'clock in the morning.

MINORCA was taken by the Engliſh in 1798.—Captain Gifford, Firſt Aid-de-Camp to General the Honourable Charles Stuart, arrived this afternoon at the Office of the Right Honourable Henry Dundas, one of his Majeſty's Principal Secretaries of State, with a Diſpatch from the General, of which the following is a Copy.

Ciudadella, November 18, 1798.

I have the honour to acquaint you, that his Majeſty's forces are in poſſeſſion of the iſland of Minorca, without having ſuſtained the loſs of a ſingle man.

As neither Commodore Duckworth or myſelf could procure any uſeful information relative to the object of the expedition at Gibraltar, it was judged adviſable to diſpatch the Peterell ſloop of war to cruize off the harbour of Mahon for intelligence; where, after remaining a few days, ſhe joined the fleet near the Colombrites, without having made any eſſential diſcovery. So circumſtanced, it was agreed to attempt a deſcent in the Bay of Addaya, and the wind proving favourable on the 7th inſt. a feint was made by the line of battle ſhips at Fornelles, and boats were aſſembled for that purpoſe under the direction of Captain Bowen, Captain Polden, and Captain Preſland. Previous to the landing of the troops, a ſmall battery at the entrance of the bay was evacuated, the magazine blown up, the guns ſpiked, and ſhortly after the firſt diviſion, conſiſting of 800 men, was on ſhore. A conſiderable exploſion to the weſtward indicated that the Spaniards had alſo abandoned the works at Fornelles. Nearly at the ſame moment 2000 of the enemy's troops approached in ſeveral different directions, and threatened to ſurround this inconſiderable force, but were repulſed with ſome loſs on the left, while the guns of the Argo checked a ſimilar attempt on the right flank, and the poſt was maintained until the debarkation of the different diviſions afforded the means of eſtabliſhing a poſition, from whence the enemy's troops would have been attacked with conſiderable advantage, had they not retired in the beginning of the night.

The ſtrength of the ground, the paſſes, and the badneſs of the roads in Minorca are ſcarcely to be equalled in the moſt mountainous parts of Europe; and what increaſed the difficulty of advancing upon this occaſion was the dearth of intelligence; for although near 100 deſerters had come in from the Swiſs regiments, and affirmed, that the remaining force upon the iſland exceeded 4000 men, no particular account of the enemy's movements was obtained. Under this uncertainty it was for a few minutes doubtful what meaſure to purſue, but as quickly determined to proceed by a forced march to Mercadal, and thereby ſeparate the enemy's force by poſſeſſing the eſſential paſs, in the firſt inſtance, and from thence advancing upon his principal communications to either extremity of the iſland, juſtly depending upon Commodore Duckworth's zeal and exertions to forward from Addaya and Fornelles ſuch ſupplies of proviſions and ordnance ſtores as might favour ſubſequent operations.

To effect this object, Colonel Graham was ſent with 600 men, and by great exertion arrived at Mercadal a very few hours after the main force of the enemy had marched towards Ciudadella, making ſeveral officers and ſoldiers priſoners, ſeizing ſeveral ſmall magazines, and eſtabliſhing his corps in front of the village.

The perſevering labour of 250 ſeamen, under the direction of Lieutenant Buchannan, during the night, having greatly aſſiſted the artillery in forwarding the battalion guns, the army arrived at Marcadel on the 9th, where learning that Mahon was nearly evacuated, a diſpoſition was inſtantly made to co-operate with the whole force in that direction, and Colonel Paget detached under this movement with 300 men to take poſſeſſion of the town; upon his arrival, he ſummoned Fort Charles to ſurrender, and made the lieutenant-governor of the iſland, a colonel of artillery, and 160 men priſoners of war, removed the boom obſtructing the entrance of the harbour, and gave free paſſage to the Cormorant and Aurora frigates, which were previouſly ſent by Commodore Duckworth to make a diverſion off that port. But theſe were not the only advantages immediately reſulting from this movement; it favoured deſertion, intercepted all ſtragglers, and enabled the different departments of the army to procure beaſts of burthen for the further progreſs of his Majeſty's arms.

Having aſcertained that the enemy's troops were throwing up works and intrenching themſelves in front of Ciudadella, it was reſolved to force their poſition on the night of the 13th inſtant, and, preparatory to this attempt, Colonel Paget, with 200 men, was withdrawn from Mahon; Colonel Moncrief, ſent forward with a detachment to Ferarias; three light twelve-pounders, and five and a half-inch howitzers, and ninety marines landed from the fleet; when, in conſequence of its having been communicated to Commodore Duckworth, that four ſhips ſuppoſed of the line, were ſeen between Majorca and Minorca, ſteering towards the laſt-mentioned iſland, he decided to purſue them, requeſted that the ſeamen and marines might reembark, and ſignified his determination of proceeding with all the tranſports to ſea: but weighing the ſerious conſequences which would reſult to the army from the ſmalleſt delay on the one hand, and the advantages to be reaſonably expected from a ſpirited attack on the other, it was thought adviſeable to retain them with the army; and on the 12th inſtant, the whole force marched to Alpiuz, and from thence proceeded on the 13th to Jupet; Colonel Moncrief's detachment moving on a parallel line on the Ferarias road to Mala Garaba. Theſe precautions, and the appearance of the two columns approaching the town, induced the enemy to retire from their half-conſtructed defences within the walls of Ciudadella; and in the evening of the ſame day, a ſmall detachment under Captain Muter, was ſent to take poſſeſſion of the Torté den Quart, whereby the army was enabled to advance on the 14th, apparently in three columns upon Kane's, the Ferarias, and Fornelles Roads, to the inveſtment of the town at day-break, occupying ground covered by the poſition the enemy had relinquiſhed: thus ſtationed, in want of heavy artillery, and every article neceſſary for a ſiege, it was judged expedient to ſummon the governor of Minorca to ſurrender; and the preliminary articles were immediately conſidered; but doubts ariſing on the part of the enemy whether the inveſting force was ſuperior in number to the garriſon, two batteries of three twelve-pounders and three five and a half-inch howitzers were erected in the courſe of the following night within 300 yards of the place, and, at day-break, the main body of the troops formed in order of battle conſiderably to the right of Kane's Road, leaving the piquets to communicate between them and Colonel Moncrief's poſt. This line, partly real and partly imaginary, extended four miles in front of the enemy's batteries, from whence two eighteen-pound ſhot were immediately fired at the troops; but a timely parley and the diſtant appearance of the ſquadron, occaſioned the ceſſation of hoſtilities, and renewed a negociation, which, through the addreſs of Major-General Sir James Erſkine, terminated in the annexed capitulation.

Four weeks ſalt proviſions for the garriſon beſides the encloſed liſt of ordnance ſtores, were found in the town of Ciudadella.

The aſſiſtance received from Commodore Duckworth, in forwarding the light artillery and proviſions, greatly facilitated the rapid movements of the army; and I am happy at the opportunity of declaring my obligation to Lord Mark Kerr and Captain Caulfield, for the ſupplies they ſent from Mahon, and their exertions to land two mortars, which, in the event of further reſiſtance, might have proved of the utmoſt importance in ſecuring the army, or compelling the enemy to ſurrender.

The ſupport I have experienced from Major-General Sir James St. Clair Erſkine, Brigadiers-General Stuart and Oakes, the exertion of Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart, my adjutant-general, the zeal, ſpirit, and perſeverance of both the officers and men of the different regiments under my command, have eminently con-contributed to the ſucceſs of the expedition, and authoriſe me to repreſent their ſervices as highly deſerving his Majeſty's moſt gracious approbation.

Captain Gifford, my firſt aid de camp, who is perfectly acquainted with every circumſtance concerning the capitulation of Ciudadella, and the reduction of the iſland of Minorca, will have the honour to deliver this diſpatch.

I have the honour to be, &c. &c.

(Signed) CHA. STUART.

The Right Hon. Henry Dundas.

Terms of capitulation demanded for the ſurrender of the fortreſs of Ciudadella to the arms of his Britannic Majeſty.

I. The garriſon ſhall not be conſidered priſoners of war, but ſhall march out free, with their arms, drums beating, colours flying, with twelve rounds of cartridge per man.

Anſwer.—The town and fortreſs of Ciudadella, and the fort of St. Nicholas, together with all the artillery, ammunition, ſtores, proviſions, or effects, the property of his Moſt Catholic Majeſty, ſhall be ſurrendered to his Britannic Majeſty's arms, and the gate of Mahon, and the fort of St. Nicholas, ſhall be delivered up to the Britiſh army to-morrow at noon.

II. They ſhall be preceded by four braſs four-pounders and two two-inch howitzers, with lighted matches, and twelve rounds for each.

Anſwer.—The garriſon ſhall march out as propoſed in the firſt and ſecond articles, but the guns muſt be left with the artillery.

III. The ſaid garriſon ſhall be ſent with all due convenience to Spain, at the expence of his Britannic Majeſty, to one of the neareſt ports of the Peninſula, excepting the firſt battalion of the Swiſs regiment of Yan, and the detachment of dragoons of Numancia, with their horſes and furniture, who ſhall be ſent to Majorca, as belonging to corps which garriſon that iſland.

Anſwer.—The garriſon ſhall be conveyed to the neareſt port of his Moſt Catholic Majeſty.

IV. The officers in this iſland and fortreſs ſhall keep their arms, horſes, and equipage, with the funds of their regiments, and be permitted to go to Mahon, for the purpoſe of bringing away their families and removing or diſpoſing of their property there.

Anſwer.—Admitted, they paying their juſt debts, and the officers having occaſion to go to Mahon, to bring away their families or diſpoſe of their property, will have paſſports on applying to the Britiſh Commander in Chief.

V. The officers of the war department, the revenue, and marine, together with the perſons employed in every branch thereof, ſhall be permitted to follow the garriſon, and are to be included in the articles, 3, 4, and 5.

Anſwer.—Admitted.

VI. Whatever officers and troops have been made priſoners in Mahon, or other parts of the iſland, ſince the 7th inſtant, are comprehended in the above five articles.

Anſwer.—People who have already ſurrendered cannot be included in the above capitulation.

VII. The deſerters from this army who have given themſelves up to the protection of his Britannic Majeſty ſince the ſaid 7th inſtant, ſhall be reſtored to our army.

Anſwer.—Refuſed.

VIII. Beaſts of burthen, both great and ſmall, ſhall be granted at the ordinary prices, for thoſe who may be deſirous of going to Mahon.

Anſwer.—Admitted.

IX. During the time the garriſon may remain in this iſland, their neceſſary wants ſhall be ſupplied at the expence of Spain.

Anſwer.—There will be no obſtacle to the garriſon's being ſupplied with proviſions by its own officers while it remains, which will be as ſhort a time as poſſible, and be regulated by the commander in chief.

X. The ſick and wounded ſhall remain in the hoſpitals, and their treatment be at the expence of their regiments.

Anſwer.—Admitted.

XI. The inhabitants of this iſland ſhall be allowed to continue in the free exerciſe of their religion, enjoying peaceably the revenues, property and priviliges which they poſſeſs and enjoy at preſent.

XII. The epiſcopal ſee of the iſland ſhall remain eſtabliſhed in it, according to the bull for its new creation, enjoying the honours, authority, and rents belonging to the biſhopric, and ſubſiſting with the eccleſiaſtical chapter and as ſuffragan of the archbiſhop of Valencia.

XIII. The univerſities (or corporations) of the iſland ſhall be maintained in the enjoyment of the particular privileges and franchiſes which have been granted to them by the ancient Kings of Spain, as they now poſſeſs them, and as they have been allowed to them in the treaties which have taken place as often as this iſland has paſſed from one dominion to another.

Anſwer.—11, 12, and 13, are articles which do not properly belong to this capitulation, but of courſe due care will be taken to ſecure the peaceable inhabitants in the enjoyment of their religion and property.

XIV. The merchant ſhip named Experiencia, which is in the port of Mahon, coming from Smyrna, and belonging to the conſulate of Cadiz, and its cargo, ſhall remain free, and a paſſport be granted for its ſafe conduct to Spain.

Anſwer.—Refuſed.

XV. Commiſſioners will be appointed on both ſides to ſettle the detail of the execution of this treaty; and to deliver and receive all ſtores, &c. the property of his Moſt Catholic Majeſty.

A Diſpatch from Admiral the Earl of St. Vincent, of which the following is a Copy.

Le Souverain, Gibraltar, Dec. 6, 1798.

I incloſe the copy of a letter from Commodore Duckworth, with other documents relating to the conqueſt of the iſland of Minorca; upon which important event I requeſt you will congratulate the Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty.

Lieutenant Jones, firſt of the Leviathan, is the bearer of this diſpatch, who, from the report of Commodore Duckworth, and my own obſervation while my flag was on board that ſhip, is highly deſerving their Lordſhips favour and protection.

ST. VINCENT.

Leviathan, off Fournelles, Minorca, Nov. 19.

In purſuance of your Lordſhips inſtructions to me of the 18th and 20th of October, I proceeded with the ſhips under my orders, and the troops under the command of the Honourable General Charles Stuart, to the rendezvous off the Colombrettes; and after having been joined by his Majeſty's ſloop Peterell, and the arrangements for landing had been completed, on the 5th in the afternoon I ſtood for Minorca, but in conſequence of light winds, I did not make that iſland till daybreak on the 7th, then within five miles of the Port of Fournelles, where finding the wind directly out of that harbour, and the enemy prepared for our reception, I (having previouſly conſulted the General) made the ſignal for Captain Bowen, of the Argo, accompanied by the Cormorant and Aurora, to aſſiſt in covering the landing, to lead into the Creek of Addaya, there not being water or ſpace enough for the line of battle ſhips, which he executed in the moſt officer-like and judicious manner; and in hauling round the northern point, a battery of four 12-pounders, fired one gun, but on ſeeing the broadſide, the enemy left it, blowing up their magazines, and ſpiking the guns, when the tranſports were got in without damage, though there was ſcarcely room for ſtowing them in tiers.

During this ſervice, which was rapidly executed, the Leviathan and Centaur plied on and off Fournelles, to divert the attention of the enemy; but knowing an expeditious landing to be our greateſt object, as ſoon as I obſerved the tranſports were nearly in the creek, I bore away, and anchored with the Leviathan and Centaur off its entrance, to ſee that ſervice performed. One battalion was put on ſhore by eleven o'clock, and directly took the height, which proved fortunate, as the enemy very quickly appeared in two diviſions, one of which was marching down towards the battery beforementioned, when I ordered the covering ſhips to commence a cannonade, which effectually checked their progreſs, and the General kept them at bay with the troops he had; and by ſix o'clock in the afternoon the whole were on ſhore, with eight ſix-pounders, field-pieces, and eight days proviſions, as alſo two howitzers.

On the ſame evening, after ordering the Cormorant and Aurora to proceed off Port Mahon, with ſeven tranſports, to form a diverſion, I got under weigh with the Leviathan and Centaur, and turned up to Fournelles with an intent to force the harbour; but on my entering the paſſage, I found the enemy had evacuated the forts, and the wind throwing out cauſed me to anchor, when I made the Centaur's ſignal, (which was following me) to haul off, landed the marines of the Leviathan, took poſſeſſion of two forts of four guns each, and one of ſix: but ſoon after the General requeſting I would not enter this port, I ordered Captain Digby to embark the marines, and to put to ſea, and cruize under the command of Captain Markham, who was employed in covering the port of Fournelles and Addaya, and preventing ſuccour being thrown in, whilſt my pendant was hoiſted on board the Argo, where I continued two days, aiding and directing the neceſſary ſupplies for the army. In this I was ably aſſiſted by Captain Bowen. During theſe two days, I viſited the head-quarters to conſult with the General, when it was decided, as the anchorage at Addaya was extremely hazardous, and the tranſports in hourly riſque of being loſt, to remove them to Fournelle, which was executed under cover of the Leviathan and Centaur.

On the 11th, I ordered the Centaur off Ciudadella to prevent reinforcements being thrown in, and anchored the Leviathan at Fournelles, landed ſome twelve-pounder field pieces and howitzers, the ſailors drawing them up to the army, ſhifted my pendant to the Leviathan, and left the Argo at Addaya, ordering Captain Bowen to continue there till all the depots were re-embarked and removed, which was effected that day. Late that evening I received information from the General that four ſhips, ſuppoſed to be of the line, were ſeen between Minorca and Majorca. In the middle of the night the General ſent me another corroborating report from the look-out man, of the four ſhips ſeen being of the line. I inſtantly put to ſea (though one fifth of the crews were on ſhore) with two ſhips of the line, a forty-four, and three armed tranſports, and ſtood towards Ciudadella, when at day-light the next morning, that that place bearing S. E. by S. eight or nine miles, five ſhips were ſeen from the maſt-head, ſtanding directly down for Ciudadella. I inſtantly made the ſignal for a general chaſe, when I ſoon obſerved the enemy haul their wind for Majorca; but I continued the purſuit to prevent the poſſibility of their throwing in ſuccour to Minorca; and at noon I diſcovered the enemy from the fore-yard to be four large frigates and a ſloop of war; this latter keeping her wind, I made the Argo's ſignal to haul after her, and Captain Bowen, by his letter of the 15th, informs me he took her at half paſt three that afternoon, and proved to be his Majeſty's ſloop, Peterell, which had been captured the preceding forenoon by the ſquadron of frigates I was in chaſe of. For further particulars on that head I ſhall refer you to Captain Bowen's letter, where I am convinced you will obſerve with great concern the very harſh treatment the officers and crew of the Peterell met with when captured; and he has ſince added, that one man, who reſiſted the Spaniards plundering him of forty guineas, was murdered and thrown overboard. I continued the chaſe till eleven o'clock that night, when I was within three miles of the ſternmoſt frigate; but finding the wind become light, I feared it would draw me too far from the iſland of Minorca; I therefore hailed the Centaur, and directed Captain Markham to purſue the enemy, ſteered directly for Ciudadella, which I made the ſubſequent afternoon (the 14th), with the Calcutta and Ulyſſes.

The next morning (the 15th) at day-break, the Argo joined us off Ciudadella. Having had no communication from the General, I ſent the firſt Lieutenant, Mr. Jones, though a very hazardous night, in the ſhip's cutter, with a letter to the General, propoſing to cannonade Ciudadella if it would facilitate his operations. In the morning of the 16th, Lieutenant Jones returned with duplicates of two letters I had previouſly received by Captain Gyfford, the General's aid-de-camp, acquainting me that he had ſummoned the town on the 14th, and that terms of capitulation were agreed upon on the 15th to ſurrender to his Majeſty's arms. When I went on ſhore I ſigned the capitulation the General had made, on which fortunate event I moſt truly congratulate your Lordſhip. The Centaur joined, not having been ſo fortunate as to capture either of the Spaniſh frigates, though within four miles of the ſternmoſt, Captain Markham being apprehenſive the continuance of the chaſe would carry him to a great diſtance from more eſſential ſervice.

From the 13th in the morning, when Fort Charles was put into our poſſeſſion, and Lord Mark Kerr in the Cormorant, with the Aurora, Captain Caulfield, entered the port, thoſe ſhips have been employed for the defence of the harbour, guarding the priſoners; and I have the pleaſure to aſſure your Lordſhip, in the performance of the various ſervices incident to the movements I have ſtated, I cannot paſs too high encomiums on the captains, officers, and ſeamen, under my command. From Captains Poulden and Preſsland, Agents of Tranſports, I received every poſſible aſſiſtance in their departments; and when it was neceſſary I ſhould proceed to ſea to bring to action a reputed ſuperior force, they ſhewed great ſpirit, and uſed every exertion to accompany me in their armed tranſports, as did Lieutenant Simmonds, the other agent, in his. I muſt now beg leave to mention my firſt Lieutenant Mr. George Jones, who, in the various and hazardous ſervices he had to undergo during the attack of the iſland, has proved highly deſerving my praiſe; I have therefore put him to act as Commander of the Peterell, which ſhip I have preſumed to re-commiſſion to convey the preſent diſpatches.

There is alſo high merit due to my ſecond Lieutenant, Mr. William Buchannan, whom I landed as ſecond in command under Captain Bowen, with more than 250 ſeamen; there were likewiſe the Leviathan's and Centaur's marines with the army, to the number of 100; but other eſſential ſervice calling Captain Bowen on board his ſhip, the command of the ſeamen devolved on Lieutenant Buchannan, and, as will appear by the ſtrongeſt accompanying teſtimony given him from the Commander in Chief of the army, he performed the ſervices with the army with the greateſt ability and exertion. I ſhould feel myſelf remiſs was I to cloſe this without noticing to your Lordſhip the particular exertions, activity, and correctneſs of Lieutenant Whiſton, of the Conſtitution cutter, in the various ſervices and meſſages he had to execute.

The General having ſignified his wiſh that his diſpatches ſhould be ſent without delay, I have not yet been able to viſit the Port of Mahon, to obtain a return of the ſtate of the dock-yard or veſſels captured in that place; but I underſtand, from Captain Lord Robert Mark Kerr, that there are no ſhips of war, and only one merchant ſhip of value; the particulars of which I will tranſmit by the earlieſt opportunity. I have the honour to be, my Lord, with the higheſt reſpect, &c.

J. T. DUCKWORTH.

Admiral the Earl of St. Vincent, K. B.

Argo, at Sea, Nov. 15, 1798.

I have the honour to acquaint you, that at half paſt three P. M. on the 13th inſtant, I had the good fortune to come up with the ſhip that I hauled the wind after round Cape Rouge, conformable to your ſignal; ſhe proved to be his Majeſty's ſhip Peterell, in poſſeſſion of Don Antonio Franco Gandrada, ſecond Captain of the Spaniſh frigate Flora, who, in company with the Caſilda, of 40 guns, Pomono, of 40, and Proſerpine, of 40, captured her the day before.

Theſe frigates had come from Carthagena, had touched at Barcelona, ſailed from thence on Saturday laſt, bound to Mahon, with eight millions of rials to pay the troops.

Deeming it abſolutely neceſſary to make the Peterell uſeful until your return, I took all the Spaniards out (72 in number) and gave her in charge of my firſt lieutenant, Mr. Lyne, with a mate, two midſhipmen, thirty ſeamen, and twelve marines, directing them to land an officer and guide at Fornelles, with a letter for General Stuart, and to return here immediately.

I am ſorry to inform you that the Spaniards behaved very ill to the officers and ſeamen of the Peterell, having robbed and plundered them of every thing. Great part of the Captain's and officers clothes I have recovered.

I returned

I returned off this place yeſterday, but being calm I could not get near the ſhore.

I have the honour to be, Sir, &c.

JAMES BOWEN.

Commodore Duckworth.

Before Ciudadella, Nov. 18, 1798.

I have the honour to return you and the gentlemen employed on ſhore under your command, my ſincere thanks for your activity, zeal, and aſſiſtance, in forwarding the light artillery of the army; neither can too much praiſe be given to the ſeamen for their friendly and cheerful exertions under very hard labour; exertions which were accompanied with a propriety of behaviour which I greatly attribute to your management, and which will ever merit my acknowledgments, and affords me the ſatisfaction of aſſuring you that I am with ſincere regard, yours, &c.

CHARLES STUART.

MIQUELON, ISLAND OF, TAKEN IN 1778. It is ſituated on the coaſt of Newfoundland; and at the peace of Paris, in 1762, was granted to the French, as well as the iſland of St. Peter, in order for them to cure the fiſh they caught on the banks of Newfoundland. But on their declaring in favour of America, Vice-Admiral Montague, then commanding on the Newfoundland ſtation, ſent Commodore Evans to ſeize thoſe places, which he effected on the 14th of September, and entirely deſtroyed all their ſtages, &c. and embarked the ſettlers for France.

MIRANDA, TAKEN IN 1762. A city of Tra los Montes, in Portugal, a frontier againſt Spain, near Leon, twenty-ſix miles ſouth of Braganza. It is a place of ſome ſtrength; and on the 9th of May, it was obliged to ſurrender to the forces of Spain, by the exploſion of a powder magazine, by which the walls were ſo damaged, and two ſuch breaches made, beſides the loſs of above 500 men buried in the ruins, that it was rendered untenable.

MISITRA, TAKEN IN 1770. This town is ſituated in the ſouth part of the Morea, on the banks of the river Vaſilipotomos, fifty-three miles from Corinth. It conſiſts of the town, caſtle, and ſuburbs, ſtrongly fortified, ſubject to the Turks. Captain Barker having routed 1000 Turks near this town, attacked it, and after two days ſiege, the enemy quitted both town and caſtle to the Ruſſians, who plundered them of immenſe booty. This place was taken by Mahommed II. in 1457.

May 6.

The army marched from Donauſchingen the 2d inſtant, and arrived at Engen in the courſe of the afternoon, before the enemy had reached that place. Notwithſtanding the great importance which was attached to the gaining the poſition of Stockach, yet it was not thought poſſible to proceed ſo far that day, without expoſing to imminent danger the ſeveral corps of the Archduke Ferdinand (which covered the march on the ſide of the Zolhaus) and thoſe of Generals Giulay and Kienmayer, which had received orders to retire from Fribourg and Oiffenbourg, and join the main army. On the ſame day the enemy withdrew the army which had till then occupied the north-eaſt part of Switzerland, and was oppoſed to the Auſtrians on the ſide of the Griſons and the Voralberg, and brought the whole of it towards Conſtance and Schaffhauſen in the courſe of the following night, leaving the eaſtern frontier of Switzerland entirely open. On the 3d in the morning, this force, united to that which had paſſed the Rhine at Schaffhauſen on the 1ſt inſtant, attacked and carried the Auſtrian poſition at Stockach, occupied by Prince Joſeph of Lorraine, with a force under his command quite inadequate to meet that which the enemy had brought againſt him. On this occaſion the Auſtrians ſuſtained a very conſiderable loſs both in men, cannon, and ſtores; though, fortunately, a part of the magazines which had been formed at Stockach had been carried away in the courſe of the two preceding days. The Prince having been obliged to fall back on Pfullendorff and Moeſkirch, the left flank of General Kray's army was uncovered. In this ſituation of things, and before the Archduke Ferdinand had effected his junction, General Kray was attacked at Engen, about two o'clock in the afternoon, by the main French army, my, commanded by General Moreau in perſon. This army had been reinforced by a detachment from the camp at Dijon, and conſiſted of five entire diviſions. A ſeparate force fell at the ſame time upon the Archduke, and obliged him to fall back on Dutlingen. The French attacked every where with the utmoſt impetuoſity, bringing up freſh columns in ſucceſſion, and ſacrificing immenſe numbers of men on every part of the Auſtrian line where they had hoped to penetrate. They were, however, unable to make any impreſſion on any one point, and at nine in the evening they gave up the attempt; at which time the Auſtrians remained maſters of the whole poſition which they had occupied in the morning, and the Archduke had joined the main army, after having defeated the corps oppoſed to him, and taken ſeveral priſoners and three pieces of cannon. His Royal Highneſs, to whoſe perſonal exertions this ſucceſs was chiefly owing, has, on this occaſion, merited and gained the eſteem and admiration of the whole army. At this moment the ſpirit and confidence of the army was ſuch, that General Kray would, in his turn, have attacked the enemy, but for the loſs of Stockach, which rendered his retreat abſolutely neceſſary. He remained, however, in the field of battle all night, and only began his march at day-break. The army arrived at Leiptingen, at nine in the morning of the 4th, where it halted till three in the afternoon, and then marched forward to Moeſkirch, where a junction was effected with Prince Joſeph of Lorraine at nine in the evening. The Archduke covered the march, in the courſe of which his Royal Highneſs was joined by General Giulay, with the corps from Fribourg, and by the firſt diviſion of the Bavarian ſubſidiary army from Baylingen. The whole of this march was made, and the junction with General Giulay, Prince Joſeph of Lorraine, and the Bavarians, effected without any material interruption from the enemy. In the afternoon of yeſterday, the different corps of the enemy being concentrated in one great army, whilſt General Kray had ſtill between 30 and 40,000 men detached on different points, General Moreau attacked the Auſtrian poſition at Moeſkirch with his whole force, but owing to the ſteady bravery of the Auſtrian troops, and particularly to the decided ſuperiority of their artillery, he was unable to make any material impreſſion, and at ſun-ſet each army retired to its reſpective quarters. The loſs was very conſiderable on both ſides; but there is every reaſon to believe that the enemy has ſuffered much more conſiderably than the Auſtrians. This opinion, which is confirmed by the unanimous report of the priſoners made at the cloſe of the day, is founded not only on the circumſtance of his not renewing his attack in the night or this morning, notwithſtanding his very great ſuperiority of numbers, but on the nature of the action itſelf, which conſiſted in a ſucceſſion of impetuous but unſucceſsful attacks made by the French infantry, under the fire of the Auſtrian artillery, and expoſed to frequent charges of cavalry. Unleſs General Kray ſhould be again attacked in the courſe of the day, he will, probably, take a poſition this afternoon or to-morrow behind the Danube, his left at this place, and his right at Sigmaringen. Your Lordſhip will probably have been much alarmed at the firſt reports of this affair that will have reached England through France, nor indeed can it be ſuppoſed that the expectation of the enemy ſhould not have been extreme during the whole day of the 3d, or that the French officers ſhould not have holden out to their government the moſt flattering hopes of ultimate and complete ſucceſs; but the ſteady valour of the Auſtrian troops, the order that reigns through every department of the army, and the ſkill and unſhaken courage and coolneſs of the generals have, I truſt, under the bleſſing of God, fruſtrated the great deſigns of the enemy.

I have the honour to be, &c.

W. WICKHAM.

On the 6th inſtant, the Auſtrians took a poſition behind the Danube without any material oppoſition from the enemy, whoſe loſs in the battle of the 5th appears to have been greater than was at firſt ſuppoſed. On the ſame day the junction was effected with Lieutenant-General Kienmayer. The ſecond diviſion of the Bavarians paſſed through this place yeſterday, and marched about a league further, where they will halt to-day, and their junction with General Kray will be effected either to-morrow or the day after, according to the neceſſity that may exiſt for haſtening their march. The firſt diviſion, conſiſting of 6000 men, had joined the main army in time to render very eſſential ſervices, and was cloſely engaged with the enemy in the battle of the 5th. The Swiſs regiment of Roverea in his Majeſty's ſervice, under the command of Colonel de Watteville, has formed a part of the Archduke's corps from the beginning, and has been particularly diſtinguiſhed by its bravery and good conduct: I am ſorry to add, that it has ſuffered in proportion, and that a number of excellent officers have been either killed or ſeverely wounded. It is impoſſible at preſent to obtain any exact return of the Auſtrians' loſs in killed and wounded. Though the general officers expoſed themſelves on every occaſion, yet I believe not one of them has been killed or made priſoner, and only one (Major-General Karazai) wounded. Few priſoners have been made on either ſide; but the Auſtrians were obliged to leave ſome of their wounded at Engen, for want of carriages to carry them away. No one corps of the Auſtrians has been broken or diſperſed by the enemy, nor have they loſt a ſingle piece of cannon in the different actions between the main armies, though ſeveral fell into the hands of the enemy at Stockach. The Archduke Ferdinand, as I have mentioned in another diſpatch, took three pieces from the enemy, at the time when his Royal Highneſs formed his junction with the Commander in Chief near Engen.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) W. WICKHAM.

The battle at Moeſkirch, on the 5th, was dreadful! the earth was covered with dead. Moreau fought with the courage of a Roman hero. He had four horſes killed under him: a ball that happily was already ſpent, ſtruck him on the breaſt, and lodged in his clothes. His intrepidity decided the victory in the moment when when it appeared doubtful. At the head of a corps of heavy cavalry, he turned the enemy at the moment they believed themſelves conquerors. The Auſtrians loſt 6,000 men, without counting the priſoners. On the 6th there was an armiſtice of twenty-four hours to bury the dead, and the 7th, the French were advancing.

MOHATZ, BATTLE AT. A town of Lower Hungary, ſituated on the Danube, ſeventeen miles north-weſt from Eſſeck. In the year 1678, the Emperor of the Turks, and the Emperor of Germany being at war, their reſpective armies met here on the 4th day of Auguſt, and fought a deſperate battle, of which the Turkiſh writers preſent us with the following account.

The two armies being very near, firſt try their fortunes by ſkirmiſhes, and then fall to work with their cannon, which doing moſt execution on the part of the Turks, the Germans were forced to give way. The Turks taking this for a flight, follow the enemy, who retreat towards the Danube. Yet, while the Vizier proceeds more ſlowly, by reaſon of his numbers, the Duke of Lorraine, the Imperial General, encamps at Mohatz, where, having refreſhed his troops, he ſet out for Zikli; but he had ſcarce left his camp, when a great number of Turkiſh horſe appear, and attack the Germans on all ſides, as they moved ſlowly, in order to detain them till the Vizier came up with his whole army. After three days ſkirmiſhing, comes and poſts himſelf in a little wood through which the Imperialiſts were to paſs. Next day, which was the 4th of Shawal, (Auguſt 1ſt), he draws up his army; when obſerving the front of the Germans to be too wide for the wings to aſſiſt each other, commands his troops to annoy the enemy's right wing with continued but ſlight attacks; and at the ſame time, to ruſh with their whole ſtrength upon the left wing. The Turks accordingly fell upon the left wing with ſuch fury, that they muſt needs have routed it, but for the cannon placed among the enemy's ſoldiers, which killed great numbers of Othmans as they moved incautiouſly forward, and made them retreat to the wood. However, they attacked the ſame wing a ſecond time, with a larger force, but with no better ſucceſs than the firſt.

The Duke of Bavaria, who commanded that body, imagining the courage of the Turks to be abated by theſe two repulſes, leads his troops to attack them in the wood; but before he could execute his deſign, he ſees the Othmans advancing in a body againſt him. Hereupon, he ordered his cannon to be placed in the front, loaded with ſmall bullets and pieces of iron, which did ſuch execution, that they were forced to retire in haſte. The Duke follows them, but had ſcarce continued the purſuit an hour, when to his great ſurpriſe, he ſees the Othman camp entire, and fortified with a ſtrong trench in ſo ſhort a time. However, the trenches being demoliſhed by the Imperial cannon, the enemy penetrate into the camp itſelf, and put to the ſword almoſt all the Janiſſaries, deſerted by their horſe. The Vizier, perceiving things to be deſperate, with a few only eſcapes by flight; leaving the camp a prey to the victors, who purſue them with their horſe, when he was out of their reach.

Our hiſtorians relate this action with different circumſtances from the Turkiſh. Their account of the battle is this: the Duke of Lorraine, joined by the Duke of Bavaria, Prince Louis of Baden, Caprara, Heuſler, and other generals, having paſſed the Drave, on the 18th of July, marched to Eſſeck, and next day advanced towards the Vizier, who was ſtrongly and regularly encamped under that fortreſs, by the direction of ſome French engineers: for at this time, the French began to enter into a confidence with the Turks. The Imperialiſts finding it impoſſible either to draw them out to a battle or force their camp, which was impregnable, and being themſelves expoſed by their ſituation to 150 pieces of the enemy's cannon, as well as in want of proviſion and forage, they determined to repaſs the Drave. The Turks, believing this to be a kind of flight, made ſeveral attacks on their rear; but being repulſed by the ſignal addreſs of the generals, they ſuffered them to croſs the river unmoleſted, without laying hold of the great advantages which the paſſage of it would have given them.

The Imperial army having paſſed the Drave, encamped on the 28th near Mohatz, where they were joined by 5000 German foot, and 1000 horſe. Next day, on advice that the Vizier began to paſs that river, all things were diſpoſed for a battle; and the Duke, the better to invite him to it, ſtill retreated, being followed by the enemy, who were reported to be 80,000 ſtrong, beſides attendants. At length, on the 12th of Auguſt, when the Duke had advanced with his right wing within an hour's march of Siclos, the Elector of Bavaria, who commanded the left, was attacked by 8000 Turkiſh horſe, ſupported by 6000 Janiſſaries, who had the night before intrenched themſelves on the ſide of a hill, from whence they fired many vollies on the cavalry. But Prince Louis of Baden, having obſerved a very advantageous poſt on the ſide of the ſame hill, he was ordered to take it, which he did with admirable ſucceſs; for the Janiſſaries having fired three vollies, and the Spahis as often furiouſly charged the rear-guard, the brave Elector ſet his men firm againſt the frequent and forcible attacks of the enemy. Theſe not being able to endure the fire and unſhaken order of the Imperialiſts, betook themſelves to a diſorderly and precipitate flight; ſo that the horſe breaking in upon the foot, trampled down the Janiſſaries, and drove them back to their trenches; into which the Germans entered at the ſame time, and put the whole army to a ſhameful route, leaving their camp, with all their tents and baggage behind them. There were found in the camp ſixty-ſeven pieces of cannon, 1000 kintals of powder, of match 400; 8000 cannon-balls, 3000 bombs and carcaſſes, 10,000 grenades, arms of all ſorts, 2000 oxen, 500 horſes, and other animals, beſides great plenty of proviſions. In this battle, 8000 Janiſſaries with their Aga were killed, 3000 others drowned, and 2000 taken priſoners. Of the Imperialiſts only 1000 were ſlain.

Near this place, on Auguſt the 29th, 1520, was fought fought another battle. Solyman, Emperor of the Turks, having invaded Hungary with an army of 300,000 men, Louis II. King of that country and of Bohemia, a weak and inexperienced Prince, advanced raſhly to meet him with a body of men which did not amount to 30,000. With an imprudence ſtill more unpardonable, he gave the command of thoſe troops to Paul Tomori, a Franciſcan Friar, Archbiſhop of Golocza. This aukward General, in the dreſs of his order, girt with its cord, marched at the head of the troops; and hurried on by his own preſumption, as well as by the impetuoſity of the nobles, who deſpiſed danger, but were impatient of long ſervice, fought this fatal battle, in which the King, the flower of the Hungarian nobility, and upwards of 20,000 men, fell the victims of his folly and ill conduct. Solyman, after this victory, ſeized and kept poſſeſſion of ſeveral towns of the greateſt ſtrength in the ſouthern provinces of Hungary, and over-running the reſt of the country, carried near 200,000 perſons into captivity.

MOHAWK RIVER, EXPEDITION ON, IN 1780. It runs through a country of the ſame name between Lake Ontario and the province of New-York. For an account of which ſee the following letter.

Extract of a Letter from General Haldimand, Governor and Commander in Chief of his Majeſty's Forces in the Province of Quebec, to Lord George Germaine: one of his Majeſty's principal Secretaries of State.

Quebec, October 25, 1780.

I have the honour to acquaint your Lordſhip, that I have juſt received an expreſs from Major Carleton, who commands one of the detachments mentioned in my letter to your Lordſhip of the 17th ultimo.

The ſecrecy and diſpatch with which this detachment penetrated, prevented any oppoſition of conſequence on the part of the enemy; and on the 10th and 11th inſtant, the garriſon of Fort Anne and Fort George ſurrendered priſoners of war.

Major Carleton, who has, as well as his detachment, ſhewn great zeal and activity in this affair, having fully anſwered the purpoſe for which he was ſent, is returned to Crown Point, where he is to remain as long as the ſeaſon will permit the veſſels to navigate the lake, in order to draw the attention of the enemy.

The reports aſſiduouſly publiſhed on all occaſions by the enemy, of cruelties committed by the Indians, are notoriouſly falſe, and propagated merely to exaſperate the ignorant and deluded people. In this late inſtance, Major Carleton informs me, they have behaved with the greateſt moderation, and did not ſtrip, or in any reſpect uſe ill, their priſoners.

I incloſe, for your Lordſhip's information, a liſt of the killed, wounded, and priſoners.

A party of 100 men and Mohawk Indians croſſed Lake Champlain, with Major Carleton, to co-operate with Sir John Johnſon, who muſt be before this time upon the Mohawk river; and another party of 200 Canada Indians, with their proper officers, under the command of Lieutenant Houghton, of the 53d regiment, marched at the ſame time towards Connecticut river. They are returned, having brought away thirty-two priſoners, without any loſs, although purſued by a ſuperior force, of which it is thought many were killed.

I every day expect to hear of Sir John Johnſon's ſucceſs upon the Mohawk river.

P. S. November 2.—I have kept this letter open in hopes to give your Lordſhip an account of the party which was ſent upon the Mohawk river, under the command of Sir John Johnſon. The enemy, by means of two Oneida Indians, who had deſerted from Niagara, had received information of an intended attack upon the Mohawk river, and had prepared accordingly: but this did not prevent his ſucceſs, though it occaſioned him to meet with great oppoſition. I have juſt received a letter from Sir John, wherein he acquaints me, that he has deſtroyed the ſettlements of Schohary and Stone Arabia, and laid waſte a great extent of country. He had ſeveral engagements with the enemy, in which he came off victorious. In one of them, near Stone Arabia, he killed a Colonel Browne, a notorious and active rebel, with about 100 officers and men.

I have the pleaſure to acquaint your Lordſhip, from Sir John's letter, that I have great reaſon to hope, that many of the miſſing will find their way to Oſwego or Niagara, as ſome Indians and rangers, well acquainted with the woods, are with them. I cannot finiſh without expreſſing to your Lordſhip, the perfect ſatisfaction which I have from the zeal, ſpirit, and activity, with which Sir John Johnſon has conducted this arduous enterpriſe.

MOLA, in the Livora of Naples, in Lower Italy, where the following remarkable anecdote of Engliſh courage was ſhewn in 1638, to the Captain Baſſa of the Porte, who was with the whole Turkiſh fleet under his command, on a viſit to Cairo, and other ports, for the purpoſe of convoying the veſſels laden at thoſe places for Conſtantinople, and at Mola to meet with two ſhips, the Hector, and the William and Ralph, laden with corn, in the Gulf of Mola. Corn being a prohibited commodity, and not to be tranſported, under penalty of forfeiting ſhips, cargo, and liberty of the men, the Baſſa was invited, by the proſpect of ſuch a treaty, to command the ſeizure of theſe veſſels, which, as they were but two, it was not queſtioned but they would yield at the firſt ſummons; but in this the Turk was miſtaken; he had to deal with people who knew their ſituation, who were unuſed to fear, and were reſolved to make the infidels pay as dear as poſſible for the property, liberty, and lives of Britons. Immediately the Engliſh ſhips cut their cables, and ſtood out to ſea, where they were attacked by the whole Ottoman fleet, being ſometimes boarded by one, and then by two gallies at once; yet as they plied their guns with ſmall ſhots and made a gallant defence with their half pikes, they often cleared their decks, and beat off the enemy with great ſlaughter. The Captain Baſſa being aſhamed that his whole fleet ſhould meet ſuch oppoſition from ſuch veſſels, reſolved to enter his men at the gun room port of one of the ſhips, and running the prow of his own galley into the ſtern, the gallant crew clapt an iron ſpike into the loop-hole of the prow, by which the galley being wedged to the timbers of the ſhip, they brought their guns to bear aft, and charging them with croſs bars, pieces of iron, and partridge ſhot, raked them fore and aft, killed the Captain Baſſa himſelf, and near 300 in the galley. At length, having ſpent all their ſhot, they charged their guns with pieces of eight, but being overpowered by numbers of the enemies, and not able to make farther reſiſtance, after maintaining this unequal conflict for more than three hours, they ſet fire to their ſhips, which, blowing up, deſtroyed two or three gallies which lay alongſide them, together with their men who were then fighting upon deck hand to hand with the defendants; ſo that none of theſe undaunted fellows were taken, but three or four that were picked up out of the ſea. Thus ended this extraordinary action, the Turks gaining the victory with the loſs of 1200 ſlaves killed and wounded, beſides the Captain Baſſa, and ſeveral other officers of note killed, and 500 Turks ſlain and wounded. The gallies were forced into port, where they remained a full month to repair. This affair ſtruck the whole Porte with amazement at the bravery, or obſtinacy, as they called it, of the Engliſh; and is a matter not altogether forgotten at Conſtantinople at this day.

MOLDAVIA, ſurrendered to the Auſtrians on the 7th of June 1788, when the hoſpodar of the province and Prince Ipoilanti were made priſoners of war. Among other circumſtances attending this diſaſter, it is related, that the force of the Ottomans conſiſted of only 6000 men, while that of the enemy amounted to 15,000; but that the former made a long and vigorous reſiſtance, nor yielded up their arms till they had made a prodigious ſlaughter, which, after all, they found fruitleſs.

MOLWITZ, BATTLE AT. A little town of Sileſia, ſituate about three miles from Creiſs, and forty ſouth from Breſlau. In the year 1741, when half the powers in Europe were buſying themſelves about the election of an Emperor, Frederic III. then King of Pruſſia, who ſaw the general confuſion, marched an army of 60,000 men directly into Sileſia. His pretenſions were to four duchies, which his family had formerly acquired by purchaſes, and by acts of confraternity, which his anceſtors not being able to maintain, had been obliged to relinquiſh. The Queen of Hungary was incenſed to find herſelf attacked in the day of her diſtreſs, by a Prince to whom ſhe had given no ſort of provocation; and his Pruſſian Majeſty charged the court of Vienna with a deſign either to aſſaſſinate or carry him off by treachery: a deſign which was diſowned with expreſſions of indignation and diſdain; and which was founded in no other place than his own imagination. Both parties were now inflamed. The Queen ordered Count Neuperg to aſſemble a body of forces, and ſtop the progreſs of the Pruſſians in Sileſia. Accordingly, on Monday the 10th day of April, 1741, the two armies met at Molwitz, and the engagement began about two o'clock in the afternoon. The Auſtrians at firſt drove back the left wing of the Pruſſians, commanded by Lieutenant-General Schuylemburg. But his Pruſſian Majeſty having been informed that the Auſtrians were ſuperior to him in cavalry, had intermixed grenadiers with his horſe, by which means this confuſion was recovered. The attack on the right wing of the Pruſſians was likewiſe very intrepid, but the heat of the action was on the left wing; which having been rallied, now repulſed the Auſtrians in turn, and purſued their advantage ſo well, that at ſix o'clock they began to retire, and made a retreat in very good order, and encamped under the cannon of Neiſs, leaving the field of battle to the King, who dearly purchaſed this ſpot of ground. He loſt at leaſt 3000 men, beſides his kinſman Frederic, Margrave of Brandenburgh, and Lieutenant-General Schuylemberg. The loſs of the Auſtrians, as they were defeated, muſt have been greater than that of the Pruſſians, though they endeavoured to conceal it; therefore there is no aſcertaining it exactly; but according to all probability, it could not be leſs than 4000. Notwithſtanding the King of Pruſſia remained maſter of the field of battle, the action was far from being deciſive. The Auſtrians faced the Pruſſians ſeveral times in their camp, and frequent ſhirmiſhes happened. The neceſſitous affairs of the Queen of Hungary, at length obliged General Neuperg to be recalled with his army. The King of Pruſſia then made a conqueſt of Sileſia, for there was no oppoſition.

MONA, an iſland ſituated on the Baltic ſea. Near this place, on the 18th of April, 1782, at two P. M. Sir Samuel, now Lord Hood, made ſail from the fleet, with ten ſail of the line, a frigate, and a fire-ſhip. On the 19th at ſix A. M. ſaw five ſail in the paſſage of this place; at half paſt ſix A. M. the Admiral made ſignal for chaſe. At two P. M. ſome of the ſhips came up with two French line of battle ſhips and a frigate, after ſome action, both the line of battle ſhips and frigate ſtruck. They continued chaſe after another frigate, which eſcaped them in the night.

MONDOVI, November 13, 1800. This day the Imperialiſts entered this city, which is in Piedmont. The French had left a battalion in the citadel of that place, where it remained till eleven o'clock at night. From fear of the inhabitants, they would not attempt to effect their retreat by way of the gate leading to the town, but opened a breach towards Vico, and thus formed the rear of the French army. This battalion was greatly haraſſed by the country people on its retreat, who killed ſeveral of the troops compoſing it, and took ſome of its horſes and baggage. The town and diſtrict of Mondovi have ſuffered greatly during the ſtay of the French.

The loſs of the Auſtrians in killed and wounded is very inconſiderable; their artillery made great havoc among the French, whoſe loſs cannot yet be poſitively ſtated. The regiment of Lattermann forms the garriſon of Mondovi.

MONS, SIEGE OF. A city of the Auſtrian Netherlands, ſituated on a hill, near the confluence of the rivers Haine and Trouille, about twenty-two miles ſouth-eaſt from Tournay. The brilliancy of the campaign of 1690, had ſo much revived the military genius of Louis XIV. that he had a deſire to taſte again of war, and make ſome campaigns yet in his old age. All things had been prepared for opening the campaign for 1691, very early with the ſiege of Mons. Oats were bought up for the ſubſiſtence of the cavalry inſtead of forage. The King ſet out from Verſailles the firſt of March, and put himſelf at the head of his army, compoſed of 30,000 horſe, and 70,000 foot. The Mareſchal de Luxemburg begged his Majeſty, that he would permit the ladies of the court to partake of the pleaſures and advantages of the field with the generals; thinking that the ſiege of Mons (the Confederates not being able to diſturb them in it) would at the ſame time afford leiſure enough to divert themſelves in their tents, which the King very readily granted, deſigning to make this campaign gallant in appearance, as well as glorious in victory.

A few days after the King's arrival, Mons was inveſted and beſieged in form. Whilſt the artillery fired upon the place, and the ſoldiers kept the trenches, the generals had balls in their tents, to entertain the ladies of the court who had followed the army. Louis ſeemed to be young again, and pleaſed himſelf as much with the converſation of the fair, as the youngeſt general that was there. The court of France never made war with leſs danger, and more pleaſure.

The lines being brought to perfection, the cannon began to play from the batteries with incredible fury; one battery ſeconding the other without intermiſſion, and with ſo much diſpatch, that, by the confeſſion of the moſt expert engineers, never any artillery did greater execution. Twenty-four mortars, and ſixty pieces of cannon, were continually employed againſt the place. There was about 1,000,000 weight of powder laid up in the camp for the ſupply of them. The King, betwixt the ſiege and his diverſion, was day and night in motion. He viſited the trenches once or twice daily, encouraging every one to do his duty, with ſuch ſucceſs that both the officers and ſoldiers ſhewed the utmoſt eagerneſs in out-braving one another. They frequently worked uncovered, and carried their faſcines at noon day, in ſpite of the continual fire of the garriſon, to the trenches. The beſieged ſeemed to have put their chief hopes in their artillery, having not made one ſally during the whole ſiege. The only place that was defended with much gallantry was a horn-work, which the French, making their way through the grenades and carcaſſes of the enemy, carried ſword in hand. The citizens of Mons were all along in hopes that King William would come to their relief; and in effect, he marched with an army of 44,000 men as far as Halle, within ſix leagues of Mons; but finding himſelf not ſtrong enough to attack the French army, he remained in that poſt till after the ſurrender of the place, which perceiving itſelf not in a condition to ſuſtain a general aſſault, came to a capitulation, after a ſiege of ſixteen days.

After the taking of Mons, the troops on both ſides returned to quarters of refreſhment, and the reſt of the campaign was ſpent in marches and countermarches, without any remarkable action. The Confederates had boaſted, ever ſince the beginning of the ſummer, that they would beſiege ſome place or other in Flanders. They attacked Beaumont, a ſmall place without much defence, the garriſon conſiſting only of 150 men.

The Duke of Marlborough, after the battle of Blaregnies, or Malplaquet, reſolved on the ſiege of Mons. On the 18th of September, 1709, he ordered and haſtened the march of the artillery and ammunition waggons, deſigned for that enterprize: a great number of horſes were ſent from the army, to aſſiſt in bringing up the ſame to the camp; and the 19th, the Duke of Marlborough removed his head-quarters to Havre. The Duke of Marlborough, and Prince Eugene, having taken the neceſſary meaſures to ſecure the march of the artillery, appointed the generals that were to command in this ſiege, under the Prince of Orange-Naſſau. The latter gave an account of the diſpoſitions made thereto, and the progreſs thereof till the 27th, in the two following letters to the States-General.

High and Mighty Lords,

I received with due reſpect your High Mightineſſes letter of the 16th inſt. in which you expreſs your ſatisfaction in my conduct, ſhewn in the battle of Tanieres, or Malplaquet; and as this declaration is very acceptable to me, ſo it ſhall animate me for the future, not to regard any pains or trouble, but ever to ſacrifice my life in the ſervice of your High Mightneſſes, in hopes to deſerve your favour and affection more and more.

The ſiege of Mons being reſolved upon, I have the honour to command it, and under me, of the infantry, the Lieutenant-Generals Pattendorf, Rantzau, and Dohna; the Major-Generals Lord North and Grey, Sacken, Els, Ammama, and Ivoy; the Brigadiers Evans, Earl of Orrery, Weecks, Horſt, Rechteren, and Ockinga: of the cavalry, Lieutenant-General Schullemburg; the Major-Generals Stain, Chanclos, and Cheus; and the Brigadiers Fabricus and Hunderbein.

The moſt part of the thirty battalions and thirty ſquadrons, appointed for the ſiege, being arrived in this camp, I repaired hither on the 20th inſt. and the projects of the directors of the approaches, in reſpect to the attacks, being approved of, it was, with the advice of the field-deputies of your High Mightineſſes, and the Princes of Savoy and Marlborough reſolved to open the trenches to-morrow night, if every thing requiſite and neceſſary thereto be ready in two ſeveral places, viz. at the gate of Bertamont, where the chief attack will be, and the gate of Havre. This evening, 100 ſoldiers, and 100 workmen, are ordered to poſſeſs themſelves of a mill on the Trouille, and thereby to cut off the enemy's proviſions on that ſide. The Sieur Dru de Caſtillon, captain of the regiment of Guethem, and a peaſant who offered himſelf voluntarily, have been ordered to drain the inundations between St. Guiſlain and Mons, to execute which, 150 pioncers, with a ſufficient guard to ſupport them, are commanded, and they are to begin that work to-morrow.

Thirty ſquadrons, under the command of a lieutenant-general, two major-generals, and two brigadiers, have been ordered to guard the artillery hither, which is to break up from Bruſſels to-morrow: all the other poſts are, for their better ſecurity, aſſigned to the commanding officers.

In the mean time, nothing is omitted for making the neceſſary preparations to continue this important ſiege with a happy ſucceſs, &c.

From the camp before Mons,
September 23, 1709.

The other Letter, dated the 26th of September, was as follows:

High and Mighty Lords,

On the 23d, I had the honour to give your High Mightineſſes an account of my arrival in this camp, and what had been done to that time, in the preparation towards the proſecuting of this ſiege.

The perſons who were ordered to drain the inundations between Conde and Mons, did ſo happily execute theſe orders, that the water on one ſide is already fallen above ſix feet.

The deſign of cutting off the mills on the Trouille, has likewiſe had good ſucceſs, the garriſon therein, conſiſting of twenty-four men, under the command of an officer, ſurrendered priſoners of war, without any reſiſtance; whereupon a beginning was made to draw off the water on that ſide likewiſe.

Laſt night, at half an hour after nine, the trenches were opened at the attack of Bertamont, with all the ſucceſs imaginable. A parallel of 550 feet was drawn before the horn-work of that gate, with a line of communication from the village of Hyron to the parallel aforeſaid, and another was begun from the height of the road of Bavay; but the time falling too ſhort, it could not be joined to the other. We had, on this occaſion, three men killed; and one major, one captain, one ſubaltern, one engineer, and fifty-four common ſoldiers wounded. On the attack of the gate of Havre, Engineer de Boffe run a parallel along the foot of the glacis, but an unforeſeen accident incapacitated him to draw a communication with his line on the rear, which was the reaſon that it could not certainly be known what number were killed and wounded on that ſide. I was only informed, that Lieutenant-General Cadogan, his aid-de-camp, and another officer, who had advanced too near, were wounded.

The Engineer Rietquetſeler, with 300 ſoldiers, 100 pioneers, four pieces of cannon, and the neceſſary ammunition and faſcines, were ordered to make themſelves maſters of the redoubts of Nimy; but the men and other requiſites not being ready time enough laſt night, that deſign was deferred till to-morrow morning, &c.

(Signed) J. W. F. Prince of Orange and Naſſau.

P. S. After the concluding of theſe, I received advice, that the redoubt of Nimy had been forced this day, wherein were found two pieces of cannon, twenty-five men, an officer, and a ſubaltern. This afternoon the enemy made a ſally upon our trenches, on the attack of Havre, with 300 men, on which occaſion, the Engliſh regiment of Hill had about ſixty men killed and wounded; but being ſuſtained by the regiment of Prince Albert, the enemy was obliged to retire with ſome loſs.

The 27th, Lieutenant-General Wilks joined the army, with five battalions and ten ſquadrons from Duillemont. The two days following the beſiegers carried on their approaches, as much as the badneſs of the weather would allow of, and finiſhed their batteries. The 30th, another convoy of ammunition and artillery being arrived, thirty-two pieces of cannon were brought to the batteries, at the attack of the gate of Bertamont, and ſixteen to thoſe at the gate of Havre. It is remarkable, that the Allies made no lines of circumvallation at this ſiege; a plain mark they were no ways apprehenſive of the enemy; nor did not think them ſo formidable as the Mareſchal de Villars endeavoured to perſuade the King his maſter that they were.

The firſt of October, purſuant to the diſpoſition made the night before, Major-General Ivoy, with a detachment, advanced in the morning to attack the horn-work and the redoubt without the park-gate, which covered the mills where the beſieged uſed to grind their corn. In this ſervice four pieces of cannon and two howitzers were uſed, which had not fired above three rounds, when the enemy ſeeing the Confederates, who had marched a conſiderable way up to the waiſt in water, ready to make an aſſault, yielded themſelves priſoners of war, to the number of fifty-four men, one captain, and two lieutenants; but the officers were permitted to return into the town.

By the taking of theſe works, in which the beſiegers found forty ſacks of meal, two pieces of cannon, and ſome ammunition, they became maſters of a ſluice, which was of great uſe for letting out the water; and the ſame day they began to fire from twenty-ſix pieces of cannon. The 2d, nothing paſt of any moment. The 3d, the weather being become fair, the beſiegers obliged the enemy to quit a ſmall redoubt, on the right of the gate of Havre, and continued their approaches, with very little loſs at both attacks, till the 8th, when they were not above ten paces from the counterſcarp of the horn-work at the gate of Havre, which they attacked that day, and after half an hour's reſiſtance, lodged themſelves on the covered way, with the loſs only of ſixty men killed and wounded, and among the latter Colonel Hara, of the Engliſh artillery, and Captain Petit of the guards. They perfected their approaches, lodged themſelves on the covered way of the horn-work at the gate of Bertamont, and begun to batter the face of that work, from two batteries of twelve pieces of cannon each.

From the 8th to the 16th, nothing happened worthy of notice, only that the beſiegers continued to bombard the place. The 16th, in the morning, 400 grenadiers, ſuſtained by 500 fuzileers, and 700 workmen, attacked the ſecond counterſcarp of the horn-work at the gate of Havre, which the enemy quitted after a ſhort reſiſtance; and thereupon, the Allies made a good lodgement, and removed their batteries to the palliſades, to batter the horn-work in breach. At ſeven in the morning, they began with a great diſcharge of bombs and grenades, to attack the horn-work of Bertamont, by which the enemy were ſo much annoyed, that when the beſiegers had mounted the breach, they found, to their great amazement, that the beſieged had quitted both the ravelin and the horn-work, and they lodged themſelves therein with very little loſs. They took at the ſame time, a little out-work, on the right of the horn-work, without loſing one man, and in it a lieutenant and fifteen ſoldiers priſoners.

They began the 18th, at the attack of Bertamont, to remove the batteries into the horn-work, in order to batter the baſtions, and continued to work on them with all poſſible diligence. The 19th, in the morning, their batteries began to fire upon the face of the horn-work at the gate of Havre, and continued to do ſo, with very good ſucceſs, till the 20th about noon, when the breaches being almoſt practicable, and the beſiegers making preparations for an attack, they were prevented by the enemy's beating a parley, and hanging out white flags at both attacks, to ſignify their deſire to capitulate. Hoſtages were hereupon exchanged, and the enemy having ſent to M. de Sonnegar, major-general, M. Grimaldi, a brigadier, and M. Lellier; the Allies, on their ſide, ſent into the town Major-General Ranck, Brigadier Orkinga, and Colonel Alberti.

The French hoſtages, having dined with the Prince of Naſſau, near the Bertamont attack, went in the afternoon to the Duke of Marlborough's quarters, where Prince Eugene was at the ſame time; and having delivered in their propoſals, conſiſting of twenty-two articles, returned into the town in the evening with their Highneſſes' anſwer. They came out again the next morning, and after ſome debates, accepted ſuch terms as the Confederate generals thought fit to grant them: by which they were allowed to march out with other marks of honour, but without cannon or mortars.

The articles were ſigned about ten at night, at Prince Eugene's quarters, by that Prince, the Duke of Marlborough, and the Field-Deputies of the States-General, on the one part, and General Grimaldi, Governor of the town on the other: and immediately after, 500 men took poſſeſſion of the gate of Nimy.

The reduction of this important place, after the memorable and bloody battle of Malplaquet, was a plain demonſtration that the Allies obtained in that action, ſomething more ſubſtantial than the name of a victory; ſince the enemy, who had hazarded a battle to prevent the ſiege of this town, did not make the leaſt motion to relieve it; notwithſtanding the aſſurances given by the Mareſchal de Villars and Bouffiers to his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, that he would not loſe an inch of ground by that action; and their boaſts of marching towards the Confederate army, if the King's ſervice required it.

The 23d, the garriſon marched out with all the marks of honour allowed them by the capitulation; beſides which, the Confederate generals granted them two pieces of cannon and one mortar, by way of compliment. The whole did not exceed 100 men, the reſt being either ſick or wounded; and a great number of Walloons and others having ſtayed behind in the town, to liſt themſelves in the ſervice of the Allies. Count Dohna, who was appointed to command in that place, marched in at the ſame time with a detachment of troops, which were to be in garriſon during the winter. Of the Britiſh troops employed in this ſervice, Colonel Hill received a hurt in his ſide, Colonel Clayton was dangerouſly wounded in the eye, and Colonel Foxton and Major Mortimer were killed.

The French army, commanded by Marechal Saxe, took Mons in 1746, with very little trouble.

MONS, November 6, 1792. A battle was fought at the village of Gemappe, near this place, of which the following account was given to the National Convention, it being the firſt victory obtained by their troops, againſt the Auſtrian army.

Dumourier informed the Convention, that, after fighting with the Imperialiſts for five ſucceſſive days, the army of the Republic had conquered, and Mons had been the fruit of their victory. Forty thouſand French had attacked 28,000 Auſtrians, intrenched on all ſides, defended by forty redoubts, twenty pieces of heavy artillery, and a great number of cannon of a leſs weight of metal and howitzers. As to the number of French killed on this occaſion, he cannot give any account, but ſuppoſes there may have been 300, and double the number of wounded. Fifteen hundred of the enemy were either taken or deſerted, and they had about 4000 killed and wounded. The French took nine pieces of cannon, and a number of cheſts of ammunition. He diſpatched General Bonneron with 8000 men on one ſide, and General Dampier with as many on the other ſide, to ſeize on the city of Aeth, which contained ſeveral large magazines. He found ſeveral in Mons. The Auſtrian army retired in the greateſt diſorder, towards Bruſſels and Brune le Compte.

An officer who was preſent in the action near Mons, between the French and Auſtrians, on the 6th inſt. ſtates, that the force of the latter did not exceed 19,000 men.

This officer affirms, that the French had between 9 and 10,000 killed; that as the French advanced to the Auſtrian intrenchments, they were mowed down by whole battalions, but that they perſevered with an ardour worthy of a better cauſe.

The French account of the loſs of the Auſtrians is accurate; it amounted to near 4000.

MONTI-CHRISTI, ENGAGEMENT OFF, IN 1780. A ſettlement ſituated on the north ſide of Hiſpaniola, or St. Domingo, in the Weſt-Indies. Captain Cornwallis, with a ſquadron from Jamaica, being on a cruize off this place, fell in with, on the morning of the 20th of April, four ſail of French ſhips of the line and a frigate, with a number of merchant ſhips under their their convoy. Our ſhips, conſiſting of the Lion of ſixty-four guns, Briſtol of fifty, and Janus of forty-four, formed the line ahead, and were chaſed by the French, who came within gun-ſhot at five in the evening, and a running fight was maintained during the whole night; the enemy not chooſing to go along-ſide of our ſhips, though they had it in their power. The morning of the 21ſt was calm, and the Janus being near, the French commodore kept up a conſtant and well-directed fire, which obliged him to take the advantage of a light air of wind to ſheer off, with the loſs of his mizen-top-maſt, and fore-top-gallant-maſt. The Lion and Briſtol towed with their boats to the aſſiſtance of the Janus, which brought on a general firing for two or three hours. The remainder of the day was employed by the enemy in repairing their damages; and juſt before ſun-ſet, they made ſail again after our ſhips, but did not come within gun-ſhot the whole night. Soon after day-light on Wedneſday morning, the 22d, Captain Cornwallis ſaw three ſail to the leeward, which he imagined, and afterwards found to be the Ruby, and the Niger and Pomona frigates. The French immediately hauled their wind, and Captain Cornwallis chaſed them for five hours, but they declined the combat, notwithſtanding the Janus was diſabled; and Captain Cornwallis had only two ſixty-four and one fifty gun ſhip, to oppoſe to four ſail of the enemy's line of ſeventy-four guns each, under the command of M. de la Mothe Picquet. The French fired ſo injudiciouſly, that there were only twelve men killed and wounded in our three ſhips.

MONTREAL, TOWN OF, TAKEN IN 1760. It is ſituated on an iſland of the ſame name in the river St. Laurence, ſixty leagues ſouth-weſt of Quebec, North America. For an account of which ſee the following letter.

Copy of a Letter from Major-General Amherſt to the Right Hon. Mr. Secretary Pitt, dated Camp at Montreal, September 8, 1760.

On the 26th of Auguſt, I proceeded to this place. From the 26th to the 30th, I was employed in repairing ſome part of Fort William Auguſtus, mending batteaus, and fitting out the veſſels, beſides making ſuch preparations as I judged eſſentially neceſſary for the paſſage of the army down the river.

On the 31ſt I ſet out, rowed twenty-four miles, and encamped on the Iſle au Chat. The rapids were more frightful than dangerous.

September 1ſt, I paſſed the Long Saut, marched covering parties on the ſhore; the boats were obliged to row in ſingle file, and keep at ſome diſtance; this took up great time, though the current of the river was violent. The rapids were full of broken waves; the batteaus took in water; a corporal and three men of the royal highlanders were drowned. I encamped at Johnſon's Point, fourteen miles from the iſle au Chat. I ſent parties forward on the lake. Sir William Johnſon went to an Indian village, Aſqueſaſhua, to aſſure them of protection on their good behaviour.

September 2d, I rowed twenty-four miles down lake St. Francis, and encamped at point au Beaudet. M. la Corne, with a party, had been here, and at the Indian village. Very violent rain and wind came on at night: luckily our boats were in ſheltered coves.

September 3d, the bad weather continuing, the army halted: a ſcouting party brought in a priſoner from the Cedars.

September 4th, the army was in their boats ſoon after day-break. The weather was favourable for paſſing the worſt part of the river; but I am ſorry to acquaint you, that the rapids were the occaſion of eighty-four men being drowned. We loſt likewiſe twenty-nine batteaus of regiments, ſeventeen of artillery, with ſome artillery and ſtores. Seventeen whale-boats, and one row galley, were ſtaved: the guns with ſome ſtores and proviſions, will be ſaved. I encamped this night at iſle Perrot, about two miles from the river, with the regulars. It was too late for the greateſt part of the artillery and the Provincials to proceed there, and they encamped on the river ſide.

September 5th, the inhabitants of the iſland had all run into the woods, and abandoned their houſes: ſome were taken, and ſome came in. I had the oath of allegiance tendered to them, and I put them in quiet poſſeſſion of their houſes; and they ſeemed as much ſurpriſed with their treatment, as they were happy with it. The neceſſary repairs of boats put it out of my power to proceed this day. The remains of the provincial regiments joined me.

September 6th, the army was in their boats ſoon after day-break. I rowed in four columns by the right, as I intended to land on my left, at La Chine, on the iſland of Montreal, about three leagues from my laſt camp: the weather was favourable, and I landed without oppoſition: ſome flying parties run into Montreal, after a few ſhots. To make the moſt of the day I could, I marched on: the parties had broke up one bridge, which was ſoon repaired: and after a march of two leagues, I formed the troops on a plain before Montreal, where we lay the night on our arms; and I got up two twelve-pounders, five ſix, and five three-pounders, of light artillery. I left the New-York troops, and two Connecticut regiments, for the ſecurity of the boats at La Chine.

September 7th, in the morning, two officers came to an advanced poſt, with a letter from the Marquis de Vaudreuil, referring me to what one of them, Le Colonel Bougainville, had to ſay. The converſation ended with a ceſſation of arms till twelve o'clock, at which time the propoſals came. I returned mine, and wrote to the Marquis de Vaudreuil. This was followed by another letter from the governor: I ſent my anſwer. I then received a letter from M. de Levis, which I anſwered. The troops lay on their arms at night; and ſoon after day, I had a letter from the Marquis de Vaudreuil, which I anſwered, and ſent Major Abercromby into the town, to bring me the articles of capitulation, ſigned by the Marquis de Vaudreuil, of which I have ſent him a duplicate ſigned by me; and Colonel Haldimand, with the grenadiers and light infantry of the army, has taken poſſeſſion poſſeſſion of a poſt, and will proceed to-morrow in fulfilling the articles of capitulation. I thought it better, from the number of battalions, to oblige them not to ſerve during the preſent war, than to encumber England with them as priſoners of war. I ſhall do myſelf the honour of ſending the colours of the battalions to you by the next occaſion.

In the diſturbances between Great Britain and her colonies, a party of Americans attempted to ſurpriſe this town, the 25th of September, 1775, but were repulſed. Nevertheleſs, it was obliged to capitulate to them the 12th of November following. General Burgoyne retook it the 15th of June, 1776.

MONTSERRAT, ENGAGEMENT OFF IN 1759. One of the Carribbee iſlands in the Weſt-Indies. For the particulars of which, ſee the following account of the engagement which happened to the leeward of Montſerrat the 3d of November, between his Majeſty's ſhip Buckingham, of ſixty-ſix guns, Richard Tyrrel, Eſq. commander, and three French men of war, which were convoying a fleet of merchantmen from St. Euſtatia to Martinico.

On the 2d Inſtant, at eight in the evening, his Majeſty's ſhip Buckingham ſailed from St. John's Road in Antigua, and at five next morning (Montſerrat then bearing W. half S. diſtant ſeven miles) chaſed and brought to two ſail, which proved to be Engliſh privateers, and at nine chaſed another ſail, which proved to be the ſloop Weazel, Captain Bowles. At twelve o'clock, (Montſerrat bearing E. N. E. diſtant five leagues), Captain Tyrrel ſaw three ſail bearing W. and by S. ſtanding to the ſouthward, on which he crowded all ſail, and at once perceived a fleet of nineteen ſail; he then made the Weazel's ſignal to chaſe.

At two o'clock, Captain Tyrrel diſcovered a French ſhip of ſeventy-four guns, the Floriſſant, one of thirty-eight, the other of twenty. He cleared ſhip, and got every thing ready to engage. The reſt of the fleet were a ſmall frigate, an armed ſhip, and 14 ſail of ſloops; all which were to the windward of the men of war. At half paſt two, the French men of war formed a line ahead, the Floriſſant hoiſting a red flag at the the mizen-topmaſt-head, and a white jack at her enſign-ſtaff.

At three, the Weazel was ahead of the Buckingham, and fired two ſhot, which the Floriſſant and one of the frigates returned. On this Captain Tyrrel made the Weazel's ſignal to come in, and ordered her to keep cloſe under the Buckingham's ſtern. At half paſt three, the Floriſſant fired her ſtern-chaſe at the Buckingham, which Captain Tyrrel did not return till he got nearer, and then repaid it briſkly.

At four the largeſt frigate bore away under the Buckingham's lee, fired her broadſide, and received one from the Buckingham, on which ſhe thought fit immediately to ſheer off. Captain Tyrrel ſtill continued to fire his bow-chaſe on the Floriſſant, and ſhe her ſtern-chaſe on the Buckingham, who alſo received ſeveral fires from the twenty-eight gun frigate. But Captain Tyrrel finding he could not by this means bring the enemy to a general engagement, he ordered the Buckingham a-yaw, which brought her broadſide to bear on the Floriſſant, and immediately poured it in, great guns and ſmall arms. This the enemy briſkly returned; and at the ſame time, the thirty-eight gun frigate hauled her round, came under the Buckingham's ſtern, and raked her. Several broadſides were exchanged in this manner, till at half an hour paſt five, coming to piſtol-ſhot diſtance, the fire grew extremely hot on both ſides. The Buckingham now fired full broadſides of great guns, and ſmall arms from the tops, poop, and gang-ways, which, in a little time, ſilenced the Floriſſant; and her white jack at the enſign-ſtaff was then obſerved to be ſtruck, and never afterwards hoiſted. Her red flag was alſo lowered from the mizen-topmaſt-head, as far as the mizen-peak.

At half an our paſt ſix the Floriſſant fired only two guns, but Captain Tyrrel ſtill kept up his fire of great guns and ſmall arms.

At a quarter before ſeven, the two ſhips fell aboard: the Floriſſant's jib-boom run in between the Buckingham's main and mizen maſts; and her fore-yard was likewiſe foul of the Buckingham's main-yard. They remained ſome little time in that poſition; and it was obſerved from the Buckingham's tops, and by Captain Frey, with the marines on the poop and gang-ways, that there was not a man on the enemy's poop or quarter deck to fire at; and the few that remained in the tops were in ſuch confuſion, that they threw ſeveral hand grenades without lighting the fuſee.

At ſeven o'clock, Captain Tyrrel got every thing ready for boarding, which the enemy prevented by ſheering off juſt at the time it was to have been put in execution. On this the men cheerfully run back to the great guns, which were loaded with round and grape ſhot, and round and double-headed ſhot; and at twelve yards diſtance the whole broadſide was poured into the enemy, with volleys of ſmall arms from the the tops, poop, and gangways, in ſuch a manner, that not a ſhot could miſs. The enemy all this time being driven from their quarters, and the ſhip ſtill remaining in the ſame poſition, Captain Tyrrel had leiſure to repeat the fire; but a breeze then ſpringing up, it ſheered round the Floriſſant, and brought her ſtern to the Buckingham. The enemy took this opportunity of hoiſting all the ſail they could crowd, and made off, being favoured by the darkneſs of the night, and the great damage the Buckingham had received in her rigging; her tiller rope being ſhot away, all her braces and bowlines gone, her ſails cut to pieces and aback, her maſts, yards, and ſtanding rigging much damaged, and the ſhip under no command. During all the engagement the thirty-eight gun frigate raked the Buckingham whenever ſhe could.

Captain Tyrrel had the misfortune to loſe three fingers from his right hand, and received ſeveral contuſions in his head, arms, and body. We had alſo the great misfortune to loſe Lieutenant Marſhal, a gallant and brave officer. Lieutenant Harris, of the marines, and Mr. Winterborne, the maſter, were both dangerouſly wounded. In all, the Buckingham, had ſeven men killed, and forty-ſix wounded, two of which died ſoon after.

We ſhall add no encomiums on the behaviour of the the officers or men belonging to the Buckingham; what that muſt have been, the facts contained in the foregoing narrative ſufficiently declare. Captain Tyrrel laboured under this diſadvantage, that from his conduct great things were expected from him whenever he came to be oppoſed in action. However, on this occaſion, he far ſurpaſſed the moſt ſanguine expectations, heightened as they were. Nor could the bravery of our enemies be denied, had they not ungeneroufly given into a meaſure fit hardly to be named of the worſt of pirates, and common ſea robbers. Their great guns were ſtuffed with ſtar langrage, pieces of caſt metal, and other ſuch mortifying rubbiſh; and their ſmall arms were loaded with chewed bullets; many of which were found on board the Buckingham, and ready to be produced. Their langrage was a ſquare bar of iron four inches long, notched on the angles to make the wound leſs curable. This is a practice mean and baſe in the higheſt degree, as it is of no advantage to the action, but only ſerves to add future languiſhing torments to the wounds received in battle, and exhibits an inſtance of French manners, and French honour.

The French men of war got into the Granades, the Floriſſant was an entire wreck, her whole ſide being one port, having ſeven feet water in her hold, and all her guns and ſtores taken out. The French confeſſed they loſt 140 men, but it was imagined they loſt upwards of 300.

MONZHEER, OR MONGHEER, TAKEN IN 1764. A town ſituated in the province of Bengal, Eaſt-Indies; for the particulars of which ſee the following letters. As this rupture began unexpectedly, we think it requiſite to lay before our readers the reaſons that occaſioned it.

When Lord Clive left Bengal in January, 1760, the political ſtate of the province was as follows:

Our alliance with the Nabob, Jaffier Ally Cawn, had continued uninfringed three years, and we had rendered him very ſignal ſervices.

Our character throughout the empire was reſpected and admired; our military reputation in particular was in its higheſt luſture.

The force left by Lord Clive was greater than had been ſeen in the country ſince the battle of Pleſſey, and there was no enemy to contend with but the Shah Zada, ſon to the Mogul, who had never dared to make a ſtand againſt us, when we had ſcarce half the force.

Yet in a few months, by the ill conduct of Ramnaran, deputy nabob of Bahar, the Shah Zada gained ſuch an advantage, that the government was obliged to make head againſt him every way. In a ſecond engagement ſome advantage was gained over the Shah Zada by the young nabob, ſon to Jaffier Ally Cawn, aſſiſted by us; but before it could be ſufficiently improved, a ſtop was put to all operations by the death of the young nabob, who was killed by lightning, as he was ſleeping in his tent, on the 20th of July.

This event threw Jaffier Ally Cawn into the greateſt diſtreſs; he had no other child grown up to manhood; and though nobody would have attempted his life, while there was a ſucceſſor to revenge his death, yet he now became ſuſpicious and apprehenſive, and not without reaſon. He was preſſed on every ſide for money; ſome provinces were in rebellion, his army mutinying, and his friends the Engliſh in almoſt equal diſtreſs, the provinces that had been mortgaged to them paying little or no revenue, no money from Europe, and the Nabob greatly in arrear at the ſame time. The gentlemen of Fort St. George wrote preſſingly for money, declaring they could not carry on the war without it. There was an inveſtment to be provided, and a large army to pay.

At this juncture Coſſim Ally Cawn, ſon-in-law to the Nabob, came down to Mr. Vanſittart, to conſult with him on the diſtreſſes of the ſtate. The gentlemen of the ſecret committee ſeemed determined to have him appointed miniſter, upon which a treaty was made on the 15th of September, 1760, between Coſſim Cawn and Mr. Vanſittart, in which it was ſtipulated,

I. That Jaffier Ally Cawn ſhould continue in his dignities; that all affairs ſhould be tranſacted in his name, and that a ſuitable income ſhould be allowed for his expences.

II. That Coſſim Cawn ſhould be deputy, and adminiſter the government, and ſucceed to the nabobſhip at Jaffier's death.

III. That firm friendſhip and union ſhould ſubſiſt between us and Coſſim, his enemies and friends to be ours.

IV. The Engliſh army ſhould aſſiſt Coſſim againſt all his enemies, its charges being paid, for which the lands of Burdwan, Middinport, and Chittigong, ſhall be aſſigned; the Company to ſtand to all loſſes, and receive all the profits of theſe three countries.

Againſt this treaty ſeveral of the council proteſted.

Of what happened in conſequence of it, the following account is given by Mr. Vanſittart, in a memorial, the date of which does not appear.

"The Subah Jaffier Ally Cawn was extremely tyrannical, avaricious, and indolent; and the people about him being abject ſlaves, or the inſtruments of his vices, there was no chance of having the government properly conducted but by their removal. He attributed the ill ſucceſs of his affairs to imaginary plots and contrivances, and ſacrificed numberleſs lives without mercy to his exceſs of jealouſy.

An order was ſent to Jeſſaret Cawn, the Nabob of Dacca, to put to death all the ſurvivors of the family of the Nabobs Allworde Cawn, Shamut Jung, and Suraja Dowla, but upon his declining to obey it, the meſſenger, who had private inſtructions to execute this tragedy in caſe of the others refuſal, maſſacred them all, with about twenty women, their attendants.

Executions of this kind had made the Nabob the dread and deteſtation of all good men, and he neceſſarily became a prey to people of mean extraction and abject diſpoſitions, who ſought only to make themſelves rich by oppreſſion, which increaſed taxes, and occaſioned a ſcarcity of proviſions.

The Nabob, immerſed in ſenſuality, was wholly indifferent about his affairs. No money came into his treaſury, nothing was paid to his army, his troops mutinied and ſurrounded his palace, threatening his life, which they would certainly have taken away, had not his ſon-in-law, the preſent Subah, Coſſim Ally Cawn, become anſwerable, and paid them a large ſum out of his own treaſury. This happened laſt June, yet the danger was no ſooner over, than he fell back into his former lethargy; the ſame unworthy miniſters managed his affairs, and another month would hardly have paſſed before he would have been cut off by his own ſepoys, and the city become a ſcene of plunder and diſorder.

Two hoſtile armies were alſo in the field, and waited only for the fair weather to advance; the Shah Zada towards Patna, and the Beerboon Rajah towards Muxadavad. The Rajahs of Biſſonpoor, Rangies, and the other countries bordering upon the mountains, were ready to ſhake off their dependence, and had already offered conſiderable ſupplies to the Beerboon Rajah. The Rajah of Curroch had committed open hoſtilities, and had taken poſſeſſion of all the country about Bogglepoor, which entirely ſtopped the communication between the two provinces on that ſide of the river. In a word, the whole country ſeemed ripe for an univerſal revolt. To encounter all theſe difficulties, there was nothing but troops without pay, from whom no great efforts could be expected.

All who are now in Bengal, and acquainted with the tranſactions of government, will bear witneſs that this is a true ſtate of the fact. Affairs were therefore at an extremity no longer to be neglected without manifeſt danger, and I was reſolved to uſe my utmoſt endeavours to get theſe bad miniſters removed; in order to which, I judged it convenient to carry with me a detachment of Europeans and ſepoys, under a pretence of ſending them with Colonel Caillaud to reinforce the army at Patna.

In the converſations I had with the Nabob, I took occaſion to repreſent to him in general terms, the bad management of his miniſters, the univerſal diſaffection of the country, and the deſperate ſtate of his as well as the Company's affairs. To convince him of the weakneſs of his adminiſtration, and to point out the means for their removal, I had prepared three letters, which, after a ſhort and friendly introduction, I delivered to him.

The firſt repreſented that the Engliſh forces were unpaid; that the country forces were alſo unpaid, and therefore mutinous; that the ſepoys had endangered his life when Coſſim Cawn interpoſed: that his miniſters plundered and murdered the people, and were bringing deſolation on the country: that proviſions were ſcarcely to be procured on any terms: that the coin minted at Calcutta was not ſuffered to paſs for its full value: that the war with Shah Zada was not near a concluſion: that only a ſmall part of the whole province of Patna remained in his poſſeſſion: that all the lands and villages were in a ſtate of ruin, and the chiefs every where ready to join the Shah Zada. The letter concludes with theſe words: "After long conſideration, I concluded that I would make one vigorous trial, immediately to remedy theſe evils; hoping, by God's aſſiſtance to ſurmount all difficulties. For this reaſon I am come with great joy into your preſence, and am happy in paying you my reſpects."

The ſecond letter repreſented, that the troubles of Patna were owing to the non-execution of an order he himſelf had ſolicited from the Governor.

The third letter informs him, that the affairs of regulation, which were the objects of his viſit, were ſubmitted to his conſideration in a ſeparate addreſs, containing ſeven articles, which addreſs is not inſerted in any publication yet made relating to this affair. It contains alſo a requiſition of certain lands to pay the Engliſh troops, and incidental expences, and intimates, that if what is required is not granted, recourſe will be had to force.

The Subah ſeemed much affected by the peruſal of theſe letters; and at length confeſſed himſelf, through age, and grief for the late loſs of his ſon, incapable of ſtruggling alone againſt ſo many difficulties; he deſired that he might have time to conſult with his friends. I told him, the men with whom he had lately adviſed were his greateſt enemies; that his returning again to them could only be the means of augmenting his difficulties; that he had much better take the aſſiſtance of one from among his relations, on whoſe fidelity he might more ſafely rely. He named five or ſix, and amongſt them Coſſim Ally Cawn, who was, as he owned himſelf, the moſt proper; nevertheleſs, it was with the utmoſt difficulty I could prevail on him to ſend for him, and the jealouſy he diſcovered on the occaſion was ſuch, that I ſaw he would never conſent without ſome ſort of force to give the other the means of reſtoring order to his affairs. When Coſſim Ally Cawn arrived at Mauraudbaug, he ſeemed extremely apprehenſive that the Nabob, inſtead of truſting him with the management of his affairs, would endeavour to get rid of him. I agreed, therefore, that he ſhould not go to the Nabob's palace until meaſures were taken for his ſecurity. We reſolved to give the Nabob the next day, the 19th, to reflect upon the letters beforementioned, in hopes that he would propoſe ſome means of regulation. I heard nothing from him all day, but found by my intelligence that he had been in council with his old adviſers, whoſe advice I was ſure would be contrary to the welfare of the country in general, and that of the company in particular. I determined to act immediately on the Nabob's fears; there could not be a better opportunity than the night of the 19th afforded, it being the concluſion of the Gentoo feaſt, when all the principal people of that caſt would be pretty well fatigued with their ceremonies. Accordingly I agreed with Colonel Caillaud that he ſhould croſs the river with the detachment between four and five in the morning, and having joined Coſſim Ally Cawn and his people, march to the Subah's palace, and ſurround it juſt at day-break, being extremely deſirous to prevent any diſturbance or bloodſhed. I wrote a letter to the Nabob, and delivered it to the Colonel, to ſend it to him when he ſhould think moſt expedient. Meaſures were taken at the ſame time for ſeizing his miniſters. The neceſſary preparations being accordingly made, the Colonel embarked with the troops, joined Coſſim Ally Cawn without the leaſt alarm, and marched into the court-yard of the palace, juſt at the proper inſtant, the gates of the inner court being ſhut. The Colonel formed his men without, and ſent my letter to the Nabob, who was at firſt in a great rage, and threatened he would make what reſiſtance he could, and take his fate; but at length ſent a meſſage to Coſſim Ally Cawn, informing him that he was ready to reſign the ſeals, provided he would take the government upon him, diſcharge the arrears due to the troops, and pay the uſual revenues to the king; to ſave his life and honour, and give him an allowance ſufficient for his maintenance. Theſe conditions being agreed to, Coſſim Ally Cawn was proclaimed, the troops took poſſeſſion of the gates; the general officers and perſons of diſtinction made their acknowledgments; and in the evening every thing was perfectly quiet, as if there had been no change. The people in general ſeemed much pleaſed with this revolution; which was brought about without the leaſt diſturbance in the town, or a drop of blood ſpilt.

The Nabob did not think himſelf ſafe even one night in the city, and requeſted that he might be permitted to live in Calcutta, where he ſhould be extremely happy, which was granted. Coſſim Ally Cawn ſupplied him with boats, and ſuffered him to take away his women, with a reaſonable quantity of jewels. I furniſhed him with a ſtrong eſcort of Europeans and ſepoys, and intended to lodge him the firſt night at Herageib, but he choſe to ſleep in his boats. The next day I viſited him with Colonel Caillaud; he appeared reconciled with the loſs of a power which he owned to be too much for his abilities to manage ſince the death of his ſon; and the enjoyment of the remaining part of his days in peace and ſecurity, under the Engliſh protection, ſeemed to be the chief object of his wiſhes.

On the morning of the 22d he ſet out for Calcutta, and arrived there the 29th; he was met by a deputation from the council, and treated with every mark of reſpect due to his former dignity.

Coſſim Cawn, who had more abilities than his predeceſſor, applied himſelf to the regulation of his finances, and his meaſures were greatly facilitated by the total defeat of the Shah Zada, which happened ſoon after, and the reduction of the rebel rajahs.

This ſtrengthened the Nabob in his new power, and at the ſame time we imprudently gave up to his reſentment Ramnaran, whoſe power was the only check upon him, and whoſe attachment we had often experienced on the moſt intereſting occaſions; by this ſacrifice we alſo loſt the confidence of all the country powers.

The depoſing Jaffier Ally Cawn had divided the council and ſettlement into two irreconcileable parties, and the new Nabob himſelf, not knowing how ſoon he might quarrel with his new friends, retired from his capital to a ſtrong fort 300 miles from Calcutta, where he buſied himſelf in forming an army on our model, receiving our ſepoys and their officers into his ſervice, to teach his troops our diſcipline, and procuring a vaſt quantity of firelocks inſtead of match locks, with a good train of field artillery.

In the mean time many diſputes aroſe between us, concerning ſome incroachments in trade on our part, which the Nabob juſt complained of, and then checked by force.

Mr. Vanſittart, unwilling to uſe force on his ſide, went up to the Nabob to adjuſt their differences, and at length concluded a treaty, which his council refuſed to ratify, becauſe, among other articles, there was one which ſubjected our ſervants to the Nabob's courts. In ſupport of this refuſal, they called upon the chiefs of the out-factories who had ſeats at the board; and having over-ruled the Governor, they ſent a deputation to the Nabob, conſiſting of Mr. Amyat the ſecond, and ſome other gentlemen, to demand more favourable terms. The Nabob, however, aſſerted the validity of the treaty then in being; and having a full treaſury and a large army, he ſeized ſome boats near Patna for the duties which by that treaty were his right. Mr. Ellis, the chief at Patna, repelled force with force, and a ſkirmiſh enſued, which ended in the capture of Patna by our people, with a great ſlaughter of the Nabob's people; the next day the Nabob retook the place, and all our troops were in their turn either killed or taken priſoners.

A party alſo overtook Mr. Amyat, and the other gentlemen of the deputation, while they were yet within the Nabob's reach, and having killed Mr. Amyat and Mr. Wollaſton, both gentlemen of very amiable characters, took the reſt priſoners. The council received advice of theſe tranſactions, proclaimed Jaffier Ally Cawn without the concurrence of the Governor; and Major Adams, the commanding officer, took the field."

The following is an Account ſent by Major Adams, in a Letter dated at the Camp before Mongheer, the 5th of October, 1763, to the late Earl of Egremont, of the late Military Tranſactions in thoſe Parts.

"After the treacherous murder of Mr. Amyat, and other gentlemen in his company, on the 3d of July, at Murſhedabad, by the order of the Nabob Coſſim Ally Cawn, I took the field by the order of the preſident and council of Fort William, with his Majeſty's 84th regiment of foot, 150 of the Company's forces, two troops of European cavalry, one of Black cavalry, ten companies of ſepoys, and twelve pieces of cannon; and on the 10th proclaimed Jaffier Ally Cawn, Nabob of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orixa, as had been done ſome days before at Fort William.

On the 11th, ſix companies of our ſepoys with one piece of cannon, on their march from Birdawan to join the army, were attacked near Cutwa by a numerous body of the enemy's cavalry, who, by repeated efforts, broke our ſepoys three times, but by the prudent diſpoſition and gallant behaviour of Lieutenant Glenn, who commanded them, the enemy were at laſt obliged to retire with a conſiderable loſs. I immediately ordered an advanced party, which conſiſted of fifty European infantry, a troop of cavalry, three companies of ſepoys, and two pieces of cannon, commanded by Captain Long of his Majeſty's 84th regiment, to join Lieutenant Glenn, and diſpoſſeſs the enemy of the village of Cutwa. They accordingly on the 14th attacked the enemy, and after a very obſtinate reſiſtance obliged them to quit the place with great loſs, leaving three pieces of cannon.

On the 16th I croſſed the Coſſambazzar river with the army at Agurdub, and on the 19th in the morning I attacked the enemy, who were drawn out at Ballaſſara ready to receive me, oppoſite to the fort of Cutwa, having thrown up an intrenchment with ſeveral pieces of cannon in front of their right, and having on their left a marſhy ground. Perceiving their diſpoſition, I made a motion to their right in order to attack their left flank, which was open. This movement obliged them to alter their whole diſpoſition; and immediately 2500 Patna horſe, and 1000 ſepoys, marched out to attack our right wing, which they did with great reſolution, and bore our cannonade very well till within fifty yards of us, when our grape-ſhot and a diſcharge of muſquetry obliged them to fly with great precipitation, as did likewiſe their main body. Our ſepoys and cavalry purſued them with great ſlaughter; they ran towards the city of Murſhedabad, leaving us all the cannon; and likewiſe abandoned the fort of Cutwa on the oppoſite ſide of the river. By the beſt accounts I could get, the enemy were about 10,000 horſe and foot, and they had 7000 or 8000 killed, with their commanding officer Mahamud Tuchy Cawn. I proceeded after the fugitives, and arrived within two miles of the city on the 23d, and determined to attack them immediately, though conſiderably reinforced and ſtrongly intrenched. But finding that their intrenchments were fourteen or fifteen feet high, and well defended with cannon, and that it would be impoſſible to get poſſeſſion of them in the face of an enemy without a conſiderable loſs. I therefore thought it adviſable to make uſe of a feint, and accordingly ordered a ſmall detachment to advance towards the ſouth part of their works, where they had collected their principal force, in order to amuſe them, whilſt I marched the army at two in the morning of the 24th, round to the north-eaſt; and at daylight attacked that part of their works where they had but a ſlight guard, and which they ſoon abandoned, as well as the city, and retired towards Scoree, leaving us all their cannon.

I then proceeded to Saddockhang, where I halted four days to refreſh the army, greatly fatigued by exceſſive hard duty, and almoſt inceſſant rains. Here I received advice, that the factory of Decca, which had been taken ſome days before by Coſſim Ally Cawn's people, was retaken by Meſſrs. Grant and Swinton's battalions of ſepoys, and that the latter was ordered with his battalion to join me immediately.

On the 29th, I again croſſed the Coſſambazzar river at Naſſapon, and was joined at Mahamudhore by Major Carnac with 100 Europeans, one battalion of ſepoys, one troop of Black cavalry, and two pieces of cannon from Bardawen.

Auguſt the 1ſt, I croſſed Nuncas Nulla, which ſeparated us from the enemy, over which I immediately ordered bridges to be thrown; and at four in the morning of the 2d, I marched the army over, leaving the baggage on an iſland, formed by the two Nullas, defended by a party of ſepoys and one piece of cannon. Between ſeven and eight o'clock I came within ſight of the enemy's whole army, drawn up in order of battle, much more numerous than I expected; 8000 ſepoys, 20,000 horſe, and twenty pieces of cannon, beſides matchlock and rocket-men, compoſed their army according to the beſt accounts I could get; the artillery were all mounted in the Engliſh manner, and ſerved by 200 Europeans of thoſe taken at Patna, of which one company were artillery men; and their ſepoys were armed, clothed, and accoutred like our own. The whole were divided into brigades, and poſted in a very advantageous manner. I immediately began to form, and moved up within a very ſmall diſtance of the enemy without receiving a ſhot, neither did they begin to cannonade till I began the attack, a circumſtance never before known in India. After a very obſtinate diſpute of near four hours, they retired, leaving me all their cannon. Their cavalry charged the 84th regiment, when ſeparated from the main body, with uncommon reſolution in front and rear three ſeveral times within twenty yards; which having obliged the battalion to change its face, the enemy was repelled with loſs.

About 2000 of the enemy lay dead on the field of battle; 80 Europeans and foreigners immediately came off to us, and 150 boats laden with military ſtores fell into our hands. The Engliſh of the Patna detachment would not inliſt in Coſſim Ally Cawn's ſervice, they were therefore kept priſoners at Mongheer.

The enemy retired to Auda Nulla, a poſt which they had been fortifying for ſome time, and remarkably ſtrong by nature, having in front a very conſiderable ſwamp, and protected on one flank by the mountains, and on the other by the river. Here they threw up a work, and mounted upwards of 100 pieces of cannon, having a very deep ditch in front, fifty-four feet broad, and full of water except towards the hills. We had no other method of carrying on approaches towards it, but on the bank of the river, on account of the ſwamp. The breadth of the dry ground did not exceed 200 yards. On the 21ſt of Auguſt I encamped within 3000 yards of the enemy's works, and began to throw up an intrenchment to protect the camp from any attempts of the enemy's cavalry, that my attention might not be taken off from the ſiege.

On the 24th at night, I advanced an approach under the bank of the river, and erected a redoubt for the protection of the trenches within 1200 yards of the enemy's works, into which I ordered 120 Europeans, 300 Sepoys, and three pieces of cannon. On the 25th at noon, the enemy marched a conſiderable number of Sepoys to attack it, who were permitted to advance within 100 yards, when they received ſuch a warm fire as to oblige them to retreat, leaving about 100 killed and wounded on the ſpot.

On the 27th, our approaches were carried on 450 yards farther, and a redoubt ſimilar to the former was finiſhed, but I could not get the grand battery completed before the 3d of September, on account of the difficulty of getting materials, and the badneſs of the weather This battery I opened in the morning with four eighteen pounders, two twelve-pounders, four howitzers, and one royal, at about 500 yards diſtance; at which time the enemy marched to attack our encampment campment in front and rear, but were eaſily repulſed. On the 4th, finding that our fire had no great effect on the enemy's mud work, and that there was no poſſibility of carrying it by the river, but by advancing our approaches and filling the ditch; and that the enemy's principal attention was taken up with our preſent attack, thinking that part of their works towards the hills quite ſecure by the large lake and ſwamp in front, I determined to attack that part in the morning, and accordingly ordered the two companies of European grenadiers, a company of French volunteers, and 500 grenadier Sepoys, to march at three in the morning, commanded by Captain Irwin of his Majeſty's 84th regiment; to whoſe prudence and perſeverance the ſucceſs of the attempt is principally owing. They were ſupported by 1000 Sepoys and two pieces of cannon, and the whole line to follow him. This was accordingly put in execution in the morning, and we got poſſeſſion of their whole works with a great deal of fatigue, but little loſs in proportion to the importance of the affair. The numbers that were ſlain are incredible, and the number drowned far exceeded the ſlain. About 1400 or 1500 horſe were made priſoners, whom, after taking their horſes and arms from them, I ſent about their buſineſs, the firſt inſtance of this kind ever known in this country. Their conſternation and terror is inconceivable. The roads, particularly at every piece of water, are ſtrewed with dead carcaſſes; and they have never attempted to make any ſtand till we arrived here yeſterday; though many places are fortified by nature, and require very little artificial aſſiſtance to render them impregnable, particularly the paſs of Tiriagully, where they had mounted thirteen pieces of cannon, all which they abandoned on the approach of our advanced guard.

Coſſim Ally Cawn is retired with the principal remains of his army to Patna, leaving a garriſon of 2000 Sepoys in this place, which I hope to be maſter of in a few days. Before he ſet out he left 4000 horſe, and 1000 matchlocks here, with orders to haraſs us during the ſiege by attacking our rear. On our approach they retired to Carrickpore, about eleven coſs diſtance in the hills; to which place I, on the 2d inſtant at night, ordered two battalions of Sepoys and two pieces of cannon to attack and drive them from thence, which they effected with great eaſe, and returned this day to camp.

During our attack at Auda Nulla, a conſiderable detachment of horſe and foot, under the command of Camgor Cawn, proceeded down to Beerbon, through the hills, in order to enter the Bardawan province. They were retarded for ſome time by Captain M'Lean, with a ſmall detachment of Sepoys and two pieces of cannon; but by my laſt accounts from thence, I hear that Camgor Cawn has given him the ſlip, and entered the Bardawan country to the weſtward of him. I have ordered Major Carnac down thither, who in a few days, with the reinforcement juſt arrived from Madras, will, I doubt not, be able to give a good account of them.

The next ſtand that the enemy will make, it is ſaid, will be at Patna. Coſſim Ally Cawn has a great deal of money, and pays his people well, who are all ſoldiers of fortune, and have no connection in the country, being chiefly Perſians and Mogul Tartars, who, on account of the troubles in their own country, are obliged to ſeek a refuge here. He is a cunning, artful politician, but will never venture himſelf in the field, well knowing that his people will fight much better than if he was himſelf preſent.

The Armenians, and ſome Europeans, have had the principal hand in bringing his artillery to ſo great perfection, and forming and diſciplining his Sepoys.

I have the honour to incloſe to your Lordſhip, a return of the killed and wounded in the ſeveral engagements, and of the artillery and ſtores taken from the enemy.

I have the honour to be, &c.
THOMAS ADAMS.

Extract of a Letter from Major Adams to the late Earl of Egremont, dated at the Head-Quarters at Doudnagur, in Bengal, November 20th, 1763.

In my laſt, I acquainted your Lordſhip with the happy ſituation of affairs in this country, and with the proceedings of the campaign to the commencement of the ſiege of Mongheer. On the 4th of October, I ordered faſcines and other materials to be provided for that purpoſe; and on the 8th, I had three batteries ready to open on the fort, one of two eighteen-pounders, at 350 yards diſtance, to batter the ſouth curtain near the river, where the ditch was diſcontinued; and by the falling of the river, the bank ſerved as an epaulment to protect our battery from being enfiladed, and a cover for ſtorming. Another battery of one twelve-pounder, to enfilade the eaſt face; and a third of one eighteen-pounder, to enfilade the ſouth face of the fort. But we were prevented opening them, by the commandant (Areb Ally Cawn) promiſing to ſurrender at diſcretion. He was induced to treat with me, from an account he had heard from Gurgin Cawn, otherwiſe Caja Gregore, his patron, being cut off by Coſſim Ally Cawn, on his march to Patna. The whole morning was ſpent waiting for the garriſon to ſurrender; but unluckily, a rumour getting amongſt their ſepoys, that we had marched down a battalion of ſepoys to plunder them as ſoon as diſarmed (which was in reality done for their protection), they began a very warm fire from all their works, which we ſoon ſilenced by our enfilading batteries, that ſwept their whole curtains where their cannon were mounted, their baſtions being ſo ſmall as not to admit guns of any conſequence. On the 9th, we opened our battery of two eighteen-pounders to breach the curtains. The enemy were not ſo much annoyed by our enfilading batteries as they were on the 8th, having thrown up traverſes on the curtains. On the 10th, I opened another battery of two eight-inch howitzers, within 180 yards of the curtain, with which, and the two eighteen-pounders, we continued to batter it, and before night made the breach very practicable. At night, I erected another battery for one twelve-pounder, to diſmount a gun which the enemy had mounted on the the demi-baſtion of the ſouth gateway, to flank the breach. On the 11th in the morning, the enemy ſurrendered at diſcretion, having laid down their arms, and marched out of the fort: the garriſon conſiſted of about 2000 men. Before I arrived at Mongheer, I ordered Captain Wedderburn with his volunteer company, two companies of ſepoys, and two pieces of cannon, to advance up the river in boats, in order to pick up any of the enemy's boats that might have been in the rear; and to endeavour, when he arrived near Patna, to acquaint our captive gentlemen, who were lately removed from Mongheer, of his approach, that they might have concerted meaſures to effect their eſcape, which he would facilitate; alſo to prevent any ſupplies of grain going into Patna from the oppoſite ſide. This piece of ſervice he effectually performed, except what regarded the captives, who were all inhumanly maſſacred on the 6th ult. before Captain Wedderburn's arrival, by order of Coſſim Ally Cawn. One Someros, a German, commonly called Soomeroo, was the infamous villain who executed theſe orders, with a company of ſepoys, trained up by himſelf. Forty-nine gentlemen, twenty-five of them in irons, were murdered in one houſe, with about fifty ſoldiers in irons; and nine gentlemen, with the remaining part of the Engliſhmen who were priſoners, were put to death in other parts of the country where they were confined, amounting in the whole to about 200. Dr. Fullarton was the only perſon who eſcaped from Patna, having received a pardon from Coſſim Ally Cawn a few days before the maſſacre of the Engliſh. Tagulpat, the famous banker, and his brother, with Ramnaran, late Subah of Patna, Rajah Bullub, and twenty-ſeven others, moſt of them their relations or dependents, were put to death by the ſame executioner. Ramnaran was thrown into the river; and the bodies of the others were expoſed to be devoured by the beaſts and birds of prey, and a guard of ſepoys ſet over them to prevent their relations from burning them, according to the cuſtom of their religion. In Mongheer, I found large magazines well ſtocked with ammunition and grain. I immediately, after the ſurrender of the place, ordered a bridge to be thrown over Singia Nulla, and a detachment of the army to proceed on to Rai Nulla. After ſettling the garriſon, regulating the hoſpital, and embarking the battering cannon, I marched the army; and on the 25th of October, I encamped within four miles of Patna, and ordered the neceſſary materials to be provided for carrying on the ſiege, which I imagined would be pretty hot, as Coſſim Ally Cawn had left 10,000 men in the place; he himſelf, with a ſmall part of his army, being encamped at Bieram, about ten coſs to the weſtward of it: the remainder of his horſe he ordered to attack and haraſs our rear during the ſiege. A part of our boats were attacked by 600 horſe, about ten coſs diſtant; but the eſcort luckily beat them off without any loſs on our ſide. On the 28th, I marched the army away to the confines of the ſuburbs of Patna, and encamped them in a ſtrong poſt, almoſt entirely ſurrounded by a high bank and ditch, within two miles of the walls of the city. On the 30th, at night, I ordered ſome ſhells to be thrown from two howitzers into the city, to amuſe the enemy, whilſt a battery was erected on the bank of the river, 260 yards diſtant, with four embrazures, to batter the curtain near the north-eaſt angle, by the river. Here I thought it neceſſary to breach, for the ſame reaſon that I breached near the river at Mongheer. On the morning of the 31ſt we had finiſhed the battery, and had got in two eighteen-pounders and two howitzers; and the artificers were laying the platform, when the enemy marched out a large body of ſepoys, and advanced, under cover of the mud-walls and hollow-ways, very near to the battery, before they were diſcovered; on which all our ſepoys abandoned it, and the enemy eaſily took poſſeſſion, and blew up our magazine, with a great number of their own people. Captain Smith, who commanded our advanced poſt, inſtantly marched and retook the battery: and on the alarm, a detachment of fifty grenadiers, a battalion of ſepoys, and two pieces of cannon, marched to ſupport our advanced party, which arrived in time to repel a ſecond attack which the enemy made, and perſevered in it with great reſolution. Lieutenants Goddard and Swinton were wounded in this laſt affair, with a great number of our ſepoys, and a few killed: but the enemy's loſs was much greater, notwithſtanding we followed them to the ditch, and were expoſed to their fire from the walls the whole time. The loſs of our magazine was an affecting circumſtance, and what added to it, was the loſs of three boats loaded with ammunition the day before in a violent gale of wind. On the 1ſt of November the battery was opened, with four eighteen-pounders and an eight-inch howitzer, and in a little time we ſilenced moſt of the enemy's cannon on the part attacked; and in the evening we began to breach the curtain. Likewiſe opened another battery, a little to the left of the former one, for one ſix-pounder and one howitzer, to play on the eaſt gateway and its demi-baſtions. On the 2d we continued to play on the breach, having the night before repaired the grand battery, and added another embrazure to the little battery, to the left of it. On the 3d, our working parties were preparing materials for another battery, and for ſtorming, the breach being almoſt practicable. But as the guns of the demi-baſtions of the eaſt-gate, and the baſtion to the ſouth of it were not ſilenced, I determined to erect another battery to deſtroy their defences, and to make another breach in the mud baſtion to the ſouth of the breach already made. At night the enemy were alarmed about nine o'clock, manned all their works, and kept up an inceſſant fire from their great and ſmall arms, which did us no miſchief; but their blue light directed us to pour ſome grape ſhot on them to good advantage. On the 4th, we began to erect a battery for three eighteen-pounders, to take off all the enemy's defences at the eaſt-gate, and to the ſouth of it, and one eighteen-pounder to breach the mud-baſtion, in conjunction with another battery of two pieces of cannon, which I cauſed to be erected near it, the ground not admitting the whole to be together. The enemy, in the night, repaired the mud baſtion, and the inſide of the breach in the curtain, with ſand bags The whole front attacked was ſo cleared of the enemy, as to permit us to look into the

the ditch oppoſite to the breach, which we found full of water, except a little to the right, where there was a paſſage over a mud-bank, which had been thrown up to keep in the water. In the evening, a body of horſe appeared in the rear of our encampment; but our cavalry, and ſome ſepoys, obliged them ſoon to retire with ſome loſs. On the 5th, our two new batteries were opened with very good ſucceſs, the whole front attacked being cleared of the enemy; the mud baſtion was ſufficiently breached, and the repairs of the breach in the curtain knocked off. At night I ordered the party at the batteries, which conſiſted of 100 Europeans, and a battalion of ſepoys, to be reinforced with the two European grenadier companies, completed to eighty men each, five companies of grenadier ſepoys, the former commanded by Captain Irwin, of his Majeſty's 84th regiment, and the latter by Captain Trevanion, with a battalion of ſepoys, and the whole to receive orders from Major Sherlock, who commanded the attack, and to whom I gave directions to keep up a conſtant fire on both breaches at night, and to ſtorm at daylight. I likewiſe ordered all the ſcaling ladders and faſcines to be ready, if required, in the front of the battery. On the 6th, in the morning, at half an hour paſt five o'clock, the European and ſepoy grenadiers entered the breach without any difficulty; but the enemy afterwards made an obſtinate reſiſtance, which coſt them about 1500 men. As ſoon as the attack began, I marched the line to ſuſtain it, and in two hours we were maſters of the whole city. Captains Irwin, Champion, Stibbert, Galiez, and Lieutenant Scotland, were wounded, otherwiſe our loſs may be eſteemed trivial upon this occaſion. Captain Irwin is ſince dead. Coſſim Ally Cawn was at Bieram on the day of the attack; but immediately on the receipt of the news, he retired with precipitation to Laſſarum, and drew out all his treaſure and valuable effects from Rotas, with which he proceeded to the banks of the Camiannaſſa, the confines of the province, where he is now waiting for admittance into Sujah Dowlah's country. Sujah Dowlah is Vizier to the Mogul, who will not permit him to croſs the river with his army: an aſylum only for himſelf and family is offered him I marched the army on the 13th inſt. from Patna; and a few days more will, I believe, determine his fate, and put a period to the campaign.

I have the honour to incloſe to your Lordſhip a return of the killed and wounded in the ſeveral attacks, and of the artillery taken.

Further particulars concerning the maſſacre.

To the Honourable Henry Vanſittart, Eſq. Preſident and Governor, &c. Council of Fort William.

Gentlemen,

The accounts which I have communicated to the Preſident, relative to the fate of our gentlemen at Patna, are now confirmed by the arrival of ſeveral of their ſervants in camp. One Aſſuck, conſumah to Mr. Albright, who gives the moſt diſtinct account, I intend to ſend down to Calcutta for your examination. He ſays, that twelve days ago, at nine o'clock in the evening, our gentlemen having drank tea, were acquainted by Mr. Ellis's ſervant that Someros was arrived with ſome ſepoys, on which Mr. Ellis immediately ordered a chair to be brought for him; but inſtead of going to the gentlemen, he ſent away the Mogul who had the charge of them, and went into the cook room, and gave orders to the ſervants, who were getting ſupper ready, to be gone. He then ſent for Meſſrs. Ellis and. Luſhington, who being acquainted he had private buſineſs with them, immediately went to him, and were inſtantly cut down. Afterwards Meſſrs. Hay, Lyon, and Jones, were ſent for, and diſpatched in the ſame manner; as were likewiſe Meſſrs. Chambers, Amphlett, and Gulſton, who were next ſent for with Mr. Smith, but he receiving a cut on the ſhoulder, eſcaped into the room, and acquainted the reſt of the gentlemen, who defended themſelves with bottles and plates, (their knives and forks being taken from them after dinner), and obliged the ſepoys to retire, who immediately loaded their pieces and ſhot them. Twenty-five were in irons. The abovementioned gentlemen, with others, amounting to twenty-four more, were not in irons. He adds, that Captain Wilſon, Engineer Mackecy, Doctor Campbell, and five or ſix others, were murdered at Chaliſatoon, where they were confined with Doctor Fullarton, who was the only gentleman that was not put to death. But that all the Engliſh ſoldiers were yet alive. This horrid maſſacre was perpetrated the night that Coſſim Ally Cawn received the preſident's and my letter.

All accounts agree, likewiſe, that Futta Sing, Ramnaran's brother, and nine more of Ramnaran's relations, were about the ſame time put to death, and that the Seats were put to death near Baar, and their bodies not permitted to be burnt, but expoſed under a guard of ſepoys. The bodies of our gentlemen were moſt of them thrown into a well in the compound of the houſe they were confined in.

They likewiſe ſay, that immediately on receipt of the news of our ſtorming Auda Nulla, Coſſim Ally Cawn ordered all the Engliſh to be ſent out on the river and ſunk there, but was prevented by Ceja Gregore, who, had he lived, they ſay, would have prevented this horrid affair.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your moſt obedient humble ſervant,
(Signed) THOMAS ADAMS.

Camp at Burice, October 18, 1763.

P. S. Petruce can now be of no ſervice to us, I wait for your inſtructions before I ſhall ſet him at liberty.

To the Honourable Henry Vanſittart, Eſq. Preſident and Governor, &c. Council of Fort William.

Gentlemen,

The particulars of the maſſacre of our gentlemen at Patna, of which I have already acquainted you, are all ſince confirmed with this addition:

That Someros having invited our gentlemen to ſup with him, took that opportunity to borrow their knives and forks, in order to entertain them in the Engliſh manner. At night, when he arrived, he ſtood at ſome diſtance in the cook-room to give his orders; and as ſoon as Meſſrs. Ellis and Luſhington entered, the former was ſeized by the hair, and pulling his head backward, another cut his throat; on which Mr. Luſhington immediately knocked him down with his fiſt, ſeized his ſword, killed one, and wounded two more, before he was himſelf cut down. After which, the gentlemen being alarmed by Mr. Smith, ſtood on their defence, and repulſed the Sepoys with plates and bottles. Someros then ordered them to the top of the houſe to fire down on the priſoners, which they obeyed with reluctance, alledging, that they could not think of murdering them in that manner; but if he would give the priſoners arms they would fight them; on which he knocked ſeveral of them down with bamboos, Captain Jocchier being in the neceſſary, eſcaped for that time, but was found out two or three days after, and put to death. All the private men were murdered by ſixty at a time; and the bloody-minded villain carried his reſentment ſo far, as to put a young child of Mr. Ellis's to death.

I am, with great eſteem,
Gentlemen,

MONTENOTTE, BATTLE AT, according to an Extract of a Letter from General Bonaparte, General in Chief of the Army in Italy, to the Executive Directory, the 25th Germinal, 1793.

The campaign of Italy has begun. I have to render you an account of the battle of Montenotte.

After a movement of three days for a change of poſition, General Beaulieu attacked, with a diviſion of 6000 men, the right of the army ſupported on Voltri.

General Crevoni, who commanded that poſt, having under him the 70th and 99th half brigades, ſuſtained the fire with the intrepidity which characterizes the ſoldiers of liberty. I was not miſtaken as to the true intentions of the enemy. From the moment I was informed of the circumſtances of the attack of the right, I ordered General Crevoni to wait for the night, and to fall back by a forced march, concealing his movement from the enemy, on my centre, which was ſupported by the heights of the Madone de Savone.

On the 24th, at four in the morning, Beaulieu in perſon, with 15,000 men, attacked and beat down the poſitions on which the centre of the army was ſupported. At one o'clock he attacked the redoubt of Monte Lezino, which was our laſt intrenchment. The enemy came ſeveral times to the charge, but this redoubt, guarded by 1500 men, was rendered impenetrable. The enemy paſſed the night at the diſtance of piſtol-ſhot.

During the night General Leharpe, with all the troops of the right, took poſt behind the redoubt of Monte Lezino. At one in the morning, I marched with the Generals Berthier and Maſſena, the Commiſſioner Salicetti, and a part of the troops of the centre to the left. We paſſed by Altare on the flank and the rear of the enemy.

At break of day on the 22d, Beaulieu, who had received reinforcements, and Leharpe, attacked each other with vigour, and with different degrees of ſucceſs, when General Maſſena appeared, and ſpread death and terror in the flank and rear of the enemy, where General Argenteau commanded. The route was complete. Two of their generals, Roccavina and Argenteau, are dangerouſly wounded. The loſs of the enemy is between 3 or 4000 men. There are above 2500 priſoners, among whom are a colonel, eight or ten ſuperior officers, and many colours.

On the 24th, at Monte Lezino, the combined armies of the Auſtrians and Piedmonteſe were defeated with a loſs of 10,500 men, 8000 of which were made priſoners, forty pieces of cannon, fifteen ſtandards, and their whole military equipage.

Head-quarters, Carcare, 26 Germinal.

I have given you an account of the opening of the campaign, on the 20th of this month, and I have informed you of the ſignal victory gained by the army of Italy on the fields of Montenotte; I have now to give you an account of the battle of Milleſſimo.

After the battle of Montenotte, I removed my head-quarters to Carcare; I ordered General Leharpe to remove his to Soſello, to menace the eight battalions that the enemy had in that city, and to march the next day by a rapid and ſecret courſe to the city of Cairo.

General Maſſena marched with his diviſion to the heights of Dego; the general of diviſion, Angereau, who had been on the march two days, was in the plains of Carcare; the general of brigade occupied the heights of Bieſtro; general of brigade, Joubert, with the firſt brigade of infantry, occupied the intereſting poſition of Sainte Marguerite.

Our ſoldiers attacked the enemy on all ſides, and purſued them. General Leharpe put himſelf at the head of four ſquadrons of cavalry, and briſkly followed them.

We have, by this victory, taken between 7 and 8000 priſoners, among whom are a lieutenant-general and about twenty or thirty colonels, and almoſt the whole of the following regiments: three companies of Croats, a battalion of Pellegrini, Stein, Vilhem, Schroeder, Tentach, four companies of artillery, ſeveral ſuperior officers of engineers, in the ſervice of the Emperor, and the regiments of Montſerrat, of the marine, of Suze, and four companies of the grenadiers in the ſervice of the king of Sardinia; twenty-two pieces of cannon, with caiſſons, &c. and fifteen ſtand of colours.

The enemy has had between 2000, and 2500 men killed, among whom is a colonel, an aid-de-camp to the king of Sardinia.

Montenotte, where the French lately defeated the Auſtrians, is a mountain at the head of the valley of the Erro, and is at the diſtance of eighty miles from the ſouthern frontiers of France. This river, as well as the waters, which paſs Cairo, where alſo the French have eſtabliſhed themſelves, deſcending by Acqui, join the Tanaro near Aleſſandria, whence the river, after uniting with the Po, forms a broad and rapid current through the Imperial dominions of Milan and Mantua. The Genoeſe territory, whoſe neutrality has been violated by both armies, conſiſts, with the exception of the little inſulated diſtrict of Oneglia, of a narrow ſlip of land, of the length of 150 miles, and of the average breadth of ſcarcely twenty miles. The country from France to Genoa is ſo mountainous and rugged, and momentarily interſected by ſmall rivers, which the mountain ſhowers, in an hour, ſwell into immenſe torrents, that it is almoſt impaſſable except to mules. The mountains on the north, truly denominated the Maritime Alps, though generally miſtated as the Appennines, divide this barren tract from the rich and fruitful hills of Piedmont, and the widely extended plains of Lombardy, and during the laſt winter they alſo ſeparated the contending armies. Theſe mountains, though very high, and their ſummits even in ſummer loaded with congealed ſnow, preſent at the head of almoſt every valley ſome leſs elevated part, by which the peaſants paſs from the ſouthern to the northern ſide. The kings of Sardinia, whoſe cruel fates have placed them between great warlike nations, and neceſſarily made them temporizers, have been frequently obliged to change their allies in a war, and ſometimes in one campaign. The hope of poſſeſſing Dauphiny and Provence, which the Imperial Cabinet has held out as a lure, has frequently made them fight in alliance with Auſtria; and upon the ſucceſs of the French arms in Savoy and Nice, the Sardinian monarchs have as credulouſly liſtened to the propoſitions of France, and with Frenchmen, endeavoured to conquer the Milaneſe, in hope of adding it to their dominions. They, however, were jealous of both. To this day the roads of the mountains continue very impaſſable to the ſmalleſt cars. Mules are uſed even in the more eaſy paſſes, as more ſure-footed than horſes. The paſs of Mont Cenis is well protected by the rough deſcent to Noveleza, by the narrow valley, and the fort of Suza.

The paſſes from Mont Dauphin are oppoſed, excluſive of ſeveral ſmall forts, by the fortreſſes of Pignerol and Saluzzo; and the enemy, who dared to invade Piedmont from the ſide of Nice or the Col di Tenda, might waſte an Alpine ſummer under the walls of Coni.

MONTONI, May 1799.—In the night between the 18th and 19th two deputies arrived in the camp from Montoni, with an account that the armed peaſants, to the number of 10,000, had, after a blockade of nine days, taken the Piedmonteſe fortreſs of Ceva, the French garriſon of which, of 325 men, they had made priſoners of war, and conveyed to Mondovi, to be there confined in the citadel. At the requeſt of theſe deputies an adequate detachment was immediately marched to occupy the above important fortreſs. One of the deputies proceeded with it as a guide, while the other offered to remain as an hoſtage with our troops.

MOREA, formerly called the Peloponneſus, is a peninſula to the ſouth of Greece. In July 1782, notwithſtanding all the precautions of the Porte, againſt the motions of the Albanians, a body of 4000 men of that nation, advanced from the coaſt of the Adriatic ſea to make an incurſion into this part, and ſpread an alarm in the territories under the dominions of the Grand Seignior; but they were repulſed, and beaten back in ſuch a manner, that it was thought in all probability they would not be deſirous of returning.

MULHAUSEN, BATTLE AT. A town of Germany, in Alſace, ſituated on the river Ill, four miles ſouth from Straſburg. This battle was fought on one of the laſt days of December, 1674, between the French General M. de Turenne, who was making a conqueſt of Alſace, and the Imperial General de Bournonville, who was attempting to ſtop his progreſs. Turenne had been lately obliged to abandon Alſace, being ſo much inferior to the enemy, he could not face them in the field; therefore Louis ordered his army to be reinforced.

The troops ſent to recruit Mareſchal Turenne, arrived upon the river Saar towards the end of October. M. de Turenne was not willing they ſhould join the army; becauſe in the deſign which he had to repaſs Lorraine, in order to return into Alſatia by Befort, he had a mind to leave them to recruit themſelves thoroughly, that they might be in a condition to make the vanguard of his army, and to give time to the troops which he had with him, to recruit themſelves in Lorraine. And in fact, one cannot too much admire his conduct, and how he finiſhed this campaign.

They tarried ſome time upon the Saar, under the direction of the Count de Saulx, afterwards Duke of Leſdiguieres, who, during the ſtay there, cauſed the ſiege to be raiſed of a little fort called Blieſcaſtle, attacked by a body of 4000 or 5000 of the enemy. It was defended by a captain of Gaſcoigne, who had his company there: and what was very particular, they found this officer reduced to ſuch an extremity, that he had already eat two of his mules, and was ready to eat his maid ſervant, who had died by accident, and for that purpoſe had put her body into a powdering tub. This man well deſerved a reward; but his company being almoſt entirely loſt in the caſtle, and he being poor, and having not wherewithal to recruit them, the year after he was inhumanly broken: ſo unjuſt, hard-hearted, and cruel was Louvois, then ſecretary of war, and moſt powerful firſt miniſter.

Some time after the troops upon the Saar, who were in quarters of refreſhment, received orders from M. de Turenne to join him, and the body under his command. M. de Turenne took his march through Lorraine, along the mountains as far as Befort. The enemy imagined he was retired to put his army into winter quarters. They marched into Alſatia, put troops into Schelſt, Colmar, and Mulhauſen, and alſo poſted one part both of their horſe and foot on the other ſide of the river Ill. While the French marched ſlowly, M. de Turenne ſent his cavalry into Lorraine, where they cauſed ſome diſorder, but recruited themſelves. The intendant often complained that the country was pillaged: to which the General returned no other anſwer, but that he would give his directions for obſerving better order: and indeed, he could ſhow but little regard to theſe remonſtrances, becauſe the buſineſs was to recruit his army. During all this march, 400 horſe, commanded by the Chevalier de Sourdis, then brigadier, advanced two days journey before the army, which had no news but by them, who, at the end of December, during one of the ſevereſt winters that had been felt, ſpent all the nights on horſeback.

At laſt the army arrived at Befort. There M. de Turenne was informed of the ſituation of the enemy, who did not expect him, and thought, that before they could re-aſſemble from all their quarters, he might fall upon ſome of them in their march, if he advanced diligently with the body of his army. Nor was he miſtaken; for at the head of the gendarmes, one of the laſt days of December, he arrived upon the bank of the Ill, with 1700 or 1800 horſe; at the ſame time that 4000 of the enemy's horſe, being re-aſſembled from the quarters which they had on the other ſide of this river, were marching with all their baggage to Mulhauſen. He did not heſitate one moment whether he ſhould attack them or not.

M. de Bournonville, inſtead of marching directly towards two fords which were in the river, poſted his right on the bank, and his left on a hill, having a little ravine before him. The French paſſed the two fords, the gendarmes that of the right, and M. de Sourdis, with the light horſe, that of the left, in the enemy's flank, of whom he routed ſome ſquadrons; and at the ſame time the firſt troops of the gendarmes, having formed themſelves, bravely paſſed the little ravine. The Scots and Engliſh, who made but one ſquadron, engaged three of the Emperor's cuiraſſiers, and of his beſt regiments, who, after having made their diſcharge, near enough indeed, turned their backs on a ſudden and were purſued as far as Mulhauſen. The Duke of Lorraine's troops performed better on that occaſion than thoſe of the Emperor; the light horſe of Burgundy, commanded by the Count de Broglio, having charged only the right and the front of their ſquadron, who were come out of the defile, and made them give way: the rear and flank of the ſame ſquadron took them again in the flank and rear; ſo that if the Marquis de la Farre had not come up with the Dauphin's gendarmes, they had been defeated: but he puſhed this ſquadron, and all that were come out of the defile with them, beyond the hill. In that time M. de Turenne heard that another body of the enemy, in which there were ſome foot, were marching on the other ſide of the hill. He feared leſt this body, falling upon him, ſhould find his men in diſorder, and therefore rallied them behind the ravine. The Count of Luſignan, who, with his little troop of Engliſh and Scottiſh horſe, was returning from the purſuit of thoſe that fled, being on the other ſide of the ravine, halted there ſome time before three troops of the enemy, who durſt not engage him. And a moment after, having been joined by two little troops of horſe which came from Mulhauſen, he marched up to them, who turned their backs.

After this fight, M. de Turenne continued his march ſtraight to Colmar, where he was told that all the enemy's army were to rendezvous, and had left behind them 300 of their dragoons in the caſtle of Ruffack; rightly judging, that thoſe would not eſcape him when he had put the army to flight. He arrived on the 4th of January, 1675, within half a league of Colmar, where the Elector of Brandenburg had his ammunition and proviſions. The enemy had Colmar on their left, and Turkheim on their right; but their army, though great, could extend itſelf but half a league from Turkheim, into which place they had thrown 300 dragoons. For the reſt, all their front was covered with the rivulet of Turkheim, fordable in ſome places, but not every where. There were vineyards, and great vine-props, where it was troubleſome even for the foot to march.

M. de Turenne being reſolved to attack the enemy, gave his orders over night; and the army being encamped in order of battle, he began to march at break of day, upon the eve of the Epiphany. Inſtead of taking the ſtraight way to the rivulet, and to Colmar, he put all the army into two columns in the valley of Turkheim, as if he had deſigned to climb the hill. No man in the leaſt conceived what was his deſign; for he ſeemed to expoſe his flank to the enemy, who were able to ford the rivulet in ſeveral places, and fall upon him before he was drawn up in order of battle; when all of a ſudden he cauſed Turkheim, in which were the 300 dragoons, to be attacked, and took it. But the paſſage of it being only a defile through which there was no paſſing above four abreaſt, and it being neceſſary to have one that was larger, he ordered bridges to be laid over the rivulet, half a league below Turkheim, over againſt a place where the valley grew wider, both on the enemy's ſide and his own. The enemy marched thither with great part of their infantry; and the French, who, a little before night, obliged them to quit the other ſide of the river, came to a very warm engagement with thoſe who had poſted themſelves in this place to hinder their deſcent.

The Elector of Brandenburg ſeeing M. de Turenne on his flank, thought it proper to retreat during the night; and the Viſcount perceived at break of day, that they abandoned their camp, and conſequently Alſatia; becauſe beyond Straſburg there was nothing to ſubſiſt them, ſince they had for a long time been eating up all that country. M. de Turenne, contented to have made them decamp, ordered the Count de Roye to obſerve their march, without purſuing them; and a few days after received the news that they had all repaſſed the Rhine on the bridge at Straſburg.

Thus ended this campaign, the moſt glorious, as it was the laſt, that M. de Turenne ever made; becauſe it decided the ſucceſs of this war, which, however, was not concluded till the year 1678, by the peace of Nimeguen.

MUNICH, the reſidence of the Elector of Bavaria, was taken by the French in Auguſt 1796, and was ſeized by the French June 26th, 1800, when the General demanded a contribution of ten millions of livres.

MUSSELBURGH, BATTLE AT. A port town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Lothian, ſituated on the Frith of Forth, at the mouth of the river Eſk, about ſix miles eaſt from Edinburgh. This battle was fought on the 10th day of September, 1547, between the Engliſh and Scots. Henry VIII. had agreed with the Scots, that his ſon (afterward Edward VI King of England) ſhould marry their young queen. The proſpect of this match, by which the Engliſh would become maſters of Scotland, was extremely diſagreeable to France. Theſe two kingdoms had been ever allied to each other, and the former had always been of great uſe to the latter in her wars with England. To prevent, therefore, the loſs of ſuch a convenient ally, the French emiſſary in Scotland eſtabliſhed a powerful oppoſition to the intended alliance with England, and ſucceeded ſo far that the Duke of Somerſet, whom Henry had appointed Protector during the minority of his ſon, thought himſelf obliged by force of arms to compel the Scots to execute the contract.

Accordingly he entered the Scottiſh territories, at the head of 15,000 foot, and 3000 horſe. On the other hand, the Scots, to the number of 30,000, with 30 pieces of cannon, were ready to receive the invaders. Before the Protector would engage the enemy, he ſent a letter to the Earl of Arran, the Scottiſh Regent, aſſuring him, his intention was not to hurt the realm of Scotland, but rather to defend it, by promoting an union of the two kingdoms, on fair and honourable terms, by virtue of the marriage, to which the Scottiſh parliament had agreed in the moſt ſolemn manner. He pointed out the advantages that would accrue to Scotland from ſuch a match. He propoſed, that if all the nobility of the kingdom were not inclined to a peace on ſuch terms, hoſtilities ſhould ceaſe until the Queen ſhould be of age to chooſe for herſelf.

The Regent communicated theſe honourable propoſals to his brother John, Archbiſhop of St. Andrews, and a few other individuals,, who being elated with the hope of victory, adviſed him to conceal them from the reſt of the nobility, and in the mean time diffuſed a report through the whole army, that the Engliſh were come to carry off the Queen, and enſlave the country The ſoldiers believed this inſinuation, and took to their arms in a tumultuous manner. Underſtanding that the Engliſh were in motion, they paſſed the river Eſk and took poſſeſſion of a riſing ground, while the Protector wheeled about, and encamped upon the hill of Pinkencleuch, near the ſide of the Frith, where they lay at anchor.

The enemy imagining he intended to reimbark, quitted their advantageous ground in order to attack, and this precipitate ſtep was the cauſe of their deſtruction. The Engliſh began to be in want of proviſion; and had the Scots maintained their poſt, the Protector could not have retreated without expoſing his army to the moſt imminent danger. But the impetuoſity of the enemy ſaved them the riſk of any ſuch diſaſter.

On the 10th day of September, they divided their forces into three bodies. The firſt, under the command of the Earl of Angus, was flanked on the right with four or five pieces of artillery, and on the left with 400 horſemen. The ſecond line was commanded by the Regent, the third by the Earl of Argyle, who had brought into the field 400 Highlanders, and theſe were diſpoſed on the left flanks of the ſecond and third bodies. The Protector ſeeing them abandon their poſts, congratulated himſelf on the event, event, and cauſed his army to be drawn up in order of battle. The van was commanded by the Earl of Warwick, and took poſt on the ſide of the hill where the great artillery was poſted. The main body, under the General, was drawn up partly on the hill, and partly on the plain; and the rear was extended on the plain at ſome diſtance from the van and centre. The Lord Gray, who commanded the men at arms, was poſted at the left wing, ſo as to flank the Scots; but forbidden to charge, until the front of both armies ſhould be engaged. The enemy advancing along ſhore, were galled from an Engliſh galley, the ſhot of which killed the Lord Graham, and threw the Highlanders into confuſion. The Lord Gray perceiving their diſorder, advanced immediately to charge the enemy's van in flank, but met with a warm reception from their ſpearmen, and himſelf was dangerouſly wounded; and as the action happened in broken ground, his men at arms were actually routed, and the ſtandard in great danger of being loſt. Had the Scots been furniſhed with horſe to purſue this advantage, in all probability the Engliſh would have been entirely defeated, though the wind and ſun were full in the faces of the enemy; but as they were deſtitute of cavalry, the Lord Gray had time to rally his horſe behind his infantry.

The Earl of Warwick detached Sir Peter Mewcas, and Peter Gamboa, a Spaniſh officer, with all the muſquetry to attack the Scots, whoſe Highland archers were not yet come up. The Engliſh muſquetry advanced to a ſlough, where the horſe had been diſcomfited, and fired in the faces of the enemy. Theſe were ſuſtained by the archers, who ſhot their arrows over the heads of the muſqueteers; and at the ſame time, the artillery planted on the hill on the left, and the ordnance of the galley anchored cloſe to the ſhore on the left, made ſuch havock amongſt them that they fell in heaps, without having it in their power to annoy their enemies.

In this diſtreſs their van fell back a little, in hope of drawing the Engliſh over the ſlough and broken ground, that they might have an opportunity of acting hand to hand: but the highlanders in the ſecond line imagining their front was defeated, betook themſelves to flight in a body, and this circumſtance overwhelmed their whole army with conſternation. Diſorder and rout immediately enſued. The Scots threw down their arms and fled in the utmoſt confuſion. Then the Engliſh cavalry being rallied, fell in upon the fugitives, and meeting with no reſiſtance, made ſuch terrible carnage that they lay like ſheep in a field of paſture. The whole ſurface of the ground was ſtrewed with ſpears and ſwords. The river Eſk, and ſeveral petty brooks, were ſwelled with the blood of the ſlain, which amounted to 14,000, inſomuch, that when the ſlaughter was over, the very ſoldiers were aſtoniſhed at their own cruelty; for the Engliſh did not loſe above fifty horſemen, and their infantry did not ſtrike a ſtroke. About 3000 eccleſiaſtics, who had made a ſeparate body for themſelves, were maſſacred without mercy. One thouſand five hundred of the vanquiſhed were taken priſoners, and amongſt theſe the Earl of Huntley, the Lords Yeſter, Hamilton, and Wemys, together with the Maſter of Sempil.

Head Quarters, Choul ry Plain
September 24, 1800.

General Orders by Major-General Braithwaite.

The operations of the force employed under the Honourable Colonel Welleſley on the frontier of Myſore, have been frequently marked by circumſtances which demanded and obtained the applauſe of the commander of the army in chief, but in no inſtance has judgment in the plan and gallantry in the execution of a military movement, been ſo eminently conſpicuous as in the concluſion of the campaign on the 10th inſtant, when the Rebel Chief Dhoondia Wang, baffled by the judicious diſpoſition of Colonel Stevenſon's detachment, in his attempt to eſcape in a northern direction, was intercepted in his retreat at Conahgul, by Colonel Welleſley with the cavalry of his diviſion only, and forced to a deciſive action, which terminated in his total defeat and death; Colonel Stevenſon's detachment on the ſame day diſperſing the remnant of his force, then employed in croſſing the Kiſtna near Deodroog, and ſeizing the remaining cannon and baggage of the rebel army.

Major-General Braithwaite requeſts that Colonel Welleſley will accept his public thanks for the judgment with which his meaſures have been planned, and the vigour which has marked every movement of his force. He has particular ſatisfaction in publiſhing to the army at large, the very honourable report Colonel Welleſley has made of Colonel Stevenſon's conduct, and the activity of the detachment under his command, to which that officer attributes the occurrence of the opportunity he ſeized, of forcing Dhoondia to a deciſive action; and the Commander in Chief of the army is happy to record, in honour of his Majeſty's 19th and 25th regiments of light dragoons, and the 1ſt and 2d regiments of native cavalry, that thoſe corps, under Colonel Pater, Majors Patterſon, and Blaquiere and Captains Doveton and Price, compoſed the line, whoſe rapid charge upon a body of 5000 horſe, formed to receive them, achieved this glorious concluſion to a campaign, diſtinguiſhed throughout every ſtage of its operations by peculiar and progreſſive energy.

The Honourable Colonel Welleſly has expreſſed his obligation to Lieutenant-Colonel Bowſer for his ſervices with his detachment from the ſubſidiary force, and reported, in the warmeſt terms of praiſe, the uniform good conduct of the troops in general, under circumſtances of uncommon fatigue, and difficulty, incident to the nature of the recent ſervice. The advantages derived from the able arrangements of the gentlemen charged with the department of ſupply, have been pointed out to the particular notice of the commander of the army in chief, and he is happy in adding this record of their merits to the general expreſſion of his thanks to the Honourable Colonel Welleſley, and the army employed under his orders on the recent ſervice on the frontiers of Myſore.

Fort St. George, September 25, 1800.

General Orders by Government.

The Right Honourable the Governor in Council is pleaſed to publiſh in general orders the following diſpatches, received from Colonel the Honourable Arthur Welleſley:

Camp at Yepalperwy,

SIR, September 10, 1800.

After I had croſſed the Malpurba at Jellahall, I marched on the 3d inſtant, and entered the Nizam's territories at Haramſagur on the 5th. As Colonel Stevenſon was obliged to croſs the Malpurba in boats, he was not able to advance from that river till the 4th. It appeared to me probable, that when Dhoondia ſhould be preſſed by the whole of our force on the northern ſide of the Dooal, he would return into the Savanore by Ramagherry and Kopul, and would thus impede our communication; or, if favoured by the Potans of Canaoul, and the Poligars on the right bank of the Tumbudra, he would paſs that river, and would enter the territories of the Rajah of Myſore. I therefore determined to bring my detachment to the ſouthward, and to prevent the execution of either of thoſe deſigns, if he had them, and afterwards to puſh him to the eaſtward, and to take ſuch advantage of his movements as I might be able, while Colonel Stevenſon ſhould move by Moodgul and Nooſby, at the diſtance between ten and twenty miles from the Kiſtna, and the Mahratta and Mogul cavalry collected in one body between his corps and mine.

I arrived at Kannagherry on the 7th, and on the 8th moved with the cavalry to Baſwapoor; and on the 9th to this place: the infantry being on thoſe days at Howly and Shinnoor, about fifteen miles in my rear. On the 9th in the morning, Dhoondia moved from Malghery, a place about twenty-five miles from Rachoor, at which he had been encamped for ſome days, towards the Kiſtna; but on his road having ſeen Colonel Stevenſon's camp, he returned and encamped about nine miles in my front, between me and Bannoo. It was clear that he did not know that I was ſo near him, and I have reaſon to know, that he believed that I was at Shinnoor.

I moved forward this morning, and met his army at a place called Conahgul, about ſix miles from hence. He was on his march, and to the weſtward, apparently with the deſign of paſſing between the Mahratta and Mogul cavalry, and my detachment, which he ſuppoſed to be at Shinnoor. He had only a large body of cavalry, apparently 5000, which I immediately attacked with the 19th and 25th dragoons, and 1ſt and 2d regiments of cavalry.

The enemy was ſtrongly poſted, with his rear and left flank covered by the village and rock of Conahgul, and ſtood for ſome time with apparent firmneſs; but ſuch was the rapidity and determination of the charge made by thoſe four regiments, which I was obliged to form in one line, in order to equalize in length that of the enemy, that the whole gave way, and were purſued by my cavalry many miles. Many, among others Dhoondia Wang, were killed, and the whole body diſperſed, and were ſcattered in ſmall parties over the face of the country.

Part of the enemy's baggage was ſtill remaining in his camp about three miles from Conahgul; I returned thither, and got poſſeſſion of elephants, camels, and every thing he had.

The complete defeat and diſperſion of the enemy's force, and above all the death of Dhoondia Wang, puts an end to this warfare; and I cannot avoid taking this opportunity of expreſſing my ſenſe of the conduct of the troops. Upon this laſt occaſion their determined valour and diſcipline were conſpicuous; and their conduct, and that of their commanding officers, Colonel Pater, Major Patterſon, Major Blaquiere, Captain Doveton and Captain Price, have deſerved my moſt particular approbation. At the ſame time I muſt inform you that all the troops have undergone, with the greateſt patience and perſeverance, a ſeries of fatiguing ſervices.

It is alſo proper that I ſhould inform you how much reaſon I have to be pleaſed with the gentlemen charged with the buſineſs of procuring ſupplies for the troops; notwithſtanding the diſtance of the ſcene of my operations from the uſual ſources of ſupplies, and rapidity of my marches, and the neceſſity, from the ſpecies of warfare carried on, of perpetually altering their direction, I have always been well ſupplied with every thing which the troops could want.

The Mahratta and Mogul cavalry are now employed in the purſuit of the fugitives, and I propoſe to draw off towards the frontier of the Rajah of Myſore in a few days.

Your moſt obedient humble ſervant,

(Signed) ARTHUR WELLESLEY, COLONEL.

To the Adjutant-General of the Army.

By order of the Right Honourable the Governor in Council.

J. WEBBE, Chief Secretary to Government.

NAMUR, SIEGE OF. A ſtrong city of the Auſtrian Netherlands, ſituated at the confluence of the rivers Sambre and Maeſe, thirty-five miles ſouth-eaſt from Bruſſels. This famous ſiege was undertaken in the year 1692 by the French, under the eye of their monarch Louis XIV. When he ſet out from Paris to make the campaign, he had ſo high an opinion of his projects, that he ſaid this campaign would put an end to the war.

At the time this town was beſieged, it was provided with a gariſon of 8000 men, and with great ſtore of ammunition and proviſion, under the command of Prince Brabanſon, M. de Cohorn, the famous engineer, and others, the braveſt and moſt expert officers among the confederates.

King William III. was at that time in Flanders, and the confederates were ſo numerous on that ſide, that they could bring together an army of 100,000 men. But all theſe obſtacles were not capable of altering the French King's reſolution, who, after every thing was in readineſs for the carrying on ſo great an enterprize, ordered two ſeparate armies to take the field. The leſs numerous of the two was employed in the ſiege; the other to cover it againſt any attempt of the enemy. Theſe two armies conſumed every day 250,000 rations of of bread, and 30,000 buſhels of oats, allowing half a buſhel for each horſe a-day. And the miniſtry (as before at the ſiege of Mons, when the King was alſo preſent) had taken ſuch meaſures as to all the neceſſary ſupplies, that as long as the ſiege laſted there was always in both camps no leſs than for fifteen days proviſion. Twenty thouſand pioneers were employed in making the lines of circumvallation and contravallation, and the trenches were opened in three days after.

The city at firſt made a vigorous defence, but capitulated on the 8th day, finding itſelf not in a condition to ſuſtain a general aſſault. The trenches were on the lower ſide towards the Maeſe, under the cover of a hill, which came within muſquet-ſhot of the greateſt part of the ramparts, ſo that King William had not room to come to the relief of the place. Louis removed afterwards towards the citadel, poſted his army from the Sambre to the Maeſe, and by that means ſhortened the circumvallation.

The ſurrender of this city made the confederates fear that the caſtle, though accounted impregnable, might follow its example; for which reaſon King William, the Prince of Waldeck, general of the Dutch forces, and the Elector of Bavaria, who had lately been made governor of the remaining part of the Spaniſh Netherlands, advanced and poſted themſelves near the banks of the river Mehaigne. Theſe three bodies made together an army of near 100,000 men which was continually in motion to intercept the French convoys, or to endeavour to force their quarters, if they ſhould find an opportunity. Marchal de Luxemburg ſtill ſuperior in number to the confederates, being encamped on a riſing ground on the other ſide the Mehaigne, at about half a league's diſtance from the river, expected them in good order, there being a large plain betwixt them and the enemy.

But King William, whatever inclination he might have to hazard a battle, could not meet with a favourable opportunity to put his deſign in execution, on account of the rains, and overflowings of the river. He cauſed five or ſix ſeveral times bridges to be laid over it, which were immediately broken down again. Thus theſe two great armies encamped within ſight of one another for a whole month, exactly obſerving and following one another's motions, and frequently ſaluting one another with their cannon, without coming to cloſe blows.

In the mean time the ſiege was carried on with all imaginable vigour, the King not only giving his directions upon all occaſions of moment, but frequently ſeeing them put in execution. Being ſeized with the gout when they were juſt ready to attack a covert-way, he cauſed himſelf to be carried in a chair to a place, from whence he could obſerve all that paſſed, and give the neceſſary orders, as occaſion ſhould require.

Here it was that Louis-Alexander, Count of Thouloufe, one of his natural ſons by Madame de Monteſpan, was wounded by his ſide. It was ſaid, there did not appear the leaſt change in the young Prince's countenance at this miſhap, which people interpreted as a happy preſage. The King's forces, animated by his preſence and example, never behaved themſelves better in any ſiege whatever, though the beſieged fired without intermiſſion. The weather was extremely bad during the whole ſiege, the ſoldiers being continually fatigued by the rains and tempeſts; beſides which, they met with ſo many rocks in the carrying on of the trenches, that they could advance but ſlowly, and with a great deal of difficulty; being forced to carry them round about ſeveral great hills and large valleys, which took up a vaſt compaſs. But all theſe obſtacles ſerved only to augment the patience and courage of the French ſoldiers.

The firſt and the braveſt action that happened in the whole ſiege, was near a certain eminence, where the Allies having ſtrongly intrenched themſelves, the French were forced to drive them from that poſt, before they could open the trenches in front of the caſtle. The King's troops attacked them ſword in hand, and with bayonets in their fuzees; the defendants fired very briſkly from their intrenchments, which the French troops having ſuſtained with great bravery, the enemy at their approach quitted the poſt, after they had loſt 200 or 300 men. Within ſix days after they forced the intrenchments of the beſieged, and the redoubts of the hermitage. Fort William, under the brave General Cohorn, the man who built it, defended itſelf ten days; on the 10th they carried the covert-way, not without great ſlaughter on both ſides, when the Dutch garriſon came immediately to a capitulation.

There was remaining as yet the Old Caſtle, with all its out-works, commanded by M. de Brabanſon. This was the moſt difficult taſk, but the works were carried on ſo vigorouſly, that in five days time the beſiegers made an aſſault upon the counterſcarp. The beſieged defended themſelves with all the courage imaginable, but were at laſt forced to give way to the numbers of the aſſailants, who were from time to time ſeconded with freſh troops. Soon after, all their cannon being diſmounted, one of their chief magazines blown up by two bombs, and another having fallen into a great ciſtern which furniſhed the caſtle with water; the mines beſides being ready to ſpring under one of the baſtions of the hornwork; what with hunger and thirſt, what with fear of not being able to ſuſtain a general aſſault for want of reſt, occaſioned by the continual throwing in of bombs, they were neceſſitated to hearken to a capitulation, notwithſtanding that the body of the caſtle was entire, and that they had as yet a hornwork left, which would have coſt no ſmall trouble to take. Out of about 8000 men, of which the garriſon of Namur conſiſted at the beginning of the ſiege, there were about 1200 left in Fort William, and 2500 in the caſtle when they marched out. The reſt periſhed either by ſickneſs, or were killed by the bombs, or in the ſeveral attacks and ſallies.

The taking of Namur in the ſight of an army of almoſt 100,000 men, put all the Spaniſh Netherlands under a moſt terrible conſternation. The common people being extremely diſſatisfied that the relief of a place of ſuch conſequence had not been vigorouſly attempted by the Confederate army, affronted, nay even aſſaulted the Dutch at Bruſſels, and ſeveral other places, and did not ſtick to grumble at King William. And this victory was doubly agreeable to Louis XIV.

on account both of its importance, and that it was gained in King William's fight.

NAMUR, SIEGE OF. The taking of this important place by the French could not but greatly affect King William, therefore in 1695, he formed a deſign to regain it; the plan was without diſpute well laid, and did honour to William's ſagacity, and with it he opened the campaign. To deceive the Duke de Villeroy, the French General, he divided his army into ſeveral bodies. That which he commanded himſelf, compoſed of ſeventy battalions and eighty ſquadrons, encamped near Deynſe: the ſecond, which was to act under the command of the Elector of Bavaria, conſiſted of thirty-ſix battalions, and 130 ſquadrons, lying near Dendermond; the third, under the command of General Eremburg, was of twenty battalions and ten ſquadrons; and the fourth conſiſted of twenty-five battalions, commanded by the Baron de Heyden, and was poſted between Bref and Falcis.

His Majeſty made a motion with his army towards Fort Knock, as if he had a deſign to beſiege it. He actually attacked it three times with ſome loſs. Mareſchal Villeroy, who lay ſecure in his lines, thought he had little reaſon to fear, ſince the King was going to make ſo conſiderable a ſiege. But that Prince taking the advantage of his miſtake, ordered Namur to be inveſted by the troops of Liege and Brandenburg. The army then tacked about and marched with all expedition to the ſiege of that place. At his arrival he cauſed a plan of the country to be drawn, in order to poſt with all poſſible advantage the ſeveral bodies of his army to cover the ſiege. The Duke of Villeroy was ſurpriſed at this unexpected adventure. Mareſchal Boufflers took ſeven regiments of dragoons, a great number of volunteers, engineers, gunners, and miners, and with theſe caſt himſelf into the town. Having made a review of the garriſon, he found them 16,000 ſtrong, which, conſidered with the ſtrength of the place, gave the Mareſchal hopes of making ſo vigorous a reſiſtance, that he ſaid the King of England would repent of his undertaking that ſiege. An army for a garriſon, a Mareſchal of France to animate and command it, 100,000 men under Mareſchal Villeroy to relieve it, 100,000 men employed in the attack, commanded by a King and an Elector, both great captains, was the moſt glorious ſpectacle that the whole war had produced.

King William had left only 30,000 men, under the command of the Prince of Vaudemont in the Lower Flanders. The French King having received news of the ſiege, ſent his orders to Mareſchal Villeroy to enter that country, and if poſſible to fight the Prince. Purſuant to theſe orders, he advanced towards the enemy, who would infallibly have been put to the rout, if the Prince, according to his directions of avoiding any engagement, had not found means to make a ſafe retreat; ſo that in lieu of routing the whole army (of which in all human appearance, but few could have eſcaped) the French were forced to be contented with the defeat of two regiments, who were moſt of them cut to pieces in the purſuit. This was looked upon as one of the moſt fortunate, as well as beſt conducted retreats that ever was made. For if the Prince's army had been routed, the Confederates muſt of neceſſity have raiſed the ſiege of Namur; and in all probability he had not eſcaped if Luxemburg had been living to conduct the expedition. That General held it for a maxim in the buſineſs of war, not to give the enemy time to know his deſigns; but the Duke de Villeroy, whilſt he was uſing abundance of precaution, ſunk into the greateſt imprudence, by giving the Prince of Vaudemont time to make this moſt glorious retreat. This was of a piece with other inſtances of Villeroy's conduct, who with very ſmall talents for war was yet much intruſted.

Ten days after this retreat, the Duke de Villeroy beſieged Dixmuyde, which place ſurrendered in twenty-four hours. Deynſe opened its gates at the approach of the French forces. There were above 8000 well diſciplined troops in theſe two places, who were all made priſoners of war, beſides which, the French found the magazines full of all ſorts of ammunition; and this part of the country having been preſerved on purpoſe by the Confederates, the victorious ſoldiers got an incredible booty. By the conqueſt of theſe two places, the French forces having opened themſelves a way towards Ghent and Antwerp, the Flemings as well as the Dutch were extremely alarmed at it; eſpecially when they ſaw King William advance but ſlowly in the ſiege of Namur, though he was plentifully provided with every thing for a vigorous attack.

The beſiegers had raiſed before it thirty batteries, upon which were mounted 130 pieces of cannon and eighty mortars. This dreadful artillery played almoſt without intermiſſion as long as the ſiege laſted, in which they conſumed three millions of powder. Their army was very formidable, and conſtantly reinforced with freſh troops. What place was able to hold out againſt ſuch an attack? M. de Regnac, who commanded in chief the intrenchments of the beſieged, made ſo many ſallies as filled up the trenches of the Confederates, blew up whole battalions by the ſpringing of his mines, and made it coſt them eight days time before they could make themſelves maſters of thoſe outworks. The Confederates were at laſt ready to make a general aſſault upon the town, if Mareſchal Boufflers and Count Giſcard, who commanded the garriſon, had had the courage to ſtand it. Mareſchal Boufflers was of opinion not to ſurrender the place but at the laſt extremity; he repoſed a great deal of confidence in the bravery of the dragoons that he had brought in with him, from whom he expected wonders; but the Engliſh, whoſe extraordinary courage and intrepidity in aſſaults renders them dreadful, brought Count Giſcard to other ſentiments. He told the Mareſchal, that he thought it not adviſable to venture the loſs of a garriſon compoſed of the beſt troops of France, but rather to put his forces into the caſtle, and ſurrender the town. It did not however capitulate till twenty-four days after opening the trenches, included between the 11th of July and the 5th of Auguſt; all their covert-ways and other outworks being ſo entirely ruined by the Confederates' great artillery, that without the utmoſt hazard they could not pretend to hold out longer. The firſt aſſault had been the moſt terrible that was ever ſeen in the memory of man, it proving no leſs obſtinate than bloody. The Allies renewed the attack four ſeveral times, without being able to lodge themſelves within either of the trenches, though all the time theſe were ſeconded by a ſhower of carcaſſes, bombs, and red-hot bullets, which were ſhot within the works of the town.

This brave reſiſtance giving all imaginable hopes that the caſtle would be able to defend itſelf much longer, Mareſchal de Villeroy advanced with his army towards Bruſſels to bombard that city, unleſs the Confederates would agree not to bombard any place for the future without a formal ſiege. See BRUSSELS.

The beſt and ſtrongeſt edifices were deſtroyed, and near half of the whole city either burnt, or laid level to the ground. But this expedition inſtead of ſaving Namur, ſerved only to diminiſh the King's glory, and to render the Duke de Villeroy odious. The French in their turn underwent no leſs deſolation in their caſtle of Namur. The King of England raiſed five new batteries, to ruin at once all their principal works; ſo that never was a more terrible fire ſeen, than that which M. Cohorn made at that time.

That famous Engineer-General, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf greatly, was preſent when the King of England and the Elector of Bavaria held a council of war, whereto all the engineers of the army were called, and each had the liberty of giving his opinion concerning the attack. Cohorn in his turn gave his ſentiments againſt all the reſt, who had propoſed the ancient method. He alleged, that they ought to avoid the length of a difficult ſiege, and the loſs of abundance of officers and ſoldiers, which was unavoidable, if they followed the accuſtomed method; that as he had helped to raiſe the greateſt part of the place, he knew very well the ſtrength and weakneſs of it: that Mareſchal Boufflers being entered into the caſtle with a numerous garriſon, they ought to endeavour to deſtroy the garriſon by a continual fire from their cannon, and with their bombs, and by the favour of that fire to make their approaches, and to puſh forward their works. Cohorn was of a temper ſweet and calm; and when he ſpoke it was without affectation or paſſion. The novelty of his reaſoning, and the cool air of countenance ſurpriſed the Elector of Bavaria, who, whiſpering the King, aſked, who was that philoſopher? the King anſwered, that the philoſopher's name was Cohorn; and that if they would commit the affair to him, they ſhould ſoon take the caſtle of Namur.

The bombardment of Bruſſels having produced nothing, the Duke de Villeroy returned to put in execution his laſt project. To that end he marched into the plain of Fleurus, where he formed his army conſiſting of 100,000 men, being 100 battalions and 200 ſquadrons. He diſtributed proviſions for twelve days to his ſoldiers, and advanced to the banks of the Maine, threatening to paſs that river; but he found ſo many difficulties in the execution of his deſign, by the diſpoſition of the Confederate army, that he could not force the poſts and avenues they were poſſeſſed off, without running the riſk of loſing a battle; which obliged him to retire, letting Mareſchal Boufflers know that he had no aſſiſtance to expect from him. King William was now joined by the Prince of Vaudemont, and another reinforcement, and had left only 20,000 men to guard the trenches. The French ſay that Villeroy left nothing unattempted upon this occaſion.

All hopes of relief being cut off by the retreat of the French army, the Confederates attacked the caſtle with new vigour. Their great artillery had done ſuch terrible execution againſt it, that all the outworks appeared no otherwiſe than like ſo many heaps of rubbiſh; the poor ſoldiers being for the moſt part obliged to ſhelter themſelves in the vaults againſt the fury of the bombs and bullets, which made breaches every where, Mareſchal de Boufflers having refuſed to hearken to the ſummons ſent him by the Confederates, they prepared for a general aſſault, which was made in eleven places at once.

The day appointed for this bloody action being come, the beſieged ſaw, about ten o'clock in the morning, the enemies infantry appear in two columns above the trenches, advancing in good order towards the breaches. Three thouſand of their beſt men, at the head of whom were the Engliſh grenadiers, out-braved all the reſt in attempting to mount the breach made in the body of the caſtle. There were at leaſt 600 yards diſtance betwixt the head of the trenches and that breach, defended on both ſides with ſeveral outworks, and well provided with a ſufficient number of ſoldiers But theſe brave fellows, under the command of the famous Lord Cuts, made their way through all theſe obſtacles, and advanced ſo briſkly in ſpite of the fire of the French, which galled them both in front and flank, that the firſt battalion planted their colours on the top of the breach. This battalion being ſhocked by the bravery of the beſieged, the ſecond took their place, till being quite broken as well as the former, the flying ſoldiers preſſing one upon another, brought the reſt that were to ſecond them likewiſe into confuſion, who thereupon retreated in great diſorder. All the other aſſaults were made and repulſed with the ſame bravery, notwithſtanding the garriſon was exhauſted of ſtrength by continual fatigues, and for want of reſt; but being animated by the Mareſchal and the reſt of the officers, who alſo remonſtrated to them that the honour of the nation lay at ſtake, and that their ſafety depended only on the points of their ſwords; they gave ſuch proofs of their bravery that the aſſailants were repulſed in all their attacks with great ſlaughter. This was a moſt glorious day for the beſieged as well as the beſiegers.

The Engliſh fought moſt deſperately with the French dragoons, which made the Mareſchal begin to think more ſeriouſly of his future deſtiny. He ſaw himſelf blocked up in a garriſon, in the midſt of a prodigious number of wounded men; and, like a common ſoldier, expoſed to the continual fire of the enemy's bombs and cannon; but what touched him neareſt was, to be himſelf obliged to capitulate, or forced ſword in hand by a general aſſault.

Villeroy, full of chagrin to ſee himſelf unable to execute any thing that might ſave Namur, made yet another motion with his army, and ranged it in order of battle near the wood of St. Dennis. Having examined the the country, and found the paſſes defended by intrenchments, or otherwiſe impracticable by the defiles, marſhes, or floods of water which the Allies had brought in by cutting the banks of the river, he reſolved to advance to Perwys, having before him the Mehaigne. He had a prince to deal with who watched him very cloſely, and who having penetrated into his deſign, encamped at Offin, where he reſolved to expect him. All theſe ſtratagems of war which the Duke de Villeroy made uſe of, ſerved only to increaſe the chagrin that he had, by not being ſo fortunate as to execute the orders of the court. He was at laſt reſolved to make ſome attempt, that he might avoid the ſhame and reproach of being a ſimple ſpectator of that conqueſt. The Marquis de la Floret being detached by King William with thirty ſquadrons, to take a view of the French army; the Mareſchal ordered forty ſquadrons to paſs the Mehaigne aud attack him. The French were drawn into an ambuſcade. and charged with ſo much vigour and reſolution, that they were obliged precipitately to retire with great loſs.

The allies, animated with this advantage, prepared to make a ſecond general aſſault upon the caſtle. Mareſchal Boufflers and Count Giſcard, unwilling to expoſe themſelves to ſo dangerous an experiment, capitulated the 2d of September. The 5th, the caſtle was evacuated, and the beſiegers took poſſeſſion. The French marched out with all the marks of honour through the enemy's army, who opened them a paſſage. But as Mareſchal Boufflers came along, M. Dykvelt came up to make him a compliment, which indeed did not pleaſe him. He deſired him to ſtep aſide, pretending that he had ſomething particular to communicate to him. Boufflers expected nothing leſs from a deputy of the States-General, one of the moſt able members of that government, than ſome overtures of peace; but he was not a little ſurpriſed when that miniſter told him that the King of England had ordered him to be arreſted. He was yet more ſtartled, when M. L'Etange, lieutenant of the body guards of that Prince, ſurrounded him with a detachment, and told him, that he had orders to conduct him to Maeſtricht, in repriſal for the gariſons of Deynſe and Dixmuyde, that had been detained contrary to the capitulations. Boufflers in an inexpreſſible fury deſired leave to ſend to the Elector of Bavaria, which was granted him. He diſpatched Langallerie, who being known to his Electoral Highneſs, that prince made him a thouſand civilities, and told him he was very much concerned at what had happened to the Mareſchal, but could no ways avoid it; becauſe the King of England and the other confederate princes had made uſe of this expedient, to prevent the perpetual infractions that were made upon cartels and capitulations, which were contrary to the law of arms.

As the Mareſchal's buſineſs was to endeavour to get clear of this arreſt, he thought proper to ſend to court, and give the King a relation of all that had paſſed during the ſiege of Namur; and to repreſent to his Majeſty the neceſſity that there was of releaſing the garriſons of Deynſe and Dixmuyde, in order to procure his releaſe. The King ſeemed very well ſatisfied with the account, but extremely uneaſy at the loſs of that important place. He immediately gave orders that the garriſons of Deynſe and Dixmuyde ſhould be releaſed. Boufflers ſent advice of this to the King of England, who gave him his liberty upon his parole, and ſent a guard to protect him to Dinant. Namur was purchaſed at a very dear rate by the Confederates, who, beſides the immenſe expences beſtowed in the carrying on of this ſiege, loſt near 20,000 men, the flower of their whole army.

NAMUR, SIEGE OF. This town having proved itſelf ſo remarkably ſtrong by the two foregoing ſieges, it was never attempted by the Duke of Marlborough. But the French General, Mareſchal Count de Saxe, in 1746, determined to outdo the Duke of Marlborough by laying ſiege to this important place. The Duke of Cumberland being in England, Prince Charles of Lorraine aſſumed the command of the Confederate army, July 4, at Terheyde; the Heſſian troops from Scotland, and a reinforcement of Auſtrians under Count Palfy, had now augmented this army to 87,000 men.

The Confederate generals gueſſed at the Mareſchal Saxe's deſign, and therefore marched into the neighbourhood of Namur, to cover any attacks which the Mareſchal might make. On the 18th of July they were in ſight of the French army, which exceeded 100,000 men, encamped at Gemblours, ten miles north-weſt from Namur. The Mareſchal did not chooſe to attack the Confederates till he had gained poſſeſſion of Namur, he firſt ſeized Dinant, by which he made himſelf maſter of the Maeſe above Namur. Then Huy, which on account of its convenient ſituation, was of great advantage to him. The loſs to the Allies on this occaſion was conſiderable, their grand magazine was taken in Huy, and their communication cut off with Maeſtricht. One would think the Allies were in a lethargic infatuation, to ſuffer themſelves to be ſurpriſed in this manner, and what is ſtill more inexcuſable, they ſuffered Mareſchal Saxe by his poſition to deprive them of all kinds of ſubſiſtence, which obliged Prince Charles of Lorraine to quit his advantageous poſt, and abandon Namur to its own ſtrength. Namur was inveſted immediately by 35,000 men, under the command of the Count de Clermont. The garriſon conſiſted of 7000 Auſtrians, who made a vigorous defence, but a continual ſhower of bombs made ſuch dreadful havock in the city, that in a few days it was converted into a heap of rubbiſh. However, the garriſon held out till the 23d of September, after a ſiege of twenty-one days. The French are ſaid to have obtained this acquiſition at the expence of 4000 men's lives; the French King ordered Te Deum to be ſung throughout all his kingdom for the rapid conqueſt of Namur; his miniſters affirmed that their troops were no longer ſenſible of the lengths to which ſieges were carried in former reigns, and that the ſurrender of Namur was the fruit of a campaign where valour, capacity, and prudence conquered the enemy without fighting them. During the ſiege of Namur the allied army encamped at Maeſtricht, where they were joined by Sir John Ligonier with ſome Britiſh and Bavarian battalions; upon which the Prince reſolved to give the enemy battle, with this view he paſſed the Maeſe on the 13th day of September, and advanced towards Mareſchal Saxe, whom he found ſo advantageouſly poſted at Tongres, that he thought proper to march back again.

Namur was taken by the French, November, 1792, and was retaken by the Auſtrians in March, 1793.

NANTZ, 1793. This unhappy ſpot and its neighbourhood ſuffered much from the Royaliſts, who occupied the whole of the country between Nantz and Rennes, a ſpace little ſhort of ninety miles, and exhibited a ſcene of bloodſhed as the different parties prevailed, and continued ſo near ſeven years. The following was tranſacted November 17, 1799, when the Republican troops to the amount of 450 diſcovered a column of Chouans, two leagues from Segre. The flankers attacked them with a lively fire; the grenadiers of the 40th, and the carabineers of the 19th, ran to the ſpot where the muſquetry was moſt heard, and for a quarter of an hour they repulſed them at all points. A reinforcement of 400 Chouans joining thoſe who were purſued, the two parties choſe poſts, in which to maintain themſelves. The chief of the 109th battalion ſent an order to all the chaſſeurs of the 19th and 25th to ſupport the two companies in front of the Chouans: but at this moment the latter received a new reinforcement. This accident thwarted our plan of charging them; the Chief of the battalion perceiving this, advanced himſelf with the reſerve. It was then that the action was fought with unequalled animoſity, which laſted more than two hours. The charge of bayonet was ordered; the troops fought pell-mell with the Chouans, but were compelled to retreat, the latter being two thirds more numerous than us. The loſs of the Republicans amounts to ſixty men; that of the Chouans is reckoned at 150, beſides wounded. In this day, the Chouans, who, when attacked, were 700, were twice reinforced, which made them 1400. They covered a great extent of ground, which rendered it impoſſible to outflank, and made the battle ſo bloody.

NAPLES. Hoſtilities commenced between Naples and France in November, 1798, when his Neapolitan Majeſty and General Mack entered the territory of Rome, then in poſſeſſion of the French.

General Championet in his letters to the Executive Directory, gave the following account of the defeat of the Neapolitan troops near Civita Caſtellana.

After the battle of Terni and Porto Fermo, I expected every day new attacks from the Neapolitans, and I was very much ſurpriſed at their inactivity; but they employed that time to collect their ſcattered troops, and to advance againſt my right. General Macdonald was, indeed, attacked yeſterday in his camp in Civita Caſtellana by five columns, who proceeded from Bacano. The enemy's force conſiſted of 40,000 men. General Macdonald, ſurrounded on all ſides, gave proofs of his great talents. He received the attack with that courage which diſtinguiſhes the man of a firm character, and by his able diſpoſitions diſconcerted the projects of the enemy.

General Kellerman, commanding the advanced guard, who was poſted before Nept, was attacked with great impetuoſity by the firſt column, which advanced from Monteroſi; the General had with him only three ſquadrons of the 10th regiment of horſe chaſſeurs, two pieces of light artillery, and the firſt diviſion of the 11th regiment of the line. This handfull of brave men routed a column of the enemy conſiſting of 8000 men, killed or wounded 4[illegible]0, took fifteen pieces of cannon of different calibres, fifty caiſſons, 2000 priſoners, fifty of whom were officers, ſome of them of high rank; ſeveral pairs of colours, 8 or 900 horſes or mules, the military cheſt, 3000 muſkets, all the baggage, and purſued the fugitives to Monterôn, where they got immenſe booty. The talents and bravery of General Kellerman are too well known to require here an uſeleſs eulogium. I appointed, on the field of battle, Bru, chef d'Eſcadron, to be chef de brigade of the 19th regiment of horſe chaſſeurs, as he ſeconded General Kellerman in the ableſt manner by his bravery and devotion. I requeſt, Citizens Directors, that you will confirm this nomination, Citizen Humbert, who commanded that regiment, having died at Rome on the day of our departure. Lanur, chef de brigade, commanding the 15th light troops, prevented the ſecond column from penetrating by Rigniano, at which they wiſhed to arrive, by purſuing the old route to Rome. The enemy on this point loſt thirty horſes. The third column was driven back by the Poliſh General Kniazewitz, at the moment when they were advancing by Fabrica to Santa Maria di Falari. That brave officer, at the head of his own legion, the Roman legion, the ſecond and third battalions of the thirteenth of the line, two ſquadrons of the 16th regiment of dragoons, a company of the 19th horſe chaſſeurs, and three pieces of artillery, by the rapidity of its attack, took from the enemy eight pieces of cannon, fifteen caiſſons, and fifty priſoners, two of whom were ſuperior officers. Night put an end to the combat, and it appears that the Neapolitans left a great many dead on the field of battle. The Roman legion, who were engaged for the firſt time, conducted themſelves with great bravery. The reſult of this day is twenty-three pieces of cannon, all of French calibre, forty-five caiſſons, 8 or 900 horſes or mules, ſtandards, and colours, the military cheſt, fifty-two officers, 2000 priſoners, baggage, &c. The loſs on our ſide is confined to thirty men killed, and double that number wounded. All the corps who were engaged yeſterday did wonders.

Health and reſpect,

(Signed) CHAMPIONET.

The enemy's column, having been beaten on the 6th at Otricoli, retired to the heights of Calvi, where they intrenched themſelves. I was informed on the 8th that General Mack had paſſed the Tiber in perſon, over a bridge of boats, with a body of from 8 to 10,000 men, at the heights of Civita Caſtellana, and that he had taken a poſition at Cantalupo, in order to reinforce the corps of Calvi, and to attempt again to cut off our communications, by marching againſt Otricoli and Terni, by the way of Aſpra and Colliſepoli. I immediately gave orders to General Macdonald to march the brigade of General Mathieu towards Calvi by the way of Otricoli, Otricoli, and that of the Poliſh General Kniazewitz towards the ſame point, by the way of Magliane, whilſt Lemoine marched from Rieſi againſt Calvi, by the way of Contillano, and took poſſeſſion in his route of Civita Ducale, a Neapolitan country, and threatened Aquila. This movement was executed in the beſt poſſible manner. In the night between the 8th and 9th, all the columns ſet out on their march, amidſt a horrible ſtorm, and through the moſt terrible roads. The troops of Macdonald arrived on the 9th, at day-break, before Calvi; they attacked the enemy on the heights, and after a hot engagement, the 11th demi-brigade of the line, having aſcended a very ſteep mountain, threw the enemy into the city, whither they were followed and ſurrounded. They were ſummoned to ſurrender; in anſwer to which they made ſome ridiculous propoſitions. Macdonald replied, by ſending them his ultimatum, which was couched in the following terms: "The column ſhall be priſoners at diſcretion, or be put to the ſword." They ſurrendered immediately. Five thouſand priſoners, among whom are the Mareſchal de Meri, Brigadier Don Carello, twenty ſuperior officers, and 100 ſubalterns, 5000 good muſkets, 300 horſes, fifteen ſtandards, eight of which were blown up by an exploſion of ſome powder near a guard-houſe, and eight pieces of cannon, were the fruits of this attack. I ſhall ſay nothing of the bravery of our troops, the action ſpeaks for itſelf. Particular praiſe is due to Generals Mathieu and Kniazewitz, to the aid-de-camp Trinquelli, to Citizen Calvin, to the three chiefs of battalions, and to Citizen Borghere.

I have this morning received intelligence, that the left wing has taken poſſeſſion of the fort of Civitella. I have no official report on this ſubject, but I hear only that it was ſupplied with great abundance of artillery.

Extract of a Letter from Hillarion Point, General of Brigade.

Aquila, December 18.

The provinces of Abruzzo are in our poſſeſſion; and yeſterday, at nine o'clock at night, we entered Aquila, the capital of this province, driving before us the Neapolitan levy en maſſe; that is to ſay, the ſelf-named volunteers put in requiſition in theſe provinces. Lemoine, general of diviſion, ſent a flag of truce to the commander of the Neapolitan troops, with a declaration, that he ſhould conſider him reſponſible for all the evils which ſhould befal this city. But his anſwer not being received at the appointed hour, the troops advanced, forced open the gates, and we entered the city. All the poſts were taken poſſeſſion of; the inhabitants were forbidden to appear at the windows, and the majority of them were ſurpriſed, on the next morning, to find that we were maſters of the place. The fort ſurrendered this morning at diſcretion; we have found a great quantity of ammunition there, and have placed a ſtrong garriſon in it.

The king of Naples did not expect this viſit ſo ſoon; the high and rugged mountains which encircle Abruzzo, ſerve as a natural barrier to the country. To reach Aquila, we marched thirty-ſix miles through very difficult paſſages and defiles, and croſſed the higheſt of the Appennine mountains. The volunteers of theſe provinces, however, occupied the heights, and haraſſed us on our march. We detached in purſuit of them ſome companies of ſharp ſhooters, who climbed the heights and diſlodged them, and thus we arrived at Aquila. We are now on the great road to Naples, where we ſhall doubtleſs very ſoon arrive.

We found poſted up in the city of Aquila a proclamation of the king of Naples, particularly addreſſed to the inhabitants of the province of Abruzzo, and dated about five or ſix days before from the head-quarters at Rome. It commands them, in the name of their king, their holy religion, and the honour of their wives and daughters, to take up arms, and to ruſh upon the French, who, it ſays, in twice twenty-four hours will no longer exiſt. Among other flattering exhortations, "Brave Samnites, warlike race of heroes, imitate your anceſtors; you amount to 700,000 inhabitants: march, and the buſineſs is finiſhed. I am maſter of Rome, from which I have driven thoſe miſerable Frenchmen, who dared not to make any reſiſtance, being convinced they had to deal with a numerous and brave army, that cowards only would ſuffer themſelves to be beaten, and that we had only to march againſt them."

Had they been as courageous as they were numerous, they might have given us a good deal of trouble; but this levy en maſſe did not long continue to reſiſt us.

We have enlarged ſeveral patriots who were confined in the citadel of this place on account of their democratic opinions, among whom was one Jourdan, who has been four years in priſon, on an accuſation of having preſided at a certain club in Naples. He is a young man of talents, and a great mathematician.

Before the commencement of hoſtilities, the king of Naples publiſhed the following manifeſto.

Dear, faithful, and beloved ſubjects; after having, for almoſt forty years, exerted every effort to render you happy, and to ſuccour you in all the calamities which it has pleaſed God to ſend you, I am now about to leave my beloved country, for the ſole purpoſe of defending our holy religion, almoſt overthrown, to reanimate the divine worſhip, and to ſecure to you and to your children the enjoyment of the bleſſings which the Lord has given you. If I had been ſure of attaining that object by any other ſacrifice, believe me, I ſhould not have heſitated a moment to prefer that alternative; but what hopes could be entertained of ſucceſs after the many fatal examples with which you are well acquainted! I ſet out therefore at the head of the brave defenders of their country, full of confidence in the Lord of Hoſts, who will guide our ſteps and protect our operations. I go to brave all danger with the greateſt cheerfulneſs, becauſe I do it for my fellow-citizens, for my brothers, for my children, for ſuch I have ever conſidered you. Be always faithful to God, and to her whom I leave in my ſtead to conduct the government of theſe ſtates, my dear and well beloved conſort. I recommend to you then your tender mother, I recommend to you my children, who are not more mine than they are yours. At all events remember that you are Neapolitans, that thoſe are brave who are willing to exert their courage, and that it is better to die glorioufly for God and our country, than to live ſhamefully oppreſſed! Meanwhile, may God beſtow upon you all the bleſſings and the happineſs which is the wiſh of him who is, and while he lives ſhall be, your moſt affectionate father and ſovereign.

FERDINAND.

Naples, January 24.—The French entered Naples yeſterday, amid ſhouts of vive la liberté from the Lazzaroni, who had fought againſt them only the day before.

Prince Militorni, though five or ſix days ago general of the Lazzaroni, is appointed preſident of the new government. Finding himſelf, after unavailing efforts to reſtrain their fury, menaced with the fate of General Mack, he went in ſecret to Caſerta to concert with Championet, the means of ſaving Naples from a general conflagration. All the ſubſequent events were the reſult of an agreement between them. The two firſt days of the inſurrection of the Lazzaroni paſſed in bravadoes and preparations. Prince Militorni, who had gained their confidence by his vigorous defence of Capua, and was in conſequence proclaimed captain-general ſtrove in vain to reſtrain this unbridled populace. They declared thoſe who adviſed or ſigned the armiſtice enemies to the king; took poſſeſſion of the caſtles, murdered all the ſtate priſoners, and then hunted every quarter of the city in ſearch of the real or ſuppoſed partizans of the French. Among theſe latter victims were the Duke della Torre Pilomarino, whom they burnt, with his brother, in the court-yard of his own palace. A number of patriots intrenched themſelves with cannon in the Celeſtine convent, where they were attacked by the Lazzaroni, who, after ſuffering great loſs, forced the intrenchments, and put to death all who fell into their hands. They then diſperſed over the whole city, murdering and plundering every one pointed out as a patriot. It was in this dreadful ſituation of affairs that Prince Militorni repaired to General Championet, and agreed that the French army ſhould march to Naples, and preſent itſelf on the ſide of Capo di Chini and of Poggio, while the Lazzaroni were marching through the quarter of the Little Mole and Sainta Lucia to attack the French at Capua. On his return, Prince Militorni placed himſelf with ſome troops at Fort Saint Elmo, and fired a few cannon ſhots to tranquillize the city, while the Lazzaroni marched en maſſe to the very walls of Capua, which they attempted to take by aſſault. The 19th and 20th of January were ſpent in fruitleſs efforts, in which they were dreadfully cut up by caſe ſhot. Hearing at length that a French column was at the gates of Naples; they marched rapidly back, to aſſiſt their comrades, who obſtinately defended the avenues to the city. After blocking up the ſtreets with the furniture of the houſes, they divided into ſeveral bodies, the better to repel the French, and fought the whole of the 22d, and part of the 23d, when the Republicans at length forced a paſſage. On their entrance, the caſtles Nuovo, St. Elmo, and del Ouvo, ſurrendered without reſiſtance, but the citadel of the Carmelites, occupied by Lazzaroni, ſtood a ſiege of three hours.

Meanwhile the Lazzaroni and the peaſants, who retired fighting from ſtreet to ſtreet, were driven to the gate, where they rallied for the laſt time, and, at length fell. At night, General Championet entered the city. Such is the ſketch of the terrible events of which Naples has been for ſix or ſeven days the bloody theatre. It is reckoned that upwards of 10,000 of the inhabitants have periſhed. The loſſes occaſioned by the plunder of the Lazzaroni are incalculable. The entry of the French is now regarded as the greateſt good fortune that could happen to us; for, from every appearance, the city would have been deſtroyed by being entirely ſacked and burned. On the news of the French approaching Naples, the populace exacted a promiſe from the king, that he would not leave them. In the night, however, he embarked on board Admiral Nelſon's ſhip, which was detained by a calm. The people hearing this, aſſembled, with ſome nobles at their head, and ſent a deputation to requeſt his Majeſty's return; but could obtain no audience, Acton telling them the king would ſpeak to nobody. This occaſioned ſo warm an altercation, that the miniſter called upon the Engliſh to fire at them, and the latter appearing inclined to comply, the deputation retired. When this was known in town, the public became ſtill more exaſperated. The Engliſh ſpiked the cannon, burned a ſixty gun ſhip, and all the gun boats, leſt the populace ſhould fire on their ſhips ſtill within cannon ſhot. Of the people who aſſembled to conſider of what was to be done, ſome voted for a limited monarchy, others for a republic, and about forty families only declared for the old government.

Naples, January 29.—According to the conſtitution, the keys of Naples ſhould be given up, when an enemy has taken Capua and marches to Averſa. And this would have been done, but for the Lazzaroni who had nothing to loſe, and wiſhed for an opportunity to plunder the town. When the French appeared before Naples, they marched out in three columns. This was no ſmall proof of courage as they knew that the king had been routed though at the head of 70 or 80,000 men. For three days they defended an open town, and frequently rendered victory uncertain.

Strange as it may appear, St. Januarius the patron of Naples has declared for the conquerors. The Archbiſhop pretended that great faith was neceſſary to make the Saint perform his miracles. At laſt the blood liquefied, and at the ſame moment Veſuvius vomited flames. In conſequence of theſe two great events, the entry of the French was celebrated by a ſolemn Te Deum, the following advertiſement being publiſhed by the prelate.

All the faithful citizens of Naples are invited to be preſent this day, Friday the 25th of January, at two in the afternoon, at the celebration of Te Deum, which the Archbiſhop, accompanied by the chapter, the clergy, the general in chief, and ſtaff of the army of Naples, will ſing in the cathedral church to thank the Moſt High for the glorious entry of the French troops into this city, and who, protected in a peculiar manner by Providence, have regenerated this people, and are come to eſtabliſh and conſolidate our happineſs. St. Januarius, our protector, rejoices in their arrival. His blood miraculouſly liquefied on the very evening of the entry of the Republican troops.

The King and Queen of Naples, according to the account which Lord Nelſon tranſmitted, dated from Palermo the 28th of December, arrived there on the 25th with the royal family, after having experienced in their paſſage the ſevereſt weather ever known in thoſe ſeas, and during which they were in conſiderable danger of being ſhipwrecked. Lord Nelſon, in ſome of his private letters, deſcribes it as the moſt terrible ſtorm he ever witneſſed, and mentions that which he met with off Sardinia, previous to the battle of the Nile, and in which the Vanguard was diſmaſted, as trifling in compariſon with the hurricane off the Neapolitan coaſt.

In the courſe of the voyage Prince Albert, the youngeſt ſon of their Sicilian Majeſties, died through exceſſive ſickneſs and fatigue; and to all the miſeries which ſuch a ſcene muſt have occaſioned in the minds of the royal fugitives, they had to add their affliction for the loſs of their child.

Every Engliſhman, and all who were willing to embark, were ſafely conveyed to Sicily by ſome of Admiral Lord Nelſon's ſquadron; and we hear from other quarters, that the ſkill and management diſplayed by Lord Nelſon upon this unfortunate occaſion exceed all praiſe. When the royal family arrived at Palermo, they were received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy.

The rabble of Naples, as ſoon as they ſaw their Majeſties embark on board the Vanguard, roſe into an inſurrection, and committed the moſt diabolical exceſſes both of murder and pillage. Numbers of the nobility were maſſacred; the principal palaces and hotels of the nobility plundered; and the city continued in the utmoſt diſorder.

On the departure of their Majeſties from Naples, great part of the Neapolitan ſailors refuſed to work the ſhips that were then in the harbour, in order to conduct them to Sicily: they were conſequently obliged to man the veſſels with Engliſh tars, mixed with thoſe Neapolitan ſailors who ſtill remained faithful to their ſovereign. They alſo ſucceeded in bringing off two ſhips of the line; but were obliged to ſink the third, for want of ſeamen to work it.

The flight of the king of Naples, was in conſequence not of diſloyalty or tumults in Naples, but of diſaffection and deſertion in his army. General Mack wrote to him from Capua, that of 40,000 men with whom he entered the Roman territory, 12,000 only remained, and that they were daily crumbling away, by going over to the French. It was plain, he ſaid, that a ſecret underſtanding exiſted between the enemy and his troops, for no ſooner had his officers joined the French, than they were preſented with commiſſions, and appointed to offices of truſt. This example had ſo completely corrupted his army, that he aſſured the king he could place no dependance on them. Upon receiving this melancholy advice, the king of Naples held a council to determine on the courſe to be purſued. The Lazzaroni had ſhewn a firm attachment to the royal family, and their loyalty remained unſhaken; upon the firſt accounts of the reverſes the Neapolitan army had experienced, they offered to march for the defence of the kingdom; but it was thought more political to keep them as a protection to the capital.

In this dilemma to which the King was now reduced, it was deemed imprudent to truſt to the defence they could make againſt the French army, and it was decided that the Royal Family ſhould embark for Palermo. It was not till this determination was known that the ſpirits of the loyal ſunk, and the French party openly triumphed. Every man now conſidered of accommodating himſelf to the approaching change, of making his peace with the advocates of Republicaniſm, and providing for his own ſafety. And ſuch is the appearance which the governing and active party can give to the public opinion, that a few hours ſeemed to have changed the people of Naples from devoted Royaliſts to furious Republicans. The former ſhrunk from view, and the latter ruled in every quarter with an imperious and inſulting tone, gathering ſtrength, and committing the exceſſes (of which we have already heard) at the time the Royal family embarked.

Extract of a Letter from an officer of the Vanguard of ſeventy-four guns, dated Palermo, Sicily, Jan. 2.

We arrived here on the 25th ult. at night, having the King and Queen of Naples on board, with all their family, Sir William Hamilton, a number of the nobility, &c. On our return to Naples, after landing 8000 of their troops at Leghorn, we learnt that the Neapolitan officers had deſerted to the French and the army totally diſbanded itſelf. The revolutionary Party at Naples being alſo very powerful and menacing, the King determined upon leaving that city in the night, having previouſly, by our boats, put all his treaſure on board the Vanguard and Alcmene frigate. There were between 6 and 700 caſks, half ankers, filled with ſilver, and a great many others with gold. In a heavy ſquall on the way to Palermo, we ſplit three of our top-ſails: the Royal Family, &c. were ſo much terrified, that they called their prieſts, actually went to confeſſion, and gave themſelves up for loſt. At two P. M. we put the Queen and ladies on ſhore. At nine his Majeſty was landed, and received by an aſtoniſhing number of people; we had a full view of the whole ſcene, lying not fifty yards from the ſhore.

NAPLES retaken in July, 1799, as appears by letters from Rear-Admiral Lord Nelſon, K. B. dated Bay of Naples, 27th June, 1799.—I am happy in being able to congratulate their Lordſhips on the poſſeſſion of the city of Naples. St. Elmo is yet in the hands of the French; but the caſtles of Ouvo and Nuovo I took poſſeſſion of laſt evening, and his Sicilian Majeſty's colours are now flying on them.

Extract of another Letter, dated Bay of Naples, July 14.

Herewith I have the honour of ſending you copies of my letters to the commander in chief. All the chief rebels are now on board his Majeſty's fleet. Capua and Gaeta will very ſoon be in our poſſeſſion, when the kingdom will be liberated from anarchy and miſery.

Foudroyant, Bay of Naples, July 13th.

I have the pleaſure to inform you of the ſurrender of Fort St. Elmo, after open batteries of eight days, during which time our heavy batteries were advanced within one hundred and eighty yards of the ditch. The very great ſtrength of St. Elmo, and its more formidable poſition, will mark with what fortitude, perſeverance, and activity the combined forces muſt have acted, Captain Troubridge was the officer ſelected for the command of all the forces landed from the ſquadron. Captain Ball aſſiſted him for ſeven days till his ſervices were wanted at Malta, when his place was ably ſupplied by Captain Hallowell, an officer of the moſt diſtinguiſhed merit, and to whom Captain Troubridge expreſſes the higheſt obligation. Captain Hood, with a garriſon for the Caſtle Nuovo, and to keep good order in the capital, an arduous taſk at that time, was alſo landed from the ſquadron: and I have the pleaſure to inform you, that no Capital is more quiet than Naples. I tranſmit you Captain Troubridge's letter to me with returns of killed and wounded. I have alſo to ſtate to your Lordſhip, that although the abilities and reſources of my brave friend Troubridge are well known to all the world, yet even he had difficulties to ſtruggle with in every way which the ſtate of the capital will eaſily bring to your idea, that has raiſed his great character even higher than it was before.

I am, &c. NELSON.

Antigniano, near St. Elmo, July 3.

Agreeable to your orders I landed with the Engliſh and Portugueſe marines of the fleet on the 27th of June; and after embarking the garriſons of the caſtles Ouvo and Nuovo, compoſed of French and rebels, I put a garriſon in each, and on the 29th took poſt againſt fort St. Elmo, which I ſummoned to ſurrender; but the commandant being determined to ſtand a ſiege, we opened a battery of three thirty-ſix-pounders and four mortars, on the 3d inſtant, within 700 yards of the fort, and on the 5th, another of two thirty-ſix-pounders. The Ruſſians under Captain Builie, opened another battery of four thirty-ſix-pounders and four mortars againſt the oppoſite angle, intending to ſtorm it in different places as ſoon as we could make two practicable breaches in the work. On the 9th I added four more mortars; and on the 11th, by inceſſant labour, we opened another battery of ſix thirty-ſix-pounders within 180 yards of the wall of the garriſon, and had another of one eighteen-pounder and two howitzers, at the ſame diſtance, nearly completed. After a few hours cannonading from the laſt battery, the enemy diſplayed a flag of truce, when our firing ceaſed, and their guns being moſtly diſmounted, and their works nearly deſtroyed, the terms of capitulation were agreed to and ſigned. In performing this ſervice I feel much ſatisfaction in informing your Lordſhip, that I received every poſſible aſſiſtance from Captain Ball for the firſt ſeven days, when your Lordſhip ordered him on another ſervice, and did me the honour to place Captain Hallowell under my orders in his room, whoſe exertions and abilities your Lordſhip is well acquainted with, and merits every attention. Lieutenant-Colonel Strickland, Major Creſwell, and all the officers of marines and men merit every praiſe I can beſtow, as does Antonio Saldineo de Gama and the officers and men belonging to her Moſt Faithful Majeſty the Queen of Portugal: their readineſs on all occaſions does them great honour. The very commanding ſituation of St. Elmo rendered our approaches difficult, or I truſt it would have been reduced much ſooner; the ready acquieſcence to all our demands, and the aſſiſtance received from the Duke de Solandre, I beg may be made known by your Lordſhip to his Sicilian Majeſty. I feel myſelf alſo much indebted to Colonel Tſchudy for his great zeal and exertions on all occaſions.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Return of killed and wounded at the ſiege of the Caſtle of St. Elmo, which ſurrendered July 12, 1799.

Five officers, thirty-two rank and file killed; five officers, ſeventy-nine rank and file, wounded.

Foudroyant, Naples Bay, July 13, 1799.

Copy of a Letter from Rear-Admiral Lord Nelſon, K. B.
Foudroyant, Naples Bay, July 13, 1799.

His Sicilian Majeſty arrived in this bay on the 10th, and immediately hoiſted his ſtandard on board the Foudroyant, where his Majeſty remains with all his Miniſters.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Foudroyant, Naples Bay, 1ſt Auguſt, 1799.

I have the honour to tranſmit you copies of my letters to the commander in chief, with its ſeveral incloſures, and moſt ſincerely congratulate their Lordſhips on the entire liberation of the kingdom of Naples from the French robbers, for by no other name can they be called, for their conduct in this kingdom. This happy event will not, I am ſure, be the leſs acceptable from being principally brought about by part of the crews of his Majeſty's ſhips under my orders, under the command of Captain Troubridge. His merits ſpeak for themſelves: his own modeſty makes it my duty to ſtate, that to him alone is the chief merit due. The commendation beſtowed on the brave Captain Hallowell will not eſcape their Lordſhip's notice, any more than the exceeding good conduct of Captain Oſwald, Colonel Strickland, Captain Creſwell, to whom I ordered the temporary rank of Major, and all the officers and men of the marine corps; alſo the party of artillery, and the officers and men landed from the Portugueſe ſquadron. I muſt not omit to ſtate that Captain Hood, with a garriſon of ſeamen in caſtle Nuovo, has for theſe five weeks very much contributed to the peace of the capital;

tal; and Naples, I am told, was never more quiet than under his directions. I ſend Captain Oſwald, of the Perſeus bomb, with this letter, and I have put Lieutenant Henry Compton (who has ſerved with me ſince January 1796 as a Lieutenant) into the Perſeus; and I beg leave to recommend theſe two officers as highly meriting promotion.

I have the honour to be, &c.
NELSON.

Foudroyant, Bay of Naples, Auguſt, 1799.

I have the honour to tranſmit you a copy of Captain Troubridge's letter to me, and the capitulation of Capua and Gaeta, &c. Too much praiſe cannot be given to Captain Trowbridge, for his wonderful exertion in bringing about theſe happy events, and in ſo ſhort a ſpace of time. Captain Hallowell has alſo the greateſt merit. Captain Oſwald, whom I ſend to England with a copy of my letter, is an officer moſt highly deſerving promotion. I have put Lieutenant Henry Compton, who has ſerved as a lieutenant with me from January 1796, into the Perſeus bomb in his room, and whom I recommend to your Lordſhip. I ſincerely congratulate your Lordſhip on the entire liberation of the kingdom of Naples from a band of robbers; and am with the greateſt reſpect, &c.

Culloden, Naples Bay, July 29, 1799.

Agreeable to your orders I marched, on the 20th inſtant, with the Engliſh and Portugueſe troops from Naples, and arrived at Caſerta the following morning. After reſting the people, we marched, and encamped near Capua. The Swiſs, under Colonel Tchudy, the cavalry under General Acton, and the different corps of infantry under General Boucard and Colonel Gams, took up their appointed ſituations, the former to the left of our camp, and the latter to the right of the river. On the 22d, a bridge was thrown over the river, to eſtabliſh a communication; batteries of guns and mortars were immediatly begun within five hundred yards of the enemy's works, and on the 25th, the gun-battery of twenty-four-pounders, another with two howitzers, and two mortar batteries, were opened, and kept up a conſtant and heavy fire, which was returned by the enemy from eleven pieces of cannon; on the 26th trenches were opened, and new batteries began within a few yards of the glacis. The enemy, on finding our approach ſo rapid, ſent out the encloſed terms, which I rejected in toto, and offered in return the encloſed capitulation, which the French General agreed to, and ſigned the following morning at ſix o'clock. The French garriſon marched out this morning at three A. M. and grounded their arms, and proceeded to Naples under the eſcort of four hundred Engliſh marines and two ſquadrons of General Acton's cavalry. In performing this ſervice, I feel much indebted to Captains Hallowell and Oſwald, to whoſe abilities and exertions I attribute the reduction of the place in ſo ſhort a time, as they ſtaid night and day in the field to forward the erecting of the batteries. I alſo recommend Lieutenant-Colonel Strickland and Major Creſwell, the officers and marines, for their conſtant and unremitted attention, as well as the officers and men of her Moſt Faithful Majeſty the Queen of Portugal. The Ruſſian forces under Captain Builie rendered every aſſiſtance. General Acton and Boncard, and Colonel Gams, merit much for their zeal in cheerfuly performing all the different ſervices that aroſe. Colonel Tchudy's zeal merits great attention, for his conſtant readineſs to ſend working parties to the batteries, as well as puſhing his men forward on all occaſions. To M. Monfrere, a volunteer gentleman from the Sea Horſe, whom I had the honour to recommend to your Lordſhip's notice at St. Elmo, I feel indebted for his great ability and aſſiſtance as an engineer, which forwarded our operations much. Lieutenants Loweay and Davis who ſerved as aides du camp to me, have alſo great merit, as well as Mr. Greig, an officer in the Ruſſian ſervice, (ſerving as a volunteer in his Majeſty's ſhip under my command) whom I beg your Lordſhip to recommend to the court of Peterſburg as a promiſing officer. Count de Lucci, chief of the etat-major, was unremitting in his attention. I have the honour to incloſe to your Lordſhip a return of the ordance ſtores and proviſions found in Capua, as well as a return of the garriſon (not including Jacobins) which were ſerving with the French.

I have the honour to be, &c.
(Signed) T. TROUBRIDGE

By the articles of capitulation it was agreed that the garriſon of Capua ſhould not ſerve againſt the allies until regularly exchanged; that the two gates ſhould be immediatly delivered to the Engliſh grenadiers; that on the following day the French ſhould march out with drums beating, after which they ſhould lay down their arms, except their officers. The garriſon of Gaeta, not having been beſieged, were to be ſent to France without being deemed priſoners of war.

Return of cannon and the garriſon at Capua.

Ordnance from 24 to 4-pounders—108 ſerviceable, 10 unſerviceable.—French troops—199 officers, 2618 non-commiſſioned officers and privates.—12,000 muſquets; 414,000 muſquet-cartridges filled; 67,848 pounds weight of powder.

Return of cannon and the garriſon of Gaeta.

Ordnance—58 braſs guns, from 24 to 18-pounders; 12 iron 6 ditto; 2 braſs 4 ditto; 4 mortars, 12 inch; 9 ditto, 10 inch; with an immenſe quantity of powder and other garriſon ſtores.—French troops—83 officers, 1415 privates; beſides rebels.

NARVA, SIEGE OF, AND BATTLE AT. A large city and port town of Livonia, ſituated on the river Narva, which divides Livonia from Ruſſia. This famous battle which has ſo much adorned the annals of Sweden, was fought in the year 1700, between the Swedes and Muſcovites, or Ruſſians, as they are now called. Charles XII. having finiſhed his Daniſh war, (See COPENHAGEN.) he prepared to finiſh his firſt campaign paign with an attack upon his rival in glory, Peter Alexeowitz, Czar of Muſcovy. Charles was the more enraged againſt him, ſays Voltaire, as there were three Muſcovite ambaſſadors at Stockholm, who had lately ſworn to renew an inviolable peace. He who valued himſelf upon a ſevere probity, could not comprehend how a legiſlator like the Czar, could make a jeſt of what ought to be held ſo ſacred. The young Prince full of honour, did not ſo much as dream that there could be a different morality for princes and private perſons. The Emperor of Muſcovy publiſhed a manifeſto, which he had much better have ſuppreſſed. He alleged, for a reaſon of the war, that they had not paid him ſufficient honours when he paſſed incognito to Riga, and that they ſold proviſions too dear to his ambaſſadors. Theſe were the injuries for which he ravaged Ingria with 100,000 men.

He appeared before Narva at the head of this great army on the 1ſt of October, in a ſeaſon more ſevere in that clime than the month of January is at London. The Czar, who in ſuch weather would ſometimes ride poſt 400 leagues to ſee a mine or canal, ſpared his troops no more than he ſpared himſelf. Beſides, he knew that the Swedes, ever ſince the time of Guſtavus Adolphus, could make war in the depth of winter as well as in ſummer, and he wanted to accuſtom the Muſcovites alſo to loſe all diſtinction of ſeaſons, and to make them one day at leaſt equal to the Swedes. Thus, at a time when the froſts and ſnows oblige other nations in temperate climates to a ſuſpenſion of arms, the Czar Peter laid ſiege to Narva within thirty degrees of the pole, and Charles XII. was upon his march to relieve it.

The Czar was no ſooner arrived before the place, than he made haſte to put in practice what he had lately learned abroad in his travels. He marked out his camp, fortified it on all ſides, raiſed redoubts at certain diſtances, and opened the trenches himſelf. He had given the command of his army to the Duke de Croy, a German, and an able general, but at that time very little aſſiſted by the Muſcovite officers. For himſelf he had only the rank of a private lieutenant in his own troops. He judged it neceſſary to give his nobility an example of military obedience, who till then had been undiſciplinable, and accuſtomed to march at the head of ill-armed ſlaves without any experience or order. He had a mind to teach them, that places in the army were to be obtained by ſervices. He began himſelf with beating a drum, and was raiſed to an officer by degrees. It is by no means to be wondered at, that he, who at Amſterdam turned carpenter to procure himſelf fleets, ſhould become a lieutenant at Narva to teach his nation the art of war.

The Muſcovites are ſtrong and indefatigable, and, it may be, as courageous as the Swedes, but it requires time to form experienced troops, and diſcipline to make them invincible. The only good ſoldiers in the army were 30,000 Strelitzes, who were in Muſcovy what the Janiſſaries are in Turkey. The reſt were Barbarians forced from their foreſts, and covered over with ſkins of wild beaſts, ſome armed with arrows, and others with clubs, few of them had fuzees, nor had any of them ſeen a regular ſiege; nor was there one good cannoneer in the whole army. A hundred and fifty cannon, which one would have thought muſt have ſoon laid the little town of Narva in aſhes, were ſcarce able to make a breach, whereas the artillery of the town deſtroyed every moment whole ranks in the trenches. Narva was almoſt without fortifications, and Count Hoorn, who commanded there, had not 1000 regular troops; and yet this immenſe army was not able to reduce it in ten weeks.

On the 15th of November, the Czar had information that the King of Sweden, having croſſed the ſea with 200 tranſports, was upon his march to relieve Narva. The Swedes were no more than 20,000, but the Czar had no advantage except ſuperiority of number. Far therefore from deſpiſing his enemy, he employed all the art he could to cruſh him; and not content with 100,000 men, he was getting ready another army to oppoſe him, and check his progreſs. He had already given orders for near 40,000 recruits, who were coming up from Pleſcow with great expedition. He went in perſon to haſten their march, that he might hem in the King between the two armies. Nor was this all, a detachment of 30,000 men from the camp before Narva, were poſted at a league's diſtance from the town, directly in the King of Sweden's road; 20,000 Strelitzes were placed farther off upon the ſame road, and 5000 others made up an advanced guard; and he muſt neceſſarily force his way through the body of all theſe troops before he could reach the camp, which was fortified with a rampart and double foſſe. The King of Sweden had landed at Pirnaw in the Gulf of Riga, with about 16,000 foot, and a few more than 4000 horſe.

From Pirnaw he made a flying march as far as Revel, followed by all his horſe, and only 4000 of his foot. But he always marched before, without waiting for the reſt of his troops; and ſoon found himſelf with his 8000 men only before the firſt poſts of the enemy. He without heſitation attacked them one after another, without giving them time to learn with how ſmall a number they had to engage. The Muſcovites ſeeing the Swedes come upon them, made no doubt but they had a whole army to encounter, and the advanced guard of 5000 men immediately fled upon their approach. The 20,000 men beyond them, terrified with the flight of their countrymen, made no reſiſtance, and carried their conſternation and confuſion among the 30,000 who were poſted within a league of the camp, and the panic ſeizing upon them too, they retired to the main body of the army without ſtriking a blow. Theſe three poſts were carried in two days and a half; and what upon other occaſions would have been reckoned three victories, did not retard the King's march the ſpace of one hour. He appeared then at laſt with his 8000 men, wearied with the fatigues of ſo long a march, before a camp of 100,000 Muſcovites, with 150 pieces of braſs cannon in their front; and he ſcarce allowed them any time for reſt, before he gave his orders for the attack without delay.

The ſignal was two fuzees, and the word in German, "With the aid of God." A general officer having repreſented repreſented to him the great hazard of the attempt, "What," ſays he, "do you make any queſtion, whether I with my 8000 brave Swedes ſhall not rout 100,000 Muſcovites?" But upon recollection, fearing there was too much oſtentation in what he ſaid, he ran after the officer in a moment, "And are not you," ſays he, "of the ſame opinion? Have not I a double advantage over the enemy; the one that their horſe can be of no ſervice to them; and the other, that the place being ſtrait, their great number will only incommode them, and thus in reality I ſhall be ſtronger than they?" The officer did not think fit to differ from him, and thus they marched againſt the Muſcovites about noon, on the 13th of November, 1700.

As ſoon as the cannon of the Swedes had made a breach in the intrenchments, they advanced with their bayonets at the end of their fuzees. At the ſame time a violent ſtorm of ſnow, which fell at their backs, was driven by the wind full in the face of the enemy. The Muſcovites ſtood their fire for half an hour without quitting their poſts. The King attacked the Czar's quarter, which lay on the other ſide of the camp, and was in hopes of a rencounter, as not knowing that the Emperor was gone in queſt of the 40,000 men, who were daily expected. Upon the firſt diſcharge of the enemy's ſhot, the King received a ball in his left ſhoulder, but it grazed only in a ſlight manner upon the fleſh, his activity even hindered him from perceiving that he was wounded. Preſently after his horſe was killed under him. A ſecond had his head carried off by a cannon ball. And as he was nimbly mounting a third, "Theſe fellows," ſays he, "make me exerciſe;" and then he went on to engage, and give orders with the ſame preſence of mind as before. Within three hours the intrenchments were carried on all ſides, and the Swedes became ſenſible of their ſuperiority.

The King purſued the right of the enemy as far as the river of Narva, with his left wing, if one might properly call by that name about 4000 men, who were in purſuit of near 50,000. The bridge broke under them as they fled, and the river was in a moment covered with the dead. The reſt in deſpair returned to their camp, without knowing whither they went, and finding certain barracks, they took their poſts behind them. There they defended themſelves for a while, as not knowing how to make their eſcape. But at laſt their Generals Dolgorouky, Gollouin, and Federowitz ſurrendered themſelves to the King, and laid their arms at his Majeſty's feet. And in the inſtant they were offering them, came up the Duke de Croy, the general of the army, to ſurrender himſelf with thirty officers.

Charles received all theſe priſoners of diſtinction with as eaſy a politeneſs, and as obliging an air, as if he had been to pay them the honours of an entertainment in his own court. He only detained the general officers. All the ſubalterns and common ſoldiers were diſarmed and conducted to the river of Narva, where they were furniſhed with boats to carry them over, and return them back to their own homes. In the mean time night came on, and the left wing of the Muſcovites ſtill continued fighting. The Swedes had not loſt 1500 men; 18,000 Muſcovites had been killed in their intrenchments; a great number were drowned; many had paſſed the river; but ſtill there remained enough in the camp to exterminate the Swedes even to the laſt man. But it is not the number of the dead, but the the terror of thoſe who ſurvive, that gives the finiſhing ſtroke to victories.

The King employed the ſmall remains of the day in ſeizing upon the enemy's artillery. He poſted himſelf to advantage between their camp and the town, and there ſlept ſome hours on the ground, wrapt up in his cloak, expecting to fall at day-break upon the left wing of the enemy, which was not yet entirely routed; but at two o'clock in the morning General Wade, who commanded that wing, having heard of the gracious reception the King had given to the other generals, and how he ſent home all the ſubaltern officers and ſoldiers, deſired he would grant him the ſame favour. The Conqueror made anſwer, that he ſhould have it, if he would draw near at the head of his troops, and lay down his arms and colours at his feet. The General appeared ſoon after with his Muſcovites, to the number of about 30,000. They marched, ſoldiers and officers, with their heads uncovered, acroſs leſs than 7000 Swedes. The ſoldiers as they paſſed before him threw down their fuzees and ſwords upon the ground, and the officers preſented him with their enſigns and colours. He cauſed the whole multitude to croſs the river, without retaining a ſingle ſoldier priſoner. If he had put them under guard, the number of the priſoners would at leaſt have been five times greater than that of the conquerors.

He then entered victorious into Narva, attended by the Duke de Croy, and the other general officers of the Muſcovites. He ordered their ſwords to be reſtored to them, and being informed that they wanted money, and that the tradeſmen of Narva refuſed to truſt them, he ſent the Duke de Croy 1000 ducats, and every Muſcovite officer 500, who could never ſufficiently admire the civility of their treatment, of which they could not form to themſelves the leaſt idea.

Immediately a relation of the victory was drawn up at Narva to be ſent to Stockholm, and the allies of Sweden, but the King cut off with his own hand whatever was reported too much to his own advantage, or to the detriment of the Czar. His modeſty could not hinder their ſtriking at Stockholm ſeveral medals to perpetuate the memory of theſe events. Among the reſt, they ſtruck one which repreſented him on the one ſide ſtanding on a pedeſtal, to which were chained a Muſcovite, a Dane, and a Polander; and on the reverſe, an Hercules armed with his club, treading upon a Cerberus, with this inſcription,

TRES UNO CONTUDIT ICTU.

Among the priſoners taken at the battle of Narva, there was one who was a great inſtance of the revolutions of fortune. He was the eldeſt ſon and heir to the King of Georgia; they called him the Czarafis, a name which ſignified prince, or ſon of a czar, amongſt all the Tartars, as well as in Muſcovy. For the word

ezar ſignified king among the ancient Scythians, from whom all theſe people are deſcended, and is by no means derived from the Cæſar of Rome, ſo long unknown to theſe barbarians. His father, Mitelleſki Czar, who was maſter of the moſt beautiful part of the country, ſituate between the mountains of Ararat and the eaſtern coaſts of the Black Sea, had been driven from his kingdom by his own ſubjects in 1688, and choſe rather to throw himſelf into the arms of the Emperor of Muſcovy than apply to the Turks. This king's ſon at nineteen years of age, attended upon Peter the Great in his expedition againſt the Swedes, and was taken fighting by ſome Finland ſoldiers, who had already ſtripped him, and were upon the point of killing him. Count Renchild reſcued him from their hands, ſupplied him with clothes, and preſented him to his maſter. Charles ſent him to Stockholm, where the unfortunate prince died ſome few years after. Upon his taking leave, the King could not avoid making, aloud in the hearing of his officers, a natural reflection upon the ſtrange fate of an Aſiatic prince, born at the foot of mount Caucaſus, who was going to live a priſoner among the ſnows of Sweden. "It is," ſays he, "as if I was to be one day a priſoner among the Crim Tartars." Theſe words at that time, had no impreſſion, but were afterwards but too much thought on, when the event had confirmed the prediction.

The Czar was advancing by long marches with an army of 40,000 Ruſſians, in expectation of ſurrounding his enemy on all ſides. In the midway he had intelligence of the battle of Narva, and the diſperſion of his whole camp. He judged it not convenient with his 40,000 raw and undiſciplined men to engage with a conqueror, who had lately deſtroyed 100,000 intrenched in their camp. He returned back from whence he came, ſtill purſuing his reſolution of diſciplining his troops, at the ſame time that he civilized his ſubjects. "I know," ſays he, "the Swedes will beat us for ſome time, but in time they will teach us to beat them."

Moſcow, his capital, was in the utmoſt terror and deſolation at the news of this defeat; and ſo great was the pride and ignorance of the people, that they could not be perſuaded but they had been conquered by more than human power, and that the Swedes had been victorious by the force of magic. This opinion was ſo general, that public prayers were ordered to be put up to St. Nicholas, the patron of Muſcovy, upon the occaſion. The form was too ſingular to be here omitted. It runs thus:

O thou, who art our perpetual comforter in all our adverſities, great St. Nicholas, infinitely powerful, by what ſin have we offended thee in our ſacrifices, genuflexions, bowings, and thankſgivings, that thou haſt thus forſaken us? We have implored thy aſſiſtance againſt the terrible, inſolent, enraged, dreadful, inſuperable deſtroyers; when, like lions and bears who have loſt their young, they have fallen upon us, terrified, wounded, and ſlain by thouſands, us who are thy people. As it is impoſſible this ſhould have happened without diabolical influence and inchantment, we beſeech thee, O great St. Nicholas, to be our champion and ſtandard-bearer, to deliver us from this troop of ſorcerers, and drive them far off from our coaſts, with the recompenſe that is due unto them.

Whilſt the Muſcovites were thus complaining of their defeat to St. Nicholas, Charles XII. returned thanks to God, and prepared himſelf for new victories.

NASEBY, BATTLE AT. A village near Rothwell, in Northamptonſhire, about ten miles north from Northampton. In the year 1645, being the time of the grand rebellion, this battle was fought between Charles I. and his Parliament. The King marched to Leiceſter, took that town by aſſault, and Fairfax followed the ſame route, in order to give him battle; the two houſes, having, at the deſire of their General, diſpenſed with the attendance of Cromwell, who thus preſerved his command in their army, notwithſtanding the ſelf-denying ordinance. Charles being informed that Fairfax was ordered to beſiege Oxford, advanced towards Harborough, where he received intelligence that he had abandoned his deſign upon Oxford, and had been repulſed in aſſaulting the caſtle of Borſtal. The King continued his march in expectation of being joined by Colonel Gerard with 2000 men from Wales, as well as by Lord Goring at the head of 3000 cavalry.

This officer had wrote to him from Taunton, giving him hopes of reducing that place, and adviſing him to act on the defenſive till he ſhould join the army; but the letter fell into the hands of Fairfax, who thus appriſed, reſolved to hazard an engagement before the junction could be effected. For this purpoſe he followed the Royaliſts, and the King ſeeing it would be impoſſible to reach Leiceſter, without expoſing his rear to certain deſtruction, determined to meet him half way. He accordingly marched back, and on the 14th day of June, came in ſight of the enemy, who were drawn up in order of battle, on a riſing ground near Naſeby. Prince Rupert led the right of the Royaliſts, the left was under the direction of Sir Marmaduke Langdale; Lord Aſtley commanded the main body, conſiſting of all the infantry, and the King headed the body of reſerve. The cavalry on the enemy's right was commanded by Cromwell, the left by his ſon-in-law Ireton; while Fairfax and Skippon conducted the centre. Prince Rupert attacked the left wing with his uſual impetuoſity and ſucceſs, they were purſued as far as the village; but the Prince in his return miſpent his time in a fruitleſs attempt to ſeize their park of artillery. Cromwell in the mean time was furiouſly engaged with Sir Marmaduke Langdale, whoſe horſe were broken, after a very obſtinate diſpute. The infantry on both ſides maintained the conflict with equal valour for ſome time, but in ſpite of Fairfax and Skippon, their battalions began to give way, when Cromwell returned and charged the King's infantry in flank, with ſuch vigour as they could not reſiſt, ſo that they were immediately routed and diſperſed. By this time Prince Rupert had rejoined the King and the ſmall body of the reſerve, but his troops though victorious could not be brought to a ſecond charge.

They were at all times licentious and ungovernable, but here they were intimidated; for Fairfax, Skippon, and and Cromwell, had by this time reduced their forces into order of battle, and ſtood ready for either attack or defence. The King would have charged them at the head of his reſerve, even before Rupert returned, had not he been prevented by an uncommon incident.

The Scottiſh Earl of Carnwath, who rode by his Majeſty's ſide, ſeizing the bridle of his horſe, turned him round, ſaying, with a loud oath, "Will you go upon your death in an inſtant." The troops ſeeing this motion, wheeled to the right, and rode off in ſuch confuſion, that they could not be rallied during the whole action.

The King perceiving the fortune of the day irretrievably loſt, was obliged to abandon the victory to his enemies, who took all his cannon, baggage, and about 5000 priſoners. Among other things which fell into their hands, was a caſket, containing his private letters to the Queen, ſome of which were publiſhed. We cannot omit obſerving, that ſuch an air of tenderneſs runs through this correſpondence, between Charles and his conſort, as muſt impreſs every impartial reader with a very favourable idea of conjugal affection.

NAVARRE. In 1793, the French entered Spain with an army of conſiderable force, of which the following accounts were tranſmitted from thence, December 12.

Count Colomera, commander in chief in the kingdom of Navarre, in his letter from Pampeluna of the 25th ult. mentions, that our troops have not only repulſed the enemy in various attacks ſince the 24th, but have alſo diſlodged them from various advantageous poſts that they occupied.

About 12,000 French made an attempt upon the left of the army under this general at Irzos and Berrios, who on the firſt notice of this movement repaired to the ſpot, and about ſix in the morning found that the action had commenced; it was very violent, and well ſuſtained by our troops, who obliged the enemy to retire towards Bebzunco and Amoz.

The Spaniſh general afterwards viſited his right wing, commanded by Lieutenant-General Creſpo, who, according to orders tranſmitted to him, had attacked and carried the heights poſſeſſed by the French, commanding Sorauren and Olabe, Count Colomera reconnoitred all the enemy's poſitions, and ſeeing that the French were much increaſed in number, and that the volunteers of Arragon, and ſome other battalions, intended as reinforcements, had not arrived, he ordered the chaſſeurs of Gallicia, and a battalion of Ultonia, to maintain their poſition upon the heights, which they did with great valour till the arrival of the reinforcements. The fire in the mean while had continued without any manifeſt advantage on either ſide; but upon the arrival of freſh reinforcements about two o'clock in the day, the enemy's poſts were taken. The French were purſued by our troops, who obliged them to abandon the caſtles of Olabe and Olatz, and all the heights in their diſtricts. The latter part of this ſervice was performed in an hour and a half, when, to give the troops ſome repoſe, the general ordered a halt. A great number of the enemy were killed and made priſoners.

It was ſome time before the report of the death of General del Union was credited; but General Amarillas, who ſucceeded him in the command, wrote to the French general, who informed him, that the Count was found dead, with two muſket balls in his breaſt. This unhappy intelligence was alſo confirmed by the French General Perignon.

June 5, 1794.—General Urrutia, in a letter of the 27th ult. gives the following intelligence.

In the evening of the 25th, two ſhips of force, three frigates, and ſixteen ſmaller veſſels, anchored in the bay of Roſas, and early in the morning of the next day commenced an attack upon the enemy's ſhips of war and tranſports in the ſame bay.

The enemy being perſuaded that this operation was connected with a general attack upon land, in order to prevent it, reſolved upon an offenſive movement, and marched in queſt of us that night with all their forces. Eight thouſand men were deſtined to attack our right, while the remainder of their army was directed againſt our centre.

Whatever might have been the enemy's intention, it is certain they were fruſtrated by the ſkill and vigilance of the chiefs commanding his Majeſty's forces. The enemy were obliged to make a precipitate retreat, having ſuſtained a conſiderable loſs: that on our ſide was very trifling, though at preſent I have not received the returns.

June 12.—Don Joſeph Urrutia, commander in chief of the army of Catalonia, in a diſpatch of the 4th inſt. has tranſmitted the following account:—Since the old caſtle of Baſcara has undergone ſome repairs, and the addition of ſome works, to enable it to reſiſt any ſudden attack, it has been garriſoned by a part of the Free Corps, under Captain Don Pedro de Echevaria. Don Ruiz, with a party of thirty men, having been ſent out to reconnoitre the ground in the front of this fortification, on the oppoſite ſide of the river, as far as Pontos, they fell in with a body of about 2000 of the enemy, on their march towards the height of Caſa Vicens. The fire of this party was maintained with ſo much bravery and diſcretion, that the march of the French column was conſiderably retarded, and at length obliged to change its route.

Another French column, of between 3 and 4000 infantry, 600 cavalry, and four pieces of cannon, which were proceeding towards Baſcara, were completely repulſed.

The General's diſpatch concludes with a warm encomium upon the horſe artillery, under the conduct of Don Joſeph Autran.

The account of the defeat of the Spaniards in Navarre, is confirmed by the following letter, dated St. Sebaſtian, July 8, which has appeared in the French Journals:—Our army has gathered new laurels under the walls of Pampeluna. The battle began on the morning of the 18th, (July 6), and laſted fourteen hours. The loſs of the enemy is eſtimated at 2500 men. Their cavalry has been completely deſtroyed; they they attempted to charge our grenadiers, who waited the attack with their bayonets. In the mean time, our dragoons and huſſars advanced, diſperſed, and purſued the enemy ſo vigorouſly, that neither the roads nor the gates of Pampeluna were wide enough to receive them. By this victory we have cut off the communication of the right from the left wing of the enemy.

Accounts from Bilboa and other Spaniſh ports in Biſcay, ſtate, that the French have completely ſucceeded in getting poſſeſſion of all the ſtrong paſſes in Navarre, upon the river Ebro as far as Tudel, and that the communication with Old Caſtile was altogether cut off; ſo that Pampeluna can receive no relief whatever from the metropolis, and the interior of Spain. Theſe letters further ſtate, that the whole of the province of Navarre muſt inevitably fall with the capital city of Pampeluna; for that all the troops are ſent to the ſouth-eaſt to oppoſe the progreſs of the French in Catalonia, who meditate the immediate inveſtment of Girande.

NECESSITY, TAKEN IN 1754. A fort built on the Forks of the river Ohio, in North America; and as this action may be termed the beginning of the war which drove the French entirely out of America, ſome account of their proceedings previous to their taking this fort we think will be agreeable to the reader.

M. du Queſne, who ſucceeded M. de la Jonquiere in the government of Canada, being charged with an immediate and vigorous execution of the expedition to ſubdue the country on the Ohio to the crown of France, detached the Sieur de St. Pierre early in the year 1753, with a ſufficient force to make a lodgement and to maintain his ground on the river au Beuf, or Beef river, till reinforced, which St. Pierre performed; and he built a fort upon the ſpot in honour to M. du Queſne. Such a diſagreeable neighbour ſoon notified his acceſſion by the outrages committed on the back ſettlements of Virginia and Philadelphia, and more particularly by cutting off the Indian trade, and ſeizing upon our traders and their goods.

In October, 1753, the Governor and council of Virginia having orders from England to repel force by force, diſpatched a meſſenger to examine the territory behind their ſettlement, and to explore the French encroachments and operations, who brought back an account, that there had been 1500 regular forces ſent to thoſe parts from Old France; that the French had built three forts upon the Ohio, on the lands lately granted to certain gentlemen in London by the crown. That as the French met with no oppoſition, they were reſolved to maintain their ground. This advice concluded with obſerving, that unleſs means were uſed to drive off the French, and likewiſe forts built on the banks of the Miſſiſippi by the Engliſh, the French would fortify themſelves in ſuch a manner, that it would not be in our power to expel them.

This report made by the provincial meſſenger, appeared of ſuch an intereſting nature to the crown of Great Britain, that Governor Dinwiddie immediately ſent the following letter by Major George Waſhington to the French Commander in Chief, at the fort on the river au Beuf.

SIR,

The lands upon the river Ohio, in the weſtern parts of the colony of Virginia, are ſo notoriouſly known to be the property of the crown of Great Britain, that it is a matter of equal concern and ſurpriſe to me, to hear that a body of French forces are erecting forts and making ſettlements upon that river, within his Majeſty's dominions. The many and repeated complaints I have received of theſe acts of hoſtility lay me under the neceſſity of ſending, in the name of the King my maſter, the bearer hereof, George Waſhington, Eſq. one of the adjutants-general of the forces of this dominion, to complain to you of the encroachments thus made, and of the injuries done to the ſubjects of Great Britain, in violation of the law of nations, and the treaties now ſubſiſting between the two crowns. If theſe facts be true, and you think fit to juſtify your proceedings, I muſt deſire you to acquaint me, by whoſe authority and inſtructions you have lately marched from Canada with an armed force, and invaded the King of Great Britain's territories in the manner complained of; that according to the purport and reſolution of your anſwer, I may act agreeable to the commiſſion I am honoured with from the King my maſter. However, Sir, in obedience to my inſtructions, it becomes my duty to require your peaceable departure, and that you would forbear proſecuting a purpoſe ſo interruptive of the harmony and good underſtanding, which his Majeſty is deſirous to continue and cultivate with the moſt Chriſtian King, &c.

ROBERT DINWIDDIE.

Mr. Waſhington was alſo inſtructed to make a further and diligent inquiry into the French encroachments and deſigns. For this purpoſe, it appears by his journal on this occaſion, that he travelled by the way of Frederickſburg, Wincheſter, and Will's Creek, and thence to the mouth of Turtle Creek on the river Monongahela; where he was informed of the death of the French General in Chief in thoſe parts, and of their troops returning into winter quarters. From thence he paſſed to the forts on the Ohio, about ten miles diſtant, where the Monongahela is joined by the river Alligany. On the 25th of November he met with a few French deſerters, from whom he got intelligence, that they were part of 100 men, ſent with eight canoes laden with proviſions, from New Orleans to Kuſkaſkas, with a promiſe of being joined there by an equal number of French from the Miſſiſippi, to convey them and their ſtores up the river. That the French had built four ſmall forts between New Orleans and the Black Iſlands, garriſoned by thirty or forty men, and a few ſmall pieces of cannon in each. That at New Orleans, near the mouth of the Miſſiſippi, there were thirty-five companies of forty men each, with a fort of ſix carriage guns; and at Black Iſlands, diſtant 130 leagues above the mouth of the Ohio, a fort with eight guns, and ſeveral companies. They alſo acquainted him that there was a ſmall palliſaded ſaded fort on the Ohio, at the mouth of the Ouabach or Wabaſh, about ſixty leagues from the Miſſiſippi, a river which heads near the weſt end of Lake Erie, by which the French on the Miſſiſippi, communicate with thoſe on the Lakes.

With theſe deſerters was an Indian trader, named Brown, who informed him further, that at Shanaoh town, he had met with a King of the ſix nations, from whom he learnt, that the French had built a fort on Lake Erie, and another on a ſmall lake, about fifteen miles aſunder, with a large waggon road between. That three nations of French Indians had taken the hatchet againſt the Engliſh. That the French had called all the Mingos, Delawares, &c. together, and told them that they had intended to be down the river this fall, but were obliged by the inclemency of the ſeaſon to defer their march till the ſpring, when they would certainly come with a much greater number; and threatening them with military execution, in caſe they would not remain neuter; for that they expected to fight the Engliſh three years, and did not doubt of ſucceſs, and of conquering all the lands on the Ohio.

Mr. Waſhington arrived at Verango on the 4th day of December, 1753, an old Indian town at the mouth of French Creek on the Ohio, where he found the French colours hoiſted at a houſe, from which they had driven Mr. John Frazer, an Engliſh ſubject; and met with Captain Jonquiere, who was the French commander on the Ohio; who received him courteouſly, and referred him to the general officer of the next fort with his letter. However, Jonquiere kept him at ſupper, and after the glaſs had paſſed about cheerfully, the French Captain told him, that it was their abſolute deſign to take poſſeſſion of the Ohio; and by G— they would do it; for though they were ſenſible the Engliſh could raiſe two men for their one, yet they knew their motions to be too ſlow and dilatory to prevent any undertaking of theirs, grounding the right of France to the river, upon a diſcovery made by one La Salle, about ſixty years before; and agreeable to this converſation, they had ſeized all ſtraggling Engliſh traders, and had orders to make every perſon priſoner who attempted to trade on the Ohio, or the waters of it; and now the commandant returned the following anſwer to the Governor's letter.

SIR,

As I have the honour of commanding here in chief, Mr. Waſhington delivered to me the letter, which you wrote to the commander of the French troops. I ſhould have been glad that you had been inclined to proceed to Canada to ſee our general, to whom it better belongs than to me, to ſet forth the evidence and the reality of the rights of the king my maſter to the lands ſituate along the river Ohio, and to conteſt the pretenſions of the King of Great Britain thereto. I ſhall tranſmit your letter to the Marquis Duguiſne, (or du Queſne.) His anſwer will be a law to me. And if he ſhall order me to communicate it to you, Sir, you may be aſſured I ſhall not fail to diſpatch it forthwith to you. As to the ſummons you ſend me, to retire, I do not think myſelf obliged to obey it. Whatever may be your inſtructions, I am here by the orders of my general; and I entreat you, Sir, not to doubt one moment but that I am determined to conform myſelf to them with all the exactneſs and reſolution that can be expected from the beſt officer. I do not know that in the progreſs of this campaign, any thing that has paſſed which can be proved an act of hoſtility, or is contrary to the treaties which ſubſiſt between the two crowns, the continuation whereof as much intereſteth, and is as pleaſing to us as the Engliſh. Had you been pleaſed, Sir, to have deſcended to particularize the facts which occaſioned your complaint, I ſhould have had the honour of anſwering you in the fulleſt, and, I am perſuaded, the moſt ſatisfactory manner, &c.

LEGARDEUR DE ST. PIERRE.

From the Fort ſur la Riviere au Beuf, December, 15, 1753.

Theſe hoſtilities were alſo tranſmitted to the court of Great Britain, and the complaints againſt them were exhibited in a memorial by the Earl of Albemarle, the Britiſh miniſter at Paris; but without any other effect than deluſive promiſes to curb and withdraw the cauſes of thoſe complaints. And the Britiſh miniſtry ſtill gave ſo much ear to thoſe vain pretences and excuſes, that they prevented his Majeſty at the opening of the parliament, on the 15th of November, 1753, from taking proper notice of the French conduct towards his American ſubjects; and permitted him to declare, that the continuance of the public tranquillity, and the general ſtate of Europe remained upon the ſame footing as when they laſt parted; and aſſured them of his ſteadineſs in purſuing the moſt effectual meaſures to preſerve to his people the bleſſings of peace.

The governor of Virginia was convinced otherwiſe, and endeavoured with a true Britiſh ſpirit, to prevail with the Virginians, and his neighbouring governments, to arm in their own defence, to erect a fort on the Forks to curb the French encroachments, and to defend the Britiſh traders and property. But for want of a national countenance and ſuccour, this ſcheme failed, and, inſtead of deterring the French from their deſigns, it ſerved only as a means to provide them with arguments to make the native Indians jealous, and to oppoſe the Engliſh.

Governor Dinwiddie prevailed at laſt with his province to raiſe 10,000l and 300 men to protect their frontiers; and the command of this ſmall regiment was given to Mr. Waſhington, a brave and prudent young gentlemen, who began his march on the 1ſt of May, and on the 28th came up with a party of the French, took twenty priſoners, killed ten, and put the reſt to flight. Having learned from his priſoners the real ſtrength of the enemy in thoſe parts, under the command of the Sieur de Contrecœur, in chief on the Ohio, and acquainted by his ſcouts, that this commander in chief, informed of the advantage he had gained over the French party on the 28th, had ſent the Sieur de Villers with 1000 French, and 200 Indians to attack him, and diſlodge him from a little fort he had run up, called fort Neceſſity, as a temporary defence and cover for his handful of men, till ſome troops which had had been promiſed to follow him from New-York might arrive; he made the beſt diſpoſitions poſſible for one in his circumſtances to maintain his poſt, and to beat off an enemy, if any ſuch ſhould attempt to diſturb him. Which came to paſs on the 3d of July, when the body of 1200 men abovementioned marched up to the attack of his little camp and fort. The Engliſh were by this time by one caſualty or other, reduced to 200; but they ſuſtained the enemy's whole force for upwards of three hours, and laid 200 of the enemy dead in the field. So much reſolution greatly diſcouraged the French, and put their General upon ſome leſs dangerous method of diſlodging the Engliſh. Thus, at the time Colonel Waſhington expected nothing bettea than to be ſurrounded and put the ſword, the enemy called a parly, which ended in an honourable capitulation for the brave remains of our provincial troops, of whom thirty had been killed and ſeventy wounded. For our men behaved with the greateſt intrepidity, determined not to aſk for quarter, but with their bayonets ſcrewed to ſell their lives as dear as they poſſibly could.

The capitulation was, that each ſide ſhould retire without moleſtation, and that the Engliſh army ſhould march away with all the honours of war, and with ſtores, effects, and baggage. But after Colonel Waſhington had marched out of Fort Neceſſity, the Indians, whom the French had ſeduced from their allegiance to the King of Great Britain, attacked them, plundered their baggage, and made a great ſlaughter of the men, cattle, and horſes. And when the French commander was applied to, he pretended to be extremely concerned, drew his ſword, and ran among the Indians, but, inſtead uſing means to ſtop their breach of the capitulation, he encouraged them to rob and murder the Engliſh.

NEGAPATAM, ENGAGEMENT OFF IN 1746. A Dutch ſettlement on the coaſt of Coromandel, in the Eaſt-Indies. About the middle of January, 1746, Monſieur Bourdenay left the iſland of Maſcarine, now called Bourbon, in the ſhip Hercules of ſeventy guns, bound for Pondicherry, having a ſquadron under his command, conſiſting of fourteen ſhips. Soon after the French left the iſland they met with very bad weather, wherein they loſt two of their ſhips, and one ſmall veſſel was ſeparated, though afterwards proved to be ſafe. The Hercules loſt her main-maſt, which with the damages ſuſtained by other ſhips, obliged the French to put for Madagaſcar, where they lay two months to refit and victual; and ſetting ſail in May, they reached the coaſt of Coromandel the 24th of June, 1746, between the iſland of Ceylon and the Main, deſigning to make the new French ſettlement of Carricol to get news.

On the loſs of Commodore Barnet, who died of a nervous fever at Fort St. David's garden-houſe, the 29th of April, 1746, a loſs greatly lamented, but afterwards grevioufly felt by the Engliſh in thoſe parts, the chief command of the Engliſh ſquadron fell to Captain Peyton of the ſhip Medway. Early in the morning of the 25th of June, 1746, the Engliſh ſquadron being near to Negapatam, the French ſquadron appeared in ſight, and about eleven o'clock the two ſquadrons were near each other; the Engliſh ſquadron conſiſted of the ſhips Medway, Captain Peyton; the Preſton, Lord Northeſk; the Harwich, Captain Carteret; the Wincheſter, Lord Thomas Bertie; the Medway's prize, Captain Griffin; and the Lively, Captain Stevens; though the Lively was ordered out of the line and never fired a gun.

The French ſquadron conſiſted of the Hercules, Monſieur Bourdenay, and five ſhips of fifty guns, three ſhips of forty guns, and two ſhips of twenty guns, being in all eleven ſhips; one of the ſmall French ſhips was alſo out of the line, and did not fire a gun.

We do not find how it happened, but it appears there was not a great gun fired until about four o'clock in the afternoon; Lord Northeſk was ordered to attack the two headmoſt ſhips of the French line, and going to his ſtation paſſed by Monſieur Bourdenay, who fired his broadſide, and was anſwered by a broadſide from Lord Northeſk, that laid open the Hercules's upper tier of guns; Captain Carteret was ordered to attack the third and fourth ſhips of the French line; and Captain Peyton engaged the Hercules and another ſhip in the centre of the French line; Lord Bertie engaged the ſeventh and eighth ſhips of the French line; and Captain Griffin took up the three laſt ſhips of the French line.

The French ſhips being full of men, fired very briſkly, and particularly the French had the better of the Engliſh in their ſmall arms, which being obſerved by the Engliſh, they kept at a proper diſtance, and ſoon found that they managed their great guns better than the French, and their weight of metal greatly exceeded the French; Monſieur Bourdenay alſo perceiving this, made two attempts for boarding of the Medway, but he met with ſuch a warm reception both times, that his people began to flag, and he gave a ſignal for another ſhip to come up to his aſſiſtance, which Lord Bertie obſerved, and went up to aſſiſt the Medway; and the Medway's prize was then attacked by four of the French ſhips in the rear, the French endeavoured to retake their ſhip, and Captain Griffin as bravely defended himſelf.

Night coming on, the fight ceaſed; Lord Bertie ranged up to the Medway, and enquiring of Captain Peyton, was anſwered, that all were well on board the Medway, ſave only that ſhe was very leaky, and employed many hands to keep her clear; Lord Bertie acquainted Captain Peyton that he had loſt two men, and received ſome damage in his rigging, but hoped they ſhould give a good account of the French in the morning.

Early in the morning, Lord Bertie and Captain Carteret were near to the French ſhips, and expected the ſignal to engage, but were greatly diſappointed by a ſignal for a council of war; which council being met, Captain Peyton acquainted them of the leaky condition of the ſhip Medway, and his main-maſt wounded; Captain Carteret had his fore-maſt greatly wounded; Lord Bertie had ſuffered in his rigging; and Captain Griffin had loſt thirty men; what elſe occurred is unknown, ſave only that the council agreed, that they repair their ſhips at Crankanelly bay, and ſo make another attempt. The French drew their ſhips in form, and appeared ready to engage; but finding the Engliſh did not make a ſecond attack, they proceeded to Pondicherry.

NEGAPATAM, was taken in 1781, by the Britiſh naval and land forces, under Admiral Sir Edward Hughes, and Major-General Sir Hector Munro, for the particulars of which tranſaction, ſee the following letters from thoſe commanders.

Extract of a Letter from Sir Edward Hughes, to Mr. Stephens, dated on board the Superb in Trincomalé Bay, the 15th of January, 1782.

I had the honour to addreſs you for their Lordſhips information by letter of the 18th of October laſt, in which I informed their Lordſhips, that Major-General Sir Hector Munro, K. B. was ſent to take the command of the Company's troops in the Tanjore country, and to co-operate with his Majeſty's ſquadron under my command in the attack of Negapatam; that I was in hopes we ſhould be able to reduce it, although the garriſon was reinforced, by a large detachment of Hyder Ally's troops, and the fortifications conſiderably ſtrengthened by new works; that it was true the ſeaſon for military operations on the coaſt, was far advanced, and the ſhift of the monſoon at hand; but, that for a place of ſo much conſequence to the company's and national intereſts as Negapatam truly was, ſomething muſt be riſqued. Accordingly the Company's troops appeared at Nagore on the ſea coaſt, on the 21ſt of October, and Major-General Sir Hector Munro immediately landed from the Superb, to take the command of them; the ſame day the whole corps of marines of the ſquadron, amounting to 443, officers included, landed and joined the Company's troops; and on the 22d a battalion of ſeamen from the ſquadron, conſiſting of 827, including officers, was alſo landed; the whole under the command of the Captains Thomas M'Kenzie, of his Majeſty's ſhip Active, Captain Alexander M'Coy of the Exeter, and Captain Henry Reynolds, of the Combuſtion fire-ſhip, with orders to co-operate with Major-General Sir Hector Munro to the utmoſt in all meaſures for the attack of the place; in the mean time the heavy cannon for the attack, conſiſting of four eighteen-pounders and two twelve-pounders iron guns, from the tranſports, with twelve eighteen-pounders from the ſhips of the ſquadron, two ten-inch and ſix five and a half-inch mortars, with their carriages, a proportionable number of ſhot, ſhells, powder, and every eſſential ſtore were landed through a great ſurf by the boats of the ſquadron, or on rafts or catamarans, made for that purpoſe, with incredible fatigue to the men, and equal ſpirit and labour, under the ſuperintendence of Captain Ball of the Superb, who had great merit in his department of ſevere duty. On the night of the 29th of October, the ſtrong lines which the enemy had thrown up, flanked by redoubts, to cover and defend the approach to the town, were ſtormed and carried by our troops, in which the ſeamen and marines bore a principal part, and diſtinguiſhed themſelves for ſteady and determined bravery.

On the 3d of November the General opened ground againſt the north face of the fort, and the approaches were carried on with great rapidity, in which the ſeamen and marines worked with readineſs and effect. On the 5th I moved with a part of the ſquadron nearer the fort on the flank of our lines, and on the 6th landed early in the morning, to concert with the General the beſt means of carrying on the ſiege with vigour, and returned on board the Superb the ſame evening.

On the 7th a battery of ten eighteen-pounders, within 300 paces of the walls of the place, being ready to open, I thought it proper to ſend the following ſummons jointly with the General to the Governor.

Camp before Negapatam
SIR, November 7th, 1781.

As we are perfectly informed of the weakneſs of the town and citadel of Negapatam, and the ſmallneſs of the garriſon you have to defend it againſt the ſhips and troops of his Britannic Majeſty, and the Eaſt-India company, under our command, of whoſe great ſuperiority in proportioned numbers and diſcipline you cannot be ignorant: we are induced from motives of humanity, in order to avoid the effuſion of human blood, and of regard to you and the inhabitants of the place, to prevent, if in our power, the diſtreſſes and calamities that may befal you and them, to demand of you the immediate ſurrender of the place, on ſuch terms as appear to us reaſonable and conſiſtent, and you and we agree upon. For this purpoſe, we give two hours from the time this ſummons is delivered to you, to deliberate on an anſwer. If you agree to ſurrender on capitulation, commiſſioners are immediately to be ſent on your part to the General in camp; but if you reject the offer now made you, the batteries will immediately open againſt your walls, and you will yourſelf be the cauſe of more diſadvantageous terms at a latter day.

We have the honour to be, with great regard, &c. &c. &c.
EDWARD HUGHES.
HECTOR MUNRO.

Reynier Van Vliſſengen, Governor of Negapatam.

And the Governor being indiſpoſed, received from the ſecond in command the following anſwer:

To the Honourable Sir Edward Hughes Knight of the Bath, Vice-Admiral of the Blue, Commander of his Britannic Majeſty's Naval Forces, and the Honourable Sir Hector Monro, Commander of his Britannic Majeſty's Military Forces, &c. &c.

SIRS,

I have have had the honour juſt now to receive the letter you was pleaſed to write me, containing the ſummons to deliver over this place. And as I am obliged by honour and oath to defend this place with all my power, I cannot enter into any agreement regarding the ſurrendering of the ſame, but ſhall, when you reſolve to attack me, defend myſelf with the forces I have on hand.

I have the honour to be, Sirs, with great reſpect, your moſt humble obedient ſervant, (by the indiſpoſition of the governor) MOSSEL.

Negapatam Nov. 7th, 1781.

During

During the ſiege the enemy made two deſperate ſallies with the greateſt part of the garriſon, but were both times beat back into the town with much loſs. In the afternoon of the 10th, the breaching battery being ready, four eighteen-pounders were got into it, and opened on the face of the baſtion intended to be breached with good effect; in the night four more eighteen-pounders were got into the ſame battery, and all opened on the breach-baſtion at day-light, and ſoon after the enemy demanded a parley, and ſent two commiſſioners to the General in camp with terms of capitulation, which the General did me the honour to ſend off on board the Superb. In the mean time hoſtilities ceaſed on both ſides, and early in the morning of the 12th I landed and went to camp, and with the General received the commiſſaries there about ten o'clock, when the terms of capitulation were agreed to, and after being ſent into the town to be ratified by the Governor and his council, was counterſigned by the General and myſelf at two o'clock, and the gates of both the town and citadel were put in poſſeſſion of our troops.

The garriſon conſiſted in all of about 8000 men, of which about 500 were Europeans, regulars, and militia, 700 Malays, 2500 Sepoys, and 2300 of Hyder Ally's troops, of whom 1000 were cavalry, and run away on the firſt charge at the attack of the enemy's lines, and never came near the place after, but kept at a diſtance plundering and burning the villages; and moſt of the Malays and Sepoys threw away their arms, and deſerted the garriſon through the weſtern gate in the night between the 11th and 12th during the truce.

The ſquadron loſt in this ſervice ſeventeen ſeamen killed, and twenty-ſeven wounded, thirteen marines killed, and twenty-nine wounded, moſt of the wounded have ſince died of their wounds, and many, both ſeamen and marines, were carried off ſuddenly by violent cramps, and ſpaſms brought on by wet and fatigue.

From the 12th to the 29th of November, the weather was ſo tempeſtuous, that it was with the greateſt difficulty and riſque I could embark ſome of the military priſoners from the port of Nagere to windward, on board his Majeſty's ſhip the Active, and the Company's Snow Panther; and on the 19th, there being every appearance of an approaching gale of wind, the ſquadrons put to ſea, and ſtood to the N. E. under their courſes, until the weather became more moderate, and the whole returned to Nagapatam Road on the 23d, except the Company's ſhips Neptune and Royal Admiral.

On the 24th and 25th, the weather being more moderate, I was enabled to embark the whole of the ſeamen and marines, who had done duty on ſhore during the ſiege, on board their reſpective ſhips, and the remaining part of the military priſoners being embarked on board the Active and Panther, they ſailed for Madras the 4th of December.

From that period to the end of the month, we experienced all the viciſſitudes of monſoon weather, much wind, heavy rains, and now and then a fair day, of which we took the advantage to get proviſions and water on board the ſhips, and embark the Dutch Company's civil ſervants, from the late Governor downward, in all fifty-ſix, on board the Company's ſhip Rochford, and ſhe ſailed with them for Madras on the 23d of the month.

A detachment of the Company's land forces, being granted me for the purpoſe of garriſoning Trincomalé, if taken, conſiſting of an officer and thirty European and Native artillery, and about 500 volunteer Sepoys, under a captain and ſubalterns, they were embarked on board the ſhips of the ſquadron, and the Company's ſhip Eſſex, accordingly, and I ſailed with his Majeſty's ſhips and tranſports from Negapatam Road, the 2d of this month, and arrived in this bay on the 4th, where I found Captain Montague in his Majeſty's ſhip the Seahorſe, who had been ſtationed off this place ever ſince the 21ſt of Auguſt laſt, to block up the Dutch ſhips in the harbour.

On the 5th in the morning, I began to diſembark the troops with all the boats in the ſquadron, ſix large chellingas, and four large catamarans; the chellingas and catamarans were brought from Negapatam, for this purpoſe. The marines with two ſix-pounder field pieces mounted, a detachment of artillery, and two companies of Sepoys as pioneers landed firſt, about three miles from Trincomalé Fort, without any reſiſtance; the battalion of the ſeamen, conſiſting of the ſame number of officers and men as at the attack of Negapatam, were landed immediately after the marines, and joined them, the Company's Sepoys followed them, and the whole were landed before dark, under the command of Captain John Gell, of his Majeſty's ſhip Minorca, aſſiſted by Captain Montague of the Seahorſe, and Captain Reynolds of the Combuſtion fire-ſhip, the ſeamen and marines, with the guns and pioneers, immediately formed and marched forward to Trincomalé Fort; and the ſame night the grenadier company of marines, with the guns, made themſelves maſters of the fort, by puſhing reſolutely through the gateway, while the Governor was drawing upon paper the terms of capitulation which he meant to propoſe.

In this fort, which commanded the only place where proviſions and ſtores could be landed from the ſhips, were found ten iron guns of different calibres, and three officers with forty men were made priſoners; and I learned from the priſoners, that the enemy's whole remaining ſtrength was drawn into Oſtenburgh Fort, on the top of a high hill which commanded the harbour, and had an open communication with their ſhips.

On the 6th we began to land the requiſite ſtores, proviſions, and baggage, for the troops at Trincomale Fort, and on the 7th the field officers, with Major Geils, the engineer, were employed in reconnoitring to find the beſt road to the heights. On the 8th, the whole marched towards a high hill which commanded Oſtenburgh Fort, on the top of which the enemy had a poſt with an officer's guard. This poſt a detachment of ſeamen and marines drove the enemy from on the ſame night, and took poſſeſſion of it within 200 yards of Oſtenburgh Fort; and I ordered Colonel Geil to ſend the following ſummons of ſurrender to the Governor the morning of the 9th.

Superb

Superb, in Trincomalé Bay,
January 9th, 1782.

Sir,

As I am perfectly informed of the weakneſs of your fort, and the very ſmall number of men you have to defend it, againſt the ſhips and troops of his Britannic Majeſty and the Eaſt-India Company under my command, of whoſe great ſuperiority, both in proportioned numbers and diſcipline, you cannot be ignorant.

I am induced from motives of humanity, in order to avoid the effuſion of blood, and regard to you and the inhabitants of the place, to prevent, if in my power, the diſtreſſes and calamities that may befal you and them, to demand of you the immediate ſurrender of Fort Oſtenburgh and its dependencies, with the ſhips and veſſels in Trincomalé harbour, on ſuch terms as appear to me reaſonable and conſiſtent, and you and I may agree upon: for this purpoſe I give you two hours from the time this ſummons is delivered to you to deliberate and return me an anſwer. If you agree to ſurrender on capitulation, commiſſioners are immediately to be ſent on your part to Colonel Gell, commander of the forces on ſhore, who will ſend them in ſafety to me; but if you reject the offer now made you, you yourſelf will be the cauſe of lives loſt, and more diſadvantageous terms at a latter day.

I am, Sir, your moſt obedient humble ſervant,
Ed. Hughes.

Albertus Hamaed, Eſq. Governor of
Fort Oſtenburgh.

To which, in about two hours, I received the following anſwer.

January 9th, 1782.

Honoured Excellency,

In anſwer to your Excellency's letter of ſummons of the 9th of this month, received by me, but now a little before ſeven o'clock in the morning, I have to inform you thus, by every poſſible means in my power, it is my duty to be faithful to my maſters, and for that reaſon I have reſolved not to ſurrender Fort Oſtenburgh, but to defend it to the laſt againſt all attempts that may be made to take it.

I am, honoured Excellency,
your Excellency's humble ſervant,
Albertus Hamaed.

Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Hughes, K. B.

Major Geils, who carried the ſummons, reported to me, that it was his opinion the place might be taken by aſſault; and as I was more diſpoſed to this mode of attack, as heavy cannon for battery could not get up the hill without much labour and loſs of time, which laſt I could not afford, but being deſirous not to riſk a repulſe, I wrote another ſummons to the Governor as follows:

Superb, in Trincomalé Bay,
January 9th, 1782.

Sir,

I have received the honour of your anſwer of this date to my ſummons of the 9th of this month, and am greatly ſurprized at your imprudence in expoſing the lives of the few men, women, and children, ſhut up with you in Fort Oſtenburgh to the certainty of a ſtorm, which no duty you owe your employers can warrant.

My former attachment to you and your family, as well as other acquaintances at this place, induces me to warn you of the imminent danger of this fate, by attempting to defend a place not defenſible, and you ſee the Engliſh troops in poſſeſſion of the heights which command the fort: if, after this friendly advice, you perſiſt to refuſe the ſurrender of the place on reaſonable terms, which I now offer you, you muſt take the conſequences, without laying any act of inhumanity to my charge. I am with regard, Sir, your moſt obedient humble ſervant,
Ed. Hughes.

Albertus Hamaed, Eſq. Governor of
Fort Oſtenburgh.

And determined, if the Governor refuſed to capitulate, and the Major continued in his opinion of the practicability of taking the fort by aſſault, to order it to be aſſaulted, being fully ſatisfied of the ſteadineſs and bravery of our men, and that, if practicable, they would ſucceed. The Governor ſent me the following anſwer to my ſecond ſummons.

Oſtenburgh, January 10, 1782.

Moſt Generous Sir,

Your Excellency's letter of yeſterday was delivered into my hands this morning at ten o'clock, in anſwer to which I am to acknowledge your Excellency's good will to me perſonally, and all the people in my place, but I am under the neceſſity of informing your Excellency, that my orders from my ſuperiors are to defend the place where I now command to the laſt. If I failed in this, I could not anſwer to them for my conduct, and that I leave to your Excellency's conſideration.

I am, with much reſpect,
moſt generous Sir,
your Excellency's humble ſervant,
Albertus Hamaed.

His Excellency the generous, brave, and illuſtrious Sir Edward Hughes, K. B. Commander in Chief of his Britannic Majeſty's ſquadron in Trincomalé Bay.

Major Geils perſiſting in his opinion that the lower part of the fort might be taken by aſſault, although not ſo clear reſpecting a cavalier very high, mounting ſix pieces of cannon, the aſſault was ordered, and the neceſſary diſpoſitions made for the attack to begin at day-light in the morning of the 11th, and accordingly the ſtorming party, compoſed of 450 ſeamen and marines, and their officers, with each flank covered by a company of pioneers, and ſeamen carrying the ſcaling ladders, and armed with cutlaſſes, with a reſerve of three companies of ſeamen, and three companies of marines, with two field-pieces to ſupport it, followed by the Company's troops, advanced at day-light towards the fort, and the ſerjeants party in front, getting in at the embrazures unperceived unperceived by the enemy, was immediately followed by the whole of the ſtorming party, who ſoon drove the enemy from their works, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the fort; and all the ſhips and veſſels in the harbour immediately ſurrendered.

In this aſſault I had the misfortune to loſe Lieutenant George Long, my ſecond lieutenant, a moſt worthy and deſerving officer, who was killed in advancing bravely to the aſſault at the head of his company, and alſo twenty non-commiſſioned and private ſeamen and marines; Lieutenant Wolſey, who commanded a company of ſeamen, Lieutenant Samuel Orr, of the marines, who commanded their grenadier company, and did duty as brigade major, and forty non-commiſſioned and private ſeamen and marines were wounded. The enemy loſt but few men, as they moſtly threw down their arms, and their forfeited lives were ſpared by that diſpoſition to mercy which ever diſtinguiſhes Britons.

Priſoners taken in the garriſon.

The Governor, 1 captain, 2 lieutenants, 3 enſigns, 250 European infantry, 1 captain-lieutenant and engineer.—2 ſubalterns, 50 European artillery, 55 ſeamen from the ſhips, and 10 artificers.—1 captain, 1 lieutenant, 2 enſigns, Malays.

In the harbour we found two of the enemy's ſhips, one of the Company's, the other private, but richly laden, and ſeveral ſmall veſſels of no conſequence.

I beg you will alſo acquaint their Lordſhips, that the whole of the officers who have been landed from the ſquadron; for the attack of Negapatam and this place, have on all occaſions manifeſted much honour, courage, and good conduct, and the private ſeamen and marines have acted with great ſteadineſs and bravery. The public ſervice has received great aſſiſtance from Major Geils, an excellent officer and able engineer in the Company's ſervice, who conducted, as engineer in chief, the attacks of Negapatam and this place, with much ſpirit and propriety; and I have the pleaſure to aſſure their lordſhips, that the moſt perfect harmony ſubſiſted between the officers and men of his Majeſty's ſquadron, and thoſe of the Company's forces co-operating with them.

As the knowledge of theſe ſucceſſes by which the Dutch are driven entirely from the coaſt of Coromandel, and a fair beginning made towards getting poſſeſſion of all their ſettlements on the iſland of Ceylon, may be attended with many good conſequences to the public, I have ordered his Majeſty's ſloop the Nymph, Captain John Sutton, commander, late my firſt lieutenant, to proceed to England immediately; and I have delivered to Captain Henry Ball, my captain in the Superb, who has been of infinite uſe to the ſervice in ſuperintending the landing of the heavy guns, ſtores, proviſions, and other articles, both at Negapatam, and at this place, my letters for their lordſhips, and the Earl of Hilſborough, with the colours of the citadel of Negapatam and of Fort Oſtenburgh, which I requeſt their lordſhips will permit him to lay at his Majeſty's fleet.

Extract of a Letter from Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Hughes, K. B. Commander in Chief of his Majeſty's Ships and Veſſels in the Eaſt-Indies, to the Earl of Hilſborough, dated Superb in Trincomale Bay, January 17th, 1782.

I am happy to obſerve to your Lordſhip, that the fall of Negapatam fully anſwered my expectations, for immediately after, Hyder Ally's troops evacuated all the forts and ſtrong poſts they held in the Tanjore country, and the Poligars, or the petty princes, in the Marawa and Trinavilly provinces, who at the inſtigation of Hyder, had rebelled againſt the Nabob of the Carnatic, and taken up arms againſt us, are returned to their obedience on the beſt terms they can make for themſelves.

Extract of a Letter from Sir Hector Munro, K. B. to the Earl of Hilſborough, dated Negapatam, November 24, 1781.

I have the honour to inform your Lordſhip of the ſucceſs of his Majeſty's troops and thoſe of the Eaſt-India Company againſt Nagapatam, which ſurrendered the 12th inſtant by capitulation, to Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Hughes, commander in chief of his Majeſty's ſhips and forces by ſea before Negapatam, and to me, who had the honour of commanding the troops that beſieged it by land.

Sir Edward blocked it up by ſea from the 8th of July to the 12th of this month, the day on which it ſurrendered.

The reduction of this fortreſs at this period is of the utmoſt conſequence to the public, as it is to the intereſt of the Eaſt-India Company, for ſhould the French and the Dutch, or either of them in force come to the Coromandel coaſt, Negapatam would not only have been their arſenal and granary, but the place from whence they would have commenced all their intended operations againſt the Company's forts and poſſeſſions in this part of India, and would have been of as much conſequence as Pondicherry would have been, had it not been taken and demoliſhed.

I incloſe your Lordſhip a return of the killed, wounded, and miſſing during the ſiege; the ſtrength of the garriſon which defended Negapatam, and a return of the troops that attacked it: all which, I have to requeſt, you will be pleaſed to lay before the King, and make known to his Majeſty the good conduct and gallant behaviour of both officers and men on every occaſion during the ſiege.

Permit me, my Lord, to expreſs the great ſatisfaction, as well as the ſupport I received from the co-operation of Sir Edward Hughes during the ſiege, which I could not carry on but for the aſſiſtance of the ſquadron. His zeal for the public ſervice and his knowledge of the advantages which muſt ariſe from the reduction of Negapatam, made the Admiral not only indefatigable in landing the troops, ordnance, and ſtores, but he exerted himſelf with great vigour and diſpatch to forward our operations by land, inſomuch that he juſtly merits his Majeſty's approbation, the thanks of the public, and of the Eaſt-India Company.

Sir Edward Hughes, K. B. was informed that the French ſquadron was laying at anchor off Cuddalore, on the 24th of June 1782, which that place had ſurrendered before to their land forces, and that his Majeſty's armed tranſports, the Reſolution and Raikes, on their paſſage to join him at Tricomalé, with ſtores and ammunition, had very unfortunately been fallen in with by the French ſquadron and captured; and the San Carlos, another of his Majeſty's armed tranſports, with the brig Rodney, were chaſed and very narrowly eſcaped being alſo captured, and had returned to Madras Roads.

He continued with the ſquadron at anchor in Negapatam Road till the 5th of July, when at one P. M. he weighed with the ſquadron to the ſouthward, having ſeen the French fleet appear in ſight, conſiſting of eighteen ſail, the Engliſh kept to the ſouthward all night in order to gain the wind.

On the 6th at day-light, the enemy's ſquadron at anchor bearing N. N. E. diſtant about ſeven or eight miles, wind at S. W. At fifty minutes paſt five A. M. he made the ſignal for the line of battle ſhips a-breaſt, and bore away towards the enemy, at ſix obſerving the enemy getting under ſail, and ſtanding weſtward, hauled down the ſignal for the line of battle and made a ſignal for the line a-head, at two cables length diſtant. At ten minutes paſt ſeven, the Engliſh line being well formed, made the ſignal to bear down upon the enemy; each ſhip in the line againſt the ſhip oppoſed to her in the enemy's line. At ten minutes paſt ten the French began to fire. At forty minutes after ten the Engliſh made ſignal for battle, and at the ſame time for cloſe engagement.

From ten minutes after eleven till thirty-five minutes paſt noon, the engagement was general from van to rear in both lines, and moſtly very cloſe; the French ſhips appeared to have ſuffered very much both in hulls and rigging, the van ſhip had bore away out of her line; and the Brilliant, the French Admiral's ſecond ſhip a-head had loſt his main-maſt.

At this time the ſea breeze ſet in S. S. E. very freſh, and ſeveral of the Engliſh van and centre were taken away, and paid round with their heads to the weſtward, while others of their ſhips, thoſe in the rear particular, which had ſuffered leſs in their rigging, paid off, and continued on the former tack. Some of the French ſhips were alſo paid round by the ſea breeze with their heads to the weſtward: the Admiral's ſecond a-head in particular, which was ſuppoſed to have been the Ajax, but proved the Severe, fell along-ſide the Sultan, and ſtruck to her: but whilſt the Sultan was wearing to join the ſquadron, made what ſail ſhe could, fired on and raked the Sultan, without ſhewing any colours, and then got in amongſt his own ſhips.

At fifty minutes paſt noon, finding the Worceſter, Eagle and Burford, ſtill continued on their former tack, and nearing the body of the enemy's ſquadron very faſt, the Engliſh Admiral made a ſignal to wear, and haul down the ſignal for the line, purpoſing to make a ſignal for a general chaſe; but the captain of the Monarca having hailed, and informed them that all his ſtanding rigging was ſhot away, and the ſhip otherways ſo much damaged as to be ungovernable; and the Hero on the contrary tack, hauling in with the land with the ſignal of diſtreſs out; and the enemy's ſhips having wore and come to the larboard tack, thoſe leaſt diſabled formed to windward to cover the diſabled ſhips, and endeavouring to cut off the Eagle, the Engliſh made ſignal at twenty minutes paſt one, to wear, and ſtood to the weſtward, the engagement ſtill continued partially, wherever the ſhips were near the enemy.

At half paſt four a ſignal was made to prepare for anchor. At ſeven in the morning the damages of the Engliſh ſquadron appeared to be too great to attempt to purſue the enemy.

The ſame day Sir Edward Hughes ſent Captain James Watts, of his Majeſty's ſhip the Sultan in the Rodney brig diſarmed, with a flag of truce, and letter to Monſieur Suffrein, containing a demand of the ſurrender of the French King's ſhip the Ajax.

Captain Watt came up with the French ſquadron the ſame evening, and the letter was forwarded to M. Souffrein, who returned an evaſive anſwer, ſaying it was the French ſhip Severe who had the halliards of her enſign ſhot away, as frequently happens in action, by which means it came down, but was never intended to be ſtruck.

NEVIL's CROSS, BATTLE OF, IN 1347. A place ſo called near Durham. Philip, King of France, finding his ſchemes on the Continent to divert Edward III.'s intention from the ſiege of Calais had failed, prevailed, as his laſt effort, upon David King of Scotland, to invade England with an army of near 50,000 men. The invaſion at this juncture alarmed the nation very much, but did not diſhearten the people. Young Lionel, left by the King his father guardian of the realm, not being of age to command an army, Queen Philippa took upon her to repulſe the enemy. To that end heading the troops drawn together from all parts with wonderful expedition, ſhe marched directly againſt the Scots, and offered them battle. David was no leſs eager to engage, imagining nothing more eaſy than to put to flight undiſciplined troops commanded by a woman; but in this he was deceived, not only loſing the day with the loſs of 20,000 of his men being ſlain, but was himſelf wounded and taken priſoner.

The chief perſons among the Engliſh who ſignalized themſelves in this expedition, were William la Zouche, Archbiſhop of York, Gilbert de Umfrevyle, Earl of Angus, Henry Percy, Raiph Neville, William Dayncourt, and Henry Scroop.

The King of Scotland, although he had two ſpears hanging in his body, his legs almoſt incurably wounded, and his ſword beat out of his hand, diſdained captivity, provoking the Engliſh by opprobrious language to kill him. And when John Copeland, Governor of Roxburgh caſtle, adviſed him to yield, he ſtruck him on the face ſo fiercely with his gauntlet, as to knock out two of his teeth. Nevertheleſs, Copeland conveyed him out of the field a priſoner, and upon refuſing to deliver him to the Queen (who ſtaid at Newcaſtle during the battle) the King ſent for him to Calais, where he excuſed his refuſal to the Queen in ſo handſome a manner, that the King ſent him back with the reward of 500l. a-year in land, where he himſelf ſhould chooſe it near his own dwelling, and created him a Knight Banneret.

NEVIS, ENGAGEMENT OFF, IN 1680. An iſland in the Weſt-Indies. Captain Berry being ſent in the Coronation of fifty-ſix guns, a hired ſhip, to protect the trade in the Weſt-Indies; where being joined by eight large merchant ſhips, converted into men of war by the governor of Barbadoes, he, as Commodore, ſailed to cover Nevis from the French, who at St. Kitt's were fitting out twenty-two men of war and frigates, ſix large tranſports of their own, and four Dutch, to conquer that iſland.

As he turned the Point of Nevis, his men were a little frighted at the blowing up of one of his beſt ſhips by an accident, juſt as the French fleet came in ſight; but the Commodore raiſed their ſpirits with great preſence of mind; "Now," ſaid he, "you have ſeen an Engliſh ſhip blow up; let us try if we can't blow up Frenchmen. There they are, Boys! and if we don't beat them, they will beat us." Having ſaid this, he immediately began the fight with the French Admiral, and, after a briſk engagement of upwards of thirteen hours, forced this mighty fleet to fly for ſhelter under the cannon of St. Chriſtopher's, whither he purſued them, ſent in a fire-ſhip and burnt the French Admiral. Seeing her in flames, he ſaid to his ſeamen, "I told you in the morning, that we ſhould burn a Frenchman before night; to-morrow we will try what we can do with the reſt." But while he was refitting his ſhips the enemy wiſely ſtole away, the French to Martinico, and the Dutch to Virginia.

NEUMARCK TAKEN IN 1757. A town of Sileſia in Germany. The King of Pruſſia after the battle of Liſſa, being joined by ſome troops, aſſembled his whole ſtrength at Parchwitz, when he found himſelf in a condition to face the enemy, and his troops full of ardour to reſtore affairs to their former ſtate.

Thus diſpoſed and animated, his Pruſſian Majeſty, being but two days march diſtant from the enemy, advanced with his whole army to Neumarck on the 4th. The viſit was quite unexpected. It threw the huſſars and pandours, many hundreds of which were reſting themſelves ſecure in that town, into great confuſion at the approach of the King's army. They endeavoured to eſcape towards Breſlau, while they ſhut the gates of the town on the ſide of the Pruſſians. But his Pruſſian Majeſty foreſeeing that would be their attempt to eſcape, had ordered ſome ſquadrons of dragoons and huſſars to file round the walls, and to cut off their retreat; by this means the action became deſperate. The Pruſſians forced the gates and drove the enemy out of the town, who falling into the hands of a large body of cavalry, ſtationed for that purpoſe, 300 of them were cut to pieces, and 600 of them threw down their arms and were made priſoners, with the loſs of no more than five Pruſſian huſſars. There were found in this town all the enemy's ovens, a ſmall magazine, and two pieces of cannon belonging to the pandours.

NEUSTADT TAKEN, AND ACTION NEAR, IN 1760. A town in the duchy of Wirtemberg, Germany. The following account was written by a Pruſſian officer who was in the engagement.

Lieutenant-General Baron Goltze having received intelligence of General Laudohn's aſſembling his troops, recalled all his detachments, and began his march towards Neiſs, on the 15th inſt. with his whole force. In the mean time General Laudohn, who had ſet out from his quarters on the 14th, with Palfy's regiment of cuiraſſiers, Lowenſtein's dragoons, 500 huſſars of Nadaſti, 500 of Kalnocki, 2000 Croats, fourteen companies of grenadiers, marched all night, with a view to ſurpriſe our troops at Neuſtadt. The latter were ſcarce out of the gates, when they were ſurrounded by thoſe of the enemy. General Laudohn ſummoned our troops twice by ſound of trumpet to lay down their arms, which they not complying with, he ordered all his cavalry to advance; they accordingly advanced ſix times on a gallop, to within ten paces of our troops; but perceiving many fall on their ſide, among whom were ſeveral officers, they retreated in great diſorder. Afterwards, the Croats having taken poſſeſſion of a wood, between Siebenhauſen, and Steinau, through which the roads were very bad, and by the rains rendered almoſt impaſſable for carriages, there attacked our troops on all ſides. Unfortunately a waggon broke down there in a defile, and as our people did not think proper to ſtay to repair it, they were obliged to abandon all that were behind it, and five covered waggons laden with baggage; and eighteen carts with meal and oats fell into the hands of the enemy, who haraſſed our troops as far as Steinau, and were conſtantly engaged with our rear-guard. The loſs of the Auſtrians however greatly exceeded ours; they buried above 300 men in different places, and ſent 500 wounded to Neuſtadt. Beſides which, we have taken twenty-five priſoners, amongſt whom are ſeveral officers.

We had thirty-five men killed, and five officers, and ſeventy-two private men wounded. The enemy made thirty-nine men priſoners, ſo that our loſs in the whole, including the miſſing, amounts to about 170 men; which is not much, conſidering the great ſuperiority of the enemy. Subſequent letters bring advice, on the 17th at break of day, the Auſtrians had abandoned the city of Neuſtadt, and that General Laudohn had retired to Jagerſdorff with the fourteen companies of grenadiers under his command; and that the Auſtrian cavalry were marched to Freywalde. The ſame letters add, that the Auſtrians had loſt twenty-eight officers in this action, and that the number of dead and wounded amounted to 1000 men. The regiment of Lowenſtein (cavalry) muſt have ſuffered greatly.

NEUENBURG, SURPRISAL OF. A town of Germany, ſituated in the circle of Suabia. In the year 1688, this town being in the poſſeſſion of the Germans, againſt whom the French were then at war, it was reſolved by Marechal Feuquieres to take it.

The enemy had thrown 500 foot and 1500 dragoons into the place, and this garriſon was well precautioned for its defence on the ſide of Pfortzheim, but expoſed a little too much towards the other gate, from whence they imagined they had no danger to apprehend, becauſe the ways to it were difficult to paſs. During the day-time they poſted on an eminence, that commanded a view of the gate of Pfortzheim, a party of twenty dragoons, ſo that they could diſcover every man who ſhould happen to quit Pfortzheim by day. The gate which was towards the river Entz, and contiguous to the covered bridge, was unprovided with a draw-bridge, and had not any work to protect it. There was only one centinel over the gate, and a corps-de-guard of fifteen or twenty men below. The rounds, however, were very frequently made on the wall.

When M. de Feuquieres had gained information of the manner in which theſe incommodious neighbours conducted themſelves, he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for carrying this poſt by the gate of Entz, becauſe the garriſon was leaſt attentive to that quarter. He waited till the cloſe of the day, that the party of dragoons might not diſcover his march; after which he advanced with 600 men through bye-ways which conducted him to the head of the bridge of Entz. A prodigious quantity of ſnow had fallen, but the march was ſo ſecret and expeditious, that he arrived about midnight at the covered bridge. He then advanced upon it with his detachment, and when diſcovered by the centinel who was ſtationed over the gate, told him in high Dutch, that he belonged to a regiment which he knew was quartered in Wirtemberg, and had lately returned from the war that was carried on towards Fort Louis. He then deſired to be admitted, as being incapable of ſuſtaining the cold any longer. The officer of the guard, having received information of thoſe particulars from his centinel, aſcended to the place where he was ſtationed, and converſed with the Marquis, while he diſpatched a meſſenger to the Commandant, who lodged in the caſtle, at a conſiderable diſtance from that gate. During the converſation, Feuquieres's men fixed a petard on the gate, which was not perceived by the officer till it was ready to operate. He then ordered the centinel to fire, and cauſed a drum to beat an alarm, though too late; for the gate was forced in a moment, and the Marquis formed his troops in order of battle on the ſpot, before the garriſon was in any ſtate of defence; ſo that the troops who compoſed it were cut in pieces, in retaliation for the murder of a lieutenant, and twenty troopers of the regiment of Villeroy by the Imperialiſts, after they had taken them priſoners, and had promiſed to allow them quarter. The French found 200 horſes in the town, and diſtributed them among the troopers and dragoons of the garriſon of Pfortzheim; after which, the Marquis ordered the town to be ſet on fire.

To this we ſhall add the ſurpriſal of Entzwahingen, as it was in conſequence of that of Neuenburg. Entzwahingen is a little town, ſituated in an open country on the river Entz, not far from Neuenburg; its garriſon was compoſed of 500 horſe and foot, and in imitation of the garriſon of Neuenburg, had a poſt in the day-time, on an eminence near Pfortzheim, from whence the ſoldiers who were ſtationed there, had a view of all thoſe who came out of the town. After the Marquis had remounted all his cavalry and dragoons on the horſes taken at Neuenburg, he marched to Entzwahingen during the next night. The cavalry were ordered to advance on the other ſide of the Entz, to prevent thoſe of the enemy from ſaving themſelves by paſſing that river; while the General attacked the two gates with his infantry, and marched with 600 foot, divided into two bodies, in order to form an attack. Theſe gates were ſituated one towards Pfortzheim, and the other towards Heilbron. They were unprovided with draw-bridges, and were not ſo well built as thoſe of Neuenburg. However, they were covered with a paliſaded redan, capable of containing about fifteen men, who retired at night into the town, and in the day-time it only protected the guard who were poſted at the gate.

As the enemy had no more than 150 foot in the place, the Marquis judged that the guard at the gates would be weak, and that it would be neceſſary to attack thoſe gates with vigour. He ordered hatchets to be delivered to the men who were detached for that particular ſervice, and as they were protected by the fire of the infantry, they ſoon cut down the barriers and gates ſo effectually, that the troops entered in good order, notwithſtanding the darkneſs of the night. All the troops of the garriſon were cut to pieces, to retaliate the maſſacre beforementioned; above 600 horſes were taken and ſent to Pfortzheim, and the town was plundered.

NEUBURG. A town of Wirtemburg and Suabia, twenty-ſeven miles weſt of Stutgard, where the following event took place between the French and Auſtrians, as related in a letter tranſmitted from Lieutenant General Lecourbe to General Moreau.

Head-quarters, Pafenhauſen,
July 3, 1800.

The two diviſions of Gudin and Montrichard having received orders on the 26th of June, to paſs the Danube and the Lech at Donawert and Gunderſingen, they began their march at a very early hour. Arrived at the Lech, the bridge of Gunderſingen was found to be ſo much damaged, that it required almoſt the whole of the day to repair it. The reſiſtance the enemy oppoſed was very feeble, but the firſt troops could not paſs over until ſeven in the evening. Gudin's diviſion, ſion, however, took a poſition in the front of Rain, covering the roads of Poetmes and Neuburg. A few hundred Auſtrians having paſſed in boats oppoſite to Schenfeld, the brigade of the left kept up a fire upon them until eleven at night, and took 100 priſoners. The remainder returned to the left bank of the Danube.

The order was given for General Gudin to proceed with his diviſion on the 27th of June to Poetmes, ſupporting his left on Enkirth; to General Montrichard to proceed with his diviſion to Neuburg, which he was to occupy with his left, extending his right ſo as to connect himſelf with General Gudin, and covering the road from Augſburg to Neuburg.

The two diviſions began their march before daybreak to execute this movement: that of Gudin was obliged to diſpute and gain by force its poſition, which the numerous cavalry of the enemy prevented from being completely taken poſſeſſion of. Several charges were ſucceſsfully executed by the 6th and 8th huſſars, who took 100 horſes from the enemy. General Puthod, who commanded the brigade on General Gudin's left, eſtabliſhed himſelf, however, at Enkirch.

But the principal efforts of the enemy were directed againſt General Montrichard. That General marched along the cauſeway of Neuburg with the whole of his diviſion, and, after taking poſſeſſion of that place, was to have taken a poſition on the right. Meanwhile General Kray, either deceived by our movements, or ſtill wiſhing to riſk another battle in the hopes of obtaining a poſition on the Lech, and operating his junction with Prince Reuſs, debouched from Neuburg with the main body of his army.

The two corps being in motion, neither were yet perfectly prepared either for receiving or giving battle; the advanced guard of General Montrichard penetrated almoſt to Neuburg, after driving back that of General Kray.

General Eſpagne marched with his brigade to ſupport the advanced guard, and a ſanguinary action ſoon took place, on the heights of Oberhauſen, between that brigade, conſiſting of the 37th and 84th, and all the enemy's freſh troops. The poſitions were obſtinately diſputed by our troops, who performed prodigies of valour. In vain did a battalion of the 37th proceed to Brontels to uncover the left of the enemy, who were numerous in artillery, infantry, and cavalry. The affair terminated by our being compelled to abandon the villages of Oberhauſen and Netherhauſen.

The enemy, enboldened by this firſt ſucceſs, ſoon covered all the ſurrounding heights, on which they planted about twenty-five or thirty pieces of cannon.

It was rather late before I was informed of this action, and at any rate it was impoſſible to believe that it would be very ſerious, as no one could ſuppoſe that Kray wiſhed to fight a battle, ſince he had a marſh and defiles in his rear.

I ſent inſtantly, however, for the brigade of General Grandjean, which was in reſerve on the Lech, and marched promptly to the field of battle.

Parties of the enemy's cavalry coming upon our rear, and carrying off ſome baggage, the ſpirit of our troops was ſomewhat damped. I found, however, Generals Montrichard and Schiner, at the head of their corps, giving them examples of firmneſs. The retreat was effecting towards Borkheim, but I ſtopped it, becauſe I felt that it was of importance to the army not to make a retrograde ſtep before an enemy, whoſe courage might have thereby been revived, and who would, therefore, have derived a great advantage from ſuch a movement. Some platoons, which I found in good order, ſerved to drive the enemy from the wood on the left of Unterhauſen.

The firſt company of grenadiers of the 109th was there. It demanded from its captain, Lacoſte, liberty to charge with the bayonet; the execution immediately followed the order; in an inſtant the wood was retaken. The brave chief of the 37th, Lacroix, who ſtill kept the village of Unterhauſen with 100 marksmen, marched alſo in front, and from all ſides the pas-de-charge was heard. My aid-du-camp, Noiſet, had his horſe killed under him at my ſide. The attack could only be ſudden on our part; not in a ſtate to ſuſtain the attacks of freſh troops, the firſt effort of the enemy repulſed us. I was not deceived in the danger, but it was neceſſary to keep the enemy in check until my reinforcements arrived. The troops of the diviſion, beſides, were emaciated by fatigue and famine, having marched all the night and fought all the day.

What I had foreſeen happened. Immediately ſeveral battalions of the enemy's troops marched againſt us, protected by twelve or fifteen pieces of well ſerved artillery. The enemy retook the wood, the heights and the village; but they were kept back till the arrival of ſome troops of the 4th huſſars and 11th chaſſeurs, and a company of horſe artillery of Sibelle. This firſt reinforcement animated the courage of our troops: three pieces of artillery advantageouſly placed on a height prevented the enemy from eſtabliſhing the batteries he had in front.

At laſt, after twelve hours battle, ſuſtained by the brave 37th, 84th, and 109th infantry, 9th huſſars, and the 6th cavalry, that is to ſay, till eight in the evening, when a battalion of the 14th light, two of the 46th, and two of the 59th, arrived. I then made my diſpoſitions for the attack on the two flanks and the centre. Some companies of the 14th and the 46th went by a road which I had ſeen to the right in this wood, and arrived, without being ſeen, to within 150 toiſes of the enemy's artillery. The reſerve, which ſucceeded the firſt of theſe attacks, left no doubt to the enemy that great reinforcements had arrived. Immediately all the columns, foot, horſe, and artillery, advanced; all the movements were executed in ſuch concert, that the enemy appeared to give way. He ſtill poſſeſſed the village of Unterhauſen, protected by a numerous artillery. I ordered a battalion of the 46th to march in the charging ſtep, and in columns againſt it. It was executed with the greateſt courage, and without firing one ſhot; but the brave Chief of Brigade Forty, commander of that brigade, was killed at the head of the village, as well as the firſt grenadier of France, Latour D'Auvergne.

The battle continued, with an unexpected obſtinacy, until until ten at night. The 46th and 14th light were intermixed with the enemy's cavalry, without, however, being broken; and the enemy, ſoon aſtoniſhed at their boldneſs, fell back and retreated. I ordered them not to be followed, as the night was coming on. This day finiſhed with overthrowing the Auſtrian army, two thirds of which have been beaten by twelve battalions. It has alſo proved to our troops, that though few in number, if they are obſtinately reſolved to attack or defend a poſition, they may always be ſure of ſucceſs.

By this battle we have alſo obtained 800 priſoners of fifteen different regiments, among whom are Major Lacy and ſeveral other officers. The enemy left a number of dead on the field of battle, and 300 wounded, whom he could not carry off from Neuburg. We had on our part about 300 killed and wounded.

The moveable ſurgical corps diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their zeal. The ſurgeon in chief, Percy, who was on the field of battle, directed ſuccours to the wounded, and removed them with that activity and courage which he always diſplays. Not one of our wounded remained in the hands of the enemy.

All the chiefs, all the officers, and ſoldiers, rivalled each other in courage. The Chief of Brigade Sancey, and the Chief of Battalion Montfort, diſtinguiſhed themſelves. LECOURBE.

NEWARK, SIEGE OF, AND BATTLE AT. A borough town in Nottinghamſhire, ſituated on the river Trent, about fifteen miles north-weſt from Wollingham. This battle was fought during the time of the grand rebellion, viz. 1644. Whilſt the Marquis of Newcaſtle was in the North obſerving the Scottiſh army, the Lord Willoughby of Parham, and Sir John Meldrum with about 5000 men of the Parliament forces, laid ſiege to Newark, wherein the King had put a garriſon. As ſoon as Charles knew of this proceeding, he ſent orders to Prince Rupert to endeavour to relieve the place. The Prince being then at Cheſter, put himſelf immediately upon the march, and being joined by other troops, made a body of 7000 men, with whom he advanced towards Newark. Meldrum, who commanded alone at the ſiege, (the Lord Willoughby being gone elſewhere) reſolved to fight the Prince, and for that purpoſe drew up his forces at a little diſtance from the town.

On the 21ſt of March there was a ſharp conflict, particularly at a bridge over which Meldrum had reſolved to retreat in caſe of need. The bridge was vigorouſly attacked, and as bravely defended.

Meanwhile, after the fight was over, Meldrum finding himſelf too weak to renew it the next day, reſolved to retreat over the bridge in the night. But he found the guard he had left there had deſerted, and the bridge in poſſeſſion of the enemy. So not being able to retreat, and perceiving himſelf ſurrounded with the King's forces, Meldrum ſent a trumpet to the Prince to deſire a parley. It was agreed that the foot ſhould march away with their ſwords, colours, and drums, all the officers with their arms, horſes, and baggage, and the troopers and dragoons with their ſwords, horſes, and colours. But he was forced to deliver all his ordnance and ammunition, with about 3000 muſkets.

The Prince after this expedition, which did him great honour, returned to Shropſhire, and from thence into Lancaſhire, to relieve the Counteſs of Derby, who for the ſpace of eighteen weeks was beſieged in her houſe of Latham, and made a gallant defence againſt a body of 2000 Parliamentarians. In a ſally on the 6th of May, the beſieged ſlew near 300 of the beſiegers. Prince Rupert in his way to Latham, took Stopworth in Cheſhire, and whilſt he was advancing towards Latham, the beſiegers raiſed the ſiege, and part of them, under the command of Colonel Rigby, went and reinforced the garriſon of Bolton in Lancaſhire.

The Prince purſued them, and without giving them time to come to themſelves, took the town by ſtorm. After that he took Liverpool, alſo in Lancaſhire. The Governor, Colonel Moore, had not ſpirit to make any reſiſtance, he evacuated the town in the moſt precipitate manner; what rich moveables he could put on board the ſhips in the harbour, he did, inſtead of acquitting himſelf honourably, according to the truſt repoſed in him, he minded little elſe but the preſervation of a few trinkets.

Here the Prince received a letter from the King, commanding him to relieve York, which was beſieged by the enemy, and give him battle. See YORK.

NEWBERN, a town of Craven county in North Carolina, ſituated on the eaſt ſide of the river Nuſe, plundered, and engagement near in 1781. For particulars ſee the following letter.

SIR, September 11, 1781.

I have the pleaſure to inform you, that Major Craig, after his gallant attack on the rebels at Rockfiſh bridge, (when between ſixty and ſeventy of the enemy were cut to pieces, and thirty-one made priſoners), directed his march towards Newbern, in ſuch an able manner as to prevent the junction of the ſeveral rebel parties that were collected in the different counties to oppoſe him. Being informed, on his arrival at William's bridge, that a conſiderable body of General Lyllinton's men were poſted ſix miles below, he left the cannon and baggage under a guard, and, notwithſtanding his long march, proceeded to attack them; but the enemy having learnt his intentions, went off with ſome precipitation. The detachment halted, and had but juſt taken up their ground, when a few rebel light horſe were reported to be in the adjacent woods. Major Craig puſhed immediately forward with the cavalry, conſiſting of thirty-four men, officers included, and at about 500 yards beyond his pickets, found a line of 250 choſen light horſe, headed by their General Caſwell, with every officer of rank or influence among them. Major Craig was within fifty yards of the enemy before he perceived their great numbers; he formed directly, ſending for the yagers and the North Carolina regiment to his ſupport; but being juſtly apprehenſive of their encircling his little party, and and relying on the bravery and good conduct of the 82d, and Captain Gordon's troop, without waiting for the infantry, he ordered them to charge, which was immediately obeyed with the moſt diſtinguiſhed alacrity.

The rebels gave their fire twelve yards diſtance, which did not in the ſmalleſt degree check the ardour of the troops, who ruſhed among and diſperſed them, notwithſtanding their great ſuperiority, killing ten and taking the ſame number priſoners. Lieutenant Dunlop with the troop, purſued them above four miles with little effect, the whole being mounted on ſelect horſes; a few being entangled in the ſwamps fell into the hands of the loyal militia.

It has ſince been underſtood, that a very conſiderable number were wounded. General Caſwell eſcaped with difficulty.

We have to lament the loſs of that moſt deſerving officer Captain Gordon, of the independent troop, who was the only perſon killed on this occaſion. His fall ſenſibly damps the ſatisfaction we feel at the loſs on our ſide, in ſo very diſproportionate a conteſt. Our quarter maſter of the legion, a ſerjeant, and one private of the 82d, were wounded, and fifteen horſes killed and wounded.

The march of the troops from thence to Newbern, which they reached on the 20th ult. was interrupted. A diſpoſition for the defence of the town had been made by the gallies and ſome inhabitants, which had no other effect than cauſing the firing of a few ſhot. The town was taken poſſeſſion of, and the ſtores, conſiſting of above 3000 buſhels of ſalt, and a large quantity of rum, with all the ſhipping and merchandize at the wharfs, were immediately deſtroyed.

NEWBURY, BATTLE AT. A market-town of Berkſhire, fifteen miles weſt from Reading. This battle was fought in 1643, between the Royaliſts and the Parliamentarians, during the time of the grand rebellion. Charles, after his fruitleſs expedition into Glouceſterſhire, returned towards London, and ſo did the Earl of Eſſex, who had narrowly watched his motions.

Prince Rupert was immediately detached over the hills, to intercept him in his march, and amuſe him with ſkirmiſhes, until the King in perſon ſhould bring up the infantry. He performed this ſervice with ſuch expedition, that before the enemy had reached Newbury, he charged and put their rear in confuſion; and though they behaved with great conduct and reſolution, he compelled them to ſhorten their intended march, and take up their quarters at Hungerford. Next day, which was the 17th of September, the King took poſſeſſion of Newbury with his foot, ſo that Eſſex was obliged to paſs the night in the open field; and was indeed in ſuch a ſituation, that in all probability he would have found it extremely difficult to extricate himſelf, had the Royaliſts avoided a battle; but he was obliged to it by the impetuoſity of ſome young officers, who deſpiſed ſuch maxims of caution. He drew up his men in order of battle upon Bigs-hill, within a ſhort mile of Newbury, and made ſuch a diſpoſition as became a general of his conduct and experience. The Royaliſts began to ſkirmiſh in ſmall ſucceſſive parties, until they were inſenſibly engaged too far, that the King found it neceſſary to hazard a general action The King's horſe charged with their uſual intrepidity, and even routed the cavalry of Eſſex, but they could make no impreſſion on his foot, behind which the horſe rallied as often as they were put in confuſion. The London trained bands, in particular, oppoſed themſelves like a rampart againſt the efforts of the Royaliſts, and managed their pikes with ſuch dexterity, that Prince Rupert attacked them in vain at the head of his choice cavalry. The battle was fought all day with equal obſtinacy on both ſides, and night parted the combatants, before either army could claim the victory. The King recalled his troops from the field, and next morning the Earl of Eſſex purſued his march towards Reading, which he reached with his cannon and baggage, after his rear had been ſeverely handled by Prince Rupert, who charged it when entangled in defiles, at the head of his horſe, and 1000 muſqueteers. Though the number of men ſlain in the battle of Newbury was not very conſiderable, the King ſuſtained irreparable loſs in the fate of ſome worthy noblemen who fell in the engagement. The Earl of Sunderland, a young nobleman of promiſing parts, was killed by a cannon-ball.

The Earl of Caernarvon, who had ſerved his royal maſter with ſuch courage and ability, was run through the body with a ſword, and expired in an hour after he had received the wound; but the theme of univerſal lamentation was the death of the great, the good, the amiable Lucius Cary, Lord Viſcount Falkland, Secretary of State, the darling of the muſes, the patron of learning and merit, the mirror of integrity, and the pattern of conſummate virtue. This excellent perſon had conſtantly oppoſed the crown in thoſe meaſures which he deemed dangerous to the liberty of the ſubject, and the privileges of parliament; but when he perceived the drift of the demagogues was to ruin the conſtitution; that the King had ſufficiently atoned for the errors of his conduct, during the firſt part of his reign, by the manifold conceſſions he had made in favour of his people, he diſclaimed their proceeding, and eſpouſed the cauſe of his ſovereign in diſtreſs; yet he was ſo much afflicted at ſeeing his country involved in the calamities of a civil war, that he loſt his former ſerenity of temper, he became ſilent, penſive, and reſerved; and in the midſt of his friends, the word "peace" often broke from him in a profound ſigh. He eagerly forwarded every overture of an accommodation; and that this conduct might not ſeem the reſult of perſonal timidity, he expoſed himſelf on all occaſions to the moſt imminent hazard, as if he had deſpiſed life, or been enamoured of danger. When his temper firſt changed, he began to neglect the exterior ornaments of his perſon, in which he had been formerly exact and curious; but in the morning of the battle, as if he had foreſeen his fate, he beſtowed extraordinary pains upon his apparel, ſaying, the enemy ſhould not find his body in a ſlovenly condition. "I am weary of the times," added he, "and foreſee much miſery to my country; but I believe I ſhall not be out of it before night."

He charged in the front of Lord Byron's regiment, and being ſhot in the belly, fell from his horſe, but his body body was not found till next morning. This is one of the moſt finiſhed characters which we find upon record; and his death the more lamentable, as he died in the 34th year of his age.

NEWBURY, BATTLE AT, 1644. The forces of the Parliament reſolving to make themſelves maſters of Newbury, which the King ſuſpecting, he determined to prevent them by intrenching himſelf there. The Earl of Eſſex, with a ſuperiority of numbers, marched from Reading to attack him.

On the 27th of October, the Earl attacked Charles's intrenchments in two different parts, and the action was maintained with great violence, from four o'clock in the afternoon till night, when the aſſailants forced the lines in one place, and took ſeveral pieces of cannon, but the darkneſs prevented them from making uſe of that advantage. On the other ſide, they had been repulſed with conſiderable loſs; nevertheleſs the King thought proper to retire in the night to Wallingford, leaving his artillery and baggage in the caſtle of Donnington, which the Earl of Mancheſter next day ſummoned to ſurrender. Though the governor refuſed to capitulate, they took no ſtep towards the reduction of the place, but remained inactive at Newbury. The King retired unmoleſted to Oxford, where being joined by Prince Rupert, with the northern horſe, as well as by the Earl of Northampton, and reinforced with draughts from different garriſons, he found himſelf at the head of 11,000 men, with whom he marched back to Donnington, and drew up his army in order of battle, between that caſtle and the town of Newbury. The enemy likewiſe appeared in battalia, but they did not think proper to attack the King, who happily returned to Oxford with all the artillery, ammunition, and baggage which he had left in the caſtle.

NEWCASTLE, BATTLE NEAR. The county town of Northumberland, upon the river Tyne. In 1637, Charles ſent into Scotland a book of canons for the government of the kirk, and afterwards the liturgy, with orders that it ſhould be read in all the churches in that kingdom. This occaſioned great tumults and diſturbances at Edinburgh, where the people, dreading the leaſt innovation in their religion diſapproved by their miniſtry, would not ſuffer the liturgy to be read. When the tumults were appeaſed, the whole nation fell to petitioning in behalf of their religion; but the King reſolving to puniſh ſeverely the authors of thoſe diſturbances, only anſwered their petitions with proclamations, which were by no means ſatisfactory to the people. At laſt the Scots perceiving that the court was reſolved to make them worſhip God after a new manner, and to introduce Epiſcopacy, and an entire new form of church government among them, aſſociated themſelves together (nobility, clergy, gentry, and common people) for the maintenance of their religion from all innovations. This is the famous Covenant, which like an alarm-bell, brought all the Scots together, and in one day the court loſt all authority in that kingdom. The King, far from taking proper meaſures to diſpel this ſtorm of his own raiſing, reſolved to perſiſt in his undertaking. But ſo far was his conduct from ſtopping the breach, that he only made it wider. To crown all, he reſolved to compel them by arms to ſubmit to his intended regulations. For this purpoſe he raiſed forces without a parliament, reſolving never to call another; the clergy and the Catholics furniſhed him with what money he wanted. The Scots alſo raiſed forces, and reſolved to defend themſelves.

The two armies met on the borders, and a battle was every day expected. But the King, who was with his troops, beginning to repent of his undertaking, reſolved to act on the defenſive, though vaſtly ſuperior to the Scots. In truth, both ſides were in the ſame humour, and when it was leaſt expected, commiſſioners from each party were appointed to negociate a peace. But at length, after both ſides had diſbanded their troops, the rupture broke out afreſh. And now the King was adviſed to call a parliament, which he did; but that aſſembly declined meddling with the Scottiſh affairs, applying all their attention to the petitions ſent them from all parts of the kingdom, complaining of great grievances, particularly breaches of parliamentary privileges, innovations in religion, and invaded property. This induced Charles to diſſolve them, and ſend ſeveral of their members to the tower. Hereupon the diſcontent of the people greatly increaſed, and what ſtill more inflamed them, was to ſee the Catholics countenanced, protected, and conſidered as the King's beſt ſubjects. Count Rozetti, an agent from the Pope, reſided at London, who openly went to court in great pomp, and whoſe houſe was a general rendezvous for Papiſts. Charles had married a French princeſs, who had prevailed on him to receive this agent as a ſort of nuncio, and by that, as well as the avowed protection ſhe afforded to thoſe of her religion, ſhe drew upon herſelf the implacable hatred of the people.

In Auguſt, the army deſigned againſt Scotland arrived on the frontiers, while the Scots paſſed the Tweed, and entered England. The latter being advanced as far as Newburn near Newcaſtle, there the Engliſh endeavoured to prevent their paſſing the Tyne. After a fight very faintly maintained by the latter, the Scots forced their paſſage, and the next day Newcaſtle fell into their hands; where they found all the artillery and ſtores ordered thither by Charles, who deſigned that town for the magazine of his army. This event broke all the King's meaſures. The Earl of Strafford, his great favourite, ſpeaking a little too roughly to the troops defeated at Newburn, put them upon magnifying, in their own vindication, the valour and number of the enemy. The Engliſh malcontents laid hold of this opportunity to ſpeak more boldly againſt the government. And on the other hand, the Scots took care to convince the Engliſh, that their deſign in entering England was not to injure the natives, but only to procure acceſs to the King, in order to lay their grievances before him; by this means they ſeparated the King's cauſe from that of the people of England, and by their great moderation made the Engliſh backward to ſerve againſt them.

NEWENDEN, BATTLE AT, IN 491. This place was by the Britons called Anderida, or Andred-Ceſter, where the famous Prince Arthur, after his return from Jeruſalem, oppoſed the Saxons under Ella, who had beſieged beſieged this town; the beſieged made great reſiſtance, and were ſupported by an army under Arthur, poſted on an advantageous ground, which made Ella loſe a great deal of time; but at length, after a vigorous defence, the town was carried by ſtorm, and entirely deſtroyed. Immediately after this, Ella aſſumed the title of King of Suſſex.

NEWFOUNDLAND, ENGAGEMENT OFF, IN 1755. An iſland on the coaſt of North-America.

On the 10th of July, the Alcide, a French man of war of 64 guns, and 480 men, commanded by M. Hocquart, and the Lys, commanded by M. Lageril, pierced for 64 guns, but mounting only 22, and having eight companies of land forces on board, being ſeparated from the French ſquadron commanded by M. Bois de la Mothe, fell in with the Engliſh fleet off the banks of Newfoundland; they refuſed to pay the uſual compliment to the Britiſh flag. His Majeſty's ſhips, the Dunkirk and Defiance, after an engagement of five hours, in which they fought ſo cloſe that a man killed on the yard of a French man of war fell into the Dunkirk, obliged them to ſtrike, and brought them into the fleet.

The Dunkirk loſt 90 men. The Lys had on board 76,000l. ſterling in money to pay their troops, and eight companies of ſoldiers, beſides ſeveral general officers and engineers.

NEWFOUNDLAND, 1796. A French ſquadron, conſiſting of three firſt-rates, and four two-deckers, with four frigates and two ſloops of war, entered the Bay of Bulls and Whiteley's Bay on Sunday the 4th September, and on the 5th, in the morning, they proceeded to deſtroy by fire the houſes of the inhabitants, with the magazines, ſtore-houſes, &c. which they completely effected; had taken Mr. Dingle, the juſtice of peace, and many others, priſoners; and as ſoon as the wind proved fair, they intended to proceed to St. John's with the ſquadron, after putting on ſhore 3000 troops, (which are ſtated to have arrived in the ſquadron,) to attack it on the land ſide; of which intention, however, Sir James Wallace had timely information, and was prepared for their attack, and with ſuch confidence of ſucceſs, that he is ſaid to have declared, if the inhabitants, &c. (of which there are ſtated to be 8000), would ſtand firm, he would hold out until ſuccours reached him from England, and deſpaired not of ſaving the place. He had with him, at St. John's, the Romney of fifty guns, two frigates, and the Pluto fire-ſhip.

The French were off St. John's three days, but were prevented from getting in by contrary winds, and were obliged to bear away for the Bay of Bulls.

Sir James Wallace, as ſoon as he diſcovered the enemy off the harbour of St. John's, enjoined the veſſels in the harbour not to put to ſea, and immediately moored the men of war in the moſt advantageous manner for the defence of the town, &c. They were at that time ſo well prepared for an attack, as to be under no apprehenſion from any attempts of the enemy, to obtain poſſeſſion of the town. The Romney of fifty guns, Admiral Sir James Wallace, was moored on the north ſide of the harbour, two frigates to the ſouthward, and the Pluto fire-ſhip outſide of the whole; ſo that it would be almoſt impoſſible for the enemy to attempt any thing by ſea at the entrance of St. John's.

There were, at that time about a hundred ſail of veſſels in St. John's harbour, when the French ſquadron appeared off Newfoundland. The crews of thoſe veſſels, added to thoſe of the men of war, made a force of about 10,000 men; all of whom, except enough to fight the guns on board the ſhips of war, were landed and armed; and thus there was a ſuperior land force to any thing the French could poſſibly oppoſe to them. Beſides theſe there were two thouſand ſhallops and boats, valued, large and ſmall, upon an average, with their fiſhing craft, at thirty pounds each; ſundry merchandiſe ſuppoſed to be at that time in ſtore, and in value about 300,000l. which amounted in the aggregate to nearly 420,000l. The crews of the ſhips, allowing four men to each boat, large and ſmall, together with the ſhoremen, who would make ordinary ſeamen, at a fair eſtimate, amount to 11,000 ſeamen, beſides a great number of inhabitants. See ST. PIERRE and MIQUELON.

NEWHAVEN TAKEN IN 1779. A town ſituated in the province of Connecticut, North-America; for the particulars of which ſee the following letter.

Extract of a Letter from Major-General Tryon to Sir Henry Clinton, dated New-York, July 20, 1779.

Having on the 3d inſtant joined the troops aſſembled on board the tranſports at White Stone, Sir George Collier got the fleet under way the ſame evening; but the winds being light, we did not reach the harbour of Newhaven until the 5th in the morning.

The firſt diviſion, conſiſting of the flank companies of the guards, the fuzileers, 54th regiment, and a detachment of the Jagers, with four field pieces, under Brigadier-General Garth, landed about five o'clock, A. M. a mile ſouth of Weſt-Haven, and began their march, making a circuit of upwards of ſeven miles, to head a creek on the weſtern ſide of the town.

The ſecond diviſion could not move till the return of the boats, but before noon I diſembarked with the 23d, the Heſſian, Landgrave, and King's American regiments, and two pieces of cannon, on the eaſtern ſide of the harbour, and inſtantly began the march of three miles to the ferry from New-Haven eaſt toward Brentford.

We took a field-piece which annoyed us at our landing, and poſſeſſed ourſelves of the Rock battery of three guns, commanding the channel of the harbour, abandoned by the rebels on our approach. The armed veſſels then entered, and drew near the town.

General Garth got into the town, but not without oppoſition, loſs, and fatigue; and reported to me at half paſt one, that he ſhould begin the conflagration which he thought it merited as ſoon as he had ſecured the bridge between us over Neck-Creek.

The collection of the enemy in force on advantageous ground, and with heavier cannon than his own, diverted the General from that paſſage; and the boats that were to take off the troops not being up, I went over to him, and the reſult of our conference was a reſolution, that with the firſt diviſion he ſhould cover the north part of the town that night, while with the ſecond I ſhould keep the heights above the Rock fort. In the morning the firſt diviſion embarked at the ſouth-eaſt part of the town, and croſſing the ferry joined us on the Eaſt-Haven ſide, excepting the 54th, which were ſent on board their tranſports.

In their progreſs of the preceding day from Weſt-Haven they were under a continual fire, but by the judicious conduct of the General, and the alertneſs of the troops, the rebels were every where repulſed. The next morning, as there was not a ſhot fired to moleſt the retreat, General Garth changed his deſign, and deſtroyed only the public ſtores, ſome veſſels, and ordnance, excepting ſix field-pieces and an armed privateer, which were brought off.

The troops re-imbarked at Rock fort in the afternoon with little moleſtation; and the fleet leaving the harbour that evening, anchored the morning of the 8th off the village of Fairfield.

The boats not being ſufficient for the whole of the firſt diviſion, I landed only with the flank companies of the guards, one company of Landgrave's, and the King's American regiment, with two field-pieces, eaſt of the village. and ſouth-weſt of the Black Rock battery, which commands the harbour.

We purſued our march (under a cannonade without effect) towards the village, but in our approach received a ſmart fire of muſquetry. The rebels fled before the rapid advance of the guards, and left us in poſſeſſion of it, and of the heights in the weſt, until General Garth, who landed two miles in the ſouth, joined us with the remainder of the troops in the evening.

Having laid under arms that night, and in the morning burnt the greateſt part of the village, to reſent the fire of the rebels from their houſes, and to maſk our retreat, we took boat where the ſecond diviſion had landed, the enemy throwing only a weak ſcattered fire on our flanks without execution, the regiment of Landgrave by a proper diſpoſition having effectually covered our rear.

Wanting ſome ſupplies, we croſſed the Sound to Huntingdon, and there continued till the 11th, and repaſſing that bay, anchored five miles from the bay of Norwalk.

The ſun being nearly ſet before the 54th, the Landgrave's regiment, and the Jagers were in the boats, it was near nine in the evening when I landed with them at the cow paſture, a peninſula on the eaſt of the harbour, within a mile and a half of the bridge, which formed the communication between the eaſt and weſt parts of the village, nearly equally divided by a ſalt-creek.

The King's American regiment being unable to join us before three next morning, we lay that night on our arms. In our march at the firſt dawn of the day, the 54th led the column, and ſoon fell in with the rebel out poſt; and driving the enemy with great alacrity and ſpirit, diſpoſſeſſed them of Drummond-hill, and the heights at that end of the village, from and commanding the bridge.

It being now but four o'clock in the morning, and the rebels having taken poſt within random cannon-ſhot upon the hills on the north, I reſolved to halt until the ſecond diviſion, landing at the Old Wells on the weſt ſide of the harbour, had advanced and formed a junction.

General Garth's diviſion paſſed the bridge by nine, and at my deſire proceeded to the north end of the village, from whence, and eſpecially from the houſes, there had been a fire for five hours upon our advanced guards.

The fuzileers, ſupported by the light infantry of the guards, began the attack, and ſoon cleared the quarters, puſhing the main body and 100 cavalry from the northern heights, and taking one piece of cannon.

After many ſalt pans were deſtroyed, whale boats carried on board the fleet, and the magazines, ſtores, and veſſels ſet in flames, with the greateſt part of the dwelling-houſes, the advanced corps were drawn back, and the troops retired in two columns to the place of our firſt debarkation, and unaſſaulted took ſhip, and returned to Huntingdon bay.

We were waiting only for freſh ſupplies of artillery, and force adequate to the increaſe of the rebels, by the decreaſe of the objects of their care, and the alarm of the interior country, when I was honoured on the 13th with your command of the 12th, for the return of the troops with the fleet to White Stone.

The rebels in arms at New-Haven were conſiderable, more numerous at Fairfield, and ſtill more ſo at Norwalk.

Two hundred and fifty Continental troops had now joined their militia, under General Parſons, and together were ſaid to be upwards of 2000. The accounts of their loſs are vague; it could not be trifling.

NEWPORT, or NIEUPORT, SIEGE OF AND BATTLE AT. A port town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in Flanders, ſituated nine miles weſt from Oſtend, and ſixteen north-eaſt from Dunkirk. This battle was fought in the year 1600, between the Spaniards under the command of the Archduke Albert, and the Dutch under their famous Prince Maurice, who had alſo ſome Engliſh and French in his army. The Archduke, it ſeems, intended to make a conqueſt of Holland, which Prince Maurice being apprized of, he reſolved to be in the field before him, and reached Newport all on a ſudden, having ſecured all the places behind him, in caſe of a retreat. He laid ſiege to Newport, but the Archduke having received intelligence of this unexpected march of the Prince, at the head of a conſiderable army, into the very heart of Flanders, did all that lay in his power to bring together a ſufficient force to ſtop his progreſs; for which purpoſe having found means to appeaſe the mutiny of the ſoldiers, by great promiſes (the Princeſs Iſabella, his wife, promiſing to diſpoſe even of her jewels for the payment of their arrears) and recalled his forces out of Gueldres and ſome other places, had brought together an army of 10,000 foot, and 1600 horſe, at the head whereof the Archduke marched in perſon to encounter the enemy. Thoſe left in the caſtle of Aldenburgh and other places, being amazed at ſo ſudden an approach of ſo formidable an army, army, at a time when they had flattered themſelves with certain hopes that the diſcords that reigned among them had put them beyond any poſſibility of gathering into a body, partly deſerted the places committed to their care before they got ſight of the Spaniards, contrary to the capitulation; the fault whereof was afterwards laid upon the mutinous part of the ſoldiery.

It was pretty late at night before Prince Maurice was ſurpriſed with the news that the Spaniſh army was advancing that way, headed by the Archduke in perſon; it is confeſſed on all hands, that the United Provinces for many years paſt had not been in ſo great a hazard as at this time, when they had neither time to intrench themſelves, nor if they could have done it would it have ſtood them in any ſtead, ſince the enemy were betwixt them and Oſtend, from whence they muſt expect their ſupplies, and to endeavour to fight their way to the frontiers of France, would have expoſed them to the utmoſt danger of being all cut to pieces before they could reach them. In this exigency of affairs, Prince Maurice having recourſe to that unparalleled preſence of mind, which was his conſtant companion in all his great actions, ordered Count Erneſt of Naſſau to march with all expedition with nineteen companies of foot, and four troops of horſe, to poſſeſs himſelf of the bridge of Liffingen, or if he found the enemy had already gained that poſt, to detain him in his march by ſkirmiſhes, till he might gain time to conſider what was beſt to be done, and put his troops in order of battle. Count Erneſt haſtened his march with all poſſible ſpeed, to gain the bridge before the enemy; but coming too late, poſted his forces near the fort Albert, and from thence attacked the enemy with ſuch vigour, that they did imagine no otherwiſe than that Prince Maurice was there in perſon, either with the whole or the greateſt part of his army; but ſoon after, having found their miſtake, they charged the Dutch troops ſo furiouſly on all ſides, that being forced to give way to their number, they were put to an entire rout, with the ſlaughter of 800, many of whom were ſlain after quarter given.

However, the loſs of theſe brave men proved the preſervation of the whole army; for as they fought with an unparalleled reſolution, and ſold their lives at the deareſt rate they could, Prince Maurice had thereby leiſure given him to poſt his horſe, and make a kind of entrenchment of waggons near the ſea-ſhore, towards Oſtend; for had the Spaniards immediately after this defeat attacked the Hollanders, they would in all probability have obtained an entire victory; but being elevated with the preſent advantage, which they looked upon as the ſure forerunner either of the flight or conqueſt of the enemy, they gave opportunity to the Prince to put his forces in full order of battle; whilſt they contented themſelves with proclaiming their victory throughout the Netherlands. Prince Maurice in the mean time was not idle to improve the little time he had left, ordering Sir Francis Vere with the Engliſh and Frieſelanders, and two companies of the Dutch guards, to lead the van; the French Swiſſers, and the forces lately come over out of St. Andrew's fort, compoſing the main battle under Count Solms, and the Dutch and Germans cloſing the rear: the horſe were poſted partly in the front and flanks, the reſt to cover the rear; having at the ſame time ordered ſome troops to obſerve the garriſon of Newport, he commanded the tranſport ſhips to ſail to Oſtend, to cut off all hopes of retreat from his forces.

It was ſcarce noon, when a ſtrong body of the Spaniſh horſe being advanced a great way before the foot engaged the Dutch van-guard, but were forced to retreat ſoon after to the adjacent hills, to expect the coming up of their foot, who marching along the ſea-ſhore, were not a little annoyed by the Dutch cannon. It was then taken into deliberation in Prince Maurice's army, whether they ſhould immediately attack the Spaniſh horſe, before they could be ſeconded by the foot, or expect the enemy's coming in the ſame place they were poſted in before. Thoſe that were for the firſt, urged the preſent opportunity of improving the advantage they had got in beating back the horſe, and encouraging the ſoldiers by this happy beginning; but the wiſer ſort being of opinion, that they had better expect the enemy in their poſt, in order to receive them with the more vigour, after they ſhould have been tired by a troubleſome march over ſandy hills, the laſt prevailed.

In the afternoon the whole Spaniſh army being advanced within full ſight of the Dutch, and finding them drawn up in very good order ready to receive them, many of the old officers among the Spaniards began to reflect more ſeriouſly upon the matter; and therefore not to come to a deciſive battle, but to endeavour by fortifying their camp to cut off all manner of ſupplies from the enemy; and before all to attempt the retaking of the fort of Albert; but the moſt of the young commanders elevated with their late ſucceſs, and ſeconded by the common ſoldiers, (who thought themſelves aſſured of victory) crying out aloud, to be led on againſt the half vanquiſhed enemy, this laſt opinion prevailed.

Prince Maurice by this time, being ready to give the ſignal of battle, ordered two pieces of cannon to be planted in front of his battalions on an eminence; which being performed with incredible alacrity by ſome Dutch ſeamen, by means of hurdles and boards to keep them from ſinking into the ſands, the ſame did great execution among the Spaniards, who briſkly anſwered the Dutch from eight pieces of cannon, planted near the ſea-ſhore, but with much leſs effect; the Dutch having the advantage of the riſing ground, and the cannon of ſome of their frigates making ſuch terrible havock among the Spaniards, that they were forced to draw farther from the ſhore, up among the adjacent downs, being a ridge of ſandy hills, caſt up by the ſea. Here the battle began moſt furiouſly, both ſides fighting with equal obſtinacy, and the victory remaining dubious for ſeveral hours, ſometimes one, then the other advancing or retreating, according to the advantage or diſadvantage of the ground; Sir Francis Vere, who was to attack the enemy's right wing, told the Prince at parting, that whether dead or living, he ſhould have occaſion to remember him for this day's action, which he performed to a miracle; for having repulſed the enemy's muſqueteers, he led on the choiceſt of his troops to break in upon their pikes; but having received two wounds, one in his leg, the other in his thigh, and his horſe ſhot under him, which he made uſe of to conceal his being wounded, was ſeaſonably relieved by his brother Horace Vere. At the ſame time his troops being charged in the flank by the enemy's horſe, not without great ſlaughter, they began to give way; and being hardly preſſed upon on all ſides, ſome of them were forced into the ſea; but the reſt making good their ground, Prince Maurice ſent to their relief a large body of French, who fired ſo furiouſly from the next hill upon the enemy's pikes, that they were forced to retreat backwards.

By this time the Flemings and Iriſh troops being engaged with the Swiſs, and the mutineers of St. Andrew's Fort; they were bravely ſeconded by the regiments of Holland and Utrecht; and theſe being again relieved in their turn by the German troops, they at laſt forced them to give way. Prince Maurice having wiſely pitched upon this expedient to tire out the enemy, by charging them ſeparately, and renewing the fight with freſh troops, which had the deſired effect; for whilſt the enemy purſued with more fury than conduct thoſe that gave way before them, they were continually charged by others, who keeping them in play till the former returned to the charge, they could gain no ground upon the Dutch troops; at the ſame time, Count Louis of Naſſau, with nine troops of horſe having charged the enemy's cavalry, was ſo well ſeconded by Ghent with ſome freſh troops, that they forced the Spaniſh horſe to quit their foot; which done, three troops were ſent to charge their foot in the flank, which being followed by ſix troops of cuiraſſiers, led on by Count Louis himſelf, they made a terrible havock among the enemy. Upon this occaſion Count Louis acquired immortal honour, having charged more than once through the enemy's horſe, and being ſurrounded, with only ten of his men, by a whole troop of Spaniards, yet fought his way through them with unſpeakable bravery. Prince Maurice finding himſelf ſuperior in horſe to the enemy, ordered towards the evening, Sir Francis Vere's and Bate's troops of horſe to charge the enemy near the ſea-ſhore, by the ordnance, which being done accordingly, and the enemy preſſing moſt furiouſly upon them, they received ſo warm a ſalute from the artillery, that they were glad to wheel off to the next hills, and returning to the charge, received a ſecond ſalute, which put them entirely into confuſion. The Engliſh then charging the Spaniſh foot with more vigour than ever, and theſe perceiving their main body give way, began alſo to look for their ſafety in an open flight, in which Sapana and Fillarſa their commanders in chief, were taken priſoners, the firſt dying ſoon after of his wounds.

The Spaniards, imputed the loſs of this battle to their being out-numbered by the enemy, and their having the ſea and wind in their faces; and laſtly to the diſadvantage they lay under in regard of their artillery, which being ſwallowed up for the moſt part in the ſands, could do them but little ſervice; whereas thoſe of Prince Maurice being ſuſtained by hurdles and planks, did terrible execution among them, their artillery being diſcharged thirty times during the action. Archduke Albert did all that could be expected from a general, encouraging his men with his face uncovered, in all places where his preſence was moſt neceſſary, and ſometimes alſo leading them to the charge with ſo much bravery that he received a ſlight wound in the ear by a lance, and his horſe was ſeized by the bridle by a trooper, who had certainly carried him off had not ſome of his guards haſtened ſeaſonably to his relief. At laſt, finding no hopes of reſtoring the battle, he thought fit to ſecure his perſon, which, however, would have been in no ſmall danger of being taken, had the garriſon of Oſtend ſallied out upon the flying Spaniards, or had not thoſe ſent to poſſeſs themſelves of the bridge of Leffingen quitted that poſt, dreading the ſame fate many of their companions had met with the ſame morning near that place. After the Archduke had left the battle, his forces fled in great confuſion, except 4000 Germans, who retreated in good order, without being purſued by the Dutch. It was objected by ſome to Prince Maurice, that had he improved this victory by purſuing the enemy, during the firſt conſternation, he might infallibly have opened himſelf a way into the province of Flanders; but what with his loſs near Leffingen bridge, and in the battle, what with the approaching night, in a country where the enemy was poſſeſſed of all the forts and avenues round about him, he thought it his ſafeſt way rather to reſt ſatisfied with what advantage he had got, than to expoſe his tired and hungry forces (for they had eaten nothing all that day) to any uncertain events.

The Spaniards had above 3000 men killed in this battle, and the Dutch 1000, (beſides thoſe ſlain in the morning under Count Erneſt), moſt Engliſh, who having ſuſtained the main brunt of the battle, had eight captains killed, and all the reſt wounded except two. All their ordnance, and 100 colours, were taken by the victorious enemy, and a conſiderable number of priſoners, among whom were ſome of rank. Mendoza, having loſt his horſe in the heat of the action, was taken priſoner, and ordered to be generouſly treated by Prince Maurice.

The deputies of the States, who, during the action, had ſtaid at Oſtend, returning the next day into the camp, it was taken into mature deliberation, whether they ſhould make an attempt upon Aldenburgh, and thereby open themſelves a way into Flanders, or return to the ſiege of Newport, both which, as the caſe ſtood, was found to be ſubject to equal hazards and difficulties. For, beſides that, there reigned no ſmall diſcontents among the ſoldiers, concerning the dividing of the booty and priſoners (many of whom were barbarouſly killed in cool blood by the Scots), Archduke Albert had put ſtrong garriſons into Aldenburg, and the other neighbouring ſtrong holds, gathered his broken forces under the walls of Bruges, and at the ſame time had ſent 500, and ſoon after 3000 men more under Barlotta, to reinforce the garriſon of Newport, who making frequent ſallies upon the Dutch, it was judged moſt expedient to withdraw from thence towards Oſtend, after twelve days ſpent in the ſiege, or rather blockade, of that place. Soon after, the Prince and his council being convinced of the impoſſibility of penetrating into Flanders, the fort Albert was ordered to be demoliſhed, and the forces to be embarked in the port of Oſtend, whence they ſet ſail with a proſperous gale, without reaping any advantage of their late victory, but the glory of having vanquiſhed the enemy in one of the moſt memorable battles fought for many years paſt, who at the ſame time comforted themſelves for their loſs, by having preſerved the province of Flanders from a powerful invaſion.

NEWPORT, or NIEUPORT, ENGAGEMENT OFF, IN 1653. A city, ſituated on the coaſt of the Auſtrian Netherlands, Germany. Oliver Cromwell having ſeized the reins of government, did not ſeem ſo readily diſpoſed to peace as the Dutch had expected: and by the great preparations carried on for the continuance of the maritime war, it was reſolved to omit nothing to put their marine in a condition to counteract the Engliſh, who had got together a fleet of near 100 ſail of ſtout ſhips, under the command of the Admirals Monk and Dean, in joint commiſſion, aſſiſted by Vice-Admiral Penn, and Mr. Lawſon, afterwards made a Rear-Admiral.

They were ſent over to look out for the enemy on their own coaſts; and as the Dutch were not yet ready, but lay diſperſed in their ſeveral harbours, the Engliſh ravaged their coaſts, took a great number of prizes, and returned.

Van Tromp, in the mean time, getting out of the Texel, convoyed a great fleet of merchant-ſhips north about, whither he was purſued by the Engliſh fleet, as far as the height of Aberdeen. He eſcaped them both going and coming back, which gave him an opportunity of coming into the Downs, making ſome prizes, and battering Dover caſtle. This ſcene of triumph laſted but a bare week; for Tromp came thither on the 26th of May, and on the laſt of that month, he had intelligence that Monk and Dean, who commanded the Engliſh fleet, were approaching, and that their whole fleet conſiſted of 95 ſail of men of war, and five fireſhips. The Dutch had 98 men of war, and ſix fireſhips; and both fleets were commanded by men the moſt remarkable for courage and conduct in either nation.

The 1ſt of June, while the Engliſh fleet was lying at anchor in Yarmouth Roads, advice was brought, that the Dutch fleet had been ſeen upon the coaſt; upon which, orders were immediately given for weighing, and going in ſearch of the enemy. On the 3d they met, and being on both ſides eager for an engagement, the fight began about 11 o'clock, off the ſouth point of the Gobers. The Engliſh blue ſquadron charging through the enemy, De Ruyter's diviſion ſuffered much, and himſelf was in the greateſt danger of being taken or ſunk by Lawſon, till relieved by Tromp: but Lawſon ſoon after ſunk one of their men of war of 42 guns, commanded by Captain Butler.

In the beginning of the action, the Engliſh Admiral Dean was unfortunately killed by a cannon-ball, which took him off in the middle; but Monk, who was in the ſame ſhip, covered his body with his cloak, and encouraged his men. And here appeared the wiſdom of both Admirals being on board the ſame ſhip; for as no flag was taken in, the fleet had no notice of this accident, but the fight continued with the ſame warmth as if it had not happened. The battle continued very hot till three o'clock, when the Dutch fell into great confuſion, and Tromp ſaw himſelf obliged to make a kind of running fight till nine in the evening, when a ſtout ſhip, commanded by Cornelius Van Velſen, blew up. This increaſed the confuſion in which they were before; and though Tromp did all that was in his power to oblige the officers to do their duty, and even fired upon ſuch ſhips as drew out of the line, yet it was to no purpoſe, but rather ſerved to increaſe their misfortune. In the night, Blake arrived in the Engliſh fleet with a ſquadron of 18 ſhips, and ſo had his ſhare in the ſecond day's engagement.

Tromp did all that was conſiſtent with his honour to avoid fighting the next day, but he would not do more, ſo that the Engliſh fleet came up with them again by eight in the morning, and engaged with the utmoſt fury: the battle continued very hot for about two hours, and Vice-Admiral Penn boarded Tromp twice, and had taken him, if he had not been ſeaſonably relieved by de Wit and de Ruyter.

The enemy was at length ſo hotly preſſed on every ſide, that they fell into the utmoſt diſorder, and being entirely routed, were glad to ſave themſelves by flight among the flats near Newport, from whence they afterwards got into Zealand.

Six of the enemy's beſt ſhips were ſunk, two blown up, and 11 ſhips and 2 hoys taken, with 1350 (ſome ſay 1550) priſoners taken, ſix of them captains of note.

Notwithſtanding all the pains the Dutch were at, to conceal or extenuate their loſſes, (as among other inſtances, the allowing of the loſs of but ſeven or eight ſhips in theſe two actions, is one) yet they appeared evidently enough to the eye of the whole world, even by the complaints and remonſtrances of their own Admirals. Van Tromp made no ſcruple of declaring before the States of Fluſhing, "That without a conſiderable reinforcement of large men of war, they could do no further ſervice." And de Wit is reported to have gone yet farther, and with his accuſtomed heat to have ſaid, in the preſence of the States, "Why ſhould I hold my tongue? I am in the preſence of my lords and maſters; I may ſure, nay, I muſt ſay it, the Engliſh are our maſters, and of courſe are maſters of ſea."

The loſs of the Engliſh was greateſt in their General Dean: there were beſides him but one captain, and about 200 (Whitlock ſays but 126) ſeamen killed. The number of the wounded was not much greater; nor did they loſe one ſhip; nor were ſo diſabled, but that they followed the Dutch to the coaſt of Holland, blocked them up in their own harbours, and took all ſuch ſhips as came bound for thoſe parts.

The enemy's ſhips being now blocked up in their ports; and the fight of a foreign fleet at their doors had this farther bad conſequence, that it excited domeſtic tumults. We need not wonder then, that the Dutch ſent ambaſſadors to England to negotiate a peace almoſt on any terms. Theſe Cromwell received with haughtineſs enough, talked high, and aſſumed to himſelf ſelf the credit of former victories, in which he could have little ſhare.

The States, however, were far from truſting entirely to negotiations, but laboured with the utmoſt diligence to repair their loſſes, and to fit out a new fleet. This was a very difficult taſk; and in order to effect it, they were forced to raiſe the ſeamens wages, though their trade was at a full ſtop. They came down in perſon to their ports, and ſaw their men embarked, advanced them wages before-hand, and promiſed them if they would fight once again, they would never aſk them more.

Amongſt other advantages, it was promiſed, that they would give for boarding and taking a chief admiral of the Engliſh, the ſhip and all her equipage, and 10,000 guilders; for other admirals, the ſhip, &c. and 6000 guilders; and for private ſhips, the ſhip, &c. and 4000 guilders; for a flag taken down from a chief admiral's main-maſt, 1000 guilders; for thoſe of other admirals 500 each; a flag of a fore-maſt or poop, 150; and for one of leſs conſideration, 50 guilders.

A few days after, they publiſhed another ordonance, by which they granted certain recompences for ſuch as ſhould be maimed in the ſervice of their country, which were,

By ſuch means the Dutch fitted out a fleet of 90 ſhips and upwards, before the end of July, under Van Tromp; for the tranſactions of which, ſee under the article TEXEL.

NEWPORT, October, 1793, was beſieged by the French; when they ſummoned the town to ſurrender, but were refuſed by Lieutenant-Colonel de Wurmb. They made an attack on the 24th of the ſame month, when there was a ſevere action. Captain Macbride, on board the Quebec, wrote as follows:

October 31, off Nieuport.

I beg leave to acquaint you, that I ſailed from the Downs on Monday, at eleven, P. M. and the following evening anchored off Nieuport between ſeven and eight. The enemy were firing upon the town from their guns and mortars. I found Captain Murray with the ſquadron I had detached to their aſſiſtance; from him I learned that the garriſon ſtood in great need of artillery, powder, and ammunition, and were very weak in point of artillery men; ſixty ſeamen were ſent from the ſhips; under the command of Mr. Thomas Gibbs, acting Lieutenant of the Triton, whoſe conduct has been highly meritorious: a party of forty ſeamen and marines from the Quebec, with a large ſupply of powder and ammunition, was ſent on ſhore in the morning under the direction of Captain Rogers, who requeſted to command the naval detachment; to his active zeal and ability the ſervice is much indebted. Lieutenant Clements, who at preſent commands the Albion armed ſhip, was kept in readineſs to force their way into the harbour, which was in poſſeſſion of the enemy, when that meaſure was deemed neceſſary.

The detachment from Oſtend was ſeen marching along the ſtrand in the morning, and ſoon entered Nieuport. The enemy, however, rendered our intentions uſeleſs, for they abandoned their enterprize in the night. I refer to Sir Charles Grey's letter for the detail of the military operations, reſpecting the ſecurity of this important poſt. Mr. Gibbs is the bearer of this diſpatch, to whom I refer you for particulars.

I am, &c.

JOHN MACBRIDE.

Nieuport, October 30, 1793.

On my road thither I was met by ſeveral perſons, with the agreeable intelligence, that the French were retiring, which was confirmed on my arrival.—They began their retreat in the night, and a part only of the rear guard was viſible at day-break this morning. They returned along the road to Dunkirk, ſetting fire to every thing in their way.

I went with Major-General Dundas to viſit the poſts they had occupied, and, from the extent of their encampment, I ſhould imagine that their numbers could not have been leſs than was repreſented to us, about 8000. What loſs they may have ſuſtained during the ſiege, I have no means of eſtimating: ours, as I have already had the pleaſure of informing you, was very inconſiderable. I now incloſe you a regular return of that of the 42d and 53d regiments; that of the Heſſians I have not been able to learn, but it is not greater in proportion.—The French have left behind them four 24-pounders and two mortars, as well as a great number of ſhot, ſhells, and intrenching tools. The whole were ſecured, and a great part brought into the town before I left it. I have already ſpoken in commendation of the gallant behaviour of Colonel de Wurmb and the garriſon under his command; I cannot, however, help adding, upon a more exact knowledge of their ſituation, when firſt attacked, that the ſafety of Nieuport is owing to their courage and perſeverance in its defence, with means very diſproportionate to the force brought againſt them.

The artillery, under Captain Bothwick, with the 53d regiment, whoſe loſs has been the greateſt, have been very much diſtinguiſhed; and I think it only an act of juſtice to mention, in terms of the higheſt approbation, Major Matthews, whoſe long ſervices and particular ticular exertions on this occaſion will, I hope, recommend him to his Majeſty's notice. I feel alſo that much is due to the zeal and intelligence with which Major-General Dundas undertook and executed the ſervice entruſted to him after his arrival at Nieuport, as well as to Colonel Symes, and Captain Rogers, and the officers, marines, and ſeamen, from the fleet.

APPELIUS, Aid-de-camp.

NEW PROVIDENCE. Sir Guy Carelton, not having heard of peace been concluded, he formed an expedition from St. Auguſtine, againſt New Providence, to reſtore its inhabitants, with thoſe of the adjacent iſlands, to the bleſſing of a free government. He undertook this expedition at his own expence, and embarked his men, which did not exceed ſixty-five, and ſailed for Harbour Iſland, where he recruited for four or five days; from thence he ſet ſail for his object, which was the eaſtern fort, on the iſland of Providence, and which he carried about day-light, with three of their formidable gallies, on the 14th of April, 1783. He immediately ſummoned the great fortreſs to ſurrender, which was about a mile from the fort he had taken, the governor evaded the purport of his flag; by giving him ſome trifling informations, which he took in their true light. On the 16th, he took poſſeſſion of two commanding hills, and erected a battery on each of them of twelve-pounders. At day-light on the 18th, his batteries being complete, the Engliſh colours were hoiſted, on each of them, which were within muſquet ſhot of their grand fortreſs. The governor finding his ſhot and ſhells of no effect, thought proper to capitulate. Sir Guy Carlton's forces, never conſiſted of more than 220 men, and ſome of them without muſquets, not having had it in his power to procure them. He took on this occaſion one fort conſiſting of thirteen pieces of cannon, three gallies carrying 24-pounders, and fifty men.

The governor ſurrendered four batteries, with ſeventy pieces of cannon, and four large gallies (brigs and ſnows).

NIAGARA FORT TAKEN. It is ſituated between the lakes Erie and Ontario, in North America. The theatre of our operations in America was of ſuch a vaſt extent, that if we had perſevered in the courſe we purſued for ſome time, in attacking but one place at a time, the war would inevitably be ſpun out to an extreme length, without bringing on any thing deciſive; and it would have rendered our natural ſuperiority of little uſe, by ſuffering the French to collect, as they had hitherto done, their ſtrength into one ſingle point, which enabled them to contend with us, with a force ſufficient for the ſervice in that country. This year another method was followed. It was propoſed to attack the French in all their ſtrong poſts at once; to fall as nearly as poſſible at the ſame time, upon Crown Point, Niagara, and the forts to the ſouth of Lake Erie, whilſt a great naval armament, and a conſiderable body of land forces, ſhould attempt Quebec, by the river St. Laurence.

This plan was very adviſable, as it tended to weaken by diſtracting the reſiſtance of the enemy; and whilſt we adhered to it, it was clearly impoſſible for the French to maintain their ground in any of thoſe places which were attacked, without very weakly defending, or even deſerting ſome of the others; and if by the means of ſuch diverſions, any one of thoſe places ſhould fall into our hands, the campaign could not be ſaid to be ſpent to no purpoſe. But, beſides the end in diſtracting the enemies defence, there was another propoſed of no leſs conſequence, which was, to make a concurrence in all the various operations, ſo that whilſt they divided the enemy, they might mutually ſupport one another.

General Amherſt, who commanded the American forces in chief, with the moſt conſiderable body, amounting in regulars and provincials to about 12,000 men, was to attack Ticonderago and Crown Point, by Lake George. The reduction of thoſe forts would naturally lay open the Lake Champlain, where having eſtabliſhed a ſufficient naval force, he was by the river Sorrel, which forms the communication between this lake and the great river St. Laurence, to proceed directly to Quebec, the capital of Canada. Here he was to make a junction with General Wolfe and Admiral Saunders, who having entered the river St. Laurence, at the oppoſite quarter, would probably have commenced the ſiege of Quebec, by the time that General Amherſt might find it practicable to join them. It was not doubted, that if this junction could be effected, the reduction of that city would follow of courſe.

The third of the grand operations was againſt the fort, near the walls of Niagara, a place of very great conſequence both in war and peace. The reduction of this was committed to Brigadier-General Prideaux, under whom Sir William Johnſon commanded the provincials of New-York, and ſeveral Indians of the five nations, who were engaged in our ſervice by the credit that gentleman had obtained among their tribes.

The object of this operation lay too remote from the others to expect, with any great confidence, that they could be aſſiſted by its ſucceſs in any other manner than by weakening the enemy's forces.

However,

However, it was hoped, that if they ſhould be fortunate enough to take Niagara early in the ſeaſon, the troops might be embarked on the Lake Ontario, and find no longer any obſtruction from Fort Frontenac, which was deſtroyed laſt year, might fall down the river St. Laurence, and poſſibly make themſelves maſters of Montreal, or by their approach at leaſt, draw ſuch a force to that part, as greatly to facilitate our deſigns upon Quebec and Crown Point. But if this ſcheme, in addition to its own end, ſhould not facilitate either of the two capital undertakings, it would probably, as it was the moſt important place the French had in that part of the world, draw all the troops they had upon the lakes to attempt its relief, which would leave the forts on thoſe lakes expoſed to a fourth, though inferior expedition, which was made againſt them under General Stanwix. In reality, it afterwards had that effect.

The army under General Amherſt was the firſt in motion. The Lake George, or, as the French call it, the Lake Sacrament, is a long, but in proportion, narrow water, about forty miles in length, and incloſed on either ſide with marſhy grounds. This communicates by another long and very narrow ſtrait with Lake Champlain. This ſtrait is ſecured at each ſide by a fort; that to the ſide of Lake George is called Ticonderago; that to the Champlain lake is called Fort Frederic, or Crown Point; both extremely ſtrong in their ſituation; and the former of which had repulſed our troops with a very conſiderable ſlaughter.

General Amherſt, after he had paſſed Lake George, arrived with very little oppoſition from the enemy before Ticonderago. At firſt the French made ſome appearance as if they meant to defend the place; but as they knew the ſtrength of our forces, as they ſaw that the preparations for the attack were making with as much judgment as vigour, and as the enterprize which was preparing againſt Quebec, did not leave them a force ſo conſiderable as they had there in the preceding campaign, they abandoned their fort in the night, July the 7th, 1759, having damaged it as much as they could, and retired to Crown Point.

General Amherſt immediately ſet himſelf about repairing the fortifications of this poſt, which effectually ſecured the Lake George, covered our colonies, and was of ſuch vaſt importance as to enable him to puſh forward his offenſive operations, or to favour a retreat in caſe of a reverſe of fortune.

NICE, was ſeized by the French in October 1792.

NICE BATTLE NEAR, 1793. On the 29th of July the French attempted afreſh to attack the camps of Raus and Anthion. Four ſtrong French columns marched towards Raus. General Count Saint Andre inſtantly perceiving this movement, ordered all his troops to take up arms, who repaired to their poſt with the greateſt confidence. The milita at the advanced poſts, at firſt, retreated at the approach of a ſuperior force from the enemy, from Terreſrouges; but as ſoon as they were reinforced by a body of volunteers, under Count de Rocca, they ſhewed ſo much bravery that the enemy durſt not approach them. Two other French columns marched againſt the camp of Raus, oppoſite Teſta de Rogier, and in concert with another column from the wood began to fire. General Count Saint Andre then ordered his artillery to play, which fired obliquely upon the enemy, while Colonel Count d'Autignan fired upon their front from the battery of Rogier, which forced the enemy to retreat in much confuſion.

Towards noon the ardour of fighting amongſt our troops not being yet ſatisfied, and General Saint Andre, wiſhing completely to defeat the French, ordered them to be purſued by volunteers, who offered themſelves for that purpoſe. Whilſt theſe volunteers of the legion of light troops purſued the enemy's column, which was on the right towards La Bellena; the volunteers of the flank from the wood, and the other battalion of grenadiers under Major Count Chinſano, drove the other column of the French to their camp of Belvedere, againſt which a continual fire was kept up till four in the afternoon, from whence the enemy fired a few rounds with cannon, but with no effect.

General Count St. Andre praiſes very much the firmneſs, zeal, and bravery of the officers and ſoldiers in this engagement, and particularly the Colonels Marquis de Montaſier, Marquis de la Chieſa, and the Count de Autignan.

On the ſame morning, at day-break, a column of the French, of about 800 men, marched from their camp of Tueſch, and fell upon our advanced poſts, which Baron Colli poſted on the height before the redoubt and the battery of Anthion: another French column of 2000 men appeared in the valley, between Tueſch and Morigon, and threatened equally the left and front of our camp. A third column of the enemy, of about 800 men, deſcended into the vale les Villettes on the right flank of the camp, which hid themſelves in the woods.

Whilſt the French made theſe movements, a body of 600 men of their troops was drawn out in order of battle, on the ſummits between Tueſch and Montujas, and another of the ſame force attacked our advanced poſts. However, the fire from the infantry, whom General Colli placed in advance, and that from a part of the redoubt, ſtopped the progreſs of the enemy, who were forced to retreat with conſiderable loſs, as ſoon as the General ordered the artillery from all the batteries to play upon them. The columns from the wood, and from the valley, retreated in the ſame manner; the latter, however, before their retreat, made a violent firing againſt the advanced poſt compoſed of the regiment of Lombardy, and of the militia.

Theſe attacks againſt our camp were ſupported for ſome time by the enemy's cannon. They at the ſame time threw into our camp ſeveral royal grenades, very few of which burſt, and the others did no injury at all. All was over at half after ten in the morning, when our troops reſumed their poſts.

A very thick fog happened the whole time the engagement laſted, which made General Colli apprehend that the attack of Anthion was but a feint in order to attack us on another ſide with more ſucceſs, which made him take meaſures to prevent the enemy from attempting a freſh attack: which orders were executed with the greateſt zeal and ſpeed. See GENOA.

NIME-

Head Quarters, Nimeguen, Oct. 20, 1794.

Yeſterday morning the enemy attacked the whole of the advanced poſts of my right wing in very great force, particularly that of Drutin, which was defended by the 37th regiment, and that of Appelthern, where the Prince of Rohan's light battalion was poſted. Nothing could exceed the gallantry with which the whole of the troops on the advanced poſts (particularly thoſe two corps) behaved; but at laſt the poſt on the left of the 37th regiment, which was occupied by a detachment of Rohan huſſars, having been forced, Major Hope, who commanded the 37th, and who diſtinguiſhed himſelf exceedingly, was obliged to retreat upon the dyke along the Waal, which he continued for ſome time, without being much annoyed by the enemy. Unfortunately, however, a ſtrong body of the enemy's huſſars being miſtaken for the corps of Rohan, the regiment allowed them to come upon them unmoleſted, when the huſſars immediately attacked; and the narrowneſs of the dyke, which on any other occaſion muſt have afforded a ſecurity to the infantry, in this inſtance acted againſt them, as they were driven off it by the enemy's charge, and, I am ſorry to ſay, have ſuffered very conſiderably.

As they were upon the advanced poſts, I have not as yet received an exact return of their loſs; but I underſtand that Captains Baird, Hendly, and Duff, Lieutenants Mitchell, Thompſon, Colquhoun and Murray, with the quarter-maſter Mr. Duxall, were made priſoners; of which number Captain Duff, Lieutenants Mitchell and Colquhoun, were wounded. All the priſoners who were taken agreed in the intelligence that the enemy had brought over thirty thouſand men; and at the ſame time I received the report, that a very conſiderable body of them having paſſed the Meuſe between Ruremonde and Venlo, were advancing upon my left flank, and had already taken poſſeſſion of Cleves.

Under theſe circumſtances, never having intended to riſk an action in my preſent poſition which I only kept in order to preſerve a communication with Graves, and to cover the reparations which were intended to have been made to the fortifications of this place, I determined to paſs the Waal, and to take up the different cantonments which were already marked out for the defence of the river, leaving General Walmoden, with a corps to cover the town.

Part of the troops began their march yeſterday evening, and the remainder this morning, without any moleſtation from the enemy.

I am, &c.

FREDERICK.

P. S. I am ſorry to add, that Lieutenant Wadman, of the light infantry of the 37th regiment, who was upon piquet, and had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his intrepidity and prudence, is alſo dangerouſly wounded.

November 6.

The ſortie made by the garriſon of Nimeguen, on the night of the 4th inſt. was conducted under the orders of General de Burgh, aſſiſted by General Hammerſtein. The troops employed in this ſervice, were detachments from the 8th, 27th, 28th, 55th, 63d, and 78th regiments of Britiſh infantry, with the 7th and 16th of light cavalry, and a party of Dutch and Hanoverian troops, forming altogether a corps of 3000 men. It is impoſſible yet to aſcertain who gave the information, but it is certain that the French knew of our intention, and were prepared to receive us. General Hammerſtein was appointed to ſurround the wood near the town, in order to take the enemy on their flight; in which he was to be aſſiſted by our cavalry, who were to turn the enemy's flank; but the latter could not get round their works in time. General de Burgh headed the detachment againſt the enemy's intrenchments, and attacked them in their trenches, where they were chin deep. A terrible carnage enſued on both ſides; the French made a very obſtinate reſiſtance, but were at length obliged to give way to the ſuperior gallantry of our troops, who mounted their works with fixed bayonets, and in the end completely deſtroyed them. In the mean time, General Hammerſtein's corps attacked the fugitives who were running out of the wood, and every man of them was put to the ſword, with the loſs of only three men on our ſide. From the nature of the ſervice, the detachment under General de Burgh, which performed prodigies of valour, ſuffered moſt, and the loſs is very conſiderable. Ours, alone, conſiſts in 177 men killed and wounded; among the latter is the General himſelf, and twelve other officers. No officer was killed. The loſs of the enemy was eſtimated at 700 men.

On the next day, however, the French returned to the charge, and forced back three of our regiments, which had been left in the enemy's works; and in the courſe of the day, they raiſed other fortifications on the ſame ſpot as thoſe which had been levelled the day before. Our cannon annoyed them very much during this operation; but, in the night of the 6th, they raiſed batteries ſo near the town, as to enable them to throw ſhells into it. Unfortunately ſome of them fell on the bridge we had eſtabliſhed acroſs the Waal, for the ready communication with the grand army at Arnheim. This ſeemed to be their principal aim, with a view to cut off our retreat; and ſome of our troops were killed, who were paſſing over the bridge at the time.

Incloſed is a return of the loſs on our ſide, in this ſortie; but the very narrow eſcapes of Captain Archer, of the 63d regiment, demands particular notice. Several ſhots paſſed cloſe by him; and one of them hit off two of his buttons, on the breaſt of his coat; another ſtruck the corner of his elbow. This was on the 4th. On the 5th, an alarm being given in the morning, that the French were returning to the charge, Captain Archer got up, and, before he had been out of his bed-chamber an hour, a ſhell ſtruck his lodging-houſe, and paſſed through his room, which gave way, and the houſe ſoon after tumbled down. Poor Captain Monro, of the 78th, was not ſo fortunate; a ball hit him, and ſtruck out both his eyes. He is ſtill alive, and ſome hopes are entertained of his recovery.

The Duke of York ordered a bullock to be diſtributed among each of the regiments engaged on Tuesday.

Such diſſentions prevail between our troops and the Dutch, that the latter treat our men like enemies, whenever they have an opportunity. Yeſterday they abſolutely ripped open the body of one of our privates, and cut off the arm of another. Pity it is we ſhould have to defend the country of ſuch a ſet of villains, againſt even their own will.

Return of killed and wounded in the ſortie on the 4th.

11 Rank and file killed.—1 Major, 5 captains, 6 ſubalterns, 11 ſerjeants, and 144 rank and file wounded. —1 Serjeant and 19 rank and file miſſing.—Officers wounded—Major-General de Burgh, ſlightly in the foot.—8th Regiment of foot, Captain Bland.—27th ditto, Lieutenant Baker.—55th ditto, Captain Bruce, and Captain Quin.—63d ditto, Lieutenant Wemys, Lieutenant Barclay, and Lieutenant Rutledge.—78th ditto, Major Malcolm, contuſion in the thigh and leg; Captain M'Kenzie; Captain H. Munro, his eyes ſhot out; Lieutenant Bayley, and Enſign Cameron.

November 7.

Our troops are evacuating Nimeguen. The 12th, 27th, 28th, 55th, and 63d, left that town this morning, and the reſt are immediately to follow. The French annoyed them much as they paſſed over the bridge, in leaving the town. Some of our men were killed. Every thing is in great confuſion. Ten waggons with wounded men are juſt come in; it is ſaid they were wounded in croſſing the bridge.

P. S. News is arrived at head quarters, of the ſurrender of Maeſtricht.

November 7.

On Tueſday afternoon, as the enemy had began to conſtruct their batteries, Count Walmoden made a ſortie, with a party of the troops in Nimeguen, conſiſting of the 8th, 27th, 28th, 55th, 63d, and 78th regiments of Britiſh infantry, under the command of Major-General de Burgh, and two battalions of Dutch, ſupported by the 7th and 15th light dragoons, the Hanoverian horſe-guards, one ſquadron of the 2d regiment of Hanoverian horſe, one ſquadron of the 5th regiment of Hanoverian dragoons, one ſquadron of the 10th Hanoverian light dragoons, and the Legion de Damas, in the Dutch ſervice.

The ſortie had every ſucceſs which could be expected from it. The troops advanced to the enemy's trenches under a very ſevere fire, and jumped into them without returning a ſhot.

The loſs of the enemy was almoſt entirely by the bayonet, and amounted to above 500 men; that of the Britiſh and Hanoverians will be ſeen by the incloſed return.

I am perſuaded that the gallantry of the troops upon this occaſion will merit his Majeſty's approbation.

Count Walmoden ſpeaks in the higheſt terms of the conduct of Major-General de Burgh, whoſe wound I am happy to find is very ſlight.

This ſortie had the effect of checking the enemy's operations till yeſterday morning, when they opened two batteries upon the bridge and one upon the town. The effect of the former, which very eaſily ſunk one of the boats, determined me to withdraw every thing from the troops poſted in the town, beyond what is barely neceſſary for its defence; and Lieutenant Popham of the navy having repaired the damage done to the bridge, all the artillery of the reſerve, with the Britiſh, Hanoverian, and Heſſian battalions marched out laſt night without any inconvenience, leaving pickets, under the command of Major-General de Burgh, to the amount of 2500 men; which, with the Dutch forces, has been judged ſufficient to maintain the place till the certainty of the Auſtrian movements can be determined.

FREDERICK.

Diſpatches from the Duke of York, containing an Account of the evacuation of Nimeguen, and the ſurrender of Maeſtricht.

Though the garriſon of Nimeguen, in the ſortie on the night of the 2d inſt. obliged the enemy to fall back from the batteries which they had begun to erect, yet they returned on the ſucceeding morning in conſiderable force, and after a ſevere conflict obliged three regiments, which had been left in the enemy's works, to abandon them, and to take ſhelter in Nimeguen. The enemy immediately proceeded to throw up fortifications, which were in ſuch forwardneſs on the night of the 6th, that ſhells were thrown from them into the town. A council of war being held by the garriſon on the 6th, it was reſolved that Nimeguen ſhould be evacuated. This reſolution was carried into immediate effect, and, on the 7th the evacuation was completed.

The Capture of Nimeguen by the French is circumſtantially deſcribed in the following Letter from Colonel Balneavis, Commander of the Regiment of Stuart, in the ſervice of the Prince Stadtholder.

Moſt Serene Prince,

I have the honour to ſtate moſt reſpectfully to your Highneſs, that on the 7th inſt. at eleven at night, I was, in concert with the other commandants of corps, called to an interview with Major-General de Haacke, commandant of the garriſon, who read in our preſence a letter from your Highneſs, containing an order to evacuate the place that night with the utmoſt ſilence poſſible.

I then received an order to continue the laſt with the regiment I command, to cover the retreat, and afterwards follow the other regiments, and croſs the Waal. Upon this I gave orders to Captain Pilkington, who commanded at the half-moon battery of Bottendaal, that after he had withdrawn his poſt, ſpiked the guns, ſhut the barriers of communication, raiſed up the draw-bridge, and ſhut the mill-gate, he ſhould retreat towards my poſition, and remain poſted before the aforeſaid gate, until I ſhould have paſſed the Waal with the reſt of the regiment, when he was to follow me as ſpeedily as poſſible, to cut the bridge in pieces and and ſet it afloat. As a further precaution, Captain Pilkington had poſſeſſion of the barrier keys and thoſe of the mill-gate.

Upon informing Major-General de Haacke of the above diſpoſitions, and requeſting further orders, his aid-du-camp informed me that he had already quitted the city and paſſed the Waal; and ſhortly after I learned by Lieutenant de Plonnies, that the bridge of boats had been ſet fire to by diſcharges from the enemy's mortars, and was no longer paſſable; and indeed, obſerving this bridge in flames above the mill-gate, I ſaw the abſolute impoſſibility of paſſing the Waal with the regiment under my command, the flying bridge being occupied by Major-General Bentinck's regiment, which was ſtopped in the middle of the river without being able to diſengage itſelf. I now held, on the ramparts, a council of war, in which it was unanimouſly reſolved to ſend without delay an officer with a trumpet to the enemy's head-quarters, before the French general could be fully informed of our critical poſition, to make, if poſſible, a kind of capitulation for the garriſon, conſiſting of the regiment under my command, with a detachment of Lieutenant-General Randwyck's regiment, a quarter-maſter, four dragoon guards, a bombardier, and four gunners.

We now haſtily drew up three articles of capitulation, and delivered them to Major-General d'Haacke, aid-du-camp, with a dragoon and a trumpet to carry to the French head-quarters.

Having ſent Captain Pilkington, with Adjutant Wilſon to the Hartſteegs gate, there to inform himſelf of the ſtate of things, the former told me, to my great ſurpriſe, that he dreaded the failure of our object, ſeeing that he had found that gate open, and had been informed at the ſame time, that the French light troops belonging to the advanced poſts had already entered the city, and diſarmed a guard, contrary to every expectation; however, I obtained a kind of capitulation for the garriſon.

After having gone out by the Mill-gate with military honours, and laid down our arms on the glacis, we were marched, with Major-General Bentinck's regiment, which had ſurrendered itſelf as priſoners of war to Raveſtein, under an eſcort of French troops. I do not exactly know our further deſtination, but I believe it to be Liſle.

(Signed) H. Balneavis.

The above letter recommends certain meritorious individuals to the protection of the Stadtholder.

Capitulation.

Art. I. The garriſon ſhall march out with military honours, arms, and baggage, each regiment carrying with it two field pieces to the firſt Dutch city or poſt, the Commandant arranging the mode of tranſporting the ſaid garriſon in the moſt convenient way.—Anſ. Refuſed. The garriſon ſhall ſurrender priſoners of war. On the capitulation being ſigned, the gates of the city ſhall be delivered up to the troops of the French Republic. At nine in the morning the garriſon ſhall march out by the gate of Grave, with the honours of war, drums beating, matches lighted, each battalion carrying two field-pieces, and ſhall lay down their arms on the glacis. The officers ſhall keep their ſwords and baggage: the horſes ſhall be delivered up.

II. The ſick ſhall be attended by French ſurgeons till they are cured.—Anſ. Granted.

III. The inhabitants of the city ſhall have the full enjoyment of their privileges, &c.—Anſ. Granted.

(Signed) &c. &c.

Nimeguen, November 8.

The garriſon amounted at the time of the capitulation to five field officers, ten captains, twenty-ſix ſubalterns, and 981 non-commiſſioned officers and privates; among theſe were five Engliſh.

November 9.

We were ſo cloſely beſieged in Nimeguen, and in ſuch an unſafe ſituation, that the garriſon retreated on the 7th at night.

As ſoon as the French had gained ſome heights that enabled them to fire upon the bridge of boats thrown acroſs the Waal, it was determined that the place ſhould be evacuated. The Britiſh and Hanoverians paſſed over on the night of the 7th without loſs. The Dutch troops were not ſo fortunate, for the French had commenced ſo heavy and well directed a fire upon the bridge, that the paſſage was extremely difficult and dangerous. After ſome regiments had croſſed, the bridge was ſet on fire, and the Dutch battalions that covered the retreat, were forced to attempt the paſſage by a floating bridge.

An event of the moſt fatal kind occurred. By ſome error, or by the fire of the beſiegers, the cords were cut, and the bridge floated towards the city. Expoſed thus to the fire of the enemy, all the troops were either killed or taken priſoners. Of the regiment of Bentinck only three officers and a few privates, who croſſed in a boat, eſcaped.

The greater part of the regiment of Stuart, and 150 men of the regiment of Rannwyeh, ſhared the ſame fate. The evacuation was ſo precipitate, that all the artillery and cannon fell into the hands of the enemy, who entered the city early on the 8th. The troops that remained in the place ſurrendered by capitulation.

It is expected that the French will immediately attempt to croſs the Waal, and that the head-quarters of the allied army will be removed from Arnheim to Utrecht.

The evacuation of Nimeguen took place on November 24, 1794, at night. His Majeſty's troops retired without any loſs; which would alſo have been the caſe with the Dutch, but for an unfortunate chance ſhot, which carried away the top of the maſt of the flying bridge to which the hawſer was made faſt, conſequently the bridge ſwung round, and they were taken priſoners, to the amount of about 400. The bridge of boats was entirely burnt, and the flying bridge, of which they got poſſeſſion by the above accident, has been ſince deſtroyed by our fire.

NINETY-SIX, siege of, in 1781. The town of a diſtrict of the ſame name in the province of South Carolina, North America: for an account of which ſee the following letters.

Extract of a Letter from Lieutenant-Colonel Balfour, Commandant of Charles-Town, in South Carolina, to Lord George Germaine, dated Charles-Town, June 27, 1781.

After the advantage gained by Lord Rawdon, on the 25th of April, over General Green's army, of which your Lordſhip was informed by my diſpatch of the firſt ult. the general ſtate of this province rendering it expedient to relinquiſh the poſt at Camden, Lord Rawdon therefore quitted that place, after having again offered battle to General Green, who, ſecured in a ſtrong poſition behind Sawney Creek, could by no efforts be induced from it.

On the corps under Lord Rawdon falling back towards this town, the enemy, by detachments, inveſted the poſts at Mott's houſe, Congarees, and Auguſta, having previouſly taken that at Wright's Bluff. Theſe poſts, my Lord, had been eſtabliſhed for controuling the country, and preſerving its communications. Unfortunately, from the ſuperiority of the enemy, and the impoſſibility of immediate relief, as affairs were then circumſtanced, theſe garriſons were obliged to ſurrender, though gallantly defended. However, I have the ſatisfaction to inform your Lordſhip, that the ſtores in them were but inconſiderable, and the troops have ſince been exchanged, under a cartel which has lately taken place between Lord Cornwallis and Major-General Green, for the releaſe of all priſoners of war in the ſouthern diſtrict.

Having accompliſhed theſe ſmaller purpoſes, General Green combined his force, and laid cloſe ſiege to Ninety-Six, the moſt commanding and important of all the poſts in the back country, and which was therefore maintained by about 350 men, excluſive of militia, and put under the charge of Lieutenant-Colonel Cruger, an able and zealous officer.

Thus circumſtanced was this province, when a reinforcement of three regiments from Ireland arrived; and as ſoon as the neceſſary arrangements could be made, Lord Rawdon, having under him a corps of near 2000 men, proceeded to the relief of Ninety-Six, an undertaking, from the unfavourableneſs of the climate at this ſeaſon, which your Lordſhip knows, muſt have been attended with many difficulties, and much fatigue; but which the zeal and exertion of the troops enabled them to ſurmount.

General Green, on finding this corps approaching him, took the reſolution of attempting to ſtorm the garriſon, as an expedient leſs dangerous and deciſive, than coming to action with Lord Rawdon. On the morning of the 19th inſt. he therefore made the experiment; but, by the gallantry of the troops, was repulſed, having, as acknowledged by the enemy, at leaſt ſeventy-five killed, and 150 wounded. On this occaſion, and during the ſiege, our loſs was truly inconſiderable, though, at preſent, I am unable to ſpecify to your Lordſhip the particulars of it.

Thus diſappointed in his views, General Green, the enſuing day, raiſed the ſiege, and retired with his army behind the Saluda, to a ſtrong ſituation, within ſixteen miles of Ninety-Six, at which poſt Lord Rawdon arrived on the 21ſt.

The eſſential ſervice done by the troops under Colonel Cruger, in this gallant defence of the poſt, which was cloſely preſſed by the enemy, and the noble ſpirit with which they repelled the aſſault of all General Green's army, is much too obvious to require any tribute I could pay to ſuch diſtinguiſhed merit.

Extract of a Letter from Lieutenant-Colonel Balfour to Lord George Germaine, dated Charles-Town, July 2, 1781.

Since the date of my diſpatch of the 27th ult. I have been honoured with two letters from Lord Rawdon, who purſued General Green to the fords of the Enoree; but, though near, was unable to come up with him, from the uncommon precipitancy with which the enemy retreated, and their having ſo much the advance on the march. This circumſtance, and the great fatigue of the troops in attempting to counteract it, rendered improbable all hopes of overtaking General Green's army, ſo as to effect any thing deciſive.

American Account.

Extract of a Letter from Major-General Green, dated Camp at Little River, near Ninety-Six, June 20, 1781.

In my letter of the 9th, I informed your Excellency that the enemy had received a conſiderable reinforcement at Charles-Town, and that I was apprehenſive they would march out and interrupt our operations. On the 11th I got intelligence they were advancing. I immediately advanced all the cavalry, with orders to General Sumpter to collect all the force he could, and keep in their front, and by every means in his power to retard their march. The enemy paſſed him at Congaree before he got his troops in motion. Afterwards he found it impracticable to gain their front. It was my intention to have fought them before they arrived at Ninety-Six, could I have collected a force ſufficient for the purpoſe.

We had puſhed on our approaches very near to the enemy's works; our third parallel was formed round their abattis; a mine and two approaches were within a few feet of the ditch. Theſe approaches were directed againſt the Star Fort, which ſtands upon the left of the town, as we approached it from the Saluda. On the right our approaches were very near the enemy's redoubt. This was a ſtrong ſtockade fort, with two blockhouſes in it. Theſe two works flanked the town, which is picketed in with ſtrong pickets; a ditch round the whole, and a bank raiſed near the height of a common parapet. Beſides theſe fortifications, were ſeveral little fluſhes in different parts of the town; and all the works communicated with each other by covered ways. We had raiſed ſeveral batteries for cannon, one upwards of twenty feet high, within 140 yards of the Star Fort, to command the works; and a rifle battery alſo within thirty yards, to prevent the enemy from annoying our workmen. For the the laſt ten days, not a man could ſhew his head but he was immediately ſhot down; and the firing was almoſt inceſſant day and night. In this ſtage of the approaches, I found the enemy ſo near us, that it would be impoſſible to reduce the place without hazarding a ſtorm. This, from the peculiar ſtrength of the place, could only be warranted by the ſucceſs of a partial attempt to make a lodgment on one of the curtains of the Star redoubt, and a vigorous puſh to carry the right-hand work. The diſpoſition was accordingly formed, and the attack made. Lieutenant-Colonel Lee, with his legion infantry, and Captain Kirkwood's light infantry, made the attack on the right; and Lieutenant-Colonel Campbell, with the firſt Maryland and the firſt Virginia regiments, was to have ſtormed the Star redoubt, which is their principal work, and ſtands upon the left: the parapet of this work is near twelve feet high, and raiſed with ſand bags near three feet more. Lieutenant Duvall, of the Maryland line, and Lieutenant Selden, of the Virginia line, led on the forlorn hope, followed by a party with hooks to pull down the ſand bags, the better to enable them to make the lodgment. A furious cannonade preluded the attack On the right the enemy were driven out of their works, and our people took poſſeſſion of it. On the left never was greater bravery exhibited than by the parties led on by Duvall and Selden; but they were not ſucceſsful. They entered the enemy's ditch, and made every exertion to get down the ſand bags, which, from the depth of the ditch, height of the parapet, and under a galling fire, was rendered difficult. Finding the enemy defended their works with great obſtinacy, and ſeeing but little proſpect of ſucceeding without heavy loſs, I ordered the attack to be puſhed no further.

The behaviour of the troops on this occaſion deſerves the higheſt commendation: both the officers that entered the ditch were wounded, and the greater part of their men were either killed or wounded. I have only to lament that ſuch brave men fell in an unſucceſsful attempt.

Captain Armſtrong, of the firſt Maryland regiment, was killed; and Captain Benſon, who commanded the regiment, was wounded at the head of the trenches. In both attacks we had upwards of forty men killed and wounded. The loſs was principally at the Star Fort, and in the enemy's ditch, the other parties being all under cover. The attack was continued three quarters of an hour, and as the enemy was greatly expoſed to the fire of the rifle battery and artillery, they muſt have ſuffered greatly. Our artillery was well ſerved, and, I believe, did great execution.

The troops have undergone incredible hardſhips during the ſiege, and though the iſſue was not ſucceſsful, I hope their exertions will merit the approbation of Congreſs.

We continued the ſiege until the enemy got within a few miles of us, having previouſly ſent off all our ſick, wounded, and ſpare ſtores.

Incloſed is a liſt of our killed and wounded during the ſiege.

Return of the killed, wounded, and miſſing, during the ſiege of Ninety-Six, in South Carolina.

Non-commiſſioned officers, and rank and file.—Virginia brigade, killed 41, wounded 32, miſſing 16.—Maryland brigade, killed 12, wounded 24, miſſing 3.—Light infantry, killed 1, wounded 9, miſſing 1.—Legion infantry, killed 2, wounded 2.—Virginia militia, killed 1, wounded 2. — Total. Killed 57, wounded 70, miſſing 20.—Captain Armſtrong of the Maryland line, killed; Captain Benſon and Lieutenant Duvall, wounded. — Captain Bentley, of the Virginia line, priſoner; Lieutenants Evans, Miller, and Selden, wounded. — Colonel Koſciuſzko, chief engineer, was ſlightly wounded.

NISSA, battle at. A city of European Turkey, in the province of Servia. In the year 1689, this battle was fought between the Imperialiſts and Turks. Prince Louis of Baden, the Imperial General, having gained an advantage over the Turks at Patochin, he purſued his victory; but the Turks as ſoon as they arrived at Niſſa recollected themſelves, and finding they were now ſuperior to the Imperialiſts, reſolved to give them battle. The Prince reached Niſſa on the 23d of September, and immediately drew up in order of battle.

The Turkiſh army lay encamped before Niſſa, and from that place to the top of the hill that ſecured it. He found them intrenched in their camp much more regularly than the Turks were wont to be, which made it to be believed that ſome Chriſtian had been their director; beſides which, they were environed with a deep moat well paliſaded, and the river that ran through the city, and which was very rapid, ſecured them on the other ſide, ſo that there was no poſſibility of attacking them any way but behind, where their camp was only acceſſible. Nothing paſſed that day but ſome petty ſkirmiſhes between the volunteers of the Imperial camp, and ſome troops of the Infidels; but the next morning the Imperialiſts decamped an hour before day: the left wing, followed by the baggage, took their way to the left ſide of a mountain over which they were to march, and where they made an halt, until the right wing, commanded by the Duke of Croy, had joined them; then the whole army deſcended into a valley in battle array, at which time the enemy ſhewed themſelves upon another little hill, over which the Chriſtians were alſo to paſs, before they came in ſight of the Infidels' camp, making a ſhew as if they intended to come down, and to charge the Imperialiſts, who no ſooner perceived them, but they boldly advanced to meet them. But the Turks not thinking it convenient to tarry, the Chriſtians advanced to the top of the hill without any oppoſition, where they found themſelves near the enemy's intrenchments, and perceived it was impoſſible to force them on that ſide, with an army not half ſo numerous as the enemy. Whereupon it was concluded they ſhould ſeek out a more acceſſible place, and to that purpoſe they marched along a valley, coaſting the enemy that lay on the right ſide, with a deſign to fall upon them in the rear; but becauſe they were not well acquainted with the ways, Count Cziaki was ſent out with a party of huſſars, to view the avenues on that ſide. In the mean time, ſeveral ſlight ſkirmiſhes paſſed between parties of both armies, which, however, did not hinder the Imperialiſts from keeping on their way, expecting Count Cziaki, who returned at length, and aſſured them they might march on without any danger: the which was alſo confirmed by a priſoner taken at the ſame time, who added withal, that behind the hills, which the army had in view before it, there were two villages upon the left, and to the right a ſpacious plain, large enough to embattle the army, and where they might attack the enemy's rear.

When the Turks perceived the Chriſtians deſigns, they began to intrench that part of the camp which they had neglected before, not dreaming of being attacked that way: the flower of the Janiſſaries were ordered to guard the hills, which they ſaw the right wing of the Chriſtians going to poſſeſs themſelves of, and ſent out 4000 horſe to charge the rear of the left wing, commanded by Picolimini, who ſending out a detachment of three ſquadrons of Noirkermer's regiment, they charged the enemy ſo briſkly that they were repulſed, and purſued above 300 paces.

In the mean time the right wing was engaged with the Janiſſaries, who made a ſtout reſiſtance, and coſt the life of the brave Major-General Vellon; but the Chriſtians, rather animated than borne downe with the reſiſtance they met with, redoubled their fury, and after they had beaten off the Janiſſaries, gained the hill, whither they brought their cannon, and played briſkly upon the enemy, who were retired into a bottom, from whence they alſo fired continually upon the Chriſtians. And now the Spahis, who had been beaten by a detachment of the left wing, returned again to the charge, endeavouring ſtill all they could to flank the Chriſtians, and fell on with much greater fury than before, as if the ignominy of their flight had given life anew to their courage; which onſet was firmly ſuſtained by Palfi's regiment of Heydukes, who being ſeconded by others, put the whole Ottoman cavalry into diſorder, and drove them even upon the Janiſſaries, who ſeeing the cowardice of the Spahis, fired upon them, which being done alſo by the Turks poſted on the other ſide of the river, this manner of treatment forced the fugitives to renew the charge.

But alas! that ſerved only to augment the confuſion that was already very great in the Ottoman army; for the Chriſtians taking advantage of the diſorders, flew upon the enemy from all parts, who then betook themſelves to their heels, not knowing whither to fly; ſo that only night protected them from the fury of the victors. But ſeveral of them, in ſeeking to ſave their lives in the dark, and not being able to find the way to the bridge, adventured in hopes to paſs the river, to eſcape by ſwimming, when the ſtream was ſo rapid, that moſt of them were drowned, inſomuch, that of all the Turkiſh cavalry, there were but very few that eſcaped. In their camp, the Imperialiſts found great ſtore of utenſils for pioneers, thirty pieces of cannon of an extraordinary bigneſs, of which ſome were four ſquare, a great number of carcaſſes, glaſs grenades, biſcuit, barley, rice, meal, oats, tobacco, camels, and other things. But of all the plunder, the Prince of Baden reſerved only for himſelf the Seraſkier's tent, which was very magnificent, and which had been ſent him by the Grand Vizier, in regard he had loſt his own in the former battle. After the army had pillaged the camp, they entered Niſſa without oppoſition, where they found proviſions enough for the ſubſiſtence of the whole army for five or ſix weeks, and took above 3000 horſes and mules: and what made this victory more conſiderable, was the ſmallneſs of the Imperialiſts' loſs, there being not above 300 killed, and not many more wounded, whereas the Turks were computed to have been worſe for this battle by 8000 men.

The Prince, ſtill to purſue this great advantage, diſpatched away the very next day 3000 horſe, under the command of Picolimini, to look after the fugitive Turks, with orders to advance as far as Sophia, and view the country, who returned the 13th of October without having been able to meet with any of the enemy; but reported the country was very good, having ſuffered but little from the war; and that he had put garriſons into Pio, and Muſſa Paſora, which the Turks had quitted upon his approach; and that he underſtood by ſome priſoners he had taken, that the Infidels were retired to Sophia, where they endeavoured to rally their broken troops: which intelligence moved the Prince to fortify Niſſa, and ſo much the rather, becauſe the country people, who came in great numbers to implore his protection, aſſured him that the country was good and fertile, and if preſerved, ſufficient to furniſh an army with all neceſſary proviſions; and when he had done, he made Count Picolimini commander of the place, and the adjacent country depending on it: and ſoon after Count Tekely, who had ſome time before poſſeſſed himſelf of Orſowa, thought convenient to quit it; but he firſt ſet the town on fire, and then retired to Siliſtria. While the Prince of Baden, not willing to conclude this glorious campaign with this laſt action, ſet forward on the 6th of October, with his army for Widdin, another important place, with a good caſtle upon the Danube; and upon the 11th arrived at Breſlau, where he ſtaid one day in expectation of the baggage, and from thence ſent a detachment of Germans and Hungarians to view the country, and to get ſome intelligence of the enemy, who returned next day with ſome priſoners, and reported that the two Baſha's were retired near Widdin with their forces, and that Tekely had taken the road to Sophia. Whereupon the Prince reſumed his march, and on the 14th by ten in the morning, got to the plains of Widdin, when the enemy, who knew nothing of the army's march, were ſtrangely ſurpriſed to ſee the Imperial ſoldiers foraging very near their camp; and their conſternation was ſo great, that before they could recover themſelves, the Prince's right wing had paſſed the ſtone bridges that were built upon the moraſs, and was drawn up in order of battle, expecting pecting the coming up of the left wing, which paſſed immediately after. Neither did the enemy endeavour to hinder them, which gave the right wing an opportunity to take up their poſts very near the city, and to ſecure themſelves with the Danube. The Turks ſeemed at firſt very courageous; but they were charged with ſo much bravery by the right wing, where the Prince of Baden was in perſon, that they were driven to an intrenchment they had made about the town, upon whom, however, the Imperial cavalry advanced, receiving the fire of the Janiſſaries, which killed ſome horſemen, and made the reſt recoil: but they were preſently rallied again behind a riſing ground, and advanced within forty paces of the enemy's moats, where they ſtood their ground, till the reſt of the right wing had planted themſelves near a church-yard that was there.

In the mean time General Veterani, who commanded the left wing, ordered 200 dragoons to alight, and attack the enemy's intrenchments, which they did ſo well, that in a ſhort time they entered the city pell-mell, and were ſoon ſeconded by the cavalry and the reſt of the forces, killing in the whole of this action near 2000 Turks, with the loſs of 400 of their own men.

Thoſe of the Turks that could not ſave themſelves in the barks that lay upon the Danube, or with that part of the cavalry that fled to Sophia, retired to the caſtle of Widdin, where they reſolved to hold out a formal ſiege, which made the Prince ſend to Semendria for his great cannon; and in the mean time ordered his men to begin to open the trenches, that all might be ready upon their arrival for widening the breach, and ſtorming the place: but the beſieged, upon better thoughts, would not ſtay for the cannon, and therefore, upon the 18th of October, they capitulated, to march out of the place with arms and baggage, and were conducted by water to Nicopolis, with which the Prince of Baden concluded this long and moſt glorious campaign, diſtributing his army into winter quarters in Tranſilvania and Wallachia, ſore againſt the will of the Hoſpodar, who could not help it, and then returned to Vienna.

NOIRMOUTIERS, on the French coaſt. The melancholy intelligence, which was given to the world through the medium of the National Convention and Pariſian papers, reſpecting the defeat of the Royaliſts at the Iſle of Noirmoutiers, damped, but by no means diſſipated the pleaſure derived from the following facts.

Monſieur le Chevalier de la Robberie commanded a veſſel; and was commiſſioned by the Royaliſts with diſpatches to the government of England, requiring ſupplies of proviſions, ammunition and permiſſion for all Emigrants in that country, particularly the ci-devant nobility of La Vandee, and the contiguous provinces, to join the Royal party at the iſle of Noirmoutiers. M. Robberie left Noirmoutiers on the 23d December. During the ten days which he was at ſea, he was repeatedly chaſed by frigates, but whether they were Engliſh or French he was unwilling to wait to aſcertain; and at length was obliged to make for the Welch coaſt. On his arrival there, no perſon being met with who underſtood a word of French, and all his crew being ignorant of the Engliſh language, he and his party were conſidered as French patriots, and treated by the populace with much unjuſtifiable ſeverity, he narrowly eſcaping with his life, while conducting to priſon, from the ſtones which were thrown at him. While in priſon he wrote to Mr. Dundas, informing him of his miſſion, and Mr. Dundas immediately diſpatched Lauzun the Meſſenger, to accompany him to London. His party, eighteen of whom were French pilots, were alſo releaſed.

M. Robberie ſaid, that at the time of his leaving M. de Charette, who commands the Royaliſts in La Vendee, on the 13th of December that General was at Mortagne, with intention of approaching the Loire, for the purpoſe of eſtabliſhing a communication between the northern and ſouthern army of the Royaliſts; the army under his command compriſed 20,000 men, well armed, and he expreſſes his conviction of their being able to withſtand every effort of the Republicans during this winter. The country is particularly favourable for defenſive operations, being woody and marſhy; the inhabitants were for the major part Royaliſts, much governed by their prieſts, and wanted but the preſence of their nobles to render them invincible.

In regard to the retention of the iſland of Noirmoutiers, which had been in the poſſeſſion of the Royaliſts ſince October, M. Robberie ſpeaks confidently; by ſea it is defended by a chain of rocks and forts, remarkably ſtrong, with abundance of artillery and eighteen and twenty-four pounders; towards the Continent at low water it is united to the ſhore by a narrow iſthmus, capable only of admitting one man in front, and on this the Royaliſts have conſtructed ſuch works as to render an hoſtile approach to it difficult and dangerous in the extreme; the rocks which lie between the iſland and the ſhore render the navigation at high water dangerous even to ſmall veſſels.

The garriſon conſiſted of 800 regular troops and 1,800 volunteers; the inhabitants, who are celebrated for their great ſtature and perſonal ſtrength, are no leſs diſtinguiſhed for their averſion of and oppoſition to the proceedings of the Republicans. M. Robberie declares his opinion that the garriſon might be ſtarved into ſubmiſſion, but that it could never be taken by aſſault.

On the reduction of this iſland by the Royaliſts, they continued the Patriotic ſtandards on the batteries, and by this deception gained conſiderable ſupplies of proviſions, by veſſels putting in there: the hope of attracting the attention of ſome of the Britiſh or Spaniſh cruizers induced them to hoiſt their own ſtandards.

The colours of the Royaliſts as well as their cockades were, ſince the death of their late Monarch, white edged with black. M. Robberie received the firſt intimation of the murder of the unfortunate Antoinette when in priſon.

The northern army of the Royaliſts, of whoſe fate the moſt painful apprehenſions were entertained, conſiſted of 60,000 men, when M. Robberie left Mortagne.

What is very ſingular, M. Charette, who commands the Royal party in La Vendee, was formerly a lieutenant in the navy, and now only twenty-ſeven years old. M. Robberie is in the twenty-firſt year of his age.

NOM-

NOMBRE DE DIOS, TAKEN IN 1595. A town on the Iſthmus of Darien, near Porto Bello in the Terra Firma or South America. The Engliſh were again threatened with an invaſion from Spain, and the Spaniards vainly boaſted of being able to carry it into execution with a fleet ſuperior to the invincible armada of 1588; which greatly ſpirited up the malcontents in Ireland, and alarmed the Engliſh: wherefore it was thought neceſſary to fit out two ſquadrons of conſiderable ſtrength each; one to guard our coaſt, and to quiet the fears of the people; the other to make a diverſion, and to ſeparate the ſea forces of Spain, by carrying fire and ſword into the Weſt-Indies.

The fleet appointed for the channel ſervice, prevented any attempts upon the principal ports. But inſtead of the formidable fleet expected, only four Spaniſh galleys ventured to ſea, under Don Diego Brocher, who landed a handful of men at Mounts Bay, in Cornwall. They burnt Mouſe-hole, Newlin, Penzance, and a neighbouring church, but did not ſo much as kill or wound any human creature. This was the only time the Spaniards ever landed in England as enemies.

The fleet deſtined for the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies, as it was a plan propoſed by Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins, ſo it was put under their principal command, and ordered to take a body of land forces on board, to ſeize upon Nombre De Dios, from thence to march to Panama, in order to ſeize the treaſure which is brought thither from Peru; and, according as they found it expedient, to keep poſſeſſion of and inhabit that town. But five days before their departure from Plymouth, they received letters from her Majeſty, informing them of advices ſhe had received from Spain, that the India fleet was arrived, and that one of them, having loſt her maſt, was put into the iſland of Puerto Rico; ſhe therefore ordered them, ſince ſo good an opportunity offered, and they knew the weakneſs of Puerto Rico, to poſſeſs themſelves firſt of that treaſure.

Our fleet conſiſted of twenty-ſix ſhips; among which were the Defiance, commanded by Sir Francis Drake; Garland, Sir John Hawkins; Hope Captain Gilbert Yorke; Bonaventure, Captain Troughton; Foreſight, Captain Winter; Adventure, Captain Thomas Drake.

The land forces were under the command of Sir Thomas Baſkerfield, colonel-general; Sir Nicholas Clifford, lieutenant-general; Captain Arnold Baſkerfield, ſerjeant-major; Captain Nicholas Baſkerfield, Captain Berkeley, Captain Grinſtone, Captain Platt, Captain Chicheſter, Captain Stanton, Captain Fenton.

They ſailed from Plymouth on the 28th of Auguſt, but did not get clear of the land till the laſt of that month. The firſt land they made was the Grand Canary, the chief of the iſlands of that name, where they arrived the 27th of September, and, contrary to the opinion of Sir John Hawkins, made a fruitleſs attempt to reduce that iſland, with a deſign to keep poſſeſſion of it, for the ſake of victualling.

This deſign failing they proceeded for the iſland of Dominica, where they arrived on the 29th of October, and trafficked with the natives for tobacco. It is diſtant from Martinico about ten or twelve Engliſh miles, bearing W. and by N. The people of this Iſland trafficked with them for hatchets, knives, and ſuch like commodities, in exchange for their tobacco, which was the chiefeſt commodity of this iſland.

On the 30th of October, they came to the iſland of Guadaloupe, which is diſtant from that of Dominica ten leagues, not inhabited, but was then a wilderneſs for wild beaſts. Here they continued from the 30th of October to the 4th of November. From thence they ſailed towards the river De la Hatch, and ſtruck their courſe N. W. and by N. The 7th of November they deſcried three iſlands of the Trigonies, which lie between Guadaloupe and St. John de Portrizo. The 8th of November the General ſent on ſhore all the landmen, to the end that every captain might know his own men. The 10th of November they departed from that harbour to another three or four Engliſh miles diſtant, where they continued until Tueſday the 11th of November, and then ſet ſail for St. John de Portrizo, W. and by N.

The 12th of November they anchored within three or four Engliſh miles of the town of Puerto Rico, againſt a great fort, where was placed a great piece of ordnance, which plied them with ſhot.

The very next day after their arrival at Dominica, five Spaniſh ſhips, which were ſent out to obſerve the Engliſh, and convoy the plate from Puerto Rico, ſeized the Francis, an Engliſh pinnace which had ſtraggled from the fleet; and having by tortures forced the maſter and mariners to confeſs that the Engliſh had a deſign upon Puerto Rico, they made thither with all the ſail they could to give intelligence that the Engliſh were coming. The gold and ſilver they immediately buried, and diſpatched ſmall veſſels to all the iſlands and ſea-coaſts to give the Spaniards timely notice; ſo that on the 12th of November, at their coming before Puerto Rico, the place, as beforementioned, againſt which their deſign was, they found it too well ſecured to hope any ſucceſs.

Sir Nicholas Clifford, and Brute Brown, were ſo ſeverely wounded whilſt they were ſitting at ſupper, that they died in a day or two afterwards. They were at ſupper with the General, whoſe ſtool was taken from under him by the ſame ſhot, as he was drinking a cup of beer; and Captain Stratford, with one or two more, were at the ſame time wounded, though not mortally. The ſame day Sir John Hawkins died, as was thought of grief, occaſioned by ſome conteſt which had aroſe between him and the other commanders. The Spaniards had ſunk a great ſhip at the mouth of the haven to hinder their entrance, and had placed large maſts on both ſides, from thence to the very forts which guarded the avenues.

Within the haven were the five Spaniſh ſhips, prepared to oppoſe the Engliſh, all ballaſted with ſand, and well ſtocked with muſqueteers, great guns, and ammunition. Baſkerfield, nevertheleſs, manned out his boats and pinnaces on the 13th in the evening, to the number of twenty-five, and went into the road within the caſtles, where, notwithſtanding the Spaniards fired 185 cannon-ſhot upon them, and plied them continually with their ſmall arms, they ſet fire to the five ſhips, ſhips, which were all of 200 tons, or more, and one of 400; burnt the Rear-Admiral, and did great damage to the Admiral and Vice-Admiral. The ſhips had each twenty braſs guns, and 100 barrels of powder on board. Their loading, which conſiſted chiefly of ſilk, oil, and wine, had been before ſecured: as was likewiſe the treaſure which had been brought thither in the Vigonia, being, as one of the priſoners confeſſed, 3,000,000 of ducats, or thirty-five tons of ſilver.

The fight was very obſtinate on both ſides; but after an aſſault or two, wherein they were repulſed with ſome loſs on the ſide of the Engliſh, but a far greater to the Spaniards, of whom a great number were burnt, drowned, and killed, and ſome priſoners taken, they found any farther attempt would be in vain, and therefore reimbarked and ſailed over to Terra Firma, where they burnt La Hach, the 1ſt of December, though the inhabitants offered to ranſom it with 34,000 ducats. They afterwards ſet fire to La Rancheria, where they took many negroes and other priſoners, with ſtore of pearls, and other pillage; as likewiſe a brigantine, with ſome ſilver and pearl. They afterwards burnt ſeveral other ſmall villages thereabouts; and then on the 19th took St. Martha's, which they likewiſe burnt, not finding in it the leaſt piece of gold or ſilver. The next place they took was Nombre de Dois, and they deſtroyed that place likewiſe, with all the ſhipping there, after a ſhort reſiſtance from the Spaniards, on the 28th. They did not find a penny of money in the town; but in a watch-houſe on the top of a hill near the town, they found twenty ſows of ſilver. two bars of gold, ſome pearl, money coined, and other plunder.

From thence a body of 750 landmen, under the command of Sir Thomas Baſkerfield, marched over land towards Panama; but in their paſſage as they were going through ſome narrow defiles, after one or two days troubleſome march, they were ſorely galled with ſhowers of ſmall ſhot from a wood; finding beſides, that the paſs was defended by a new erected fort, and having information that there were two forts more within to obſtruct their paſſage, they made the beſt of their way back to the fleet, where they returned wretchedly haraſſed, and half ſtarved, on the 2d of January, having marched half way to the South-Sea.

Sir Francis Drake then reſolved to make towards the iſland of Eſcudo, and from thence to Porto-Bello; but before he could put it in practice, he was ſeized with a bloody flux, of which he died on the 28th of January; though it has been ſuſpected that he was diſſatisfied at the ill-ſucceſs of his undertaking, grew melancholy, and laid violent hands upon himſelf.

The fleet being now bereaved of both its admirals, the command devolved upon Sir Thomas Baſkerfield, who, with the other officers, thought it moſt expedient to make the beſt of their way for England. Near the iſle of Pines, off Cuba, they were encountered by the Spaniſh fleet of twenty ſail, part of ſixty ſent from Carthagena in queſt of the Engliſh. Baſkerfield and Troughton, one in the Vice-Admiral, and the other in the Admiral, gave them ſo warm a reception, that after an obſtinate fight of above two hours, in which ſeveral of their beſt ſhips were very much damaged, and one of their largeſt ſet fire to and burnt, they ſheered off. Our fleet having been eight months out, returned to England in the beginning of May 1596, with very little booty, having only fired ſome ſmall towns and a good number of ſhips.

NOOTKA in the Pacific Ocean.—Extract of a letter from Lieutenant Pearce, of the marines, to his Grace the Duke of Portland, dated Tepic, New Galicia, N. W. of the city of Mexico, April 25, 1795.

I have the honour of acquainting your Grace that, in obedience to your inſtructions, I proceeded from Monterey to Nootka, in company with General Alava, the officer appointed on the part of the court of Spain, for finally terminating the negotiations relative to that Port; where, having ſatisfied myſelf reſpecting the ſtate of the country at the time of the arrival of the Spaniards, preparations were immediately made for diſmantling the fort, which the Spaniards had erected on an iſland that guarded the mouth of the harbour, and embarking the ordnance. By the morning of the 23d, all the artillery were embarked; part on board of his Catholic Majeſty's ſloop of war, Activo, and part on board of the San Carlos guard-ſhip. Brigadier-General Alava and myſelf then met, agreeable to our reſpective inſtructions, on the place where formerly the Britiſh buildings ſtood, where we ſigned and exchanged the declaration, and counter declaration, for reſtoring thoſe lands to his Majeſty, as agreed upon by the two courts. After which ceremony I ordered the Britiſh flag to be hoiſted in token of poſſeſſion, and the General gave directions for the troops to embark.

NORFOLK TAKEN. See PORTSMOUTH.

NORKITTEN, BATTLE AT, IN 1757. A village of Ducal Pruſſia, ſituated between Konigſberg and Great Jagerſdorf.

The King of Pruſſia having been obliged to retreat, in conſequence of his defeat at Corlin; the Ruſſians, emboldened by the ſucceſs of their allies, now ventured to invade to the number of 90,000 men.

They inveſted Memel, which not being in a condition to ſtand a regular ſiege, was ſurrendered by the garriſon upon honourable terms. From hence this numerous army marched ſouthward, without meeting with any remarkable oppoſition, but ſo ſlowly that they did not paſs the Pregel till near the end of Auguſt, when they paſſed that river, and encamped near Jagerſdorf. Upon this General Lehwald, who commanded the Pruſſian army, then poſted at Wehlaw, reſolved, notwithſtanding their great ſuperiority in numbers, to attack them, which he did on the 30th of that month, and of which he had an authentic account publiſhed in the gazette both of London and Berlin, the ſubſtance of which was as follows.

That the Ruſſian army, amounting to 80,000 regular troops, had choſe a moſt advantageous camp near Norkitten. It was compoſed of four lines, each of which was defended by an intrenchment with a numerous artillery, and batteries placed upon all the eminences. Notwithſtanding ſo great a ſuperiority, Marſhal Lehwald determined to attack the enemy with his army, which hardly conſiſted of 30,000 men. The attack began at five in the morning, and was carried on with ſo much vigour, that the Pruſſians entirely broke the whole firſt line of the enemy, and forced all their batteries. The Prince of Holſtein Gottorp, brother to the King of Sweden, at the head of his regiment of dragoons routed the enemy's cavalry, and afterwards fell upon a regiment of grenadiers, which was cut to pieces; but when the Pruſſians came to the ſecond intrenchment, Marſhal Lehwald ſeeing he could not attempt to carry it without expoſing his whole army, took the reſolution to retire, which he did in the beſt manner, and without the enemy's daring to ſtir out of their intrenchment to purſue them. The Pruſſian army returned to its former camp at Velau, where they remained, as did the enemy in their camp. The loſs of the Pruſſians did not exceed 2000 killed and wounded, which loſs however was immediately replaced by the diſciplined militia. the loſs of the enemy muſt be near 14,000. General Lapuchin was wounded and taken priſoner, with a colonel of the Ruſſian artillery, but the former was ſent back on his parole. The Pruſſian army had at firſt made themſelves maſters of above eighty pieces of cannon, but were afterwards obliged to abandon them with eleven of their own, for want of carriages. The Pruſſians loſt no general or officer of diſtinction. Lieutenant-General Dohna was the only one wounded.

But the Ruſſians gave a very different account of this battle; their firſt account indeed, which was given by Marſhal Apraxin himſelf was pretty modeſt and conciſe, for he only ſaid that the Pruſſians though they behaved as bravely as men could do in the action, had attacked his army contrary to all the rules of war, therefore their attack muſt have been the effect either of poſitive orders, or deſpair; the conſequence of which was, that they had, he reckoned, 10,000 men killed and wounded in their deſperate attack, whereas the Ruſſians had not above 7000 killed and wounded. But there was afterwards a long pompous account of this engagement publiſhed at Peterſburg, and to amuſe the populace, great rejoicings made, as if they had obtained a complete victory.

It is, indeed, probable that the Pruſſians loſt a greater number of men than they were willing to confeſs, as an army that attacks another's intrenchments without defeating them, always loſes more men than thoſe they attack; beſides we cannot well ſuppoſe, that Marſhal Lehwald would have given up the advantages he had obtained, if he had not loſt a very great number of men; and much leſs that he would have retired from his former camp, as he ſoon after did to Peterſwalde.

But what is moſt ſurpriſing, though the Pruſſian army had retired, and did not ſeem to have any deſign to make a ſecond attack, yet the Ruſſian army attempted nothing after this battle, unleſs it was plundering and often cruelly uſing the poor inhabitants, which, indeed, was chiefly owing to their being attended, as they always are, by a body of Coſſacks and Calmucks; for as to any other ſort of operations they continued quite inactive until the 13th of September, when they ſuddenly repaſſed the Pregel, and retreated without ſtopping till they arrived at Memel; in which retreat they loſt a great many men, as they were followed almoſt the whole of the way by ſome of the Pruſſian troops, who killed, or made priſoners all they found lagging behind the army; and even many of the ſtragglers were killed by the country people, in revenge for the ill-uſage they had met with. What reaſon Marſhal Apraxin had for this early and precipitate retreat is not known, as it does not ſeem to have been any way neceſſary, becauſe he might have made himſelf maſter of Konigſberg, and thereby have had his army ſupplied by the Ruſſian fleet; and it does not ſeem as if he had any orders from his court for retreating, becauſe he was ſoon after not only diſmiſſed from his command, but alſo confined; though it does not appear that he ever met with any other puniſhment. Whatever was the reaſon, the army preſently after their arrival at Memel, retired into winter quarters, ſome about that city and ſome in Samogitia.

NORLINGEN, BATTLE AT. A town of Germany in the circle of Suabia, 35 miles from Ulm. This battle was fought in the year 1645, between the French under the command of the Duke d'Enguien, and the Imperialiſts uuder Count de Merci. The French were attempting to conquer Suabia, and the Count de Merci having ſome little advantage in the field, reſolved to give them battle. He intrenched part of his army on a mountain, while the remainder, alſo in intrenchments, occupied a paſs at the foot of it, through which the French muſt proceed to proſecute their deſign. Merci himſelf commanded the right wing, and General Gleen the left.

The Duke d'Enguien, having examined their ſituation, found that he muſt accept of the offer, and therefore made the neceſſary preparations for fighting; Turenne, with the German cavalry, was oppoſed to Count Merci; Grammont at the head of the French horſe, had to deal with Gleen; Major-General Caſtlenau commanded the centre, which conſiſted of infantry, and the Chevalier Chabot led a corps of reſerve. The Duke, as generaliſſimo, took no poſt, that he might be ready where his preſence was neceſſary.

In order to make a general action of it, it was neceſſary to force a village, which defended Count Merci's wing. With this view, they began early in the morning on the 3d of Auguſt, by cannonading it, and marching up a large detachment of infantry under Caſtlenau. Both the attack and the defence was very vigorous, but the French gained the place. They were near being driven out again, when the Duke d'Enguien at the head of the gens-d'armes diſmounted, came to ſupport them, and expoſing himſelf received a contuſion in his thigh. Meantime, Turenne attempted to paſs between the village and the hill, on which Count Merci had planted ſome cannon. This was the only way to victory; Turenne gained his point, and extending his troops, prepared to attack the enemy's left wing. Juſt then General Gleen attacked Marechal Grammont and broke the French horſe, who behaved very ill, and took the Mareſchal priſoner. But Gleen unadviſedly purſued the fugitives, inſtead of falling on the main body in flank where it was open. He penetrated to the baggage, but could not take it.

The Duke and Turenne informed of this diſorder, haſtened to redreſs it. They attacked Count Merci ſo furiouſly, that they effectually broke his troops before General Gleen could come up to his ſupport. He was entirely defeated, almoſt all his wing cut to pieces, and himſelf found among the dead; fifteen pieces of cannon, many colours and ſtandards, almoſt all the baggage, and 2000 priſoners, were authentic proofs of this victory.

General

The enemy's victorious left wing ſeeing itſelf in danger of being ſurrounded, diſbanded on the ſpot. The ſoldiers without a leader, diſperſed themſelves, and it was two months before the Imperialiſts could appear in the field again.

The loſs of the French in this battle was ſo great, that Mazarine told the regent, there was little room to rejoice for the victory. Yet as there was no enemy in the field, they took Norlingen and Dunkelſpeil without reſiſtance. They then marched to Heilbron, before which the Duke d'Enguien falling dangerouſly ill, the command devolved on Viſcount Turenne. He took the town on the 14th of September, and made the garriſon priſoners of war. Here he ſtaid to repoſe his troops, and raiſe contributions.

In the mean time, the Imperialiſts recruited their army, and being joined by General Gallas with 7000 horſe, were ſuperior to the French, and advanced to attack them. Turenne did not think proper to wait for them, he repaſſed the Necker, abandoned to them Norlingen and Dunkelſpiel, and retreated to Philipſburg. Soon after which both armies went into winter quarters.

NORMANDY, ENGAGEMENT OFF, IN 1332. A province of France, ſituated on the Britiſh Channel.

The Death of Alexander King of Scotland leaving that kingdom without any apparent heir, many competitors divided it into factions, which furniſhed Edward with a good pretence to interpoſe his authority towards ſettling the ſucceſſion. He even claimed the ſovereignty of Scotland; inſiſted that the realm of Scotland was held of him; and backing his pretenſions with a powerful army by land, and a ſtrong fleet by ſea, required the competitors to yield to his award.

The claimants were Erick King of Norway; Florence, Earl of Holland; Robert de Bruce, Lord of Annandale; John de Haſtings, Lord of Abergavenny; John Cumin, Lord of Badenaw; Patrick Dunbar, Earl of March; John de Veſci, Nicholas Sules, and William de Roſs: who all ſubmitted to Edward's final award and arbitration concerning their ſeveral titles to the Scottiſh crown. And the ſtates of Scotland granted him ſeiſin of the realm, to enable him the better to conſtrain the parties to ſubmit to his decree and ſentence, on condition that he by a certain time prefixed ſhould make his award, and put the lawful heir in poſſeſſion thereof; which gave Edward a pretence to keep a ſtrong fleet on the northern coaſt, to aſſert his right to the ſovereignty of the ſeas, and to prevent any diſturbance from abroad, in caſe the King of Norway, or any others ſhould attempt to back their claims by a foreign force.

While this royal arbitration was depending, a war broke out ſuddenly between the Engliſh and the Normans. For though Edward had taken the utmoſt care to prevent a rupture with France, that perfidious people could not refrain their inſolence; and probably interpreting his caution to be a token of puſillanimity, fell upon our merchantmen, interrupted our trade, plundered our ſhips, and murdered all our ſailors that they could overpower in cold blood. The Engliſh firſt of all fitted out ſhips of repriſal, and the war was continued for ſome time in a piratical manner. The navigation ſuffered by ſea, and many of the ſea-ports ſuffered by land on both ſides. The mariners of the Cinque-ports entered the port of Troyn, and after killing and drowning abundance of men, they carried off ſix ſhips. On the other ſide, the French did the like in the port of Dover. Till it was at laſt reſolved between both nations to decide the dominion of the ſeas in a fixed battle on the 14th of April; and a large empty ſhip was ſtationed in the middle between the coaſts of England and Normandy for the place of engagement. Both reinforced their fleets with auxiliaries from foreign ſtates. England procured ſhips from Ireland, Holland, and Norway. The French, Flemings, and Genoeſe were called in to the aſſiſtance of the Normans. The day appointed for the battle was uſhered in by a violent ſtorm of wind, ſnow, and hail. The battle was obſtinate; but at laſt victory declared in favour of the Engliſh. Many thouſands were ſlain on both ſides, and a vaſt number of ſhips were ſunk. But the Engliſh remained in poſſeſſion of the dominion of the ſeas, which they claimed of ancient right, and 240 ſail of the enemy's ſhips, which they brought home to England. But this is related differently by Walſingham and Knighton, who write that this was no more than a private quarrel between a Norman pilot and an Engliſh mariner; that a fierce war was carried on between the ſubjects of both nations, and repriſals made for ſome time, before the two kings were concerned. But that ſixty ſtout Engliſh ſhips happening to meet a Norman fleet of 200 ſail, or 240 ſail according to Knighton, laden with wine, after a ſharp encounter, in which 15,000 French were ſlain, the Engliſh took the whole fleet and carried it into England. Another, but upon what authority I cannot ſay, informs us, that Edward having ſent out ſix ſail of ſhips for Bourdeaux, as they coaſted along Normandy, they were attacked and taken by ſome people of that province; which he highly reſenting, ordered his Admiral, Robert Tiptot, to ſail with a ſquadron to Normandy, who entering the Seine, ſunk all the ſhips he found in that river; after which he took ſeveral ſhips laden with wine, which were coming round the weſtern coaſts of France. Hereupon the French fitted out a number of ſhips, under the command of Charles Count de Valois, who engaging the Engliſh, received a total defeat; but the French ſoon after repairing their fleet, ſailed under the command of Matthew Montmorenci and John of Harcourt to Dover, and ſurpriſing that town plundered and ſet it on fire.

NORTHALLERTON, BATTLE AT. A town of Yorkſhire, ſituated about twenty-two miles north-weſt from York. In the year 1138, David, King of Scotland, entered Northumberland at the head of a powerful army (though the year before he refuſed the poſſeſſion of it); Stephen, King of England, marched an army to oppoſe his progreſs, upon which he retired to Roxburgh, where the King finding the Scots too advantageouſly poſted to be attacked with any proſpect of ſucceſs, and diſcovering ſome treachery among his followers, retreated to the ſouth without having hazarded an action. The Scots where then at liberty to waſte Northumberland with impunity; they took Norham, and dividing it into different detachments, ravaged the whole country, committing every where the moſt barbarous outrages. At length when the ſummer was far advanced, their ſcattered parties joined, they advanced as far Northallerton, where they were met by an Engliſh army, under the command of William Earl of Albermarle, accompanied by Walter Eſpec, Roger Moubray, Robert de Bruce, Bernard de Baliol, Walter de Gant, and all the northern barons. In a ſort of wheel-carriage they had erected a large pole, at the top of which was a croſs, and under this a banner, from whence the battle that enſued acquired the name of the battle of the ſtandard. Around this enſign the Engliſh were drawn up in a firm compact body, the front compoſed of pike-men and archers intermixed, to receive the firſt ſhock of the enemy. There was a diſpute in the Scottiſh army about the manner in which they ſhould begin the attack; David and his principal nobility were of opinion, they ſhould charge with their heavy-armed troops and bowmen; but the men of Galloway, who had no other than ſlight offenſive weapons, inſiſted upon the privilege of forming the van; and the diſpute growing warm between Alan de Percy and the Earl of Stratherne, the King in order to prevent a mutiny, ordered the Gallovidians to take their poſt and begin the battle. The ſecond line was compoſed of the Borderers and Lowlanders, commanded by the Prince of Scotland, under the direction of Euſtace Fitzjohn, an Engliſh nobleman who had been oppreſſed by Stephen, and joined the Scots from reſentment. The body of reſerve conſiſted of Highlanders and Murraymen, commanded by the King, attended by a body guard of Engliſh and Norman knights. The Gallovidians marched up to attack with three huzzas, and charged the Engliſh lancemen with ſuch fury that they gave ground, but they were ſuſtained by the ſecond line, and the aſſailants having no defenſive armour, were galled in ſuch a manner by the Engliſh arrows and puſh of pike, that their firſt efforts being exhauſted, and their chieftains Ulrick and Donald ſlain, they turned their backs and fled with great confuſion. The Prince of Scotland then advanced to attack with ſuch impetuoſity, that he bore down all before him, and even penetrated to the rear of the Engliſh, who terrified at his ſucceſs, began to fall into diſorder and give way, when their total defeat was prevented by the ſtratagem of an old ſoldier, who cutting off a man's head, erected it on the point of his ſpear, calling aloud, "Behold the head of the Scottiſh King," rallied the troops and renewed the battle. The Scots confounded at this apparition, and diſpirited by the flight of the Gallovidians, fought no longer with alacrity, but began to give ground on all quarters, nor could David, who fought on foot with undaunted courage, bring them back to the charge, ſo that he was obliged to mount on horſeback and quit the field.

The fugitives ſeeing the royal banner ſtill diſplayed, were convinced of their King's being alive, and crowded around him in ſuch numbers, that he was able to form a conſiderable body, with which he retreated in good order to Carliſle, where he was on the third day after the battle joined by his ſon. The Prince finding himſelf with a few ſoldiers in the heart of the Engliſh army during the engagement, had thrown away his badges of diſtinction, and mixed with the enemy till he made ſhift to eſcape through bye-ways to his father, who was diſconſolate at his being miſſing, and therefore thought himſelf happy at his return. David loſt ſome thouſands, not in the battle, but in the retreat of ſcattered parties, who inſtead of joining the royal banner, endeavoured to eſcape into their own country, and were maſſacred by the inhabitants of the country through which they paſſed. Stephen was ſo well pleaſed with this victory, that he conferred upon William of Albermarle the additional title of Yorkſhire, and beſtowed the earldom of Derby on Ferrers, by whom the other had been ſo ſtrongly reinforced.

NORTHAMPTON, BATTLE NEAR. Capital of the county of its own name, ſituated on the river Nen, about ſixty miles north from London. Notwithſtanding the adherents of the Houſe of York were diſpirited and diſperſed by the proclamation of a free pardon publiſhed by Henry VI. ſoon after the battle at Bloreheath (which ſee) in 1459, the malcontent lords ſtill entertained hopes of raiſing to the throne the Duke of York, but Queen Margaret who exerted herſelf to fruſtrate every attempt of that kind, kept a ſtrict eye upon all their proceedings. The famous Earl of Warwick was governor of Calais, an employment ſhe was determined to deprive him of, and therfore ſent her favourite the Duke of Somerſet to ſuperſede him; but Somerſet met with ſuch a warm reception, as obliged him to land in another place, from which he marched to Guiſnes, and there he ſent out detachments to ſkirmiſh with the garriſon of Calais, by whom his men were generally repulſed to their quarters. Warwick was ſo beloved by the nation in general, that when Somerſet had landed with his troops, the ſailors ſteered the ſhips directly into the harbour of Calais. The Queen being determined to wreſt the government of this fortreſs from the hands of her enemies, equipped a fleet for the aſſiſtance of Somerſet, and ordered a conſiderable body of troops to be put on board, under the command of Lord Rivers and his ſon Sir Anthony Wodeville. While the fleet lay in the harbour of Sandwich, waiting for a wind, the Earl of Warwick having received intelligence of their deſtination, manned the ſhips which had lately deſerted to him, and embarking ſome troops with Sir John Denham, they ſailed to Sandwich where they, ſurpriſed Rivers and all his officers, who were conveyed to Calais, together with their ſhips, the ſailors themſelves favouring the enterprize. Warwick being thus reinforced with ſhipping, ſailed for Ireland in order to conſult with the Duke of York about the meaſures to be taken for another inſurrection in England, where the the people eſpouſed their cauſe, and their friends expected them with impatience. The Duke agreed with him in opinion, that the lords at Calais ſhould make a deſcent among their adherents and well-wiſhers in the county of Kent, and proceed directly to the capital, which they did not doubt would receive them with open arms. The Earl of Warwick in his return to Calais fell in with the Engliſh fleet commanded by the Duke of Exeter, who had lately ſuperſeded him in the poſt of Admiral, and been ſent out to intercept him in his paſſage. But the ſailors and ſoldiers on board the Duke's ſquadron refuſing to fight againſt their old commander, he, in order to prevent a total revolt, ſailed into Dartmouth, where the greateſt part of his men deſerted for want of pay and proviſion.

The Queen and the miniſtry did not doubt but the interview between the Duke of York and the Earl of Warwick, would produce a new rebellion; which in order to weaken by anticipitation, the council reſolved to ſet on foot an exact inquiſition in all the towns and counties in the kingdom, for the diſcovery and puniſhment of all the partizans of the malcontents; the Earl of Wiltſhire and the Lord Scales were veſted with a commiſſion to make this enquiry, and puniſh all thoſe who carried arms for York and his adherents in the late rebellion; and they began to execute their powers with great ſeverity, in ſome towns which openly favoured the lords of the oppoſition. Of all the counties in England, Kent had the greateſt cauſe to dread the reſentment of the court, for it had always expreſſed a particular attachment to the Duke of York, and the conduct of the inhabitans under Cade was not forgotten; believing therefore that their ruin was inevitable if not prevented by ſome vigorous reſolution, they ſent an intimation to the lords at Calais, aſſuring them, that if they would land in Kent the inhabitants would receive them with open arms, and hazard their lives and fortunes in their ſervice. Sir Simon Montfort had been detached by Margaret with a body of freſh forces to guard Sandwich and other harbours that lay next the enemy, and ſhips had been equipped for convoying the Duke of Somerſet to England, where his preſence was thought neceſſary by the council. But Warwick ſurpriſed this armament, pillaged the town of Sandwich, took Montfort, and carried the ſhips to Calais. It was during this ſhort expedition that he became acquainted with the ſtate of affairs in England, the knowledge of which together with the invitation of the Kentiſh men, determined him and his aſſociates to land without delay. Nothing was wanting but a ſum of money to purchaſe neceſſaries, and the Earl of Warwick borrowed upon his own credit 18,000l. from the merchants of the ſtaple. Thus ſupplied, he began to make preparations, and in the mean time ſent over his uncle the Lord Falconbridge to Kent, where he was joined by a great number of people belonging to that and the adjacent counties. He was ſoon followed by Warwick himſelf, with the Earls of March and Saliſbury, who landed, where they were met by Thomas Bourchier, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Lord Cobham, and other perſons of Diſtinction. Before they ſet ſail from Calais, they diſperſed a manifeſto in England, aſſuring the nation that their ſole motive for taking arms was to deliver the people from the oppreſſion under which they groaned, and to ſecure their liberties and privileges: towards the re-eſtabliſhment of which they ſolicited the aſſiſtance of all true-hearted Engliſhmen, they had informed the Duke of York of their intended operations, and on the day on which they ſet ſail for England, they brought over about 1500 men, who being reinforced by 4000 under Lord Cobham, they began their march towards London; and ſuch numbers joined them in their route, that they entered the city in triumph, with an army of 40,000 men devoted to their ſervice.

Meanwhile the Queen was not idle at Coventry. She had endeavoured to prevent their being received in London, by ſending thither the Lord Scales with a ſtrong body of forces, but he was refuſed admittance by the mayor, even before the arrival of the malcontents, yet threw himſelf into the tower, from whence he threatened to cannonade the city ſhould the magiſtrates admit the rebels; to theſe menaces, however, they paid no regard. Margaret ſtill continued to aſſemble her forces, until her army being completed, ſhe beſtowed the joint command of it upon the Dukes of Somerſet and Buckingham, though ſhe herſelf was in effect the general, and iſſued out all the orders in the name of Henry, who was there in perſon.

As ſoon as the young Earl of March underſtood that ſhe was advancing towards London, he left the Earl of Saliſbury with good part of his troops in that capital, and marched out with the Earl of Warwick, at the head of 25,000 men, to attack her before her army ſhould be increaſed. The two parties met in the neighbourhood of Northampton, after the Queen had paſſed a river by which they were divided. Before they proceeded to battle, the aſſociated lords ſent the Biſhop of Saliſbury to the King, with a meſſage entreating his Majeſty would ſuſpend his indignation, and join with them in ſome ſalutary meaſures to prevent the effuſion of Engliſh blood. This addreſs was looked upon as a mere ceremony to ſerve appearances, and being rejected as ſuch, both ſides prepared for an engagement. On the 19th of July, 1460, the malcontents drew up their army in order of battle, the Earl of Warwick commanded the right wing, the Lord Cobham conducted the left, and the Earl of March his ſtation in the centre. The royal army was commanded by the Dukes of Somerſet and Buckingham, the Queen remained at a little diſtance, from whence ſhe could obſerve the particulars of the action, and give her directions according to the emergency of the occaſion; and Henry ſtaying in his tent waited the fate of a battle on which his crown depended.

The Yorkiſts having publiſhed orders through their army to reſpect the King's perſon, and ſpare the common ſoldiers; but to give no quarter to the officers, proceeded to the attack about two o'clock in the afternoon, and the action beginning with great fury on both ſides, continued till ſeven in the evening, when the Lord Grew of Ruthin, who commanded a conſiderable party of Henry's army, ſuddenly revolted to the rebels. This unexpected defection threw the reſt of the the King's forces into ſuch conſternation, that they forthwith began to give ground, and were routed with great ſlaughter. The Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Shrewſbury (ſon to the famous Talbot) the Lord Beaumont, and many other perſons of diſtinction were killed upon the ſpot. The Queen, the Prince of Wales, and the Duke of Somerſet fled with ſuch precipitation that they did not halt until they reached Durham. Henry fell into the hands of the victors, who treated him with all the exterior reſpect due to their ſovereign; and this deference in ſome meaſure conſoled him for the miſchance of the day, which would have rendered him a very great object of compaſſion, had not his natural indolence and want of ſenſibility fortified him againſt the viciſſitudes of fortune. He was immediately conducted to Northampton, with all the marks of honour and regard, and after a ſhort ſtay in that place, repaired to London ſurrounded by a crowd of noblemen and others, who had ſo lately appeared againſt him in the field of battle. Meantime the Queen, who did not think herſelf ſafe at Durham, retired privately to Wales, in order to elude the ſearch of her enemies, but ſhe ſoon quitted that retreat, and with her ſon took refuge in Scotland.

Immediately after the King's arrival in London, the tower ſurrendered for want of proviſions, and the Lord Scales who acted as governor, attempting to go by water in diſguiſe to the ſanctuary at Weſtminſter, was diſcovered and aſſaſſinated by the watermen. The next martial exploit was the battle of Wakefield, which ſee.

NORWICH BURNT. The Danes under Sweyne in 1003, ravaged the kingdom, and among many other towns burnt this city to the ground. This city was taken by ſome rebels in 1549.

Novi, Auguſt 19, 1799.

The column under the command of General Kray arrived at Aleſſandria, from Mantua, on the 12th, and on the day following was to have proceeded to the place of its deſtination, on the left of the whole, according to the plan of operations which I ſent your Lordſhip ſome time ago. On the 12th the enemy was in motion in different points, and it appeared as if he meditated ſome attack. General Kray was therefore ordered to remain at Aleſſandria till further orders. General Bellegarde, with 8000 men, was at Serzo, and the field-marſhal, with 600 Ruſſians, was at Poſſolo Fomigoio; his advanced poſts in front of Seravalle. The remainder of the troops were at Rivalta. On the 13th, the enemy continued to advance in great numbers. The Marſhal had given orders that no partial action ſhould be engaged in with the French; in conſequence of which, General Bellegarde was directed at the approach of the enemy to march at Ritorta upon the Orba. The advanced poſts before Seravalle were alſo driven in, and the French took poſſeſſion of Novi. On the 14th, General Kray advanced to Treſſonara. It was hoped that General Kray would have been able to have cut off a ſmall French column which had followed General Bellegarde as far as Caſtelferro, but it had early in the morning of the 14th turned to its right, and marched to Novi, where the whole French force was concentrated. The great and extenſive plain of Piedmont is terminated at Novi by a very long ridge of hills, which riſe ſo ſuddenly, and are ſo ſteep, that the aſcent is extremely difficult, though the height is not very great; they extend towards Baſaluzzo on one ſide, and towards Seravalle on the other: and upon theſe heights the enemy was encamped on the 15th, their right towards Seravalle, their centre at Novi, and their left towards Baſaluzzo, overlooking the whole plain. The army was commanded by General Joubert, and conſiſted of ſix diviſions, amounting to about 50,000 men; their object was to raiſe the ſiege of Tortona, and they were to have attacked the allied army on the 16th; the field-marſhal, however, determined to anticipate them in their intentions, and orders were given to General Kray to take under his command the corps of General Bellegarde, and to fall upon the left of the enemy, and the Ruſſians were to attack the front of their poſition. As it was reported the enemy had detached a conſiderable corps in the mountains towards Tortona, General Melas remained at Rivalta with the remains of the army, in order to cover the ſiege of Tortona, or to march to the ſupport of the Marſhal, if neceſſary. The attack was made by General Kray at five o'clock in the morning of the 15th; it continued with great violence for ſeveral hours, but the difficulty of the ground, and the numbers of the French obliged him to retire. The Ruſſians alſo engaged the front of the enemy, but they were repulſed with very great loſs. About two o'clock, General Kray made a ſecond attempt upon the enemy's left, while the Ruſſians at the ſame time again endeavoured to penetrate the centre of the enemy's line. Notwithſtanding the utmoſt bravery of the allied troops, the French maintained their poſition. Moſt fortunately at this moment, General Melas arrived with ſixteen battalions of Auſtrian infantry, attacked the enemy's right, which he beat back without difficulty. Having turned the flank of the enemy, he purſued his advantage, and got poſſeſſion of Novi. The Ruſſians immediately marched through Novi, ſupported the attack of General Melas with great vigour, and the whole French line was thrown into confuſion, and retreated in the greateſt diſorder. The whole line purſued. General Grouchi, commanding a diviſion, endeavoured to rally his men, but in vain; he was taken priſoner. Three other generals, Colli, Bardon, and Perignan, 4000 priſoners, thirty pieces of cannon, and fifty-ſeven tumbrils, are the reſult of this victory. I fear the loſs of the allies muſt have amounted to near 5000 men. I forgot to mention that General Joubert was killed, and that Moreau, who was preſent as a volunteer, volunteer, has again taken the command of the army. I have the honour to be, &c.

W. BENTINCK.

Official Account of the Battle of Novi.

Milan, Auguſt 17.

I haſten to inform you of one of the moſt ſplendid victories we have gained in the preſent campaign. The enemy's army, of 50,000 men, had advanced to relieve Tortona. Our army quitted its poſition in the mountains, and retreated into the plains, in hopes the enemy would follow us; but he would not advance, and we reſolved to attack him. For this purpoſe, General Kray attacked the left wing, and the Ruſſians the centre. The battle commenced on the 15th of Auguſt, and was extremely bloody. Thrice the Ruſſians ſtormed the enemy's centre, but they were repulſed each time, with loſs. I now took the command of our right wing, conſiſting of eight battalions of grenadiers, and ſix of Auſtrian infantry, and attacked the left wing of the enemy. In ſpite of the moſt obſtinate reſiſtance and a dreadful fire of artillery, we gained the heights; the enemy was overthrown in every quarter, driven to flight, and purſued till late at night. General Joubert remained dead on the field of battle, and Moreau was wounded. We have taken priſoners the three generals, Grouchy, Perignon, and Bellerand, from 4 to 5000 inferior officers and privates, and the whole of the enemy's artillery is in our poſſeſſion. Our own loſs in this brilliant victory is likewiſe not inconſiderable, but its conſequence, will, no doubt, be glorious, and we may hope to ſee the French entirely driven out of Italy.

(Signed) MELAS.

Auguſt 17, 1799.

The enemy were ſo advantageouſly ſituated, that no artillery could be employed againſt them; and the attack could only be made with the bayonet. For ſome time the advantage remained doubtful, and ſome of our columns were forced to give way; but ſome battalions of grenadiers haſtening to their ſupport, by attacking the French in both flanks, decided the victory.

During the battle, 1500 priſoners were made, and afterwards 2500 of the rear: we took thirty cannon. The enemy was put to flight, and ſtill purſued by our troops at the departure of the courier, when it was not known where General Melas, with his corps, had penetrated. The number of killed and wounded, on the part of the enemy, could not be ſtated preciſely; but it muſt be very conſiderable. Joubert had only taken the chief command a few days previous to this, and, while he reviewed his army, had made all neceſſary arrangements for an attack on the 16th. Field-Marſhal Suwarrow, being apprized of this, put his army in order of battle along the Orba, from Aleſſandria up to Seravalle, and ſhifted his head-quarters to Pozzolo-Formida; General Kray took his at Fregarolo. The enemy, advancing as far as Caſſino, had forced General Bellegarde to withdraw to Acqui. Theſe arrangements being made, the attack was made on the 15th, and crowned with the happieſt ſucceſs.

From another Account, Auguſt 20.

A deciſive battle has taken place. On the 13th inſt. Joubert, with the whole of his army, amounting to about 50,000 men, advanced. General Bellegarde withdrew with his corps to the plains, to entice the enemy from the mountains, and the whole army was drawn up along the Orba, in order of battle; but the enemy remaining in the ſame poſition, the Imperialiſts attacked them on the 15th, at day-break. General Kray led the right wing, Pangrazion the centre (conſiſting of Ruſſians), and Melas the left wing. Thrice the Ruſſians attacked the enemy with the greateſt firmneſs, but were each time repulſed with loſs; at laſt, General Melas, with eight battalions of grenadiers, and ſix of fuſileers, renewed the attack, broke through, and aſcended the heights. The enemy were repulſed, and attacked in flank. General Joubert was killed, and the Generals Colli, Grouchi, and Bellerand, were taken priſoners, with about 5000 inferior officers and privates; and the whole of the enemy's artillery fell into the hands of the Imperialiſts. The latter have likewiſe loſt a great number of men, the French being ſtationed ſo very advantageouſly; General Luſignan was taken priſoner. It is expected that Genoa and Tortona will fall, in conſequence of this victory.

The following Supplement Extraordinary to the Vienna Court Gazette was publiſhed agreeably to the report of the general of cavalry, Melas, dated Auguſt 11, and 12, the enemy attacked Captain Breten, of the 5th regiment of huſſars, near Cumolimo, with ſuperior force, and forced him to retreat to Rucca Grimaldi; he fixed himſelf at Ovado, yet, from precaution, Rocca Grimaldi was reinforced with a battalion of infantry.

Field-Marſhal-Lieutenant Kaim reports, that the enemy concentrated their troops towards Trenda, entered into ſmall camps in the valley of Stura, and had already ſent conſiderable reinforcements towards Mount Cenis; that ſeveral pieces of cannon had arrived at Mount Genevro, and that every thing had been prepared for the defence of Fort la Charboniere.

On the 12th of Auguſt the enemy advanced, with ſome thouſands of troops, towards Spigno, and from Suſello towards Ponzone, threw ſtrong reinforcements into the poſition of Ovado, and puſhed our advanced poſts from the ſide of Acqui to Rocca Grimaldi and Cremolino.

When Field-Marſhal-Lieutenant Count Bellegarde, who was poſted near Acqui, reported this movement of the enemy, he alſo added, that he intended advancing with nine half brigades, in the whole about 3000 men.

General Kray arriving on the 12th of Auguſt, with his corps, at the army, reported, his patroles having reconnoitred towards Argentera, that about 3000 French had appeared in the valley of Barcellonetta, and that a reinforcement from the Archduke, of 1200 men, was ſtill expected to join them.

Theſe ſerious movements on the part of the enemy indicated ſome important enterprize, and this day the Imperial Major, Count Hardegg arrived expreſs from head-quarters at Novi, with the very joyful news of a moſt complete victory over the enemy.

According to the account of the 16th of Auguſt, the army was poſted in the plains of Rivalto di Scrivia, and our intention being to decoy the enemy into that plain, it was no difficult taſk for him to drive our poſts from the mountains, and to occupy Novi on the 13th.

The French could not have any other intention but to deliver Tortona, for which purpoſe our particular intention was directed towards the vallies of Scrivia and Tortona. The firſt was obſerved by the army in Rivalto; and, to ſecure the latter, the Ruſſian General de Roſenberg was poſted in Vighkiznolo. General Kray was juſt on the point to march to Cuneo, by Aſti, but was obliged to halt from the previous attack, and to draw up his troops to Fregarollo, to effect a junction with thoſe of Count Bellegarde, in order to form the right wing of the army.

On the 14th the enemy did not move, when the commander in chief, Field-Marſhal Melas, gave orders to attack early on the 15th: and General Kray began this attack on the flank of Novi. The Ruſſian General Prince Pangrazion attacked in front; but, from the vaſt ſuperiority of the enemy, neither of them was able to penetrate; on which the Ruſſian General L. Dôrfel, and General Melas, were ordered to advance. The firſt took to the Chauſſee of Novi; the general of cavalry, Melas, with the diviſion of Frohlich, kept along the Scrivia; ſo that he had the valley and the whole field of battle under his eye. Generals Prince Pangrazion and Milloradovich then attacked Novi in front; but this attack met not with the ſucceſs that was expected, on account of the vigorous reſiſtance of the enemy; which was alſo the caſe with that of General Baron Kray, who attempted to aſcend the heights, where the right flank of the enemy was ſtationed. The attack made by Lieutenant-General Dorfelden on the heights on the left of Novi, ſhared the ſame fate. The commanding field-marſhal then, with his uſual intrepidity, ordered Lieutenant-General Dorfelden, as well as the Generals Prince Pangrazion and Milloradovich, to renew their attacks on the heights behind Novi. The laſt attack was made at three in the afternoon, but the enemy could not be forced from this poſition. Meanwhile the column of Imperial troops along the Scrivia advanced to the heights of Novi, near Pietale, and the general of cavalry, Melas, reſolved to turn the right flank of the enemy, relieve Seravalle, at the ſame time detached Major-General Count Nobili to Vignole, for the ſecurity of the valley of Scrivia, and placed troops in Arquata.

He met the enemy on the road leading from Seravalle to Novi. Field-Marſhal Lieutenant Frohlich, with a battalion of Furſtenberg and Major-General Luſignan's brigade, made a reſolute attack, in conſequence of which the right flank of the enemy was laid open. General Laudohn, with his brigade, did the ſame, which acted from the left of General Frohlich's diviſion as a ſecond column, upon the enemy's right flank. Field-Marſhal Lieutenant Lichtenſtein formed a third column, which completely turned the enemy. The general of cavalry, Melas, cauſed ſome points to be occupied by batteries, to ſupport the attack of theſe three columns, and to attract the enemy's attention to that quarter. In this attack the three columns loſt from 7 to 800 men, but were rewarded by the moſt complete victory. The enemy's whole poſition, which extended from Novi Baſaluzzo, was thus overthrown and evacuated.

As ſoon as General Melas thought his object ſecured, he attacked the heights near Novi with the battalion of grenadiers of Paar, and through the firmneſs of this battalion, he ſucceeded not only in carrying thoſe heights, but alſo in making the enemy give way, who quitted Novi, and began a complete retreat, towards Ovada; the column which had advanced under Field-Marſhal Lieutenant Prince Lichtenſtein, having cut off their retreat to Gavi. Major-General Karaczay purſued them forwards towards Poſturana. More circumſtantial details of this ſplendid victory are promiſed ſoon; at preſent we are only informed that four of the enemy's generals, among whom is Colli, have been made priſoners; and that two others were left dead on the ſpot, one of whom is ſaid to be Joubert. Priſoners being every moment brought in, their number could not be accurately ſtated. It was the ſame with the artillery taken: at the departure of the courier, twenty-two pieces of cannon and a conſiderable number of powder waggons were in our hands.

Our loſs cannot be ſtated with more certainty; but the general of cavalry, Melas, ſuppoſes, it might amount to about 4000 in killed, wounded, and miſſing, owing to the repeated attacks, and to the obſtinate reſiſtance of the enemy.

The general of cavalry, Melas, ſays, that he cannot ſufficiently praiſe the ſteadineſs and intrepidity of all the troops, as well as the ſteady and brave conduct of all the generals and ſtaff-officers; he will name thoſe who have particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves, in a future report; but remarks for the preſent, that Field-Marſhal Lieutenant Frohlich had particularly ſignalized himſelf in this action; and that he muſt alſo praiſe the brave behaviour of Field-Marſhal Lieutenant Prince Lichtenſtein, and that the whole of the officers employed under him had ſhewn themſelves very active; and that they had, by the aſſiſtance they gave in every quarter, materially contributed to this victory.

Farther Details relative to the Battle of Novi in Montferrat.

The following are the moſt intereſting particulars, which were not contained in the firſt account.

The enemy's army conſiſted of about 50,000 men. It was at firſt reſolved not to oppoſe their advancing into the plains; but to prevent diſagreeable conſequences, and placing the moſt unlimited confidence in the valour of his troops, Field-Marſhal Suwarrow was induced to attack the enemy in their poſition, which, however, as appeared already from the firſt accounts, coſt the lives of a great number of brave men, but was in the end attended by the happieſt ſucceſs.

ceſs. General Melas taking poſſeſſion of the heights of Novi decided the victory.

This happy event cauſed ſuch conſternation among the enemy, that, after ſhewing the moſt reſolute firmneſs during the whole day, they now fled precipitately towards the road of Ovada, and General Kray continued the attack with ſo much advantage, and manœuvred ſo ſkilfully againſt the enemy's rear, that he took 2000 priſoners, among whom was the general of diviſion, Colli, beſides ſeveral pieces of cannon and ammunition waggons.

The enemy's loſs conſiſts at leaſt in 3000 killed, 4000 priſoners, and upwards of 4000 wounded. Among the priſoners are the two generals of diviſion, Grouchy and Perignon, and the generals of brigade, Colli and Bardon. The general in chief, Joubert, was wounded at the commencement of the battle, and died of his wounds at Novi. The generals of the enemy who were made priſoners, unanimouſly ſtate, that their loſs conſiſts, upon the whole, in 18,000 men, and that their wounded were dreadfully mauled by our well-directed grape-ſhot fire.

Our loſs in killed conſiſts in eighteen officers and 889 privates; wounded, ten ſtaff and 152 commiſſioned officers, and 3636 privates; priſoners and miſſing, beſides General Luſignan, twenty-four officers and 1320 privates; of which latter, however, only 700, who were wounded, are actually priſoners; the remainder, who were ſeparated from the army during the battle, are now moſtly returning to their regiments.

At the departure of the courier, the accounts of the loſs of the Ruſſians were not complete. The Ruſſian General Tſchuparow is among the wounded.

Words cannot be found to expreſs ſufficiently the merits and intrepidity of the Auſtrian and Ruſſian troops: every individual that ſhared the events of this ever-memorable day, may claim immortal glory and general eſteem.

Some Imperial generals, ſtaff, and officers, are particularly noticed. The general of artillery, Baron Kray, who has ſo much diſtinguiſhed himſelf in this brilliant campaign, and the two field-marſhal-lieutenants, Bellegarde and Ott, have principally contributed to this victory by their ſkilful and intrepid manœuvres. Field-Marſhal Lieutenant Frohlich ſignalized himſelf by his uniform magnanimity. Major-General Zach has given moſt effectual aſſiſtance in arranging the attack. Field-Marſhal Lieutenant Prince Lichtenſtein, though the ground would not allow cavalry to be properly employed, did every thing in his power to haraſs the enemy on his retreat, &c.

In the night from the 15th to 16th, the enemy continued his retreat towards Genoa, and the diviſion of General St. Cyr took poſſeſſion of the Red Mountain and the heights which command the roads of Galvi, to cover their retreat.

On the arrival of Major-General Karaczay, who was ordered to purſue the enemy, we had taken thirty-ſix pieces of cannon, and 200 ammunition waggons.

Thus ended a battle, which was carried on from three o'clock in the morning till late at night, with the moſt unexampled bravery of the troops on both ſides, and the victory gained by the allies becomes more valuable, when it is conſidered that, according to advices received at the head-quarters of the army, from Field-Marſhal Lieutenant Count Haddick, who is ſtationed, with a body of troops in the neighbourhood of Aoſta, the enemy, in combination with their proceedings at Novi, on the 14th, after forcing our poſition near Roſwald, attacked our whole line in the Upper Valais, in three different points at the ſame time, with a ſuperior force, and repulſed our troops, notwithſtanding the moſt obſtinate reſiſtance, and forced Colonel Strauch to retreat towards Ponte Tereza, and Colonel Prince Victor Rohan to quit his poſition on Mount Simplon, and retreat towards Warze.

To make the neceſſary arrangements ſucceſsfully to meet every thing that might happen, Field-Marſhal Suwarrow thought proper to encamp his army on the 19th, near St. Feliciano, and to purſue his march to Aſti on the 20th, to order General Baron Kray, with a body of troops to Vigevane, and proceed as circumſtances might require, either towards Varga or Ponte Tereza.

According to farther accounts, dated Auguſt 20, General Kaim reports, that Captain Cawenffa, of the 5th regiment of huſſars, attacked the enemy near Maximo and Bagnaſeo, and drove them from that poſt with loſs.

Though the rocky ground in ſome degree retards the operations of the beſieging army before Tortona, they have however ſucceeded, in the night from the 15th to the 16th, to furniſh the batteries erected againſt the baſtions of Maſetti, with the neceſſary artillery, and on the following days, the third parallel was begun, though it is attended with great difficulties.

French Account.

Some intereſting particulars relative to the battle of Novi, publiſhed in the Moniteur.

This account ſays, although Joubert had expreſs orders from the Directory to attack the enemy, on ſeeing in the morning of the 28th their number and diſpoſition, he declined it, and took the reſolution of retiring within his former poſition; but the enemy having attacked him at ſeven in the morning with vigour, he was obliged to think of defending himſelf. The diſpoſitions made for attack ſerved for defence, and the enemy were received every where with intrepidity. They made aſtoniſhing but uſeleſs attempts to break through our troops, until five in the evening, when they made an effort to turn our right wing, whoſe too great ardour had carried it into the plain. At that moment Moreau ordered a retreat, and ſent at the ſame time a body of troops to oppoſe the progreſs of the enemy. This body attacked the Auſtro-Ruſſians, defeated them, took two pieces of cannon, and made the Auſtrian General Luſignan, and a great number of men priſoners. There was then every proſpect of our making a ſucceſsful retreat, when an order ſent to the general of artillery, and executed two hours too late, cauſed the loſs of a part of the army. A diviſion received orders to direct its march to the village of Paſtourana, and paſs through it; but on its arrival, was obſtructed and ſtopt in its march by a convoy of artillery, that ſhould have paſſed two hours before. This occaſioned conſiderable diſorder, of which the enemy availed himſelf. Generals Perignon, Grouchi, and Parthoneau, performed prodigies of valour in this critical ſituation, to rally the column; they were all three ſeverely wounded, and taken by the enemy. Perignon received five wounds from a ſabre on the head, and two on the arms. Grouchi received a cut of a ſabre on his arm of which he will loſe the uſe. This General behaved with unexampled bravery: he fought like a lion. Three times in ſucceſſion he charged at the head of his cavalry, which was beginning to be diſheartened. He ſnatched a ſtandard, and led his men once more to the fight: in the confuſion the ſtandard was torn from his hand; he ſubſtituted his cap in its place, raiſed it on the point of his ſabre, and precipitated himſelf anew upon the enemy. It was at this fatal moment he received a ſtroke of a ſabre, with which he fell from his horſe, and was made priſoner. So much exertion and courage at length arreſted the progreſs of the enemy. The corps rallied by degrees, effected their retreat, and night put an end to the conteſt.

Though this diſaſter was owing to the tardineſs of the artillery corps, we ſhould not forget that we owe to it and its brave commander, General Debelle, and the whole artillery, the beſt merited praiſe. It manœuvred during the battle, with an addreſs ſuperior to any it had ever before exhibited; in a word, it achieved wonders. Every ball carried into the columns of the enemy, and every diſcharge of caſe-ſhot made whole ranks diſappear. Thus the loſs of the enemy, even according to their own admiſſion, is enormous. They left 10,000 men on the field of battle, of whom 8000 are Ruſſians. General Bellegarde is wounded. As a proof how much the victory has coſt the enemy, they have made no attempt to purſue, but have left us to reſume our poſitions. Our loſs, which has been completely aſcertained this day, does not exceed 7000 men, including 2000 wounded. Our army has gained a victory of opinion over the Ruſſians. They have had a near view of them, and learned to appreciate them. They are good ſoldiers, but badly diſciplined. Our ſoldiers, who had a different idea of them, ſeemed to fear them; but now they only make ſport of them. Their number in this army could not exceed 12,000 men. If this is to continue, Paul muſt loſe no time to ſend reinforcements.

NOYON, BATTLE AT. A town of France, ſituated on the river Oyſe, in the iſle of France, fifty miles north-weſt from Paris. As the Normans conquered England by their victory at the abbey of St. Martin, ſo did the Engliſh forty years after conquer Normandy by their victory at Trenchebray; but this victory was not ſo complete and deciſive as the other, for what Henry I. King of England got by the ſword, he was neceſſitated to keep by the ſame means, becauſe Louis le Gros, the French King, had taken William ſon of Robert Duke of Normandy, who was a priſoner in England, into his protection, and furniſhed him with men and money in order to recover his father's dominions.

This young prince though under age, found Henry employment enough in Normandy, where the latter was obliged to be conſtantly in arms, in defence of this troubleſome acquiſition. This conduct of Louis brought on an open rupture between the two kings. The French formed a deſign of ſurpriſing Noyon, which Henry being informed of he reſolved to fruſtrate it, and marched his forces with ſuch expedition, that the enemy had ſcarce time to draw up their firſt line when the battle began. Nevertheleſs, they behaved with great gallantry, under the command of William, Duke Robert's ſon,, who charged the Engliſh with ſuch impetuoſity that they fell back upon the main body, commanded by the King in perſon, whoſe utmoſt efforts could not ſuſtain the attack.

While he exerted all his endeavours to rally his troops, he was ſingled out by a brave Norman knight, who diſcharged at his head, two ſuch furious ſtrokes of a ſabre, as penetrated his helmet and wounded him ſeverely. At the ſight of his own blood, which ruſhed down his viſage, he was enraged to a double exertion of his ſtrength, and returned the blows with ſuch intereſt, that his antagoniſt was unhorſed and taken priſoner.

Had the valour of young William been properly ſeconded, the French would certainly have obtained a complete victory; but inſtead of forming from their line a march in a regular manner, they no ſooner ſaw the ſucceſs of the Norman Prince, than they ruſhed forward in confuſion, and the rear of the Engliſh advancing to the attack in a compact body, found them in ſuch diſorder, that the ſcale was quite turned, and the French fled with the utmoſt precipitation. Louis himſelf being unhorſed in the tumult, was obliged to make his eſcape on foot to Audley, where he was joined by his fugitive troops, and receiving a reinforcement ſent a herald with a defiance to Henry, who declined the invitation. He diſmiſſed all the priſoners but about 240 knights, and the young Prince's horſe being taken in the field, after he had diſmounted to rally the troops, was ſent back with a complement, and ſome valuable preſents from his couſin William, who admired his courage.

While the King of England employed his victorious troops in reducing the Normans to obedience, Louis took Chartres from the Count de Blois, reduced Ivry, and the war continued with various ſucceſs. At length Pope Calixtus II. having held a council at Rheims, came afterwards to viſit Henry at Giſors, where he offered his mediation, which was accepted. The places taken on both ſides were reſtored and the priſoners ſet at liberty.

NUREMBERG, an Imperial city of Germany. Its fortifications are a double wall, flanked with towers mounting cannon. The French took poſſeſſion of this city in 1794, when they compelled the inhabitants to a requiſition of two millions and a half conſiſting of 10,000 pairs of boots, 50,000 pairs of ſhoes, 50,000 pairs of gaiters, 50,000 ſhirts, and 300 horſes.

They again took poſſeſſion of this city in 1796, and on Auguſt 20 took fifteen hoſtages from the city, and demanded from it a contribution of three millions of livres the payment of which was fixed at the expiration of of forty-eight hours: this time having expired without the payment being made, hoſtages were taken on the 16th, and carried off on the 17th. Among the requiſitions the French demanded from the city, are between 6000 and 7000 gallons of brandy, 25,000 pounds of meat, ſhoes, cloth, medicines, &c.

In 1800 the French again took poſſeſſion of this city, as appears by the following letters from the French general.

Cloſter-Eberach, 14 Frimaire, Dec. 5.

The ceſſation of the armiſtice having been notified to the enemy's generals, hoſtilities recommenced on the 24th of November.

Baron Albini, commanding the Mentzer troops, afraid of being forced at Aſchaffenburg, and wiſhing to cover his retreat, cauſed an attack to be made at four o'clock preciſely, with conſiderable force on the poſt of Batavian infantry, which guarded the bridge of Aſchaffenburg. This poſt was ſtrong in itſelf, and was well defended by the Dutch Colonel Colard, who charged the troops of Albini three times ſucceſſively with his huſſars, and drove them back into the town. This brave officer received two ſhots, one of which ſeverely wounded him. The officer who commanded at the bridge of Aſchaffenburg, deſerves great praiſe for his intrepidity. The Batavian chaſſeurs under his command diſplayed the greateſt bravery.

The General in Chief cauſed General D'Albini to be purſued by a party of cavalry, and gave orders to Captain Lavinu who commanded it to ſcour the country, and every where to throw it into alarm.

On the next day, the 25th, a poſition was taken in advance of Aſchaffenburg, and the town was taken poſſeſſion of. The army which had quitted the cantonments which it occupied upon the Nidda, the Lower Mein, and the Tobre, was put on its march to go towards Wurtzburg and Schweinfurth.

On the 25th the diviſions of Barbou and Duheſme paſſed the Mein at Triffeſtein, and directed its march upon Schweinfurth, where information had been received that the enemy had a corps of from 3 to 4000 men.

Lieutenant-General Dumonceau, with the Batavian diviſion, left Wertheim, and marched upon Wurtzburg, in order to inveſt it, which he did on the 29th, with the loſs of ſome riflemen on both ſides.

General D'Allaglie, being ſummoned to ſurrender the town and the caſtle, propoſed to ſurrender the town. It was given up on the 30th by capitulation.

The General in Chief left General Dumonceau Before the the Caſtle of Wurtzburg, to make an attack upon it. The poſſeſſion of the town of Wurtzburg, and the advantages of the ground on the left bank of the Mein, allowed the caſtle to be inveſted with little loſs. The artillery are already placed for its attack. The formation and celerity of the march of the ſiege equipage is the fruit of the attention of the Chief of Brigade of Artillery, Humbert, an officer of diſtinguiſhed merit.

The movements againſt Schweinfurth not being completed, the General in Chief ordered, in the night of the 29th, the Adjutant-Commandant Deverrine, to paſs with the 98th and 16th regiment of dragoons, the two arms of the Mein, above the angle of Wurtzburg, at the ferries of Cloſter-Zeel and Faher, and to advance to Geroltzoffen, with a view of endeavouring to cut off the retreat of the corps of troops from Schweinfurth; but the enemy, informed of our movements, evacuated that place.

The diviſion of Barbou and Duheſme took poſſeſſion of it on the 30th.

While the General in Chief, Angereau, was forming the inveſtment of Wurtzburg, General Moreau informed him by an extraordinary courier that he had certain information that the corps of Klenau was collecting at Neumark, and that he would be reinforced by a party of troops from Merfeld. He alſo learned that the enemy, after having drawn out all their troops from the cantonments on this ſide of Rednitz, had collected from 12 to 13,000 men in front of Bamberg, in the poſition to Burg-Eberach. The General in Chief aſſembled the two diviſions at Geroltzoffen, and reſolved to march againſt the enemy, to defeat them, and repulſe them beyond Rednitz.

On the 2d of December the two diviſions put themſelves in motion; the advanced guard, under the command of the Adjutant Commandant Deverrine, encountered at Cloſter-Eberach, a conſiderable party of huſſars of Blankenſtein, which was repulſed with loſs.

On the 3d, the diviſions found themſelves in preſence of the enemy, who covering the road from Bamberg, occupied the village of Burg-Eberach, and the two firſt heights which commanded it, and who had ſix pieces of cannon in front of the ſecond poſition. The principal height did not ſeem to be occupied.

Lieutenant-General Duheſme, who had made the firſt diſpoſitions with great ſkill, ſucceeded in driving the enemy from the village, and from their firſt poſition.

The enemy kept firm in the ſecond, and kept up a warm cannonade.

The General in Chief, Angereau, ordered the 21ſt of the line and a party of Batavian cavalry to turn, under cover of a wood, the left of the enemy, and to gain the principal height. He ordered General Treilhard with his reſerve of cavalry to advance upon the road of Bamberg, and the Adjutant-Commandant, Deverrine, to attack the enemy in front. Notwithſtanding theſe movements, the enemy reſiſted with obſtinacy; when the young and brave Deverrine, urged on by that brilliant valour which decides ſucceſs, charged at the head of the carabineers of the 29th, and forced the poſition, but the enemy, ſupported by a numerous cavalry, retired in good order. The 29th, which diſtinguiſhed itſelf in this action continued to haraſs them, and killed and wounded a prodigious number.

The Adjutant-Commandant, Deverrine, received ſeveral wounds, one of which was mortal: a captain of grenadiers, at the age of ſeventeen, and formed in the fields of battle in Italy, during the years 1796 and 97, he met death like a brave man. He ſaid to the carabineers who were preſſing around him, and who were ſhowing thoſe marks of intereſt reſpecting him which are the reward of a good character, " my friends it is glorious to die in the field of honour."

The enemy were purſued to the end of the day, and loſt more than a league of territory. They took advantage of the night, and of a country interſected and difficult to retreat by their left upon Pernirsfield, to which place General Barbou received orders to follow them. This General ſucceeded in coming up with their rear guard on the 4th, attacked, and forced it to fall back. The enemy have finally made their retreat upon Forcheim, paſſing the ſmall river of Aiſch, at the village of Aiſch, the bridge of which they have broken down.

The Army has taken poſt behind Rednitz, in order to cover the attack of Wurtzburg. General Duheſme occupies Bamberg; and General Barbou has orders to puſh detachments as far as Nuremberg.

The communications with Wurtzburg and our rear are completely eſtabliſhed, by different bridges upon the Mein.

The country affords all the reſources neceſſary for the ſubſiſtence of the army.

Our loſs in the different combats which have taken place is not conſiderable, That of the enemy is much greater. We have made ſome priſoners, and deſerters are conſtantly coming into us.

December 20.

After the battle of the 12th, at Burg-Eberach the Gallo-Batavian army, took a poſition behind the Radnitz in the neighbourhood of Forcheim. The right was ſtationed near Newſtal, that it might protect the bridge of Kinſingen, which the commander in chief had likewiſe given orders for being covered by a detachment poſted at Ochſenfutt.

As ſoon as the General in Chief became acquainted with the ſucceſſes of the army of the Rhine he made his right wing move forwards to the Rednitz, occupied Nuremburg and Forcheim as advanced poſts, and waited in this poſition till General Moreau ſhould inform of that occupied by the left of his army.

On the evening of the 23d, the General in Chief received an extraordinary courier, who informed him of the paſſage of the Inn, by General Moreau; and the General of Brigade, Levaſſeur, commanding the flanking corps of the left wing of the army of the Rhine, gave him advice that he occupied all the fortifications on the Danube, from Donawert to Ingolſtadt; puſhing parties on the two banks of the river, towards Ratiſbon and Wurtzburg, deſired him to ſend them againſt Neumark, ordered General Barbou to enter into communication with him, and to ſtretch out his right towards Furth; the efforts of General Barbou have not yet enabled him to perceive the movements of General Levaſſeur.

In this poſition the Gallo-Batavian army remained in part before the caſtle of Wurtzburg, had upon its left D'Albiny, with 2000 men, in front the corps of Simbſchen, about 12,000 men, and in the ſame direction the corps of Klenau, compoſed of 15,000 men, poſted near Neumark, and occupying Ratiſbon.

On the 25th the General in Chief gave orders to advance in front of the Rednitz, and to puſh ſtrong reconnoitring parties, for the purpoſe of aſcertaining the poſition of the enemy. From the 12th to the 26th there did not occur any remarkable event; there had been nothing but ſome affairs of poſts, in which the advantage was pretty equally balanced; but yeſterday there was a bloody battle, between Nuremberg and Lanff. The action laſted from nine in the morning till night.

General Klenau attacked the right, commanded by General Barbou, and General Simbſchen, the left, under the orders of General Duheſme. They came to cloſe quarters, and the ſlaughter was incredible; but in ſpite of their ſuperior numbers the enemy was beat and completely repulſed on all ſides. We made three hundred priſoners, and killed many officers of rank.

According to the account of the captive officers, the Auſtrians carried off more than an hundred waggons loaded with dead and wounded, and a few of our men were killed.

I wait for more circumſtantial accounts, to let you know, in all its details, an affair, the particulars of which it is not eaſy to learn in a country interſected with ravines, and covered with wood. Generals, officers, and ſoldiers, all diſplayed the greateſt valour. General Barbou, who had to ſuſtain the greateſt efforts, ſhewed, as well as General Paithod and Fuzier, as great ſcience as courage. General Duheſme ſeconded him very powerfully in oppoſing the attempts of Simbſchen, who ſought to force the left. Among the wounded we reckoned Citizens Chauvel and Michel, chiefs of battalion of the 49th demi-brigade, and the brave Frederic of the 21ſt, whoſe wound was mortal. The chief of brigade, Simon, of the 11th light infantry, had his horſe killed under him. The chief of brigade, Watier, commanding the 4th regiment of dragoons, ſtationed in the advanced guard of General Barbou, conſtantly diſtinguiſhed himſelf. This young officer, eager to acquire a name, behaves in a manner to raiſe the higheſt hopes.

Nuremberg, 4 Nivoſe (Dec. 26)

It is my duty to preſent you with the details of the battle of Nuremberg, fought on the 17th, the events which followed, and of the actual poſition of the army.

In eſtabliſhing itſelf at Rednitz, the Gallo-Batavian army left 5000 men before Wurtzburg on occupying the points of Aſchaffenburg, de Loht, Gemunden, Schweinfurth, and Kinſingen. Rednitz was no obſtacle till during the time of the floods, but the heights on the left bank are very defenſible poſitions. The General in Chief covered this line, which extended twelve leagues from Nuremberg to Bamberg. It was a poſition that merited attention.

The Commander in Chief having determined, in caſe of any reverſe upon his future plan of primary operation both on the right and left, and his line of ſecondary operation, gave to his Aid de Camp Richer, an officer of great diſtinction, the command of a corps of obſervation, which he marched to Meitſbach near the line of neutrality; he threw 400 men and three pieces pieces of ordnance into Bamberg, concentrated the reſt of his forces between Forcheim and Nuremberg, occupied Forcheim and Nuremburg, a bridge-head, eſtabliſhed his head-quarters at Herſogen Aurach, propoſed to haraſs the enemy on the left, and finally to be in readineſs to act along the principal line of operation, directing the garriſon of Bamberg to fall back upon Ellman Schweinfurth, &c. if they were forced, and in this caſe he abandoned to the enemy the great road from Bamberg to Mein, by Cloſter Eberach; having nevertheleſs taken the precaution to ſecure means of recruiting at Ritzujen all the boats of Mein, which were between that city and Schweinfurth. The 14th the Commander in Chief underſtood that the corps of Klenau was in motion, having left Ratiſbon on the 12th for the purpoſe of joining that of Simbſchen, and that Klenau had with him the two moſt famous partizans of the Auſtrian army, Counts Walmoden and Demiere. The General did not doubt but that he would ſoon have to make conſiderable efforts. The Commander in Chief went immediately to Wurtzburg, and not attaching more conſequence to this poſt than the enemy had done, converted the attack into a blockade, and directed that all the force not neceſſary in this new plan, ſhould, with all diligence, fall into the line of battle; beſides theſe orders, directions that all which might impede his movements ſhould be carried into the rear.

The General in Chief before his departure, directed Generals Duheſme and Barbou to paſs Rednitz, and puſh as far they could to aſcertain the poſition of the enemy; the General returned on the 27th, and concerted his plans with Duheſme and Barbou, when a ſharp cannonade was heard towards Altorf and Newkirchen.

The advanced guard of Barbou's diviſion, in two bodies, was directed towards Altorf and Neumark, when they met the out-poſts of the enemy, and began action. The corps directed towards Altorf purſued the enemy with great carnage, which gave time to a body of 2000 infantry and 300 hulans, to fall upon the other body marching towards Neumark. This latter body could not make head againſt any ſuperior force, but was promptly ſuccoured by Fuzier, general of brigade, who marched at the head of the 3d battalion of the 11th light infantry, and for a moment re-eſtabliſhed the advantage. Watier, chief of brigade, who was near Altorf, maintained his poſition on the heights of Fetzbach with great perſeverance. The enemy every moment received freſh ſuccours from the neighbourhood of Neumark, which kept the event ſtill in ſuſpence, when General Paithod received orders from General Barbou to advance with the reſt of the line of battle, compoſed of the intrepid 49th, the 4th dragoons, and four pieces of light artillery; to ſend one column to the relief of General Fuzier, and with the other to take the direction to Fiſhbach, and unite with General of Brigade Watier. Theſe two movements executed with as much celerity as boldneſs, put the enemy to complete rout, who left the ground covered with dead and wounded. In endeavouring to retreat upon Fiſhbach, he encountered the fire of a battalion of the advanced guard, which completed the rout. The enemy loſt this day 1200 killed or wounded, and 300 priſoners. Our loſs was only thirty killed, and 180 wounded.

The diviſion of Lieutenant General Duheſme, which was oppoſed to the forces united under General Simbſchen, was alſo attacked. This general ſeemed inclined to force the left of this diviſion. The engagement took place between the advanced guards at Graffenburg. The enemy, notwithſtanding his great ſuperiority obtained no advantage, and General Duheſme maintained his poſitions. On the 18th the General in Chief reconnoitred the force of the enemy and made his diſpoſitions to paſs his army to the left bank of the Rednitz, and occupy his ancient poſitions. Since the affair of the 17th, the line has been daily attacked in various points, but the enemy have always found an invincible reſiſtance.

In executing this retrograde movement behind the Rednitz, Lieutenant-General Duheſme was warmly attacked by M. Simbſchen, aſſiſted by ſome ſquadrons and battalions under General Klenau; this diviſion, however, fought valiantly the whole day, and in the evening returned to its ancient poſitions upon the Rednitz.

The Pruſſians formally oppoſed our occupation of the point of Furth, which connected our right with Nuremberg. The General in Chief not wiſhing to diſturb the harmony ſubſiſting between the two nations, gave orders to General Barbou to evacuate Nuremburg, and transfer his advanced guard to Wach, which was effected about night-fall on the 21ſt of December.

The enemy did not preſent himſelf before Bamberg. He conſtantly attacked on our right, which he endeavoured to turn, but in a very timid manner. From Rednitz to Schewbach, he had detachments as far as Stein. The General in Chief did not feel much inquietude from theſe demonſtrations: and although Herzogen Aurach was rather a ſtation of partizans, their head quarters he did not change, becauſe in caſe of a reverſe, and after the line of operations he had choſen, this point became the centre of his movements. He was ready, moreover to watch thoſe of the army of the Rhine.

The General in Chief has had his attention unceaſingly turned towards the Danube; he did not doubt but that General Levaſſeur knowing that Klenau had deſerted Ratiſbon for the purpoſe of marching againſt the Gallo-Batavian army, would take advantage of this circumſtance to drive from thence the few troops that remained, and take poſſeſſion of this important point. Our ſpies and our detachments had been carried off between Rednitz and the Danube. The General impatiently expected the return of a confidential officer whom he had diſpatched to General Levaſſeur. This officer returned this morning, he gave an account of General Levaſſeur having marched to Ratiſbon on the 22d, but that he meant to attack it on the 23d; thus there was little doubt but that Ratiſbon was poſſeſſed by the army of the Rhine; but what gave the more certainty was, that at three o'clock this morning Simbſchen and Klenau prepared to retreat with 12,000 infantry, the greateſt part of the cavalry having filed on the the right of Neumark. Klenau having loſt the point of Ratiſbon, the line of Nab is no longer tenable for him. He has no other reſource but to evacuate the High Palatinate. The General in Chief immediately ſent the ſame officer to Lieutenant-General Saint Suzanne, to engage him to make a combined operation near Amberg and La Nab; in ſhort, to drive the enemy into the defiles of Bohemia. In the mean time the army is in purſuit of Klenau and Simbſchen. We have re-entered Nuremberg.

The army is ready to ſupport new fatigues, to march to new battles, and to ſearch for enemies, worthy of its courage.

The General in Chief, and the General of Diviſion, are perfectly ſatisfied with all the officers of the ſtaff. Theſe officers, to great activity, join that intelligence which makes them uſeful upon every occaſion. Among them, Albert, chief of the ſquadron, was particularly diſtinguiſhed. The Citizen Fouque adds, that at the attack of Bamberg, he charged the enemy on the bridge of Rednitz with the bayonet's point. The Adjutant Commandant Maſſabeau, who rendered great ſervice at the battle of Nuremberg, as alſo the Captain Paſſaleer, aid de camp to General Barbou. The Adjutant Commandant Sicarde ſucceeded to the brave Deverrine, and proved himſelf worthy to replace him.

The 95th demi-brigade in ſome degree made its firſt eſſay in arms. It merits, nevertheleſs, to be placed on the ſide of veterans. In the affair of the 20th, at Neukirchen, this demi-brigade, commanded by Citizen Le Clerk, attended with their arms, preſented the charge of cavalry. It did not fire but at cloſe quarters. It had 18 officers out of the combat.

The 25th light brigade gave proof of its courage at Burg Eberach. The 21ſt of the line was worthy to be commanded by the brave Frederick. The 49th is a formidable corps, and their attack is terrible. The enemy has conſtantly diſtinguiſhed the 11th. The generous Auſtrians ſpeak of this brigade, in their reports by the German phraſe of dic jungen leuti, the lads of the 11th.

The cavalry was eminently uſeful, and ſuffered conſiderable loſs.

Our infantry, the firſt infantry in the world, has upon every occaſion diſconcerted the cavalry of the enemy, the pride and the hope of the Auſtrians, and has ſhewn itſelf upon every occaſion ſuperior to their infantry. The Hulans and the corps of Blankenſtein were thoſe who ſuffered moſt from our fire.

The regiment of Blankenſtein have to reproach themſelves with two aſſaſſinations. Our troops had conceived ſuch animoſity, that they had nearly carried it into the battle. A party of the Blankenſteins had cut off the heads of ten of our ſick found in the village of Bamberg, and one of their patroles aſſaſſinated the commandant of an eſcort which conducted the exchanged priſoners. This was an old tranſaction; but as it appeared it was an authorized tranſaction, it became neceſſary to collect authentic proofs upon it. Our movements and continued actions prevented our purſuing this enquiry. I cannot do better, Citizen Miniſter, than with the document to ſend you alſo the report of Watier, chief de brigade to General Barbou. It is difficult to tell with more energy, an action ſo odious, and ſo much violating the law of nations.

ANDREOSSI.

P. S. General Dumonceau, commandant of the troops blockading Wurtzburg, announces, that on the 26th the enemy made a vigorous ſortie againſt him, and that the fire of muſquetry continued two hours and a half, with great ſlaughter on both ſides; but the enemy were obliged to retreat in diſorder with conſiderable loſs. The diviſion of Dumonceau had in this affair, five men killed, one of whom was a captain, and near ſixty wounded.

OCEAN, ENGAGEMENT ON. Suppoſed to be in the mouth of the Channel. The motives for committing this hoſtility have been related, (See LONDON), therefore it is needleſs to repeat them. Louis, the Dauphin of France, finding himſelf hard preſſed in England, in the year 1217, ſent over for a reinforcement, which his Princeſs, Blanche, prepared with all poſſible diſpatch at Calais; but the governors of the Cinque-Ports in England, hearing of the deſign, equipt a fleet to attack the enemy, and put to ſea. The two fleets met on the 24th day of Auguſt, 1217. The Engliſh were not intimidated, though the French had eighty ſhips and they but forty, for perceiving the enemy to have this advantage, they made uſe of their ſuperior ſkill; ſo that taking advantage of the wind, they ran down many of the tranſports, and ſunk them with all on board. Their long bows did them notable ſervice; and to prevent the French from boarding of them, they laid heaps of lime upon their decks, which the wind blowing freſh, drove in the faces of the enemies, and in a manner blinded them; ſo that declining the diſpute, they as faſt as poſſible bore away for the ſhore, and landing at Sandwich, Louis, in revenge for the miſchief they had done him, burnt it. The Engliſh were every way gainers by this engagement; as on the other hand, it entirely ruined the affairs of Louis, who was now forced to ſhut himſelf up in London, where very ſoon after he was beſieged; the Engliſh fleet in the mean time blocking up the mouth of the Thames. He quickly ſaw how great his danger was, and in this ſituation he did all that was left for him to do, that is to ſay, he entered into a treaty with the Earl of Pembroke, whereby he renounced all his pretended right to the kingdom of England, and provided the beſt he could for himſelf and his adherents, which freed the kingdom from the plague of foreigners, and remains an inconteſtable proof, that nothing but our inteſtine diviſions can invite an invaſion; for while we retain the ſovereignty of the ſeas, ſuch attempts in the end muſt prove fatal to thoſe who undertake them.

OCZAKOW, SIEGE OF, October 1788. The ſally made by the garriſon of Oczakow, at the end of the month of Auguſt, was, in fact, the moſt bloody the beſiegers had experienced, who loſt many thouſand men. General Suwarrow occaſioned the above ſally by the repeated defiance he made to the enemy, who at laſt fell fell on his troops ſo furiouſly, that had not Prince Repnin flown to his ſuccour in time, the left wing muſt infallibly have periſhed. General Suwarrow was wounded, and another general, and thirty officers, of different ranks, fell in the field of battle, beſides forty other officers who were wounded. This event obliged Prince Potemkin to make ſome changes in the poſition of his camp, and the diſtribution of his troops. To this misfortune muſt be added that cauſed by the exploſion of a powder magazine in the fortreſs of Kinburn, which blew up the great church, then full of people, by which accident near 800 perſons were buried in its ruins.

Copy of a Letter from Prince Potemkin, dated December 19, 1788.

I haſten to give you the good and happy news of the taking of Oczakow. After having vainly uſed every poſſible means to get the beſieged town to ſurrender, after having deſtroyed ſeveral parts of the fortification, after that our artillery had reduced to aſhes a very conſiderable ſtore-houſe of the town, and blown up a powder magazine. Knowing, moreover, that the enemy was at the laſt extremity, and that ſtubborneſs only could be the cauſe of their reſiſtance, at laſt every circumſtance led me to reſolve on ſtorming it on the 17th ult.

This enterpriſe has had all poſſible ſucceſs, and by the aſſiſtance of the Almighty, her Imperial Majeſty's troops under my command took poſſeſſion of the intrenchment fortified in the beſt manner poſſible by the Fort of Haſſein Pacha, and by the whole forces of the place.

The action was extremely bloody. Our troops behaved with an incredible intrepidity. I cannot ſufficiently praiſe the courage of the generals who acted under me; nor can I extol, as much as it deſerves, that order and preciſion which was obſerved by every one in the executing ſuch ſhare of the enterpriſe as was committed to his care.

The Ruſſian troops entered ſword in hand. The Turks defended themſelves moſt gallantly, but nothing could reſiſt the bravery of the Muſcovites, and they took the place by ſtorm, and with great bloodſhed, for only 2000 of the garriſon remained alive. The Ruſſians loſt 7000 men, and among the killed are Prince Dolgorucki, General Soritſch, Prince Wolkouſky, General Woynikow, and many others of rank. The particulars of this important affair are eagerly expected.

OKELEY, BATTLE AT. The Danes having frequently ravaged parts of this kingdom, and in 852, having paſſed the Thames after pillaging London, they were met in Surry, where they were totally overthrown, and a very great ſlaughter made of them.

OLMUTZ, SIEGE OF. The capital of Moravia, ſituated on the river Moravia, about ſeventy-five miles north from Vienna. At the beginning of the year 1758, the King of Pruſſia reſolved to make Moravia the theatre of war. Moravia was freſh ground, a country as yet untouched by the ravages of war. If he had ſucceeded in his operations in this country, his ſucceſſes, by opening to him the neareſt road to Vienna, muſt prove more deciſive than they could any where elſe. If he ſhould fail, the Auſtrians were at a diſtance from the centre of his affairs, and would find it difficult to improve their advantages to his ruin. After the reduction of Schweidnitz, the king ordered two bodies of his troops to poſt themſelves in ſuch a manner, as to make it appear that he intended to carry the war into Bohemia. Whilſt he drew away the enemy's attention from the real objects by theſe diſpoſitions, the main of his army by a very rapid march entered into Moravia in two columns, and made themſelves maſters in a ſhort time, and with little or no oppoſition, of all the poſts neceſſary to cover the troops to be employed in the ſiege of Olmutz. On the 27th of May the trenches were opened before that city.

Mareſchal Daun was no ſooner appriſed of the King's march towards Moravia, than he took his route through Bohemia to that province. Notwithſtanding that the Empreſs Queen omitted no poſſible endeavours to aſſemble a juſt army againſt the King of Pruſſia, though ſhe had for that purpoſe exhauſted the Milaneſe and Tuſcany, and ſwept up the laſt recruits in her Danubian territories, M. Daun was not yet in a condition to give the King of Pruſſia battle; neither did his character lead him to truſt that to fortune, which he might enſure, though more ſlowly, by conduct. This wiſe General took his poſts from Gewics to Mittau, in a mountainous country, in a ſituation where it was impoſſible to attack him. He had the fertile country of Bohemia, from whence he readily and certainly drew ſupplies, in his rear. He was from his poſition, at the ſame time enabled to haraſs the Pruſſian army before Olmutz, and to intercept the convoys which were brought to them from Sileſia.

Olmutz, by the extent of its works, and other advantageous circumſtances, is a city which it is very difficult completely to inveſt. So that ſome of the King's poſts being neceſſarily weakened by occupying ſo great an extent of country, were attacked by M. Daun's detachment from time to time, with ſuch ſucceſs, that abundant ſuccours both of men and ammunition were thrown into the place. Theſe attacks were always made by night, and very few nights paſſed without ſome attack. The ſucceſs was various. But the operations of the ſiege were greatly diſturbed by theſe continual alarms. Beſides, it is ſaid that the Auſtrians, before the King's invaſion of this province, had deſtroyed all the forage in the neighbourhood of Olmutz. The horſe were obliged to forage at a great diſtance, which haraſſed them extremely. M. Daun took advantage of all theſe circumſtances. It was in vain that the King of Pruſſia endeavoured by all the arts of a great commander to provoke or entice him to an engagement. He profited of the advantages he had made, without being tempted by them to throw out of his hands the ſecure game he was playing.

The great object of M. Daun was the Pruſſian convoys. On receiving advice that a large and important one was to leave Troppau on the 25th of June, he took meaſures to intercept it. He ordered General Jahnus, Jahnus, who was at Muglitz on the left, to advance towards Bahrn, and a detachment which was at Prerau, at a conſiderable diſtance to the right, to march to Stadt-Leibe, ſo that thoſe two corps ſhould on different ſides attack the convoy at one and the ſame time. To further the execution of this project, M. Daun himſelf approached the Pruſſian army, and directed all his motions as if he intended to give them battle. However, the King was too great a maſter in the game of generalſhip which was now playing, to be deceived by this feint. He detached a conſiderable party under General Ziethen to ſupport his convoy, which was already about 7000 ſtrong. Before this detachment could come up, the convoy was attacked, but the Auſtrians were repulſed. But M. Daun, who provided for every thing, quickly reinforced his parties, who renewed the engagement the next day. They firſt ſuffered the head of the convoy to go unmoleſted; but as the centre was ſtill embarraſſed in a dangerous defile, they eaſily cut off the head from the reſt, and then they attacked the centre with the greateſt fury. The Pruſſians made as good a reſiſtance as the nature of the ground would ſuffer. General Ziethen did every thing which could be expected from an accompliſhed officer; but in the end they were entirely routed; all the waggons in that diviſion were taken; the rear was puſhed back towards Troppau; the head alone, with great difficulty, arrived at the Pruſſian camp.

This was a fatal ſtroke, becauſe it came at a time when it was impoſſible to repair it. The ſiege of Olmutz had been all along attended with great difficulties; and now the news which every day arrived of the nearer and nearer approach of the Ruſſians, called the King loudly to the defence of his own dominions. Already the Coſſacks and Calmucks made incurſions into Sileſia, and by their ravages and cruelties, announced the approach of the great army. The ſiege muſt be raiſed; Moravia muſt be abandoned; M. Daun muſt have the honour of freeing his country, and driving away ſuch an adverſary as the King of Pruſſia, from a conqueſt deemed certain: all was performed without a battle, by a ſeries of the moſt refined and vigorous manœuvres that ever were put in practice.

When the King of Pruſſia ſaw that the unproſperous ſituation of his affairs obliged him to retreat, he took a reſolution, ſuch as a victory inſpires in others. He took advantage even of the excellent movement of M. Daun, by which that able general had advanced his quarters to Polnitz, and placed himſelf ſo as to ſupport Olmutz in the moſt effectual manner: by this movement, however, he was obliged to uncover the frontiers of Bohemia. The King of Pruſſia, whom nothing could eſcape was ſenſible of this advantage, and, therefore, inſtead of falling back upon Sileſia, which ſtep would immediately have drawn the Auſtrian army into his dominions, he determined to retreat from one part of the enemy's territories into another.

The day before the ſiege was raiſed, the firing of the Pruſſians continued as briſk as ever, and ſhewed no ſort of ſign of an intention to depart; but in the night (July 1), the whole army took the road to Bohemia in two columns, and gained an entire march upon the Auſtrians. So that notwithſtanding the utmoſt efforts which the enemy could make to overtake and haraſs the King upon his march, he advanced into Bohemia with little moleſtation, ſeized upon a large magazine at Leutomiſſel, defeated ſome corps of Auſtrians who had attempted to diſturb him in his progreſs, and arrived at Konigſgratz, one of the moſt important poſts in Bohemia, with all his ſick and wounded, with all his heavy baggage, all his heavy artillery, and military ſtores complete. This place he poſſeſſed after driving from it a body of 7000 Auſtrians who were intrenched there. He immediately laid this city, and ſeveral other diſtricts, under contribution; but his plan not admitting any further operations on that ſide, he took no other advantage from this momentous poſt. He ſoon re-entered Sileſia, and marched with the moſt amazing diligence to encounter the Ruſſians, who had at this time united their divided corps under Brown and Fermor, and fixed the long fluctuating plan of their operations, by entering the New Marche of Brandenburg, and laying ſiege to Cuſtrin. The reduction of this place could leave them but a few days march to Berlin. Count Dohna was not in a condition to oppoſe their progreſs; the King was ſtill at a great diſtance. So that on the whole, it is difficult to ſay which gained the greateſt glory, the King of Pruſſia by his retreat, or M. Daun by the meaſures which obliged him to it.

OMOA, (ST. FERNANDO DE), TAKEN IN 1779. A fort ſituated on the ſouth ſide of the Bay of Honduras, and on the Gulph of Dulce, South America. For the particulars of which ſee the following letters.

Whitehall, December 18, 1779.—Extract of a Letter from Captain Dalrymple, Commander of the Loyal Iriſh Volunteers, to the Right Honourable Lord George Germaine, one of his Majeſty's Principal Secretaries of State, received yeſterday by Lieutenant Garden, of the 60*th Regiment.*

St. Fernando de Omoa, October 21, 1779.

Your Lordſhip ſhould be informed, that General Dalling had diſpatched me to the Moſquito ſhore to collect a force, and that he had alſo ſent arms, artillery, and ammunition, for St. George's Key, being the principal ſettlement of the Baymen.

On the 27th of September, the day of our arrival at Black River on the Moſquito ſhore, an advice boat came up from the Bay with certain intelligence, that the Spaniards had, on the 15th of September, taken poſſeſſion of St. George's Key, having a number of armed petiaguas, and about 600 men. On this notice, having collected ſixty Indians, and enliſted ſome volunteers on the ſhore, we ſailed in the Porcupine ſloop of war with three tranſports, for the relief and re-eſtabliſhment of the Baymen. On the evening of our departure from Black River, we fell in with Commodore Luttrel in the Charon, accompanied by the Loweſtoffe and Pomona frigates, when we were informed informed, that St. George's Key had been retaken by his Majeſty's armed ſchooner Racehorſe, and that the remaining inhabitants with their ſlaves had retired to Truxillo and Rattan. I intended to have conſulted the Baymen on re-ſettling Honduras, when I was informed that his Majeſty's ſhips had been at the Gulf of Dulce, and not finding the regiſter ſhips there, had proceeded to St. Fernando de Omoa, where they diſcovered them; that they had entered the Bay, where ſome ſhot were exchanged between them and the fort, but not having a ſufficient land force to attack on ſhore, they were obliged to leave it. Judging this a happy opportunity of adding luſtre to his Majeſty's arms, I waited upon Commodore Luttrell, and offered to attack on the land ſide with the Indians and the detachment of the Loyal Iriſh, if he would reinforce me with the marines and muſketry-men from the ſhips. The Commodore agreeing in opinion that the fort might be taken by attacking by ſea and land at the ſame time, it was accordingly determined on, and Truxillo was appointed as the rendezvous to collect the Baymen, where we met ſome people from the Moſquito ſhore, who had been on an expedition againſt the regiſter ſhips. The Commodore immediately had the Baymen collected, as I ſuggeſted it, who were diſperſed about the iſlands of Rattan and Bonaccoa; they were formed by me into four companies, being inveſted with powers by General Dalling for that purpoſe: the ſlaves I officered by their proprietors. With this reinforcement of 250 men, added to the Loyal Iriſh marine, muſketry-men from the ſhips, and Indians, our force amounted to upwards of 500 men. The Commodore having got in readineſs, at my requeſt, ſcaling ladders, iſſued out 200 ſtand of arms, excluſive of ſeventy ſtand iſſued by me of the regimental arms, and 150 ſent down by General Dalling, which were intended for the Bay, we ſailed from the Bay of Truxillo on the 10th inſt. and landed on the 16th about eight o'clock at night, at Porto Cavallo. We were informed by our guides, that Porto Omoa was only three leagues diſtant; and our intention was to have marched directly on in the night to ſurpriſe and eſcalade the fort; but the diſtance proving greater than was imagined, and the roads very bad which they paſſed, ſuch as I may venture to affirm no European troops ever marched before in this climate, being obliged at times to walk (on account of impenetrable mangroves) out into the ſea, which damaged their cartouches, and at other times through lagoons, moraſſes, and narrow foot paths, over mountains rendered almoſt impaſſable from the late rains, having precipices on each ſide, and forced to grope our way by lights made from cabbage trees. We were not arrived within two leagues of the fort at day-break, having loſt our rear, ſome lying down through fatigue, and others loſing the line of march from the darkneſs of the night, and the difficulty of keeping up in paths only paſſable by Indians. In the morning, the rear line was brought up by Captain Cardan, of the 60th regiment of foot, and having refreſhed the troops for two hours, we proceeded again through paſſes and defiles, the ſame as in the night before, the Indians ſkirmiſhing along the paths. We had taken two look-outs, from which ſome of the ſoldiers eſcaped, and carried intelligence that an enemy was advancing; and as they had ſeen our ſquadron the night before, and the Moſquito crafts, imagined that Indians (only) landed from them were the enemy on ſhore, not thinking that Europeans would undertake ſuch a march; and in order to favour this deception, the Indians were advanced in front, who diſlodged them from their look-outs, which prevented them from occupying the defiles and paſſes, until we arrived near the town, where they had placed an ambuſcade. The Indians, who are extremely ſharp as ſcouts, perceived them: they repreſented that the Spaniards were drawn up in force. A diſpoſition of attack was immediately framed for the Loyal Iriſh and marines to force the paſs in front in column, and to advance rapidly with the grenadiers march, ſupported by the ſecond line drawn up; and the Pomona's muſketry-men of the firſt line were detached to gain a hill on the left, covered with wood, which commanded the paſs. Theſe orders being inſtantly executed, the defile was forced. We received a ſcattering ill-directed fire from fifty or ſixty Spaniards, which killed one ſoldier only of the Loyal Iriſh, and wounded a marine; and ſo great was their panic that they fled on all quarters to the fort, woods, and town, evacuating the governor's houſe, built with battlements, and terraſſed on the top; a poſt which, if defended by twenty Britiſh regulars, would have ſtopped our whole force. The gaining this hill, and that which the Pomona's men had aſcended, gave the entire view of the fort, commanding it and the town in the bottom, the fort diſtant half a mile, and the town cloſe under the hill. The ſkirmiſhing continued from the town, and galled us a little. Being unwilling to ſet fire to it, I deſiſted upwards of an hour; but finding that I could not permit an enemy on my flank, the town forming a creſcent under the hill, orders were given for its being conſumed, which were carried into execution, the inhabitants flying to the fort and the woods. The property conſumed in the town was eſtimated at 100,000 piaſtres. The ſquadron came into the Bay while the town was in flames, and ſuppoſing it a proper time to batter the fort, went in abreaſt of it. A diverſion was made by the land forces in their favour from the hill. The ſcaling ladders were carried by the Honduras fuſileers; but their eagerneſs to engage in ſkirmiſhing, made them drop the ladders, and haſten to get up to the head of the column, which prevented the land forces from co-operating with the ſquadron (by ſtorming) ſo heartily that day as could have been wiſhed.

The Loweſtoffe having got aground, and the other ſhips, as I imagined, obſerving the ſignal was diſplayed that the land forces could not co-operate, deſiſted firing. The Loweſtoffe was much damaged, but got off.

The day following we paſſed in ſkirmiſhing, in ſecuring the roads round the fort, and driving in cattle for the land forces. On the 18th, the ſquadron landed ſome guns to the weſtward: two four pounders were got up that night and a battery was immediately opened on them.

This battery incommoded them much, but never could have made any impreſſion on the walls of the parapet, as they were eighteen feet thick.

The Spaniards pointed that evening three guns more towards the land ſide, and in the morning diſmounted one of ours. Obſerving there were ſome houſes near the fort which the Spaniards had neglected to burn, parties of marines, Baymen, and Indians, occupied them, and kept up ſo inceſſant a fire on the embrazures of the fort, that the Spaniards' fire from the guns were often ſilenced for hours, and we obſerved them throwing over the dead. This day ſix guns more were got up by the ſeamen and Baymen, one of which General Dalling had ſent for the Baymen, three others being ſwamped coming on ſhore. Captain Cardan opened a battery of four ſix-pounders, from the hill which the Pomona's men had gained in the firſt ſkirmiſh at the defile, which alſo commanded the fort.

Foreſeeing that by a ſiege of this nature, before approaches could be made in a regular way, and a breach effected, a vaſt train of artillery would be required, and a length of time; after which we would be obliged to ſtorm, having alſo the enemy in our rear all round, and having maturely weighed all theſe circumſtances, with the diſadvantage inevitably attending a ſiege, it was therefore determined to eſcalade the fort, as the ditch was found to be dry: and having conſulted with the Commodore on the mode of attack, it was reſolved that the Pomona ſhould be towed cloſe in, the heavier ſhips co-operating. The attack being determined on, the Europeans were formed in four columns in line; four men advanced with guides at the head of each column; in each column followed eight men carrying the ladders, who were followed by a few hand-grenade men. Two columns conſiſted of ſeamen, and two of marines, with a few Loyal Iriſh. At three in the morning, the diſpoſition being made, and our force conſiſting of 150, we moved down the hill, and there lay waiting for the ſignal of the Charon, which was to denote ſhe had got under way, and would attack in twenty minutes. The ſignal being made a little after four o'clock in the morning of the 20th, we advanced under the fire of our own batteries, and were encouraged by obſerving that the Spaniards did not perceive our march, by the direction of their ſhot over us, pointed at our batteries on the hills.

The Pomona, and fleet alſo, attracted their notice by the fire from the ſea-ſide. By this fortunate co-operation in profound ſilence, arms trailed, and in order to animate the troops, the parole was changed to bayonette, and the counterſign Britons ſtrike home. We advanced undiſcovered under the Spaniſh centries, who were every two or three minutes paſſing the word alerto. At the entrance into the ditch were two guns, pointed from the flank of the baſtion to ſcour it. We were perceived by their centries, and their drum beat to the alarm poſts. Our columns were ſtaggered, and ſtept back; but inſtantly recovering themſelves, they advanced to the wall, in height twenty-eight feet, on which was a battery of five guns. They reared one ladder, a ſecond, and a third. The firſt ladder was broke by the flank guns of another baſtion, killing a midſhipman, and badly wounding five men: the other two ladders were alſo wounded, but not broke. Two ſeamen got up firſt by one ladder, and obeyed their orders in not firing; they preſented at ſixty Spaniards drawn up, but retained their fire until others aſcended: and ſo great was the conſternation of the enemy, that it ſeemed as if they had loſt the power of their arms, although their officers were at their head encouraging them.

The ſeamen ſcrambling up the ladders, down off the parapets they went, and being reinforced by marines and ſeamen, the Spaniards fled to the caſemates, but they could not recover their panic, notwithſtanding every exertion of their officers. About 100 Spaniards eſcaped over the walls on the oppoſite ſide, and out of a ſally port. The Governor and principal officers then came and delivered up to me their ſwords, the garriſon and regiſter ſhips, with the keys of the fort, and ſaved their lives. Incloſed is a liſt of the Spaniſh officers, with the troops of the garriſon, alſo a liſt of our killed and wounded, which is very inconſiderable. We found eleven Spaniards wounded, ſome of whom are ſince dead. They will not acknowledge the number they have loſt, but it is thought it exceeds thirty.

As to the behaviour of the officers and ſoldiers under my command, the Britiſh diſplayed that bravery which is their known characteriſtic. The Baymen and Indians were alſo of the utmoſt ſervice in all duties of fatigue, in ſkirmiſhing and dragging up the cannon.

Your Lordſhip will pardon my mentioning an inſtance of an elevated mind in a Britiſh tar, which amazed the Spaniards, and gave them a very high idea of Engliſh valour. Not contented with one cutlaſs, he had ſcrambled up the walls with two; and meeting a Spaniſh officer without arms, who had been rouſed out of his ſleep, had the generoſity not to take any advantage, but preſenting him one of his cutlaſſes, told him, "You are now on a footing with me." The orders were, not to ſpare while they reſiſted, but to grant quarter to all who requeſted it. Only two Spaniards were wounded by the bayonet in reſiſting, nor was any perſon pillaged or plundered.

I have the pleaſure to inform your Lordſhip, that the greateſt harmony ſubſiſted between the ſea and land forces during the whole of this expedition; and that Commodore Luttrell, and the captains of the navy, have on every occaſion made the greateſt exertions to forward the ſervice on ſhore; and all underwent the moſt ſevere fatigue, in this hot climate, with uncommon alacrity.

Of this fortification your Lordſhip will judge of the importance, from the incredible expence the crown of Spain has been at in erecting it, as the ſtone of which it is built is raiſed out of the ſea, and brought twenty leagues.

The outworks are not finiſhed, notwithſtanding they have have conſtantly employed 1000 men at work for twenty years. It is the Key to the Bay of Honduras, and where the regiſter ſhips and treaſure are ſent to from Guatimala in time of war. The morning of their arrival the treaſure was conveyed into the country, ſo that what we have found in the military cheſt, and what belonged to the public, does not exceed 8000 piaſtres; but the regiſter ſhips muſt be very valuable, if they arrive in ſafety in England.

I ſend theſe diſpatches, with the colours of Omoa, and alſo plans of the fortification, by Lieutenant Cardan of the 60th regiment, whom I appointed to act as captain of artillery and engineer to this expedition, and humbly beg he may be permitted to lay them at his Majeſty's feet.

Return of killed and wounded acting on ſhore, at the ſiege and attack of fort St Fernando de Omoa. October 20, 1799.—1 Midſhipman, 3 ſeamen, killed; 7 ſeamen wounded.—1 Subaltern and 4 marines wounded.—Loyal Iriſh. 1 Private killed.—Bay fuzileers. 1 Private wounded.—Moſquito Indians. 1 killed, 1 wounded.—Total. 1 Midſhipman, 5 men, killed; 1 ſubaltern, 13 men wounded.

Names of officers killed and wounded.—Mr. Lloyd, midſhipman of the Loweſtoffe, killed.—Second Lieutenant Wightman, of the Chatham diviſion of marines, wounded.

Admiralty office, December 18, 1779.—Captain Pakenham arrived at this office yeſterday afternoon, with a Letter from the Honourable John Luttrell, Captain of his Majeſty's ſhip the Charon, to Mr. Stephens, dated at Omoa the 27th of October, 1779, of which the following is an Extract.

Charon, in the Harbour of Omoa, October 27th, 1779.

Sir,

I am to requeſt you will be pleaſed to acquaint their Lordſhips, that, in obedience to their orders I received from Sir Peter Parker, I ſailed from Port Royal early in the morning of the 8th of September laſt, and being joined in a few hours after by the Pomona, Loweſtoffe, and Racehorſe ſchooner, bore away for the Spaniſh main; which however I was not able to reach, owing to calms and baffling winds, until the 15th. The next day we got to Rattan; and being apprehenſive that the enemy's regiſter ſhips might paſs to windward, and along their own ſhore, in caſe I carried all the ſquadron towards George's Key, I ordered Captain Nugent, who was well acquainted at that place, to take the Racehorſe up to George's Key, to procure as expeditiouſly as poſſible the moſt ſkilful pilots for Omoa, and gulf of Dulce. Having ſo done, he was directed to join his ſhip at Key Boquel, then to repair to Glover's Reef, where I waited his arrival, having anchored the Charon and Loweſtoffe there on the 19th inſtant. The Monday morning following, I had the mortification to learn, by a boat which had eſcaped from George's Key, that it had been taken by the Spaniards five days, which made me very doubtful reſpecting the ſafety of Captain Nugent: but I was relieved from the anxiety a few hours afterwards, by the Pomona and Racehorſe ſchooner appearing in ſight. Upon their joining me with pilots, I bore away for the gulf of Dulce, where we arrived in the evening of the 22d. There was no veſſel of any nation to be ſeen in the Gulf. I therefore, attended by the Captains Parker and Nugent, with the marines of the ſquadron, and a party of ſeamen in the boats, puſhed up the river, and landed at the Spaniſh warehouſes before twelve that night, but found them totally abandoned and empty, except the remains of a few proviſions, which ſeemed to indicate that the people had not been long gone. On the 23d, in the morning, I ſent a number of men from the ſhips to the Racehorſe, and directed Lieutenant Trott to make the beſt of his way to Omoa, to reconnoitre the ſtrength of the place, and to look for the ſhips which had ſailed from Dulce, concluding that they would be found at that port. The next morning the Racehorſe joined me at ſea; from her I learned that the three ſhips where at anchor under the fort; two of them with all an end, and the third with her yards and topmaſts ſtruck; and that the fortification did not appear to be a very ſtrong one. Elate at the information, I made ſail for Omoa; and getting cloſe off the port by twelve o'clock at night, would have perſuaded the pilot to have carried us in, which he luckily refuſed; for the next day when we came to approach the fortification, I found it was much too formidable an aſpect to promiſe ſucceſs by an attempt to force it: nor indeed would it have anſwered any good end, for the ſhips had all their yards and topmaſts ſtruck, and were lying up a creek, where we could not get at them, had we even ſilenced near forty pieces of cannon, which preſented themſelves to our view from the different batteries. The only hope therefore which remained of our being maſters of thoſe ſhips, aroſe from a chance that we might catch them off cape Antonio before our cruize terminated, which in the poſſibility of events, I thought might happen; and I was making the beſt of my way with ſhips to that ſtation, ſtopping only two or three days to complete my water in the Bay of Truxillo, and to learn a further ſtate of the Engliſh inhabitants in the Bay of Honduras.

I have now the pleaſure to inform you of the fortunate eſcape of Captain Nugent out of the hands of the Spaniards, and of the ſubſequent ſervices performed by him at George's Key, where he arrived in the Racehorſe in the evening of the 19th, having left the Pomona as I directed, at Key Boquel. Captain Nugent approached the ſhore in his boat, without the leaſt ſuſpicion that the Key was in the hands of the enemy; but before he could land, the boat was attacked by a number of batteaux, and when taken poſſeſſion of by the Spaniards, was nearly ſinking, having received three ſhot through her, luckily without hurting any body; but Captain Nugent and his people were made priſoners; and when he got on ſhore, there was a parade for execution, ſuch as ſcaffold, and a guard of ſoldiers; for it was underſtood to be the orders with which the Spaniards came to attack the ſettlement, that every body that was conquered, and had made reſiſtance ſhould be put to death: but when they enquired, quired, and found Captain Nugent had no arms in the boat, and did not reſiſt, they contented themſelves with blindfolding, ſtripping, and hand-cuffing him. He was confined, with his boat's crew, in a cloſe priſon. During their operations, a great number of batteaux, aſſiſted by an armed ſchooner, attacked the Racehorſe, and attempted to board her; but ſhe was ſo gallantly and obſtinately defended by Lieutenant Trott, his officers and people, that the Spaniards were repulſed with great ſlaughter. On board the Racehorſe, two men only were killed and three wounded. When the Racehorſe had beaten off the Spaniards, ſhe repaired immediately to bring up the Pomona from Key Boquel; and as ſoon as the frigate appeared in ſight, the Spaniards, to the amount of 500, took to their craft and quitted the Key with great precipitation, leaving Captain Nugent, his people and the inhabitants in cloſe confinement, from which they releaſed themſelves: and Captain Nugent, in his boat, retook poſſeſſion of a brig which was aground, and the Spaniards had captured when they came into the harbour. This brig, at the ſoliciration of the inhabitants, who had furniſhed her with ſeamen, Captain Nugent armed and ſent to the river Belez, to cover the embarkation of the property there belonging to the Engliſh ſettlers, with directions that ſhe ſhould, after performing that ſervice, repair in queſt of the ſhips under my command, and in caſe of not meeting with us, make the beſt of their way to Jamaica. Thinking this information too incomplete to diſpatch the Racehorſe with to Jamaica, I directed Lieutenant Trott, as ſoon as we quitted Omoa, to go in queſt of the brig to the river Belez, and afterwards to repair to George's Key, and land the people who had ſerved as pilots, and where deſirous of being put on ſhore there; and after making ſuch other enquiries as I thought neceſſary to direct him to do, I ordered her to join the ſquadron in the Bay of Truxillo, where ſhe arrived the 30th of October, and informed me that the brig armed by Captain Nugent had nearly collected the different ſettlers in the Bay; that ſeventy of them were on board, and more than 200 under eſcort in ſmall craft; and that he had directed them to Truxillo, in their way to Black River. They however did not appear while I was there; and the King's ſhips being wooded and watered, I put to ſea with them, having directed Lieutenant Trott to give every aſſiſtance in his power towards forwarding the brig with the Baymen to black River on the Muſquito ſhore, if they arrived at Truxillo while he was taking in his water. The pilots the Racehorſe carried to George's Key, finding no King's veſſel there, or ſecurity for their perſons, left it; and the inhabitants of every ſettlement we claim in the Bay relinquiſhed their property, not thinking it tenable againſt the ſuperior number of the Spaniards, and were removing as faſt as poſſible, ſome to Jamaica, and the major part of them to Black River on the Muſquito ſhore. In this diſagreeable ſituation were things in the Bay of Honduras when I left it on the 4th of October; but on the 7th fortune changed her face upon us, and preſented to our view the Porcupine ſloop of war, having under her convoy a detachment of troops belonging to the Loyal Iriſh, and ſome Moſquito Indians, under the command of Captain Commandant Dalrymple, who was as deſirous as myſelf of making a land and ſea attack upon the garriſon of Omoa, and the Spaniſh galleons. I therefore took immediate meaſures to ſecure the ſervices of theſe people who had been driven from St. George's Key, by making ſail myſelf for Truxillo, and diſpatching the frigates to Bonaccoa and Utilla, in queſt of our veſſels with the Baymen. Lieutenant Trott of the Racehorſe, I ſent to Rattan on the ſame ſervice. They all returned to me with expedition and ſucceſs, bringing a reinforcement of 250 men. We forthwith ſet to work, made eſcalading ladders, faſcines, ſand-bags, with every other requiſite in our power, for carrying on a ſiege; having ſettled the plan of attack, gave full inſtructions to the captains and officers who were to carry it into execution; and on the morning of the 10th of October I ſailed with the Loweſtoffe, Pomona, Porcupine, Racehorſe, three ſchooners, and a number of ſmall craft for Porto-Cavallo Bay, and anchored the fleet there cloſe in ſhore.

On the evening of the 16th, Captain Pakenham, to whom I intruſted the command of landing the troops, executed my orders in ſo officer-like and expeditious a manner, that the whole was formed and marched from the beach before eleven o'clock that night. From the intricacy of the roads, and other circumſtances, our troops were prevented from making any great progreſs before the next morning, when they puſhed forward with alacrity to gain the commanding ground on the Governor's houſe; and having driven away the Spaniards who contended for the poſſeſſion of it, we occupied that very important poſt, but were ſo annoyed by the enemy's muſquetry from the town, as to compel our troops to ſet fire to it. In the midſt of the flames I arrived off the harbour of Omoa; and the wind, I flattered myſelf, would have carried us cloſe to the enemy's batteries. I therefore made the ſignal for the Loweſtoffe to lead us to action; it was obeyed by Captain Parker with alacrity and ſpirit. When we opened the eaſtern point, the enemy began to fire at the Loweſtoffe, Charon, Pomona, and Porcupine; but no ſhot were returned till their guns had ſo lulled the wind as to leave us little proſpect of getting nearer to them; ſo that rather to cover ourſelves from their aim by ſmoke, than to look for ſucceſs from a diſtant cannonade, the Charon and Loweſtoffe began to fire; the Pomona was not able to get within reach of her guns; and as ſoon as I had the power, I laid the ſhip's head to the offing; a breeze ſpringing up ſoon after to the northward, I made the ſignal to tack, thinking we ſhould certainly fetch where we wiſhed to do; in this, however, we were diſappointed, the wind baffling and forſaking us. The Loweſtoffe ran aſhore, and received a heavy fire from the enemy, but ſhe paid off again; before our boats could get to their aſſiſtance, her hull, maſts, and yards were ſo much diſabled, as to oblige me to ſend her to anchor to leeward, and there refit. The Charon's rudder was choked by a ſhot, which filled the ſpace between it and the ſtern-poſt with ſplinters; part of her wheel was ſhot away, and the mizen-maſt badly wounded.

On

On the 18th, Captain Dalrymple being anxious for artillery being ſent up to a battery he was conſtructing on Governor's Hill, I ordered the guns from the Porcupine to be landed; they were drawn up by the ſailors through a heavy road, and up a ſteep aſcent, to a ſpot where they did remarkable execution; but our time being precious, from various conſiderations, and the heat of the climate making this duty more fatiguing to our people, it was concluded on between Captain Dalrymple and myſelf, to attempt an eſcalade the following morning, and the King's ſhips to co-operate, by cannonading the wall againſt the ſea.

I made the ſignal ſettled for the attack; I weighed anchor at three o'clock, the Pomona and Loweſtoffe ſtanding for the eaſtern, and the Charon for the weſtern angle of the fort, which I began to cannonade: when Captain Dalrymple in a moſt gallant and exemplary manner, ſtormed on the land ſide with the ſeamen and marines, and ſubdued the enemy with the loſs of little blood. We took immediate poſſeſſion of two regiſter ſhips richly laden, which, with the cargoes of other veſſels of leſs note, amount to the ſum of three millions of piaſtres, or dollars.

The fort is an amazing pile of buildings; the greateſt part of it is an admirable ſort of ſtone; the remainder is brick. It has coſt the Spaniards twenty-five years labour, and the lives of thouſands of their ſubjects. Since it has been taken, we were aſtoniſhed from the ſtrength of it that it was ſo eaſily vanquiſhed. The Spaniſh Governor is very ſolicitous to ranſom the fort, and has offered 300,000 dollars for it. The 250 quintals of quickſilver which came from Old Spain, and we have now taken, the Spaniards would have bought at any price, ſaying they would give double its value, becauſe they ſhould have no other means to work any of the valuable mines in the province. Their reaſons for wiſhing it determined me not to part from a ſingle ounce of the quickſilver, nor would I conſent to ranſom the fort The number of priſoners in the enemy's fort far exceeded the troops that ſtormed it; and whoſe undaunted behaviour has added ſo much luſture to the Britiſh arms. Their humanity has not been leſs conſpicuous than their bravery; nor can there be a greater contraſt than between the treatment received by the King's ſubjects at George's Key, which ſurrendered at diſcretion, and the Spaniſh garriſon of Omoa, though taken by ſtorm; Captain Dalrymple's orders and my wiſhes have been punctually obeyed even by the Moſquito men and thoſe of Honduras that received ſuch ill treatment. Proper reſpect has been ſhewn to the Governor, Spaniſh officers, ſoldiers, and inhabitants; neither cloaths, watches, pocket money, or other effects have been taken from theſe priſoners. The ornaments of the church the captors have agreed to give back, if the Spaniſh court does punctually comply with the agreement reſpecting the exchange of priſoners.

A return of the killed and wounded on board his Majeſty's Ships Charon, Loweſtoffe, and Porcupine, in an action againſt the Catholic King's fort of St. Ferdinando de Omoa, on the 17th of October, 1779.—Charon, 1 killed, 3 wounded.—Loweſtoffe, 3 killed, 5 wounded.—Porcupine, 1 killed.

A return of the killed and wounded on board the Racehorſe armed veſſel, at George's Key, in the Bay of Honduras, the 13th of September 1779.—Racehorſe, 2 killed, 3 wounded.

Admiralty office, March 11, 1780.—Extract of a Letter from Vice-Admiral Sir Peter Parker, Commander in Chief of his Majeſty's ſhips at Jamaica, to Mr. Stephens, dated at Port-Royal, January, 1780.

The 25th of November, a conſiderable body of Spaniards inveſted St. Ferdinando de Omoa, and on the 28th, the garriſon with the crew of the Porcupine were ſo reduced by a peſtilential diſorder which raged amongſt them, that it became neceſſary to evacuate the fort, after having ſpiked the guns, and embarked the ammunition and ſtores.

The 8th inſtant the Saliſbury, commanded by Captain Inglis, brought in here a Spaniſh private ſhip of war of fifty guns, named the St. Carlos, commanded by Don Juan Antonio Zavalletta, from Cadiz, bound to Omoa, laden with braſs cannon, ſhot, muſquets, and other military ſtores for the fort. Captain Inglis has ſhown good conduct and becoming ſpirit as well before as during the action. Incloſed is his letter giving an account of the action.

Captain Luttrell has taken poſſeſſion of the iſland of Rattan for his Majeſty.

Saliſbury, off Port-Royal, Jan. 1780.

SIR,

On the 12th of laſt month, at day-break, being then off Port de Sall, in the Bay of Honduras, we ſaw two ſail to the eaſtward, the one a large ſhip, the other a ſloop, to which we gave chaſe, it being then light breezes. After different manœuvres, and the ſtrange ſhip making ſome private ſignals through the day, at ſix in the evening we got pretty near, when ſhe hoiſted Spaniſh enſign and pendant. At half paſt ſix we fired ſome ſhot, which were immediately returned, and continued cloſing with a conſtant fire on both ſides, till paſt eight o'clock, when her main maſt went overboard, and ſhe ſurrendered. Her mizen-maſt alſo went during the night.

She proved to be the St. Carlos of fifty guns, thirty-eight twelve-pounders, ſixteen of which are braſs, twelve ſix-pounders, and 397 men, a private ſhip of war, commanded by Don Juan Antonio Zavalletta from Cadiz, bound to Fort Omoa, having on board twelve twenty-four-pounders braſs cannon, a quantity of ſhot and ſhells, 500 ſtand of arms, &c.

The ſloop made off in the night.

In the action there were four men killed on board the Saliſbury, and fourteen wounded, five of whom died of their wounds; Mr. Miller the Maſter was much wounded, but is in a fair way of recovery.

The Saliſbury ſuffered much in her ſails and rigging, which we immediately ſet about repairing; as alſo in putting the prize into as good a ſtate of ſailing and defence as circumſtances would admit of, under the command of Lieutenant Haynes, firſt lieutenant of the Saliſbury.

Since that time we have been beating up for Jamaica, which which we have attained with ſome trouble; and have the pleaſure to inform you, that throughout this ſervice has been carried on with a proper and ſpirited exertion of both officers and ſhip's company.

I am, Sir, your moſt obedient humble ſervant,

CHARLES INGLIS.

ONEGLIA, a ſeaport in the territory of Genoa, but belonging to the King of Sardinia, as well as the ſurrounding principality. It has often been taken and retaken in the wars of Italy, and is an open place. The French and Spaniards had poſſeſſion of it 1744, but were driven out of it by the Piedmonteſe. On the eighth of April 1792, the French fleet conſiſting of two ſhips of the line, four frigates, four battering ſhips, and an armed brig, appeared in the morning off the environs of this city, and having made the neceſſary preparations for bombarding, attempted a deſcent. The commandant inſtantly made the ſignal by the diſcharge of a cannon, to aſſemble the land and ſea forces; and the militia united to the troops of the line, were ſtationed in the redoubts at the ſea ſide, to oppoſe the deſcent of the French, who in a little time appeared in order of battle, and diſcharged the whole of their artillery on the city. The batteries returned a ſalute with red-hot balls which damaged the French ſhips ſo much that they did not wait a ſecond diſcharge. It was taken by the Auſtrians in 1800. See GENOA.

ONORE, a part of the Eaſt Indies near Mirjee River. About five leagues to the northward of this place, General Mathews poſſeſſed himſelf of a fort called Rajahmundry, ſituated at the entrance of the river, and as ſoon as the ſtores could be landed, intended to proceed to the principal fort called Mirjee about four miles up the river. The General diſpatched a great part of the ſhipping immediately to Panany to bring up the troops from thence, except ſuch as might be neceſſary for the defence of the poſſeſſions to the ſouthward.

Inſtead however, of attacking Mirjee, the General preceeded againſt Onore, which was taken the 5th of January 1783, by ſtorm. The Killidar and about 1200 men were made priſoners, and 2 or 300 were killed and wounded. The loſs of the Engliſh in the ſiege and at the ſtorm was very inconſiderable, except in the death Lieutenant Charles Stuart who was ſhot through the body on the 28th of December, and died the next day.

ONONDAGO RIVER, ACTION AT. See ONTARIO.

ONTARIO TAKEN IN 1756. A fort ſituated on a lake of the ſame name in North America.

His Majeſty had promiſed to prefer the ſecurity of his American ſubjects, and the chaſtiſement of the French uſurpations and hoſtilities in North America to all other conſiderations. For this purpoſe, it was thought neceſſary, not only to ſend more troops but to have the army on that continent better officered. We muſt own that Lord Loudon was appointed commander in chief, with powers that were ſuppoſed ſufficient to remove all the delays, and the cauſes of the obſtructions which had defeated moſt of the former operations and ſalutary meaſures propoſed for their common defence; and General Abercromby was ſent before with two regiments, and with orders to ſuperſede General Shirley.

Every one wiſhed for, and turned their thoughts towards an American war; and looked upon theſe meaſures to preſage a vigorous effort to drive the French out of their uſurpations, and to avenge the inhuman practices of their Indian allies. But, as if procraſtination had been the favourite meaſure of that adminiſtration, his Majeſty's good intentions, and the people's expectation, were one more diſappointed by a detention of the Earl of Loudon, who was charged with the chief direction of the operations and plans in North America; but ordered to wait for certain foreign officers of experience invited from Germany, to command in a royal American regiment, conſiſting of four battalions to be raiſed in Virginia, and of which the Earl was to be the colonel. So that notwithſtanding the preparations made by the provincials under General Shirley, to open the campaign early in the year, they were obliged to halt at Albany for the arrival of a commander in chief, and of the regular forces from England, till the latter end of June, when General Abercromby arrived there, and took the command of the two regiments led off by Dunbar, after the defeat of Braddock, two battalions raiſed in America, two regiments brought with him from England; four old independant companies belonging to New York, a New Jerſey regiment, four companies levied in North Carolina, and a body of provincials ſent from England only.

It had been reſolved in the council of war held laſt year at Albany, by Mr. Shirley, &c. to endeavour to cut off the French communication between Canada and Louiſiana, by the reducing of Fort Niagara, ſituate between the lakes Ontario and Erie; which alſo would have obliged their new forts on the Ohio to ſubmit to the Britiſh arms without much bloodſhed; to cover the borders of New York, and ſecure the navigation of lake Champlain, by the conqueſt of Ticonderoga and Crown Point; to beſiege Fort du Queſne on the Ohio; and while theſe ſeveral and diſtant ſervices were carrying into execution, to alarm the capital of Canada by a body of troops detached up the river Kennebeck.

The troops deſtined for the campaign on lake Ontario, were intended to march for Oſwego, thence to be carried over in 200 whale boats, built long, round, and light.

But Abercromby, though approving of the plan, thought it by far too extenſive for the forces under his preſent command to be carried effectually into execution. Beſides, the ſeaſon was too far advanced to promiſe ſucceſs. He therefore waited the arrival of Lord Loudon, and by that determination another year was loſt; the provinces left expoſed to the invaſions and barbarities of the enemy; and the French, who received a reinforcement of about 3000 men, under the command of M. Montcalm from Europe, under a ſtrong convoy of men of war, at liberty to ſtrengthen their poſts, and to diſtreſs the Britiſh ſettlements with impunity.

During this ſtate of inactivity, and of dependence upon reinforcements from their mother country, the army received the diſagreeable news of the enemy's entering entering the country of the Five Nations, our ancient allies; where they reduced a ſmall fort garriſoned by twenty-five Engliſh, whom they put to the ſword, and butchered in a moſt barbarous manner.

The French improved this opportunity; they formed a camp at Ticonderoga of 330 tents, and ſeventy log houſes, with 3000 troops at that place and Crown Point, and daily increaſed their numbers. But the defence of this fort was not their only object; and as they were perfectly informed of the orders for the Engliſh army not to undertake any expedition till the arrival of Lord Loudon, and that his Lordſhip could not land in North America before the time would be elapſed, either to attack Crown Point, or to prevent Oſwego falling into their hands, the enemy reſolved upon the ſiege of Oſwego; and in order to facilitate their operations againſt that fort, ambuſcades were formed to haraſs and intercept any reinforcement, or convoy of proviſions, &c. which might be ſent to Oſwego from Albany, or from Schenectady.

However, a conſiderable convoy of proviſions and ſtores were conducted thither very ſafely by Colonel Bradſtreet, before the ambuſcade was laid. But in his return down the river Onondago, and ſtemming the ſtream with his batteaus, formed in three diviſions, he was ſaluted by a party of Indians, ſecreted amongſt the buſhes and trees on the north ſhore, with the war-whoop and a general diſcharge of muſquetry, which killed about ſeventy of the batteau-men. Colonel Bradſtreet landed his men immediately on the oppoſite bank, and took poſſeſſion of a ſmall iſland, where he with ſix men only drove off forty of the enemy, who forded the river to attack them; then quitting the iſland, and collecting his whole ſtrength of about 200 men, he marched to meet another party of French and Indians, who had forded the river a mile higher; whom he, with only forty men, fell upon ſword in hand in a large ſwamp, and cut moſt of them in pieces or drowned them; then he boldly marched up and attacked the main body of the enemy, conſiſting of 660 men, which had paſſed at another ford, and entirely routed them alſo. This action laſted upwards of three hours.

Our chief loſs was amongſt the batteau-men by the firſt fire from the buſhes, but the enemy had about 200 killed and ſeventy taken priſoners, and had not the reſt been favoured in their flight by a heavy rain, and the ſwelling of the waters, which put an end to Bradſtreet's purſuit, it is very probable that the whole detachment, conſiſting of 700 French and Canadians chiefly, would have been entirely cut off: for Colonel Bradſtreet was joined the ſame night by Captain Patten and his grenadiers, marching from Oneida to Oſwego, and next morning by 200 men, detached to his aſſiſtance from Oſwego. So that theſe parties ſeparated. Bradſtreet made the beſt of his way to Schenectady, and the others marched together for Oſwego.

By the priſoners brought in by Colonel Bradſtreet, General Abercromby was informed that Oſwego was the immediate object of the French arms, and that its ſiege was determined on by a large body of Europeans, encamped on the eaſtern ſhore of Lake Ontario.

The importance of this place to interrupt the commerce, as well as the motions of the enemy; and its being the only place to build veſſels for the navigation upon that lake or inland ſea, and to ſecure an intereſt with the Indians that had not declared againſt us, determined General Abercromby to detach a regiment of regulars, under the command of Major-General Webb, to its relief. But notwithſtanding the advantage which the loſs of Oſwego would give the enemy in all their future operations and meaſures, and although the Engliſh army at Albany could muſter 2600 regulars and 7000 provincials, or thereabout, under the command of General Winſlow, beſides a conſiderable number of batteau-men, their march was ſtopped by the arrival of Lord Loudon, while the neceſſaries were providing for their ſubſiſtence on the road. For his Lordſhip, how much ſoever inclined to forward General Abercromby's orders for the relief of Oſwego, was ſo peremptorily and obſtinately oppoſed in that meaſure by New England, New York, and the adjacent provinces, which inſiſted upon the reduction of Crown Point previous to all other operations, that although they were at laſt prevailed with to conſent to the march of Major-General Webb, with the regiment firſt ordered by General Abercromby, it was the 12th day of Auguſt before this ſupply could ſet out from Albany, and indulged the enemy with ſuch an unaccountable opportunity to complete their plan againſt Oſwego, that by the time Major-General Webb could reach the Carrying-place, between the Mohawk's river and Wood's creek,, he met with the diſagreeable news, that the French were maſters of Oſwego, and had made the garriſon and 300 workmen and ſailors employed to defend the paſſes between the fort and Burnet's field priſoners of war.

By this misfortune the nation loſt the two forts of Ontario and Oſwego; forts that had been run up in a hurry, unfiniſhed, and untenable againſt a regular force. The Marquis de Montcalm, an enterprizing officer, and the ſucceſſor of M. Dieſkau, was charged with this expedition, having under his command 1300 regulars, 1700 Canadians, and a conſiderable number of Indians. His firſt care was to prevent ſuccours and intelligence between Oſwego and Albany; which he effected by poſting a ſtrong body of Canadians on the road by land, and by blocking up Oſwego by water, with two large armed veſſels. This done, he without oppoſition, or danger of being diſturbed, tranſported from fort Frontenac, where he had arrived on the 29th of July, his ſtores and artillery over the lake to the bay of Nixouri, appointed the place of general rendezvous for this expedition.

Having proceeded with all the caution in his power to prevent a ſurpriſe; and in caſe of a miſcarriage to ſecure a retreat, he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for the ſiege, and opened the trenches before fort Ontario with about 5000 men, and thirty-two pieces of cannon, from ten to eighteen-pounders, beſides ſeveral large braſs mortars and howitzers (part of the artillery which had been taken from General Braddock) about midnight, on the 12th of Auguſt, at the diſtance of ninety toiſes, or fathoms, of ſix feet each, from the foſſe of fort Ontario, and like unto a parallel of about 100 toiſes toiſes in front, and in ground vaſtly embarraſſed with trunks of trees, and ſuch like obſtructions. The parallel was finiſhed at five in the morning, when the workmen began to erect the batteries in the midſt of a hot fire, kept up by the garriſon very briſkly from day-break to ſix o'clock at night, and killed their chief engineer in the trenches. But as Colonel Mercer apprehended that the fort was not tenable againſt ſuch a ſuperior force, and ſeveral pieces of heavy cannon mounted on a battery at no more than ſixty yards from it; he about three in the afternoon, having received an account from the commandant of his bad ſituation, ordered him to fire away all his ſhells and ammunition, to ſpike up the cannon, and to make the beſt retreat he could to Oſwego; which was punctually executed by deſtroying the cannon, ammunition and proviſions, and paſſing the river ſo as to join the troops on the weſtern ſhore, without the loſs of a man.

The French General, informed of this deſertion of Fort Ontario, immediately took poſſeſſion thereof, and ordered the communication of the parallel to be continued to the bank of the river; where, early in the ſame night, he began a grand battery, formed in ſuch a manner that it could not only batter Fort Oſwego, diſtant about two miles Engliſh, and ſecure the way from thence to Fort George, ſituate on a hill about four miles and a half up the river, but annoy the intrenchments of Oſwego.

On the part of the Engliſh, to the number of 370 or thereabout, which had retreated from Fort Ontario, they were ordered to join Colonel Schuyler immediately, who was charged with the defence of the fort on the hill to the weſtward of the Old Fort, under the direction of Mr. Mackeller the engineer. But the advantages propoſed by a communication between theſe two forts were ſoon fruſtrated, not ſo much by the fire from the enemy acroſs the river, who at that diſtance could never have pretended to batter in breach, and to have reduced Oſwego to the neceſſity of ſurrendering, but from a bold action of a body of 2500 Canadians and ſavages, who ſwam over the river in the night between the 13th and 14th, and cut off the communication between the two forts.

At the ſame time the enemy were very buſy in bringing up their cannon, and raiſing a battery of ten cannon, twelve-pounders, on the eaſt ſide of the river, againſt the Old Fort, though there was kept up a conſtant fire of cannon and ſhells, from the Old Fort and works about it.

On the 14th day, General Mercer being informed that a large party of the enemy had croſſed the river, to fall upon him on the weſt ſide, ordered Colonel Schuyler to march againſt them with 500 men. But this order was annulled by a cannon-ball, which a few minutes after killed Colonel Mercer.

Colonel Littlehales, who ſucceeded Mercer in the chief command, being better informed of the numbers of the enemy that had croſſed the river, that they were 2500 men; countermanded the detachment under Colonel Schuyler; and obſerving that the enemy had with great celerity raiſed a battery of nine guns, and another of mortars ready to play, that there were 2500 irregulars and Indians on the back of his garriſon, ready to ſtorm it on that ſide, and 2000 regulars ready to land in front, under the fire of their cannon; and that all the places of defence under his command were either enfiladed or ruined by the conſtant fire of the enemy, he called a council of war; who, after taking the opinion of the engineers, were unanimouſly of opinion, that the works were no longer tenable, that it was by no means prudent to riſk a ſtorm with ſuch unequal numbers.

A capitulation was accordingly reſolved upon; a white flag was hung out, and the chamade was beat, and the firing ceaſed on both ſides; though not without great reluctance of the ſoldiery, who for ſome time kept and uſed their arms, declaring their reſolution rather to die, than yield and ſurrender to the French. But the officers, though they had behaved like men determined to diſpute their poſt and liberty to the laſt extremity; yet to prevent a mutiny, and any miſcarriage that might happen by the bad uſe the enemy could make of the interval of this ceſſation of arms, two of them are ſaid to have been inconſiderately ſent out to the French General, not with the conditions a brave garriſon has a right to demand, and ſeldom fails of gaining by a proper countenance in their diſtreſſed circumſtances; but, to "know the terms he was willing to grant;" and the enemy were permitted openly to bring up more cannon; to advance the main body of their troops within muſket-ſhot of the garriſon, and to prepare every thing for a ſtorm, while the treaty for a ſurrender was carried on. The Marquis de Montcalm, informed by theſe officers of the difficulty with which the garriſon were brought to ſubmit to a capitulation, anſwered, That the Engliſh were an enemy he eſteemed; that none but a brave nation would have thought of defending ſo weak a place ſo long againſt ſuch a train of artillery and ſuperior numbers; that they might expect whatever terms were conſiſtent with the ſervice of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty. But tied them down to the following propoſals, viz.

The Marquis de Montcalm, Army and Field-Mareſchal, Commander in Chief of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's troops, is ready to receive a capitulation upon honourable conditions, ſurrendering to him all the forts; he requires them to be priſoners of war; they ſhall be ſhewn all the regard the politeſt of nations can ſhew. I ſend an aid-de-camp on my part, viz. Monſieur de Bougainville, captain of dragoons; they need only ſend the capitulation to be ſigned. I require an anſwer by noon. I have kept Mr. Drake for an hoſtage.

Auguſt 14, 1756.

MONTCALM.

And accordingly the following demand was made:

The demand made by the Commandant of Oſwego from from the Marquis de Montcalm, army and field-mareſchal to the King, Commander in Chief of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's troops in North America.

Art. I. The garriſon ſhall ſurrender priſoners of war, and ſhall be conducted from thence to Montreal, where they ſhall be treated with humanity; and every one ſhall have treatment agreeable to their reſpective ranks, according to the cuſtom of war.

II. Officers, ſoldiers, and individuals ſhall have their baggage and clothes, and they ſhall be allowed to carry them along with them.

III. They ſhall remain priſoners of war until they are exchanged.

To which the Marquis de Montcalm gave anſwer as follows:

I accept of the above articles in the name of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, under the condition of delivering up faithfully the fortifications, ammunition, magazines, barks and batteaus, with their appurtenances.

I give full power to Monſieur de la Pauze, Major-General, to reduce this preſent capitulation, and to agree upon the manner of becoming maſter of the ſaid fort, of which our troops ſhall take poſſeſſion, and to inſure the garriſon from receiving any inſult.

Given at the camp before Oſwego, the 14th day, at eleven o'clock in the morning of the month of Auguſt, 1756.

MONTCALM.

By virtue of this capitulation we loſt Oſwego, our only poſt on the Great Lakes; the garriſon laid down their arms, and ſurrendered priſoners of war, and the French immediately took poſſeſſion of Oſwego and Fort St. George, which they entirely deſtroyed, agreeable to their orders, after removing the artillery, warlike ſtores, and proviſions; with the loſs of no more than one engineer, one Canadian, one ſoldier, and one gunner killed, and twenty ſlightly wounded, on the part of the enemy. Whereas we loſt Shirley's and Pepperell's regiments, and part of Schuyler's militia, in all 1600 men, including eighty officers; 121 pieces of artillery, ſeven of which were braſs, fifty-five of which were cannon of different bores, and fourteen braſs mortars, 23,000 weight of powder, 8000 weight of lead and ball, 2950 bullets, 150 bombs of nine inches, and 300 of ſix inches, 1476 grenades, 730 fuzes for grenades, 340 common fuzes; 704 hogſheads of biſcuit, a very great quantity of pork, beef, and meal.

A magazine of ſo great importance, depoſited in a place deemed altogether indefenſible and without the reach of immediate ſuccour, gave the nation great room to ſuſpect the integrity, or to impeach the underſtandings of thoſe who, for the ſake of gain by agencies and contracts, or through ignorance of its ſituation and ſtrength, expoſed ſo valuable a prize to the firſt invader.

There were at Oſwego ſeven armed ſhips, viz. one of eighteen guns, one of fourteen, one of ten, one of eight guns, and three others mounted with ſwivels, beſides 200 batteaus of different ſizes, whoſe officers and crews were included in the capitulation.

As ſoon as the forts was demoliſhed, the French marched with the utmoſt ſpeed, with their priſoners (ſuch as were left alive; for contrary to the faith of the capitulation, Montcalm not only ſuffered the garriſon to be ſtripped, and many of them to be murdered by his army, but he delivered twenty of them up to the mercy of the Indians, by way of atonement for the loſs of their friends that had fallen in battle), and booty, to join their army at Ticonderoga, and to oppoſe the motions of the provincial army of 7000 men, which ought to have long before attacked Crown Point, but had lain idle under General Winſlow, till reduced by ſickneſs and deſertion to 4000, and till the French were now in a condition to hold them at defiance. The provincials deſerted, becauſe they were diſheartened by an inactive campaign, and the new raiſed troops contracted many diſorders for want of care and cleanlineſs. But no enemy appearing, they proceeded to Montreal, and thence to Quebec, where the priſoners were immediately embarked, and ſent to Portſmouth in a cartel ſhip.

ORCHIES, a part of French Flanders, ſituated about fourteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Liſle. It was attacked by the Auſtrians in July 1792, but they were thrown in to ſuch a confuſion by their repulſe, and the loſs of three of their beſt officers, that they cried out they were betrayed, and on their return were with great difficulty prevented from putting all the French emigrants to the ſword. They brought with them twenty waggons loaded with killed and wounded.

On the 28th of July following, a ſevere battle was fought between the French and Auſtrians, in which the latter were victorious, 1200 French were killed and 600 taken priſoners, in conſequence of which Orchies became in the poſſeſſion of the Auſtrians, with a great quantity of ſtores of all kinds. The Auſtrian army had been reinforced by 28,000 men. The battle was between 5000 men who were going from Liſle to Alſace, and they were attacked by 1600 Auſtrians who made terrible havock and drove the defeated party into Liſle. Orchies was evacuated in October following, when the French again got poſſeſſion of it.

In June 1793, the French under General Cuſtine, ſurpriſed the Dutch troops near Orchies, by a ſtratagem to the amount of 700 men; 300 were killed, and the reſt taken priſoners.

ORLEANS, SIEGE OF. A city of France, ſituated on the Loire, about ſeventy miles ſouth from Paris. This famous ſiege was undertaken by the Engliſh in the year 1428, during the reign of Henry VI. of England, and Charles VII. of France. About the beginning of this year the Earl of Saliſbury arrived in France with a body of 5000 men, whom he had raiſed at his own expence in England, in conſequence of a convention with the council. As ſoon as he brought that reinforcement to Paris, the Regent beſtowed on him the command of an army of 16,000 men, in order to reduce all the forts that were poſſeſſed by Charles on this ſide the Loire, and to drive him entirely out of the northern provinces. He began his march towards the Loire, accompanied by the Earl of Suffolk, by Talbot, Faſtolfe, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction; and in a council of war reſolved to undertake the ſiege of Orleans, though this reſolution was taken without the knowledge and contrary to the opinion of the Duke of Bedford. As it was neceſſary to reduce the neighbouring places from which they might have been incommoded during the ſiege, the months of Auguſt and September were ſpent in ſubduing Jenville, Mehun, Baugemi, Gergeau, Clevy, Sully, and other ſmall places, and at length they appeared before Orleans on the 12th day of October. Charles perceiving the intention of the Engliſh, had ſupplied the place with great ſtore of proviſion, ammunition, and a numerous garriſon commanded by Gaucour, although at that time a priſoner with the Engliſh, releaſed on parole to raiſe the money for his ranſom, and the Baſtard of Orleans, with d'Orval, Lahirly, Xaintrailles, Thouars, Bouſſac, Chabannes, La Fayatte, Gaville, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, had thrown themſelves into the places, to ſignalize their courage and addreſs.

In order to deprive the town of all poſſibility of receiving ſuccour, the Earl of Saliſbury ordered ſixty ſmall forts or redoubts to be built around it, of which ſix were more conſiderable than the reſt, for commanding the principal avenues of the place, and theſe were ſupplied with great artillery, by which the walls were inceſſantly battered.

This was a place of the utmoſt conſequence to Charles, and as ſuch defended by the garriſon with uncommon valour, in ſhort, both the aſſailants and defendants ſeemed to fight for glory more than any other advantage, and on both ſides exploits of gallantry were daily performed. Charles being deſtitute of troops and money, could not pretend to raiſe the ſiege, but notwithſtanding the vigilance of the Engliſh, he made a ſhift to introduce ſuccour from time to time; ſo that the garriſon which originally conſiſted of 1200 men, was by the latter end of December augmented to 3000, and the number of the beſiegers increaſed to 23,000 by the reinforcements they received from the Regent.

The bulwark of Tournelle being damaged by the cannon of the beſiegers, was ſet on fire by the defendants; but the flames were extinguiſhed by the Engliſh, who made a lodgment in that part, and at the ſame time took the tower of the bridge from whence they overlooked the whole city. In this place the Earl of Saliſbury was killed by a cannon-ball while he ſtood obſerving the poſture of the enemy at a window, but his death did not one moment interrupt the ſiege, which was carried on with the ſame vigour under the direction of the Earl of Suffolk, aſſiſted by the renowned Talbot, one of the greateſt captains which that age produced.

Four months had been already ſpent in continual ſallies and attacks, when the Regent ordered a convoy of ſalt fiſh to ſet out from Paris, for the uſe of the beſiegers in Lent, guarded by 1700 men, under the command of Sir John Faſtolfe, an officer of approved valour and experience. Charles receiving intelligence of the day on which he intended to begin his march, ordered the Count de Clermont to attack him with 3000 men on the road to Orleans; and that nobleman executed his orders on the 12th day of February. Faſtolfe being apprized of his approach, drew up his men behind a barricade of waggons, where they ſuſtained the firſt ſhock of the enemy, who attacked them with their uſual impetuoſity, but far from breaking through the intrenchment, they met with ſuch a warm reception as threw them into confuſion; and the Engliſh Commander ſeeing their diſorder, cauſed openings to be made in his barricade, through which he charged the enemy before they could rally, and routed them with great carnage.

In this action, which was denominated the battle of Herrings, 120 noblemen, or officers of diſtinction, loſt their lives, beſides a great number of common ſoldiers, but the baſtard of Orleans, who had joined Clermont, retreated to the town with 400 men in good order.

Charles was ſo diſheartened at this overthrow, that he began to look upon his affairs as deſperate; but that he might not be wanting to his own intereſt, in neglecting any ſtep that might contribute towards the preſervation of Orleans, he ſent Xaintrailles to the Regent at Paris, to propoſe that the city might be depoſited in the hands of the Duke of Burgundy until the war ſhould be finiſhed.

This propoſal being rejected by the Duke of Bedford, the King had actually determined to retire into Dauphine, when his affairs were reſtored by a ſurpriſing revolution. About the latter end of February, a country wench called Joan of Arc, native of the village of Dauremy in Lorraine, addreſſed herſelf to Robert de Badricaut, governor of Vau-couleurs, and affirmed that ſhe had a commiſſioa from heaven to raiſe the ſiege of Orleans, and conduct Charles to Rheims, where he ſhould be anointed and conſecrated.

Robert ſent this damſel to the King at Chinon; and whether ſhe was really a viſionary, who thought herſelf actuated by divine Inſpiration, or only uſed it as an inſtrument for the execution of a ſcheme, which the court had contrived to revive the ſpirits of the French, broken by ſo many repeated defeats, certain it is, ſhe was received as ſomething ſupernatural. She diſcovered the King, whom ſhe had never ſeen before, in ſpite of a diſguiſe he had aſſumed to deceive her, and the doctors of theology being ordered to examine her, declared that her vocation was altogether miraculous.

The parliament of Poictiers, after the like inquiry, eſpouſed the ſame opinion, and the King gave out that ſhe had explained to him certain ſecrets which ſhe could not poſſibly know but by divine revelation. By theſe means every body was prepoſſeſſed in favour of the Maiden, and the people in general believed ſhe was expreſsly ſent from God for the ſalvation of the kingdom. Hitherto the ſcheme, as in all probability it was, ſucceeded to the wiſh of the projector. Joan of Arc was looked upon with adoration; and the French troops glowed with impatience to retrieve their honour, under the auſpices of this female champion.

She was certainly endowed with the courage and addreſs of an Amazon, and her natural intrepidity was flattered by the arts of ſuperſtition, ſo that ſhe was wrought up to a degree of enthuſiaſm, that overlooked every ſpecies of danger. She aſſumed the habit and armour of a man, and was furniſhed with a ſword from the tomb of a renowned knight, in the church of St. Catherine de Fierbois.

The French ſoldiery being thus animated, Charles ſent a convoy to Orleans, guarded by a ſtrong body of troops, whom the Maiden had aſſured of ſucceſs, and when they approached the gate of Burgundy, the Baſtard made a ſally to favour their entrance. A long and obſtinate engagement enſued, and the Engliſh being defeated, Joan entered Orleans at the head of the convoy, amidſt the acclamations of the people, who were now fully ſatisfied of her divine miſſion.

That this ſpirit might not be allowed to cool, ſhe, on the 4th day of May, attacked the fort of St. Loup, which was one of thoſe that the Engliſh had raiſed for the blockade of the place, and after a furious diſpute of four hours, carried it ſword in hand, againſt a garriſon of 1200 men, 400 of whom were killed in the aſſault.

In two days after this action, ſhe proceeded againſt Fort St. John, where ſhe met with very little reſiſtance from the Engliſh, who had well nigh abandoned it before her approach. Having ſecured this conqueſt, ſhe marched immediately againſt the fort of London, which was the moſt conſiderable of the whole number, and took it by ſtorm, after a very obſtinate engagement. Without giving her troops the leaſt reſpite, ſhe led them that ſame evening againſt the fort of Tournelles, but for want of daylight, was obliged to poſtpone the attack till next morning, when ſhe begun the aſſault, which continued fourteen hours without intermiſſion. The French were repulſed four times, and as often led back to the charge by Joan in perſon, notwithſtanding her being ſhot with an arrow between the neck and ſhoulder. At length the fort was taken, and 600 of the garriſon cut in pieces.

Such a ſeries of ſucceſs, evidently owing to this virago, who was extolled as an agent from heaven, produced univerſal conſternation amongſt the Engliſh. Though they did not believe the divinity of her miſſion, they conceived a notion rather more abſurd, and ſuppoſed that ſhe acted in compact with the Devil. The loſs of ſo many forts, and dejection of the ſoldiers, rendering it impoſſible to carry on the operations of the ſiege, the Earl of Suffolk abandoned the enterprize, after having laid ſeven months before the place, and retired in diſorder, not without conſiderable loſs from the beſieged, who now purſued them in their turn, though greatly inferior in number. Such a panic prevailed amongſt the Engliſh, that they were afraid of facing thoſe troops whom they had ſo often defeated, and ſo lately deſpiſed. The very generals ſeemed ſtupified with terror: for inſtead of keeping their forces together in a body, until they ſhould have recollected themſelves from this trepidation, they diſtributed great part of the army in places near the Loire, which they had reduced before they undertook the ſiege of Orleans, and retreated with the reſt to a great diſtance, ſo that the enemy had leiſure to retake the town and fortreſſes which they had thus garriſoned; which being done, Charles proceeded to his conſecration at Rheims.

ORTEGAL, (CAPE) CAPTURE OF FRENCH SHIPS NEAR, IN 1747. The Britiſh miniſtry received intelligence of a large fleet of French merchantmen from St. Domingo, preparing to ſail for Europe, under convoy of four men of war; wherefore the Lords of the Admiralty ordered the Kent and Hampton-Court, of 70 guns, the Eagle and Lion, of 60, the Cheſter of 50, the Hector of 44, with the Pluto and Dolphin fire-ſhips, to proceed immediately to ſea, under the command of Captain Fox, in the Kent, who, on the 20th of April, arrived upon his cruiſing ſtation off the Bay of Biſcay, where he continued his cruiſe between Uſhant and Cape Finiſtere, for the interception of the St. Domingo fleet. On the 20th of June, at four in the morning, the Britiſh ſquadron began to deſcry the French, being then in the latitude of 47 degrees, 18 minutes, north Cape Ortegal in Galicia, the moſt northern promontory in Spain, bearing S. E. diſtant 146 leagues. This homeward bound St. Domingo fleet, conſiſting of 170 ſail, under the convoy of Commodore de la Motte, with the Magnamime of 74 guns, the Alcide of 64, the Arc en Ciel of 58, and the Zephyre of 36. The French were at windward, the wind at N. N. E. The Britiſh ſquadron chaſed them the whole day; and at night the French men of war bore off, the Kent N. N. E. about two leagues. The Britiſh ſhips being foul and ſickly, by the long continuance of their cruiſe, could not gain upon the French men of war, on the 21ſt, from eleven o'clock till five in the afternoon, with all ſails ſet, though the French were only under top-ſails and fore-ſails: but about a quarter after five, the French Commodore finding the Engliſh approaching very near him, ordered the men of war to ſet their main-ſails, and top-gallant-ſails, and went away without making any ſignal, either by light or gun, eſcaping in the night, and abandoning his convoy, on the 22d of June, there being but very little wind, the Britiſh ſhips purſued the French merchant-ſhips which had ſeparated, and took ſeveral; but on the 23d, the wind blew freſh in the ſouth-weſt quarters, with very thick weather, and prevented the Britiſh ſhips from overtaking them. However, the Advice of 50 guns, commanded by Captain Haddock, being a clean ſhip, and cruiſing in the Soundings, fell in with, and took ſeveral of them. The Kent took five of the French merchant-men, the Hampton-Court five, the Eagle ſix, the Lion nine, the Cheſter four, the Hector and Dolphin fire-ſhips four, and the Advice eight, which they conducted to Plymouth. Beſides theſe, five others were taken by a ſquadron commanded by Sir Peter Warren, which ſailed from Plymouth on the 6th of June, to intercept what might eſcape Commodore Fox. The whole number of prizes being 46, having 1248 ſailors on board, with very valuable cargoes of ſugar, indigo, cotton, coffee, and hides, of which all their ladings conſiſted.

OSTEND, SIEGE OF. A city and port town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in Flanders. This memorable ſiege was undertaken on the 25th of July, 1601, by the Spaniards, under the command of the Archduke Albert, who was urged to this undertaking by Prince Maurice, the year before failing in his deſigns upon Nieuport, (ſee NEWPORT.) Prince Maurice had indeed intelligence of the Archduke's intentions, and he reinforced the garriſon of Oſtend with twenty companies of Engliſh troops, and appointed Sir Francis Vere, an Engliſh gentleman, governor. He was cool and intrepid, and ſhewed by his vigorous defence he was not unworthy of the truſt repoſed in him. He extended his outworks and lines to ſuch a conſiderable diſtance, that the Spaniards found it very difficult to clear away theſe obſtacles, in order to approach the walls of Oſtend.

In one of the little redoubts, Captain Robert Coote, with only forty men, defended himſelf againſt nine battalions twenty hours, and afterwards obtained an honourable capitulation to join the garriſon. As the harbour was open, the place frequently received ſupplies of every kind. The Spaniards endeavoured to choke the paſſage, by throwing into the channel ſacks filled with ſand, large ſtones, &c. but the violence of the tide rendered their attempts abortive, therefore they proceeded to a vigorous ſiege on the weſt ſide of the town, where they made ſome impreſſion; but the wind forcing the ſea into their trenches, they could not purſue their advantage, and the beſieged repaired their breaches.

Winter coming on, the Spaniards found they had a more formidable enemy to encounter than the Dutch; the rigour of the ſeaſon ſwept away multitudes. Nor did the garriſon eſcape unhurt; it was reduced from 7000 to 4000: indeed part of that number, the Engliſh particularly, were gone home. However, the Spaniards received large reinforcements, and encouraged by ſuch aſſiſtance, they came to a reſolution of giving a general aſſault with their whole army, which the Governor being adviſed of, he, to amuſe the enemy, beat a parley, and promiſed to ſurrender in ſo many days; but in the mean time, receiving a ſupply of five companies of Zealanders, he broke off the treaty, and renewed hoſtilities. This was a terrible mortification to the Archduke, becauſe he had invited a great number of quality to be ſpectators of the ſurrender of this important place. He was greatly exaſperated at the affront, and therefore commanded ſome of the outworks to be inſtantly ſtormed; but after a very obſtinate and bloody diſpute, his troops were obliged to draw off; and the blockade continued without any thing material till midſummer 1602, when Prince Maurice made ſome attempts to relieve it, and Sir Francis Vere reſigned his office as governor, it having been agreed, that every ſix months there ſhould be a new governor. Frederic Dorp ſucceeded him, and he with great ſkill and diligence filled that important poſt. Several attacks were made, and ſometimes ſome of the outworks were gained, but then the beſieged, by their well concerted ſallies, always regained them.

Winter again returning, hoſtilities were not ſo frequent, and the ſiege for the ſeaſon was changed into a blockade. It will now be neceſſary to take a review of all the military tranſactions of the armies, Spaniſh and Dutch, for the years 1603 and 1604, as they were occaſioned by, and relate to the ſiege of Oſtend.

About the middle of ſummer, the Archduke having received a conſiderable reinforcement out of Spain and Italy, under the conduct of Ambroſe Spinola, he detached 7000 foot, and 3000 horſe, from his camp before Oſtend, under the command of Frederic Harenbergh, to reduce ſome rebellious ſoldiers at Hoogſtraten; but thoſe having obtained aſſiſtance (under certain conditions) from Prince Maurice, left only 800 for the defence of that place; the reſt, conſiſting of 1500 foot, and 1000 horſe, encamped under the walls, where being joined by 10,000 foot, and 3000 horſe, under Prince Maurice, they marched together to Getrudſberg. Harenbergh lay encamped not far from thence, on the other ſide of a great plain, which the Prince, though not without great difficulty, by reaſon of the fenny ground, having paſſed with a great part of his artillery, offered battle to the Spaniards; but they keeping within their intrenchments, only ſome ſlight ſkirmiſhes happened between the horſe; and next night marched off without beat of drum towards Herrendaal. The next morning, diſcovering their retreat, the rebellious ſoldiers of Hoogſtraten followed them, and attacked them in the rear with good ſucceſs, whilſt Prince Maurice was following with the whole army, in hopes to attack them in their march, in ſome defiles they were of neceſſity to paſs; but being detained in his paſſage over a brook, and the badneſs of the roads, the enemy got into the open plains, where not thinking it adviſable to attack them without his cannon, they continued their march, and he ſat down before Hartogenbuſh.

Within three days after, Harenbergh advancing likewiſe towards the city, intrenched himſelf near the village of Dalem; and after ſome time ſpent in light ſkirmiſhes, ordered a fort to be made between Prince Maurice's camp and that of the mutineers of Hoogſtraten, to intercept their convoys from Hueſden. The management thereof being committed to 2000 choſen men, under the conduct of Bella, an Italian, they advanced the work with ſo much expedition, that by night they had carried it on to a man's height, before Prince Maurice had any notice of it. He being ſenſible of the danger that muſt needs enſue thence, if the ſame were brought to perfection, marched thither in perſon with ſome of his beſt troops. The Engliſh being the firſt who aſſaulted this new work with great bravery, were as bravely repulſed; but being ſeconded by the French, they carried the poſt, after a ſlaughter of 2000 of the enemy.

The Archduke came ſome time after into the town, and perceiving that Prince Maurice had erected a quadrangular fort near the ſame place where the attack had been made, commanded the ſame to be attacked by break of day, and that with ſuch fury, that before Prince Maurice could come to its relief, the fortifications were laid level with the ground, and the garriſon ready to abandon the fort; but being encouraged by his approach, and a conſiderable ſupply of great guns and ammunition, they forced the enemy to deſiſt from their enterprize.

After

After this misfortune, Archduke Albert found means to engage the city to receive a garriſon of 3000 men, and ordered a ſtrong fort to be erected for their better ſecurity. The approaching winter obliged both the armies to ſeek out for their winter quarters; the mutinous ſoldiers of Hoogſtraten, in conſideration of their ſignal ſervices done this campaign, having the city of Grave aſſigned them for their retreat.

In the mean while, the ſiege of Oſtend was carried on with incredible labour and charge: for in the ſpring, the Spaniards having again attempted a general aſſault, were repulſed with great loſs; having only made themſelves maſters of ſome remote and inconſiderable redoubts, ſlightly guarded by the beſieged, becauſe they were under a neceſſity of employing their chief ſtrength in the defence of other places of much greater conſequence. About midſummer, Nott being ſent to ſucceed Dorp in the government of Oſtend, Ambroſe Spinola came into the enemy's camp, having obtained the ſupreme command in the ſiege. As he had been advanced to this dignity upon great promiſes of attacking the place in a more ſucceſsful and expeditious way than before, and furniſhed himſelf with a conſiderable ſum for that purpoſe, he employed many Italian engineers in building machines, to obſtruct, or at leaſt to annoy their entrance of the port; moſt of which, though they not wholly anſwered the deſired effect, yet by his indefatigable care and induſtry, rendered the paſſage into the port dangerous and difficult. He alſo took effectual care to open to himſelf a way to the town, by making ſeveral broad roads, by means of hurdles, faſcines, and other materials, to the chiefeſt outworks, with an intention to take them one after another.

The States of the United Provinces, at the beginning of the year 1604, being ſenſible of the danger of Oſtend, reſolved either to attempt its relief, or by a powerful diverſion, to draw the enemy thence, or at leaſt to open themſelves a door into Flanders by another way. Accordingly, Prince Maurice having brought together an army of 12,000 men, the ſame was tranſported out of the Iſle of Walcheren into Catſand, another iſle made by the ſea, the port of Sluys, and an adjacent river, called the Black River, where they landed their men on this ſide of the river, the oppoſite banks being defended by 2000 men, under the conduct of Pompejo Juſtiniani, an Italian commander. Prince Maurice having ſpent ſome days in battering a fort on the oppoſite ſide, and endeavouring to paſs the river, but in vain, a country fellow at laſt diſcovered a fordable paſſage at a good diſtance thence, whereupon the Prince having detached a ſelect body to wade through the river, the ſame was done accordingly; and having, without any oppoſition, made themſelves maſters of an adjacent caſtle, a bridge was laid over the river, affording an eaſy paſſage for the whole army.

Not far from thence were two conſiderable forts, called St. Catherine and Philip, defended by Trivulcio, and a good body of the country militia, beſides ſome regular troops. The firſt being battered for ſome time by Prince Maurice with ſlender ſucceſs, he ordered the cannon to be drawn off, which not being done without much noiſe and confuſion, the beſieged (thinking they were preparing for an aſſault) were ſo terrified, that they retreated to Fort Philip, and thence to Fort Iſendike, leaving only ſixty men to guard the former, who ſurrendered upon the firſt ſight of the Dutch troops. In the fort of Iſendike they defended themſelves for ſeven days, when having received a peremptory ſummons, they alſo capitulated.

In the mean while the Spaniards attempted the recovery of Catſand; for which purpoſe, a conſiderable number of them having croſſed the river in boats in the night time, 600 of them had already poſted themſelves on the bank, when the Scots quartered there taking the alarm, forced them to retreat with great loſs.

After the ſurrender of theſe two forts, Prince Maurice having taken poſſeſſion, and put a garriſon into Ardenburgh, formerly a noted city, had directed his march to that tract of ground which parts the two rivers leading from Damme and Bruges to Sluice; but as he was approaching the lake of Morkerk, he found the narrow paſſes thereabouts poſſeſſed by Albert Lewis Velaſco, who having obtained a ſmall advantage over the van of the Dutch, was ſo eager to purſue his victory, without ſtaying for his horſe, that having fallen in with the main body, he was put to an entire rout, with the loſs of 500 men ſlain and drowned, and 200 taken priſoners. By this victory, they opened themſelves a free paſſage over the rivers, all the forts to the weſt of Sluys were abandoned by the enemy, except that of St. George, which alſo capitulated as ſoon as they ſaw the heavy cannon brought againſt them.

Prince Maurice then poſted his army in three diſtinct bodies, commanded by himſelf; Count William and Count Erneſt of Naſſau, about the town of Sluys, ordering at the ſame time, Nott (lately returned from his government of Oſtend) to draw a line from the other ſide of the rivers as far as Ardenburgh, and by the means of boats and frequent guards diſpoſed in convenient places, to obſerve the enemy's motions. But before theſe lines were brought to perfection, the Spaniards found means to throw a conſiderable reinforcement of men into the town; but as they ſtood more in want of proviſions than men, this rather forwarded than prevented the enſuing ſurrender.

The relief of Sluys was committed to the conduct of Spinola, who, though much againſt his will, having accepted this charge, firſt endeavoured to force the paſs near the lake of Morkerk, but being repulſed thence, he attacked Count William's camp, where having met with the ſame reception, he turned all his fury againſt the forts of St. Catherine and Philip, which being ſoon taken, for want of ſufficient garriſons, he attempted the ſurpriſing of the Iſle of Catſand, in the night time, at low water; but Prince Maurice having got ſcent of the matter, went thither in perſon, and provided ſo well for the ſecurity of this important poſt, that the ſame ill ſucceſs attended the Spaniards there as in their former attempts. The garriſon ſeeing themſelves thus deprived of all hopes of relief, and being reduced to the utmoſt extremity, were glad to capitulate: 3000 of them, like ſkeletons, marched out of the place, after having endured a ſiege, or rather a blockade of three months.

The

The Dutch found ſeventy pieces of cannon, ten galleys, and 1400 galley-ſlaves in the place: theſe laſt were ſet at liberty. Aurelius Spinola, a near kinſman of Ambroſe Spinola, was not diſmiſſed, but on condition that all the Dutch ſeamen in the Archduke's hands ſhould be ſent home.

Whilſt the Spaniards had been obliged to divide their forces for the defence of Flanders, thoſe of Oſtend got a little breathing time; but the campaign being ended on that ſide by the ſurrender of Sluys, the beſiegers renewed their attacks with more vigour than ever: for after having in vain tried all the inventions of ſtopping the paſſage in the harbour, they had recourſe again to mines, cannonading, and frequent aſſaults, by which at laſt they carried the forts called the Gullet of Hell and the Hedgehog: but this ſort of ſervice proving too hot for the Spaniards and Italians, they ſhewed but little inclination for the like attempts again. The Germans were prevailed upon, by promiſes of reward, to attack the Sand-Fort, which they did with ſuch undaunted bravery, that though they ſaw the firſt aſſailants blown up into the air, the reſt purſued the aſſault, and made a lodgement in the breach. By taking of theſe forts, the beſiegers now advanced to the place. The beſieged did all in their power to defend the place, by making new works and intrenchments inſtead of the old ones; but as they were made in haſte, ſo they were not long proof againſt the fury of the enemy's artillery, which laid them almoſt level with the ground. The States-General conſidering the danger the garriſon was expoſed to, and the ſmall hope there was of relieving a place, the avenues of which were in the poſſeſſion of the enemy, and judging the taking of Rhineberg, Grave, and Sluys, a ſufficient equivalent for the loſs of Oſtend, they ordered Marketta, then governor, to ſend away the greateſt part of the artillery by ſea, and then ſurrender upon honourable terms; which being done accordingly, 3000 men, capable of bearing arms, marched out of the place with four pieces of cannon to Sluys, leaving the enemy nothing but a heap of rubbiſh, in recompence for a ſiege of three years, in which they owned to have loſt no leſs than 40,000 men. Though the defence of this town coſt the Hollanders very dear, it having been computed that they loſt at leaſt as many men.

In the year 1706, the Duke of Marlborough laid ſiege to it. The natives of the place were at this time diſpoſed to return to the Auſtrian family, the French having ſeized it, on the death of the late King of Spain, for the Duke of Anjou; but their garriſon had ſo loſt all heart and ſpirit, that they made not the reſiſtance which was expected.

In ten days after the Confederates had ſat down before it, and within four days after the batteries were finiſhed, the place capitulated. The taking of this place in ſo ſhort a time, was ſo much the greater honour to the Confederates, as before it had withſtood ſo long and vigorous a ſiege. The French in order to juſtify M. de la Mothe, the governor, ſay that the place was entirely defenceleſs, the ſoldiers were in want of arms, and there was a miſunderſtanding among the officers; add to theſe, that the inhabitants were ready to mutiny.

They found in the harbour two men of war, one of eighty, and the other of fifty guns, and about forty-five ſmall veſſels more, which were not compriſed in the capitulation.

F. Daniel ſays the place was well defended by the Count de la Mothe; but above 40,000 bombs having been thrown into the place, which had made it a heap of ruins, the menaces of the inhabitants that they would revolt, a miſunderſtanding between the French and Spaniſh garriſons, and a want of arms for the ſoldiers, obliged the Count de la Mothe at length to capitulate.

Oſtend April, 1794.

General Clairfayt wrote to Captain Robinſon, of the Brilliant frigate, off Oſtend; and alſo to General Stewart, the governor, acquainting them that the French to the number of 60,000 men, had attacked him in his poſition to cover Oſtend, which was the object of the enemy; that he had repulſed them ſeven times before they made the leaſt impreſſion; on the eighth attack they penetrated his lines, and forced him to retreat, with the loſs of about twenty-three pieces of cannon. His loſs in men had not been ſo great as he at firſt apprehended. General Clairfayt adds, that he had only three brigades, (not 10,000 men), and that his defeat was not of that nature to endanger Oſtend; and that when his re-inforcement would be all arrived, if Pichegru did not pay him a ſecond viſit, he, General Clairfayt, would march in ſearch of him.

There were more than 5000 men in Oſtend. The Duke of York had returned to Valenciennes, and was approaching to join General Clairfayt. Prince Coburg had marched for Maubeuge.

The Britiſh cavalry performed wonders in the attack on the 26th ult. and to their honour, although terrible in battle, the inſtant that quarter was aſked for by the enemy, their ſwords were ſheathed. All our officers agree, that the French artillery, which was laſt year ſo formidable, is now very ill ſerved. It ſeems they had ſtripped their garriſons of Liſle, Arras, Douay, &c. to add to Pichegru's army.

Oſtend, dated June 25, 1794.

On Monday laſt, at break of day, the French attacked the Allies at Peteghem and Deynſe. A part of the Duke of York's army had marched to Peteghem for the purpoſe of co-operating with General Clairfayt at Deynſe. After a very ſevere and well-fought action, the Allies retreated on all ſides, and the French made themſelves maſters of Peteghem and Deynſe at the point of the bayonet.

The Allies retreated to Ghent, whither they were purſued by the French. Unable to reſiſt the victorious army, that city was forced to throw open its gates to them. The magazines which fell into their hands are immenſe. Since the capture of Ghent, our communication with Antwerp, Mechlin, and all the upper part of Flanders was cut off.

The Engliſh troops who were poſted at Ghiſtel fell back back to Oſtend, and have ſince defiled along the canal to Bruges, where they encamped behind the town.

Oſtend, 1798.

Captain Winthrop, of the Circe frigate, arrived at the Admiralty with the diſpatches from Captain Popham, of the navy, and Lieutenant Colonel Warde, of the guards, giving an account of the reſult of the ſecret expedition, the object of which has been accompliſhed, though with conſiderable loſs, by burning a number of gun-boats at Oſtend, deſtined for the invaſion of England, and completely deſtroying the locks, baſon gates, and ſluices of Bruges Canal, which were eſteemed the moſt complete works in Europe. By the accompliſhment of this great object, the internal navigation between Holland, Flanders, and France, has been deſtroyed; the beneficial conſequences of which, to this country, will be, that the armaments fitting out at Fluſhing and Dunkirk, if they mean to attempt a junction, muſt put to ſea for that purpoſe, and of courſe will run the riſque of being captured by our cruizers.

The object which we have thus attained is conſequently of a very important nature; but we regret to add, that it has been accompliſhed with the loſs of about 1,200 of our men taken priſoners (who, from the ſtate of the weather, were prevented from embarking), near ſixty rank and file, and ſome brave officers, killed and wounded; among the former is Colonel Hely, of the 11th foot; and in the liſt of the latter is General Coote, the military commander of the expedition, who is a priſoner; Colonel Campbell, 3d guards; Major Donkin, 49th foot; and Captain Walker of the Artillery. The force which the enemy brought down to attack our gallant little army is eſtimated at no leſs than 14,000 French and Dutch troops, to whom General Coote, after a ſpirited reſiſtance, was under the neceſſity of capitulating. However, on the whole, we cannot help conſidering the reſult, though attended with ſome lamentable circumſtances, as highly advantageous to Great Britain, honourable to the troops employed, and creditable to the government who planned the expedition. The following official details were publiſhed.

His Majeſty's ſhip Expedition, Oſtend Roads, May 20, 1798.

Sir,

I beg you will do me the honour to inform my Lords Commiſſioners of the Admiralty, that in purſuance of their orders of the 8th inſtant, I proceeded to ſea with the following ſhips and veſſels, Hecla bomb, J. Oughton; Harpy, H. Bazely; Ariadne, J. Bradby; Expedition, H. Popham; Minerva, J. M'Kellar; Savage, N. Thompſon; Blazer, D. Burgeſs; Lion, S. Bevel; Circe, R. Winthrop; Veſtal, C. White; Hebe, W. Brichall; Druid, C. Apthorpe; Terrier, T. Lowen; Veſuve, W. Elliot; Furnace, M. W. Suckling. To anchor to the Eaſtward.—Champion, H. Raper; Dart, R. Raggett; Wolverene, L. M. Mortlock; Craſh, B. M. Praid; Boxer, J. Gilbert; Acute, J. Seaver. To keep to the weſtward, for the purpoſe of making a feint to land there), having on board the troops under the command of Major-General Coote, for the purpoſe of blowing up the Baſon Gates and Sluices of the Bruges Canal, and deſtroying the internal navigation between Holland, Flanders, and France. On the 18th, P. M. I ſpoke the Fairy, when Captain Horton told me he had taken a cutter from Fluſhing to Oſtend, and he underſtood from the people on board, that the tranſport ſchuyts fitting at Fluſhing were to go round immediately by the canals to Dunkirk and Oſtend; and although it was impoſſible that any information could give additional ſpirit to the troops forming this enterprize, or encreaſe the energy and exertions of the officers and ſeamen under my command, yet it convinced Major-General Coote and myſelf, that it was of the greateſt importance not to loſe any time, but to attempt, even under an increaſed degree of riſk, an object of ſuch magnitude as the one in queſtion; and as the weather appeared more favourable than it had been, I made the ſignal for Captain Bazely, in the Harpy, to go a-head, with the veſſels appointed to lie as beacons N. W. of the town of Oſtend, and for Captain Bradby, in the Ariadne, to keep between the Expedition and Harpy, that we might approach as near the coaſt as poſſible, without the chance of being diſcovered from the ſhore.
